"You didn't exactly let me get there." Sam turned back to his brother, one arm still closing the open cabinet door, and gave him a minor bitchface. Not strong enough to make the numbered charts, but a bitchface all the same. "Jo, Asa and Bucky are headed this way."

Dean straightened in surprise. "They are?"

"I told them we'd still meet them at Cold Oak, but they were pretty insistent it was a waste of time. I, uh," Sam pulled a sheepish look, gigantor shoulders twitching, "I think Ellen might have told them we were trying to catch some sleep, because they said they'd come to us rather than meet halfway."

Well, Dean would definitely be having words with Ellen about that shit, because it was so not okay (and total bull). He and Sam would have been fine on an hour of sleep (only, no, they really wouldn't have and Dean knew it) and this was their case, their responsibility, so they would have handled it (only it would have sucked and been potentially dangerous on that little sleep, and Dean had been the one to argue for acting responsibly here in the first place since they couldn't afford any more careless slip ups to the timeline).

"They'll be here in an hour or two," Bobby picked up the stream of conversation since it had died off. He handed the last of the groceries to Andy to put away, folding the bag up all neatly and sliding it under the sink. Too neatly. Dean's eyed the three of them suspiciously. "Asa says he owes you boys a drink, so he's bringing the beer and we're providing the grub."

How…strangely domestic, Dean thought with a blink. Bobby and the boys, having friends over for dinner. That hadn't happened…uh, well, outside of 'last night on Earth' gatherings, Dean could probably count on one hand the number of times he could remember company in the house.

(Jody didn't count. Half the times she'd been over, even after she got in on the hunting gig, it had been for half-assed attempts to arrest Bobby on something or other that they all knew she'd never actually follow through on.)

If they didn't have a missing woman to find, proof Azazel was starting to gather his special kids, and hadn't just lost their only leg up in this whole damn thing, Dean might even be excited about a little get-together. Unfortunately for them, they were Winchesters, so this was going to be all business. The fun would have to wait until after they stopped the Apocalypse.

-o-o-o-

It was halfway through Bobby cooking up dinner (a couple racks of ribs out on the barbeque with some potato salad he'd picked up from the store (and regular old salad at Sam's insistence that there be a least one vegetable present (ugh))), that Andy finally made the mistake of leaving his phone unattended. Dean, who hadn't forgotten the scene he'd walked in on earlier and how the kid had conveniently put the device away only once Dean was in the room, swiped it off the counter while Andy was busy helping Sam cut vegetables (to put on the salad. Vegetables…on top of vegetables. His brother wasn'thuman. He was a rabbit possessing a human. Dean was sure of it).

Andy made an aborted swipe for his phone the moment he realized what was happening, but by then it was way too late. Dean was into the device (and, really, Apple kind of had a point about lock screens being standard. He'd never have been able to do this so easily in 2016), pulling open the kid's camera app. He had a pretty good idea of just what Andy had been so gleefully trying to show his brother.

Yep. Sure enough, the last photo taken was one of him and Cas in that hospital bed, snoozing away, curled up all honkey-dory beneath Bobby's old quilted blanket, before any of Angela's equipment had been put in place. They looked like a snuggly, happy, sleepy little couple (god. Friggin'. Damnit. Dean was gonna murder someone. Anyone. Probably everyone at this point. But most definitely Andy). The hunter glared his truly scary glare at the kid, who shrunk beneath it, ducking physically behind Sam. The Sasquatch arched a particularly amused-but-still-very-judgemental-and-just-why-do-you-think-that's-going-to-save-you look over his shoulder at the kid.

Dean got a flash of the board game Sorry across the inside of his skull, a fairly familiar image by now (one of Andy's go-to's for sure), but since there was most definitely an after image of the word 'not' stamped all over the damn thing, flickering in and out like a ghost of a thought Andy had no hope of controlling, the message didn't exactly ring out with sincerity.

The older Winchester deleted the photo with a series of key strokes that the phone was lucky to survive. Andy winced with each one even as he made a valiant attempt to steal his phone back before the deed could be done. Said valiant attempt ended with Andy on the floor in a partial headlock, Dean now manipulating the device literally in front of his face while he pinned him to the ground (kid should have known better than to tackle a Winchester. Even a former Jedi).

"Don't bother," Sam said to Dean at the same time as the older Winchester cried out triumphantly, photo gone forever. That death glare transferred from the phone in his hand (and the top of its owners head) to the beanstalk still cutting up carrots like there wasn't a wrestling match going down on the linoleum behind him.

"What do you mean, 'don't bother'?" Dean growled. This photo was an attack on…on…well, on his person! (His manliness. It was an attack on his manliness, let's be honest). Such an attack warranted – no, demanded – retribution. His reputation would stand for nothing less! He tightened his grip around Andy's neck and the kid let out what could probably pass for "meep!" through his damaged vocal chords.

For a guy stuck in a headlock, pinned to the floor by his much larger (and stronger, and more experienced, and far, far more dangerous) surrogate brother, Andy was still way too smug for his own good. Sam looked utterly unsurprised by that fact, or by the series of images that assaulted both Winchesters shortly thereafter.

There was a flash of the standard digital icon for e-mailing and texting, then a smiling shot (like a polaroid that moved along the edges; a not quite still photo, but the nanoseconds of captured time just before the picture was taken) of Sam, one of Andy himself curtesy of the reflection of the upstairs bathroom mirror, and a third of Bobby, definitely less than smiling and all grump and gruff.

Dean, reeling from the rapid fire images, lost his grip on Andy and the kid scrambled away (making sure to 'accidentally' deliver a good kick to the solar plexus in his mad dash for freedom). Now wheezing as well as reeling, the older Winchester wasn't in the best of states to play Pictionary, so Sam did the translations for him.

"He already e-mailed the photo to himself, as well as me and Bobby." Sam swept all his chopped carrots into the large bowl of salad with a quick scrape of his knife along the cutting board. Because he was a rabbit in the shape of a man. Dean just glared and wheezed. "Texted it to us, too."

That glare transferred to Andy even as a sixth image came through. This one was a flash of memory, not unlike the bathroom mirror clip of Andy. It probably came from the kid exploring the house since it was an old but familiar picture in Bobby's den, one of the few photographs sitting on his many bookshelves. He, Ellen, and another man Dean could only assume was Jo's dad, were all smiling, standing close enough for arms to be slung over shoulders, in front of the Singer house. Between their hair, clothes, and Ellen's baby bump, the photo was clearly from the eighties.

Sam glanced over at the former Jedi, who was leaning against the counter now, victorious smile firmly in place despite the fact that he was breathing like he'd just taken on the best WWE had to offer (and barely escaped with his life). The Samsquatch had his Samsquatch eyebrow game going strong. "Ellen too?"

Andy nodded, all proud of himself, and Dean sat upright, all wheezing one hundred and ten percent in the past, replaced with a growing redness that could only be described as apoplectic and the sudden need to choke on pure air.

"You sent that photo to Ellen?"

In the blink of an eye and the span of one very angry question, the former Jedi was once again hiding behind Sam, cowering for his life. He was kind of wondering if he should make a run for it (and just how far he'd make it) when Sam asked how he even knew Ellen Harvelle. Andy shrugged, miming a phone to his ear with one hand, the other pointing to Bobby's row of phones from behind the safety of Sam's very broad shoulders.

Both Winchesters followed the gesture, staring at the bank of phones and then back at Andy. Dean blinked at them, then their Jedi, while Sam frowned curiously. Ellen must have called using one of Bobby's 'supervisor' aliases for some reason or another, and Andy had been the one to pick up.

Which…

"How the hell did that even work?" Dean groused, climbing off the floor with a grunt. He was getting old, and that was coming from a body ten years younger than he'd gotten used to.

Andy made some quick gestures with his hands that meant absolute squat to Dean, but Sam's frown turned into mollified surprise.

"Huh," the younger Winchester said with a tone just shy of indifference, turning back to his vegetables. "Ellen knows Morse Code."

Andy smiled, Dean glared, Sam chopped. Then Dean chucked the kid's phone at his head (the delay had come as Dean decided whether to throw it at Sam, who was way to calm and unaffected by this, or Andy, who had started it. Starting it won). The kid managed to fumble-catch the device with minimal damage done to his face (pity, Dean thought) and the older Winchester dusted himself off and cracked his back, satisfied by the way Andy ducked back behind Sam in an abundance of caution and fear at the mere motion.

Dean decided heading out to the grill to see if he could help Bobby was a better use of his time than staying in the kitchen with Mr. Doesn't-Care-About-the-Destruction-and-Mortification-of-his-Brother's-Reputation-as-a-Manly-Man and the One-Who-Started-It. Both of whom he might just murder if he thought any further on the fact that there was no recovering from Ellen Harvelle having a picture of him and an angel cuddling in a home hospice bed. At least she didn't know Cas was an angel. Although…honestly, that might make it worse because it would bring up a lot more questions on just who that woman was that had gotten Dean all soft and snuggle-tastic (all accusations and word-choices that Dean would be firmly, firmly objecting to. People would be hearing from his lawyers. Just you wait). Not to mention that if Ellen had the photo, it was a damn downright certainty that Jo had seen it by now too. Jo, who was on her way to Bobby's house right that very minute. So, yes, he was going to go help Bobby outside with the grilling so he didn't go to federal prison for patricide.

Dean and Bobby made small talk about the weather and sports games neither of 'em actually knew or cared that much about (because Dean knew Bobby had been the one to put that blanket on him and Cas. Any other blanket and Dean might have had reason to think it was Andy, acting on that soft heart that actually did exist beneath the pranking, evil, underhanded little brother persona. That or he'd just been properly set dressing his blackmail scheme. But no, that blanket in particular meant something to Bobby. He was the only one who ever dragged it down from the top of the linen closet. Dean suspected why, but he'd never asked. Just knew it meant something over the years when he or Sammy or the both of them together woke up tucked under that old, hand-made quilt. (He was trying not to think about it meaning anything now. Nope. Not at all. He had enough of that going on in his head thanks to Angela Garrett. He did not need to add Bobby's opinions or hints into the mix.) So, Bobby had definitely seen him and Cas sharing a bed and was probably the one who'd gotten Angela set up on the machines. Which meant he'd gotten an up close and personal view of the angel, curled on her side, spooning Dean with her hand tucked up under his shirt. And that was why they were now making small talk about the weather) until the ribs were declared done. They were just pulling them off when the sound of two cars – engines rumbling and tires crunching packed dirt and small rocks – came from around front.

Jo and her entourage had arrived.

"Good timing," Bobby said neutrally. Dean liked to think it was neutral because hewas feeling anything but, trying not to moan and groan about having to face Jo Harvelle when she'd most definitely seen photographic proof of him cuddling with a mystery woman. She would definitely not be making small talk about the weather.

The older Winchester picked up the platter of ribs – an old ceramic dish that looked like it'd survived from the eighties right along with that picture of the Harvelles – and headed for door to the kitchen. "I'll, uh, get these cut up. You and Sammy go greet the invaders."

The plate of meat was lifted off his hands faster than Dean could blink, Bobby holding it and the back door open already, leaving Dean to stare and wonder how the hell he'd moved that quickly (or smoothly). The expression on the old hunter's face wasn't letting him off easy, either. Bobby easily saw through that magnanimous, 'oh, but you first, sir!' bullshit like he hadn't been born yesterday (which, he hadn't, thanks very much). He gestured with his ball-capped head for Dean to get his butt moving inside. "You can go mingle since they're here for you, ya idjit, and I'll serve up dinner."

Dean definitely went for a frown, though given the raised, unimpressed eyebrow he got in return, it was probably closer to a defeated pout. Still, the hunter headed inside, already hearing his brother's deep voice coming from the front of the house. Accepting his fate (bracing for it, more like), Dean headed for the front door, walking into the narrow foyer of the Singer house in time to reel back at the nothing-short-of girly-ass squeal.

"Andy!"

Jo had the kid pulled down into a hug. The girliest friggin' hug Dean had ever seen. Her arms were wrapped around his neck, smothering his face into her shoulder. Mother frigign' hell, she even had one leg tucked right up off the ground, bent at the knee like a goddamn damsel in distress as she hung off him like arm candy. Dean could only stare, wondering if he should get the holy water, because there was no way that, in any way, shape, or form, Joanna Harvelle. None. Not any version Dean had ever gotten to see.

(Although that wasn't entirely true. Dean had seen that same look in her eye before. That teasing smile like she'd found a puppy to take home and spoil rotten. It was the same look Jo had after she'd been introduced to Cas and gotten over the 'yeah, right, an angel' phase. It was that look that had taken over her face when Cas downed about twelve shots and thought he might finally feeling a tingle. It was the look of a woman who had got their manicured claws around something they found adorable.)

(It was a scary look. A look to be feared by sane men everywhere.)

Andy, meanwhile, flailed in her arms with meagre fight, largely for show, but otherwise was doing absolutely nothing to free himself from Jo's octopus arms. He actually looked like he was enjoying himself. Which meant Dean was gonna murder him, soon as he figured out how to detach the two from their newly merged hips.

"My favorite Jedi! It's good to see you," Jo announced with a wide smile as she finally pulled away, leaving Andy to gasp a breath of free air and grin right back, still half bent over to make up their three and a half inch height difference. Jo's smile, though, started to turn down at the corners when Andy didn't say anything back. He just kept smiling wanly, straightening up with a self-conscious shrug when Jo's grin turned into a confused frown and she unfurled from him, stepping back. Her eyes flickered down to his neck, ever wrapped as it was these days in several layers of clean, white bandaging. "What's wrong? What happened?"

The last question was directed at Sam and Dean, both standing to the side, with increasingly somber expressions. Andy drew her attention back to him with a shrug of his shoulders and a larger, more confident swipe of his hand across his neck; a pretty standard symbol for muteness. And, as it turned out, one that also worked as an explanation for his injury. At least for Sam and Dean, who knew that the kid's throat had been slashed.

Though, given the stormy look taking over Jo's eye as she glanced between the three men again, she'd picked up the gist of it. After all, she knew what Andy could do with his voice. It wasn't a giant leap to assume someone – or something – might have been interested in taking that away.

"Bad hunt," Dean answered, though, since the silence stretched and he knew Andy couldn't actually do it for himself. He kept his voice stoically neutral, more than aware of Asa Fox and Bucky Sims standing just inside the front doorway. They'd come in behind Jo, jovial enough, each with a bag slung over one arm and a case of beer tucked under the other, but they'd quickly noticed the shift in mood.

Jo was frowning worse, now, but Andy bumped her in the shoulder with a loosely clenched fist and smiled widely, delivering two thumbs up. He was alright. Everything was alright. He followed it up with the actual words, signed messily, but with growing confidence at least. He didn't expect the blonde to understand, but he was starting to get (and, oh-the-horror, even agree with Bobby) that learning ASL was important.

To his surprise – and that of at least three other people in the room – Asa Fox signed back.

'Dude!' Andy all but exclaimed with his hands, eyes wide and grin ear-to-ear. He had to spell the word out, since after three hours of searching on the web, it had become depressingly obvious there wasn't a dedicated ASL sign for one of his all-time favorite words (which was, frankly, unacceptable in Andy's book. He was currently thinking up his own, but such an awesome word required an awesome sign, so he was taking his time). 'You sign?'

Asa pointed at himself with his free hand, then raised it to his forehead, palm curled, and tapped his fingers against his skull twice. That same hand lowered, intent to form another word, but with a grimace, Asa floundered, forgetting the sign for what he was trying to say. He ended up waving his hand side to side, which was definitely not the official way to tell someone you only knew a little ASL.

If Andy had a voice left to do it, he would have laughed. He liked this guy already.

Asa shrugged sheepishly and said to the group, "I only know a couple words. Dated a girl a while back who had deaf parents. She taught me a little. It sorta stuck with me, don't know why."

Even as he spoke, Asa's dominant hand was running through the ASL alphabet almost absentmindedly. It was clear most of the movement was muscle memory now. He screwed up every couple of letters and had to actually think to get the sign right. It was something he'd probably run through the motions of when bored, lying in bed trying to fall asleep. Or maybe he'd done it with his lover, curled up against her warm, naked body as she giggled into his neck, tickling the sweat-cooled skin there with every breath as she fixed his hand positions, again and again, for many nights until his muscles remembered every slide of her fingers against his skin, ever position they had formed with her assistance.

(Or, it was possible, Andy watched way, way, too much television and far too much of that much was trashy romance flicks and teenage dramas.)

Andy left Jo's side to clap the guy on the shoulder. Asa had himself a new fan. Which was ridiculous, Dean thought, watching from the sidelines. Because everyone talked legend of how Asa Fox could win anyone to his side in the span of about six heartbeats – usually with a smile alone – but seeing it in person was something else. (It was not fair, is what it was. No one should be that charismatic and cool and stupidly perfect.)

(And Dean's inner fanboy was losing its shit right about now. Seriously, the older Winchester was fighting a smile, pulling his face repeatedly back down into the serious frown that this serious discussion about a serious, devastating injury deserved. Given the way Sam was looking at him with distorted concern and Jo was giving him the unimpressed eyebrows, he probably just looked constipated.)

Then Andy tugged Jo's bag off her shoulder like the gentleman he was and, with a sweeping gesture, beckoned them further into the house. (Also not fair. If Dean had tried to pull that move with Jo, she'd have elbowed him right in the belly and called him a chauvinist. But Andy got away with it because he looked like a kicked puppy that was physically incapable of hurting a fly let alone judging it based on gender.)

(Andy. Their Andy. The Sith Lord and punk little brother extrodiare, who could fry your brain with his mind. But yeah, no, he was totally harmless. Uh-huh.)

As Jo entered Bobby's Den, Asa and Bucky following behind (they'd clearly been in the Singer house before given the confidence with which they navigated past the piles of books and clutter of occult), Andy turned to the Winchester brothers. He waggled his eyebrows suggestively Dean's way and the older Winchester rolled his eyes on default. He stepped into Andy's space, the kid tilting his head up to stare at the taller hunter, eyebrows still going, and Dean took the strap of Jo's bag from where he held it over his shoulder like some suave suit jacket or something.

"Dude. She thinks of you as a puppy."

Sam walked past them with a head shake and nothing to say. Andy's face fell momentarily, digesting the words, then it scrunched up in thought. He tilted his head back and forth, like he was debating his options. Then, with a shrug, the kid's face spread back into that wide, open grin and he gave Dean two thumbs up, eyebrows back to waggling.

'I can work with that.'

Dean rolled his eyes with a grunt – why did he bother?! – and walked away shaking his head too, leaving the Sith Puppy Lord to follow, grinning like an idiot.

-o-o-o-

They made it as far as the kitchen when the doorbell rang. Bobby was serving up the ribs, sides, and salad (ugh, Sam) onto an assortment plates while Asa got the beer in the fridge and Bucky, Jo, and Andy started rounding up chairs and extra table-slash-any-surface-will-do space. They all paused briefly at the noise, but no one but Sam and Dean looked surprised, glancing at each other and then Bobby. It became clear by the fact they were the only ones to do so, that everyone else had been whatever new company had just shown up.

Dean deadpan glared at his surrogate family, Bobby pointedly not looking and Jo busy taking a sip of her beer, before he stomped his way to the front door. He wasn't entirely surprised to find Ellen standing on the other side of it, a twenty-four pack in one hand and a grocery bag of what looked like pretzels and snacks in the other.

"What is this, an intervention?" Dean growled somewhat low in his throat. Cuz it sure wasn't a hunter's picnic. Those weren't a thing.

"Jo called me." Ellen shrugged one shoulder. "Seemed important."

"Nice of you to give us the heads up." Dean stepped aside to let her in, though the pointed look he leveled her way was returned with nothing but a 'mom' smile.

"Would you have stuck around if I had?"

Dean frowned, all narrowed eyes and affronted brow, because yeah, he would have. Probably. Maybe.

The older Winchester grunted as Ellen bodily handed him the case of beer as she walked past, right to his stomach. He dutifully followed with a grimace once he 1) was sure he wasn't going to drop the case and B) could breathe into his stomach again.

"Hi, mom," Jo called from the kitchen. Asa was pulling another two beers from the fridge – presumably for Ellen and Dean, since everyone else already had one. Andy was doling out the plates of food, passing it over shoulders as most of the crew settled in seats around the table or kitchen. Asa passed Ellen her beer with a charming smile and a wink.

"Ellen."

"Asa."

Dean set the case of beer on Bobby's desk and did not think about those two together. Asa was only a handful of years older than him (less than a decade), which, in comparison, put Ellen closer to his mom's age, a connection Dean did not want to think about. So he decidedly did not. Bobby apparently agreed with him, making a harrumphing sound of sheer disapproval and 'best watch yourself in my house, boy' that had Asa laughing. Ellen swatted the old flirt with her free hand, then took an offered plate loaded with ribs and chips and multiple salad types (only one of them actually consisting of lettuce). She decided to settle in a chair next to Bobby (conveniently vacated by Bucky only seconds earlier, who happened to like living and knew better than to get on Ellen or Bobby's bad side in any way, shape or form. Unlike his idiotic best friend). Bobby seemed all sorts of pleased with this, if you knew where to look past the gruff and the grump and the glare.

Dean actually had to look away for a moment, eyes dropping to the rug in the den as he remembered another timeline for those two – one with a happier ending for them both – that would never exist because, last he checked, the Titanic had hit an iceberg and sunk in the middle of the North Atlantic. Which was a stunningly depressive thought for an entirely different reason than the hundreds of souls lost at sea.

A beer popped into his vision and Dean's head snapped up. Asa was standing in front of him with that friendly smile of his. The older Winchester cleared his throat and took the beer with an appreciative nod, stowing his crap as far back in his head as he could manage.

"Thanks, man."

"Sure thing. Gonna join us?" Asa tilted his head back to the kitchen, and Dean realized that he'd been hovering on the edge of the room, still in the den, note quite joining the congregation of hunters as they started chowing down and clinking bottle necks like it was a regular family together with beer and grub and maybe even a ballgame later.

Not that the Winchesters had much experience with those sorts of things.

Sam was watching him from the table, his gigantor frame hunched over in a chair half his size, sitting kitty corner with cricket legs bunched up around the leg of the table. His look said something comically caught between, 'I understand your plight and sympathize,' and 'Don't you dare leave me in here alone with them, Dean, I will murder you.' The older Winchester huffed, shook his head, and took a swig of beer.

"Course," he answered casually, Winchester smile back in place as he sauntered into the kitchen behind Asa Fox. He tried (and failed) to shove down the dread knotted tight in his stomach over what this was probably all about.

(There were only so many possibilities, really, and almost all of them pointed right back to him and Sam. Given the way Sam kept glancing to him, the younger Winchester knew it too.)

Ellen rapped the back of her hand against the table beside her, a clear indication for Dean to take the only empty seat left, right next to her. Dean glanced over at Asa, thinking of offering it to him (maybe as an out for sitting next to the woman who was clearly about to interrogate the hell out of him, but more so just because turnabout was fair play and Ellen had made the first move). But Asa was already settling himself against the kitchen counter beside Andy, who'd jumped up and was now sitting cross-legged beside the stove (ignoring Bobby's pointed looks to get down. Dean realized this likely a common battle). So, reluctantly, the man from the future took the corner seat across from his brother, Bucky stuck between them, and accepted a plate of food passed over his shoulder rather precariously by Andy, who hadn't moved from his spot on the counter, just leaned really far forward.

It sat completely untouched in front of him. Those knots in his stomach hadn't exactly left much room for an appetite.

"So." Ellen decided to take the reins of this intervention (it was really more like a battle charge: infantry in first, cavalry on reserve, ready to flank on their general's orders). She'd gotten a call from Jo once they were back on the road out of Cold Oak, updating her on the situation and their new destination of the Singer Salvage yard. The single mother had had a choice to make; whatever was going on, she knew it was bigger than Dean or Sam were letting on and now her daughter was a part of it. Which left Ellen with a decision to make. And she'd chosen to show up. "You gonna tell us what the hell's going on, boys?"

There was a long beat of silence, filled mostly with Sam and Dean exchanging a silent conversation held entirely in worried looks, dark eyes, and raised eyebrows. Occasionally, they included Bobby in the chat. He seemed as talkative as ever, face hardly moving, and yet he got his meaning across, clear as ever.

"Before we get into that…" Dean purposefully turned away from Ellen to nod at Bucky, Asa and Jo, his eyes settling on the last of the three. Jo straightened a little under the attention, game face pulled on. Asa had likely taken lead on the hunt, but it was Ellen they'd called for help and her daughter she'd picked to do the job. Besides, Jo was his friend and deserved the recognition. "Cold Oak was empty?"

Her pretty brown eyes glanced towards Asa and Bucky, but they both gave her the lead and with that her confidence was sufficiently bolstered. She met Sam and Dean's gaze each in turn before nodded solemnly at the older of the two. "We searched the whole town, Dean. Found nothing. Well, nothing living. Some old police tape, what looked like blood stains in a couple places." No one missed the way Andy rubbued absently at the bandage around his neck, but most didn't see the reaction for what it was. "That was it. We searched the woods too. Nothing. No girl, no psychic kids. Just, a lot of restless spirits and that Acheri demon."

"Thanks for the heads up on that, by the way," Asa piped in, tipping his beer in the boys' direction. "Ran into that bastard about fifteen minutes into our search."

"Red ribbon 'round the neck worked like a charm," Bucky added with a smile, lips stained with barbeque sauce from the rib in his hand.

On top of the counter, Andy smiled bitterly, dropping his hand from his neck, but only Bobby and Ellen were facing him well enough to notice. Bobby gave the kid a sympathetic nod, which Jo caught, following over her shoulder to her cross-legged friend. Her eyes dipped down to his neck and then snapped back to his face in shock. She turned fully around in her chair, white-knuckled fingers gripping the back of it.

"The Acheri did that?" Her gaze darted down again and Andy raised his hand almost self-consciously, fingers barely skirting the edge of the bandages once more before he dropped his hand. He still didn't like to touch it, not consciously, at least. He couldn't shake the expectation of pain every time he did, even if it was healing well enough and only hurt on the bad days.

Andy shook his head, gaze locked on his lap, even as Dean said, "It's a long story."

"You got somewhere else to be?" Ellen challenged, all heads snapping her direction at the sharp words.

Dean ground his teeth, biting back his own retort. Because yeah, he did. Out looking for Ava Wilson (although he knew they'd never find her). Or the new haunt Azazel was using for his battle royale (they'd never find that, either. Not without help. Not until it was too late). Or trying to stop Hell, in general, from unleashing the goddamn apocalypse. Or, shit, how about just letting everyone finish a nice meal with some halfway decent company for once instead ofruining everyone's appetite and the almost-pleasant evening?

But he couldn't come out and say any of that, now could he?

Sam shared a sympathetic look with him, but neither Winchester answered her question, or her daughter's. Ellen glanced between the two of them, then turned her head to the left to look expectantly at Bobby. The gruff hunter, friendly as the two of them might be, just shrugged his shoulders.

"Not my story to tell."

Ellen huffed with (admittedly fond) annoyance, but loyalty wasn't a fault she'd hold against anyone, especially Bobby Singer. So she turned those mama-bear, demanding eyes back on John Winchester's boys and tried a different tactic: some tough love. "Look, we know something's happening. Something big. A demon kidnapping psychics, dropping them in a ghost town in the middle of nowhere? That's not your everyday hunt, boys. And you know more than you're letting on. Now, far as I knew before showing up here, we were all on the same side."

She speared each of them in turn with that terrifying Harvelle look, daring them to tell her that had changed or she was wrong. No one spoke a word.

"Which means it's us versus them and far as I can tell, there side holds all the cards. 'Cept for whatever you've got that you're playing close to the chest." She didn't miss the way Dean winced and tried to hide it, or absently rubbed at his chest before dropping his hand once he caught his brother's eye. She didn't understand it, but damnit, she didn't like being on the outside of a bunch of secrets. Secrets got people killed in their business. She said as much, sharp and bitter, with a throat that was too closed up and water too close to her eyes, thinking of a husband and father long gone.

Jo's gaze lowered to her food, now left untouched. So did Dean's and Ellen knew they were both in the same headspace with her.

The barkeep cleared her throat, pulling on that shield of badassery that had let her keep her bar for so many years after Bill had passed on. "So spill. We got questions and we're not leaving without answers, boys."

Dean's eyes tracked to his brother and it was obvious that, despite him being the older one and, as Ellen suspected, the ringleader of all those secrets, they were in this together. Sam shrugged one shoulder, picking at his salad with a plastic fork. His food was barely touched either. Still, even with the obvious trepidation about this, he looked like the more optimistic of the two. Which wasn't hard, really, since Dean looked like a man on Death Row.

Damn, but did he not want to do this again. He didn't want to drag them into it. Not Jo and Ellen. Not when he'd promised he'd keep them out of it.

(An empty promise. One he'd always known had nothing backing it. There was no way he could keep them out. No more than he'd been able to keep out Sam or Bobby or Cas.)

"You said they were like family, Dean," Sam spoke quietly, well aware everyone could hear him, but there was no other way this conversation would – or could – go down. Of course, Dean had been talking about Jo and Ellen. Neither of them knew Asa or Bucky from Jack, regardless of what legend and hearsay had to say about their character.

Dean had thought well enough of Roy Dabb and Walter Loflin, at least as far as hunters and reputations had gone. (They were, arguably, idiots, but that was neither here nor there.) And those sons of bitches had deposited a shotgun round each to his and Sammy's chests when they found out about the Apocalypse. So, yeah, Dean was sure as hell playing those secrets 'closer to his chest' this time around.

"Hey, man," Asa interrupted, raising his hands, one holding his beer. He was clearly picking up on the elephant in the space that existed between the two brothers. "Bucky and me can peace out. It's no big deal, we'll grab a hotel in town and meet up tomorrow."

Bucky looked put out by his buddy's offer. He was obviously curious about what was going on and probably had more than a passing opinion on what sticking their necks out by going to Cold Oak ought to get them in return. But Dean had the feeling Bucky was the type to follow Asa's lead, no matter what.

True to form, the guy didn't speak up and Asa continued with his offer. "This seems like a family thing and we only got an invite because we were escorting a pretty lady here."

He winked Jo's way. She rolled her eyes but also looked over to Dean, opening her mouth to protest. But those lips thinned into a line before she said anything, realizing that Asa had a reason to say what he had. She knew him well, him and Bucky, but the Winchesters didn't. Asa was just nice enough – nicer than the rest of them – to bow out tactfully. Jo looked down for a second, rethinking her words. She'd go into a firefight with Asa Fox any day, and she thought Dean would too, if he got to know him.

Jo looked up, locking onto Dean's gaze with a steadfast promise of her own. "They're good people, Dean. You can trust them."

The older Winchester wanted to fold to those soft eyes, the only part of Jo that wouldn't be hardened in the future by her dreams of becoming a hunter. But Dean didn't know if he could – if he was ready to – risk his brother, risk the angel sleeping upstairs or any of their friends, on a pair of hunters he didn't know. Even if they had been keeping Jo safe for months now.

Sam met his eyes, but the younger Winchester was deferring to him. His story to tell, his call to make. No matter how much of a role Sam had to play in that tale. He did, however, glance at Bobby for support either way, and Dean followed his gaze.

The older hunter mirrored the same shrug Sam had given when it came to the Harvelles, one of the only ones at the table still eating the meal he'd bothered to cook. He tugged on the cap of his hat with the hand not covered in barbeque sauce, pushing it a little further back on his head. His gaze met Dean's with a mix of support and 'it's up to you.'

"I trust 'em," is what he said aloud, nodding towards Asa and Bucky. "Besides, you two are gonna need all the help you can get."

Green eyes shuttered closed, not completely sure that's the answer he'd wanted. It was probably the answer he and Sam needed, but it meant this intervention train was going right on ahead, full steam.

Dean ran a hand over his face, then scrubbed it through his hair. Damnit, Bobby had a point. And his gut (and inner fanboy, admittedly) wanted to trust Asa Fox. He didn't know much about Bucky, other than that the pair had always been just that – a pair – but his hunter instincts weren't screaming to run away, either. His head sure was, but since when had Dean Winchester ever listened to that? No, he would trust Bobby and Ellen and Jo's word over his own brain any day of the week.

"Alright," Dean muttered on the release of a deep breath. He nodded, head bob jittery but decision already made. He met Sam's eyes first, then pinned a hardened look – the one not quite made in Hell but definitely influenced by it – on each of the hunters gathered in Bobby's kitchen, one by one. "Alright, but nothing that's said here tonight leaves this house."

Jo and Ellen exchanged glances. Asa held his gaze despite Bucky checking his way. But Dean wasn't playing here, and he wasn't about to spill ten years of secrets, some quite literally out of this world, to anyone who thought he might be.

"I'm serious. You're gonna hear some crazy shit and you don't have to be in – you can walk away from this at any point – but you don't breathe a word of what you heard here, either way. Everyone agrees to that right now or we're done."

There were plenty more glances exchanged, some of them hesitant, some suspicious, but no one moved. No one called it quits or opted out. That might have been because Bobby's glare was enough to pin them all in place, daring them to walk out on hunters in need. But mostly it was because hunters were damn near suicidal to start with and loyal sons of bitches to boot.

"Think we're all alright with that," Asa finally said, if only because no one else was saying it. The guy even smiled in the middle of what was clearly about to be a shit show. "Gotta say, I owe Mary Winchester everything. So I'm in."

"We're not our mom," Dean countered immediately, and his tone might have sounded like a challenge, but his words were an out for a promise Asa didn't even know the details of.

Though he appreciated the offer as much as his brother, Sam added quietly, "You don't owe us anything, Asa."

"Maybe not, but you're her kids," Asa replied with a wide grin, one that said there was no way in hell one of Mary Winchester's boys was ever gonna talk him out of something he'd made his mind up about, years and years ago. Dean could relate. That smile slipped a little with his next words, though. "I'm too late to repay her – by years, it sounds like – so paying it forward to you is the next best thing I can do. I'd be proud to help, whatever you need."

"I won't hold you to that," Dean muttered, not loud enough for most to hear, because it was highly unlikely Asa had any clue what he was volunteering for. But Dean took in a deep breath at the lack of argument from anyone else, regardless. Because now he had to follow through, and he didn't want to. The breath he let back out wasn't shaky by sheer force of will alone. "Okay."

Now where to start. He'd really been hoping people would argue – flip the metaphorical table – so he didn't have to start anywhere. But when was that ever his kind of luck? Guess he'd tackle it like he had with Bobby: at the beginning. Only problem was, which beginning? Ah, hell. Probably the lie that had started all this and would need to be fixed before they could tell the rest.

'Okay, here goes.'

"Sam and Andy are psychics."

That statement hadn't even settled in the room before Ellen was jumping on it, spotting the lie it uncovered faster than a honey bear on a bee's hive.

"Just Sam and Andy?" she interrupted immediately, eyes narrowed.

Dean met her stony stare, hard as it was. In for a penny, in for a pound. "Yeah, Ellen. Just Sam and Andy."

-o-o-o-

She woke with a gasp, completely surrounded by darkness and a smell that reminded her of cleaning out her grandmother's house last year, only hours after the beloved woman's funeral. Ava sat upright with a jolt, but smashed her nose into a paneled surface right in front of her face. Not that she could see it. Everything was pitch black around her. Ava hissed, rubbing at the sharp sting of physical trauma, and reached out with her other hand to define the space around her.

It was small. Really small.

Oh god. She was in a closet. A closet with no light, given the dangling string she finally found that did nothing but make infuriating clicking noises every time she tugged it in desperate, near-hyperventilating panic.

"Okay, okay, breathe. Just breathe. You can do that." Ava Wilson searched every wall for a hint, an exit, a weapon, a light, anything. She found the latter, which was her last choice out of all of the others, but she'd take it. It was the hunting knife Sam had given to her, sans the leather sheath. It had been in her purse when she…. Her purse that she had dropped in shock when she'd come home to a dark house, no lights, and yellow eyes waiting for her in the shadows. She'd reached for the knife, even managed to unsheathe it, but that…that was the last thing she remembered.

"Oh god," Ava whispered, pressing her back to what she assumed was the back of the closet, though she couldn't exactly tell in the darkness. She clutched the knife to her chest and it felt like an untethered flotation device in the middle of the ocean. A life-saver, maybe, but how temporary of one?

Shaking, Ava reached out and started her search again. Sitting there clutching a knife wasn't going to get her out of this. Wherever this was. There were no nobs or handles to indicate doors, no lines of light to define an exit. Everything was just so dark.

So, naturally, her brain went right back to panicking.

"Let me out of here!" Ava screamed, not thinking enough to worry about who might be on the other side of any one of these walls. At best, maybe someone would hear and rescue her. At worst, at least she would give her kidnapper a headache. Ava banged on every surface she could find, kicking out once her hands started to hurt from hitting and slapping the sturdy, wooden surfaces.

"Hey, hey, hold on!"

Ava stilled at the other voice in the darkness, muffled by one of walls. She faced that one, hoping it was the way out. "Hello? Hello! Get me out of here! I'm trapped!"

"Yeah, I can see that," came the slightly huffy, annoyed voice of another woman just on the other side of what Ava prayed was a closet door (it was possible, after all, that this wasn't a closet but an upright coffin or, or…something else equally terrifying and horrible and not worth thinking about right now, she had enough to panic about, thank you very much!) "Hold on, I'm trying to get it open. It's dark as shit out here."

Ava didn't really care about the quality of 'out there' just so long as it was not 'in here'. Although, once the woman currently rescuing her did get the door open after a loud thud of something heavy toppling over and the horrible creaking and splintering of wood that had been nailed shut, Ava stumbled out into almost equal darkness to what had been the interior of the closet. Then, and only then, did she care about the quality of 'out there' and wish that it was not, as it indeed was, dark as shit.

"Oh god," she whispered into the jacket of her rescuer, who had caught her as she stumbled out of the closet. The woman was stiff as a board while Ava clung to her, arms held up and out wide to the sides, like she couldn't stand the fact she was being touched. Ava was too busy being relieved to be properly offended, though she did manage to upright herself and step away from the clearly uncomfortable woman. "Thank you. Thank you for getting me out of there."

"Uh, yeah, sure. No…no worries." The woman, no older than Ava herself, had blonde hair, or what Ava thought was probably blonde. It was really hard to tell in the dim lighting. In fact, the only light source seemed to be coming from a phone clutched in the woman's hand, the flashlight component on the back shining towards the ground.

"You have a cell phone?" Ava asked rather dumbly. Hers had been in her purse. It had been one of the first things she realized while trapped in that darkness, searching for a light or a way out. Now Ava turned around to the space she'd come barreling out of only seconds ago. It was a closet, and looking at it now, she was surprised it had held her at all. The door was old, the wood splintered and paint peeling, the hinges rusty. The walls surrounding it were covered in old, dirty wallpaper that was peeling back in some places and missing entirely in others.

They…they were in a house of some sort and it had seen much better days. More of it was falling apart than wasn't and the furnishings that were left were few and far between (as were any signs of life other than Ava and her new friend).

"Where are we?" Ava asked, spinning around to complete a little tour of what was quickly becoming the world's least fun funhouse. Everything was old and dark, windows boarded up so that the only light came from the phone clutched in her rescuer's hand. Ava darted forward for a light switch as soon as she saw one. It was an old style one, probably installed in the forties or earlier, like the rest of the house. It flipped up with a loud, sharp click, but nothing happened. Ava tried not to let the disappointment drown her and she clutched that flotation device – Sam's knife – tighter to her chest as she backed away from the wall and its useless light switch.

"There's no electricity," the huffy woman spoke up from behind her, though she sounded mostly scared, despite the attitude. "I already tried."

"Have you tried calling for help?" Ava asked instead, taking deep and even breaths to keep from hyperventilating. Brady had always encouraged her to breathe through her panic attacks. Lord knew they'd had plenty of practice while trying to plan a wedding.

Oh god, Brady. Her fiancé would be panicking right now. He hadn't answered when she'd come home, but in the dark Ava hadn't even been sure he'd been there. He'd be so worried when he realized she was missing.

"No signal," the other woman answered, glancing down at the phone with a glare that was probably regret and terror, but mostly looked like moody anger. Ava tried to ignore all that. This woman had rescued her from a closet. She was right up there with Jesus and Taylor Swift right now.

Except…. Except hadn't Sam warned her about being kidnapped and waking up somewhere with other people like her? That's why he'd insisted she take the knife. Because those other people…those other people were going to kill her.

Ava took about six immediate and hasty steps away from the woman, even though she was the only light source in the creepy old house. She…she didn't look like a killer. Heck, Ava was the one with the knife. And if this lady wanted to murder her, wouldn't she have just left her in the closet? Or done it when Ava had been clinging to her like a drowning woman?

She eyed her supposed rescuer cautiously, realizing she was getting an equally wary look in return. Well, she had just leapt across the room like realized the lady had fleas or something. Ava cleared her throat and tried to clear her panicking mind. "Uh…I'm, um, Ava."

"Lily," came the simple reply, filled with suspicion and something Ava wasn't sure what to make of. Attitude, for sure, like an angsty teenager.

Ava swallowed, fingering the knife she was still clutching to her chest. "Um, do you know how- how we got here?"

Lily shook her head, looking away and shining the light from her phone around the house. There really wasn't much to see. It looked like a pretty big house. They were in a hallway of sorts, the closet Ava had been trapped in was the under-the-stairs sort (no wonder she'd smashed her face on the angled, low-hanging ceiling). There were at least three rooms visible just from where they stood, along with an upstairs, obviously. The whole place looked like one of those big mansions from that TV show Brady liked to watch. The one about hunting ghosts.

Oh god. Ava shoved that thought as far from her head as she possibly could. There was no such things as ghosts, she reminded herself and then said it two more times just for good measure. There was no use in putting that kind of thought in her head right now. She and Lily clearly had enough to worry about.

"I don't know," Lily answered the question Ava had already forgotten she'd asked. "I woke up over in that room."

She gestured with the light to what might have once been a parlor. There was only half a chaise left now, and the windows were boarded up behind incredibly sorry excuses for curtains. "I was in my house, alone last night. I have no idea how I got here."

The woman sounded both petulant and pissed about that, and Ava took some heart in their shared predicament. Maybe that meant Lily wasn't here to kill her (oh, she hoped not, but she also kept that knife close. Sam had been pretty adamant).

"The only doors I can find are locked and I bounced a fucking chair off one of the windows once I got a couple of the boards off. They're, like, safety glass or something. I don't know." Lily turned in a slow half circle, light catching on holes in walls, threadbare rugs and crooked sconces that wouldn't light anyway. Ava didn't like this place, wherever they were. "I was trying to find another way out when I heard you scream."

Ava blushed slightly at that but quickly put her embarrassment aside. She'd been terrified (fairly, in her opinion) and there was no shame in that. She was still terrified. "Well, maybe we should try-"

There was a flickering of light – Lily's phone suddenly cutting out, then blinking back on, then off and on again – and a shift in the air, like the room wasn't as big as it had been a minute ago. Or maybe they were suddenly smaller? Ava didn't know. All she knew was that one minute she was turning towards Lily, staring wide-eyed at the phone and praying the battery wasn't dying, and the next there was a third person in the house with them.

Lily screamed and Ava raised Sam's knife on instinct, scrambling back from the man who'd literally appeared out of nowhere between the two women.

He was older, middle aged, dark-haired and…kinda dirty. His coat was rumpled and stained. He swayed back and forth, like he was trying to keep himself up right. The guy looked…drunk, staring unseeing, not even looking at either woman that he stood less than five feet from.

"H-Hey," Ava tried but it came out weak and quiet. She was still holding the knife out in front of her but the thing was shaking as badly as she was. Realizing that was hardly going to save her if this man was a threat (and, honestly, he looked more likely to fall over all on his own than do any real damage attacking them), Ava stiffened her grip and steeled her nerves. "I said, hey!"

She practically screamed it, sourcing all that fear and terror, trying to funnel it into confidence. Mostly it came out sounding like anger, but she'd take it. The guy, however, didn't even move. Was he deaf? Well, Ava supposed that wasn't entirely accurate; he did keep swaying like a drunken fool.

"What the hell…?" Lily asked, phone raised to light the guy. The sudden sound of a train horn blaring in the distance caused all three of them to jump. The man in front of them spun around, looking far beyond them with red-rimmed, bleary eyes.

"Did you hear that?" Ava asked, suddenly hopeful. Train meant tracks and tracks meant a road to civilization. If they could just get out of here-

"What the-!" the sharp intake of Lily's breath and abrupt cut off of her words turned Ava back around. The guy in front of them was lit up like he was standing in front of a damn searchlight. Like, right in front of one. Lily checked her phone around, twisting it around until the beam of her flashlight lit up her own face, then back to the guy who was still lit up like a Christmas tree (in more ways than one). It was very obviously not her flashlight doing it. For one, he seemed to be the only thing lit up by it.

"What-" Ava took a step forward when the man's eyes suddenly went wide and that train sounded again, only a hell of a lot closer. Close enough to shake the house and deafen the two women. They clapped their hands to their ears.

And then the guy went flying. Flying back like he'd been hit by something traveling a thousand miles an hour, his face pancaked and front blossoming with blood. Then he was gone and the house was back to near pitch black and a terrible, awful silence.

Lily screamed. She dropped the phone, the beam of the flashlight bouncing in the fall, landing on its side and blinking out permanently with a shatter of plastic and glass.

"No, wait!" Ava tried to stop her, but Lily was already gone, bolting down the hallway they were in and disappearing into the darkness that filled the rest of the house. Ava tried to breathe through the panic that was building its way up and out of her stomach, overtaking her lungs and chest, clawing up her throat. "Oh god."

Oh god. Oh god, oh god, oh god oh godohgod.

She stared at the space where the man had been, the space where he'd gone…flying. After…after being hit…by a train. In the middle of a house. An invisible train in the middle of a…a…haunted house.

"Oh god," Ava whispered, staggering back in the darkness, knife clutched to her chest, utterly alone. Only not really. Because that… that had been a ghost. She'd just seen a ghost. Oh god. She was locked – trapped – in a haunted house and very, very much not alone.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: Pop quiz time, guys! Where's Ava! XD

The Titanic: This was a reference to an episode in Season 6 where Balthazar unsank the Titanic (Cuz, ya know, he didn't like the movie), which changed a whole bunch of things, including Ellen and Jo's deaths. Instead, Ellen was alive and living a (ridiculously sweet, stupidly heart-tuggy, sickeningly wonderful) domestic life married to Bobby.

Roy Dabb and Walter Loflin: This was a reference to 5.16 The Dark Side of the Moon. Roy and Walter were the two hunters who killed Sam and Dean with shotguns, and they wake up in Heaven and go looking for Joshua and the Garden. The show did not give the hunters last names so I took the last names off the two writers of that particular episode as tribute.

Random Ramblings: So, for some reason I'm not entirely sure of, I totally lost confidence in my ability to write Jo (it was Andy. Throwing in her squealing-like-a-teenage-girl-over-a-cute-puppy reaction to Andy made me doubt myself, even though just-how-not-Jo-it-was was entirely the point. Still. Anyway, what was I saying? Oh right!) So I decided it was time for a refresher and watched 5.10 Abandon All Hope (also an excuse to re-watch a later season. I, admittedly, am a little tired of the early ones with all my re-watches and research) Anyway, again long story short, that is the episode where we meet Crowley for the first time. And oh. Oooooh, I forgot just how much I love Crowley/ Mark Sheppard. And his intro scene ends with a narrow eyed Cas a hundred feet away going, "Got him." And…and guys…I think I gotta write a Cas 'N Crowley buddy cop story. I don't have a plot, I don't have anything, but I have a pair of buddy cops without the buddy and they need my attention. And I gotta get Cas a pair of sunglasses that Crowley tells him to take off constantly

("No, not like that, kitten. You have to take them off slowly, like what you're about to say is a monumentally important moment." "How is a poorly timed pun important-" "Don't ruin this for me. You ruin everything for me. Give me this." "…..sigh. What is the line you wanted me to say?")

Where were we? Oh right! Author's notes!

(Okay, I have a slight plot. Buddy cop up until they get into trouble, and then Crowley bolts (because he's Crowley and he saves his own skin first almost on instinct) and then, here's the best part, he's gotta go to the boys and tell him he lost their angel…(and beg for their help to get him back) ('Beg' here meaning try-to-point-out-that-Dean-really-wants-to-save-his-trench-coated-lover-boy-more-than-he-wants-to-murder-one-measly-demon-(king)-right?) XD I can work on this. I can totally tackle two stories at once (quickly shushes any readers of any other story I currently have going on, all of which are incomplete because, and I quote from my own author's notes: "I can't write two stories at once") Pffft, I so goooot this!)

(Did I already mention I can't start another story, guys?! What is with my brain? It went from no-creativity-we're-on-lockdown-time to LET'S-WRITE-EVERY-STORY-EVER-COME-ON-LETS-GO-GO-GOGOGOGO! head thud)

Up Next: Our little intervention-slash-sharing-chat-slash-Dean's-worst-nightmare-(Oh-the-shiver-shake-feels-of-emotional-support!) continues, while Persephone pokes at Chuck and "Chuck" pokes right back. Azazel has a few choice things to say about Hell, Lilith has a few choice things to say about him, and Crowley just has a few choice words in general about all of this and his unfortunate role in it. Lucky him.

Chapter 104: Season 2: Chapter 71

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: That's right, it's the MORTON HOUSE! First, kudos to Lullyanne, who guessed the new location several chapters ago from Tom's leap year reference! That is some sharp sleuthing, friend, and I was ecstatic to see someone catch that hint ;D Second, kudos to everyone who remembered the poor train-pulverized Death Echo from the Morton house episode! Third, bonus kudos to those who identified the location not by name, not by episode, not even by the presence of the Ghostfacers, but by "the place where gay love pierced the veil of death." I just about died, so extra kudos to Vaesse, and Colored Blue for very nearly killing my computer via spit-take.

Chapter Reference – God's a Penguin (he's really not): When Persephone disappeared for a weekend (to be dragged on a road trip to Minnesota with her favorite road trip buddy, Tom!), Chuck started feeling a little lonely, and gave himself a pep-talk about how he wasn't lonely, he was a Lone Wolf. Okay, well, maybe not a lone wolf. Penguin? How about a penguin. Penguins moved in groups but were also independent, got to where cute little tuxedos, and mated for life. Yeah, Chuck was totally a penguin. (Don't worry, it didn't make sense then and it won't make sense below, either.) See the end of Chapter 68 for a refresher.

Chapter Reference – Azazel revealing what he did to Sam as a kid: Quick reminder that in this story, Azazel was the one to tell Sam how he got his powers. The words he specifically used were, "Bled in your mouth, tiger, and now you've got super powers! Not a bad trade, right?" For a refresher, see Chapter 17 (Holy crap that was so long ago…)

Chapter Warnings: Boy do we have a lot to cover! Chuck and Persephone are discussing whether penguins come in packs or herds (they're really not, but Chuck can dream). Dean and Sam are discussing the merits of demon blood in baby formula (they're also really not, but I'm on a roll here), and Lilith, Azazel, and Crowley are discussing plans that largely involve screwing either each other or the Winchesters. Or both? Why not both!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 71

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

A flash of paper covered in squiggles of black appeared rather abruptly in his field vision, obscuring everything else, including the digitized version on his laptop screen that had been at a far more readable distance before the interruption. Man, he'd been mid-sentence, too. Now he'd already forgotten his train of thought. Chuck blinked until the paper under his nose came into focus. It was the last three pages of his latest chapter, printed out for Stephanie to read an hour ago and now shoved in front of his face by said editorial assistant. He stretched his neck to see just over the top of the paper, where his laptop still sat, that unfinished sentence of the next part of the story – the beginnings of Dean's attempt to explain himself to his friends and family – just sitting there, waiting to be completed.

"Where is this?"

Chuck sighed, resigned to finishing that sentence later (when he'd have to sit, staring at it, trying to remember his train of thought and the words he'd been about to write because they, of course, had been perfect then and were nowhere to be seen now) and turned his attention to what his editorial assistant was pointing to. Steph's finger was tapping the last paragraph on the page, detailing Ava Wilson's unfortunate plight.

"Oh, the haunted house?" Chuck asked almost rhetorically. It became actually rhetorical when Steph didn't answer, just continued staring at him with those scary eyes, and Chuck remembered his editorial assistant wasn't much for unnecessary questions. "Uh, don't know, yet. I'll probably have to do some research, find a haunted house somewhere in the States I can borrow. Kinda sounds fun, actually."

Steph turned away from him, drawing the papers back towards herself with a customary frowny-glare focused on them instead of Chuck for once. She gave a noncommittal, absent-minded, "Mm," in return and the writer, already turning back to his laptop with the excitement of someone who might just catch that train of thought before it left the station (unlikely, but he could hope and dream), paused at the irregularity. He pulled his fingers off the keyboard (the resignation and regret of that lost train more distant this time) and instead turned his full attention to his assistant, who seemed distracted. Which was unlike her.

"Did you…did you have an idea for where it should be?" He fiddled with his hands in his lap. He'd never asked for Steph's advice before, despite the fact that that was, hypothetically, the whole point of having an editorial assistant in the first place.

(He just kind of assumed other editorial assistants were less terrifying to talk to and therefore of more actual help. That, or other authors were braver than him. He was definitely going with the first one, even if the second was more likely.)

(It was at this point that Chuck reminded himself that he was a penguin. Penguins didn't have to be brave. Lone wolves had to be brave, but not penguins. Penguins had packs. Of course, Chuck didn't have a pack, so this analogy was quickly losing all steam and confidence. Herds? Did penguins have packs or herds? Gaggles? His fingers itched and the writer was halfway to turning back to the computer to Google-)

"No." Steph's refusal was sharp and pointed and made Chuck wince, fingers immediately withdrawing from the laptop once again despite the fact that he hadn't actually gotten anywhere near it and she was just answering his question (which he'd already forgotten he asked). Steph didn't seem as angry as the terse reply suggested, just thoughtful (okay, maybe a word slightly more negative than thoughtful. Perplexed? Oooh, pensive! Chuck reminded himself to jot that down when they were done. No use going for the keyboard now, he'd never make it). Stephanie was reading through those several paragraphs again, finger tracing along the page, that frown still pulling at her face in a way Chuck secretly found cute but would never even dream of voicing aloud for fear of a painful, slow, miserable death. "Although, given what we know of Aza- uh, the yellow eyed demon's plans from your writing so far…I imagine someplace secluded. Not easily gotten to."

The volume of her words dropped significantly, and Chuck found himself staring, distracted thoughts of penguins and laptops long gone, brain now laser focused on his editorial assistant. The writer would swear, up and down, right and left, that Steph sounded genuinely, actually honest-to-god invested. Which was more than he'd gotten out of her so far. Chuck's heartrate picked up. Could…could she actually be starting to…like his work? Is that- could that be what this was about?!

Stephanie dropped her arm, papers following, and turned back to him with that brisk formality that always made Chuck straighten up like he was in the Armed Forces. "The location must be far enough away from the Winchesters that when Sam is taken by the demon-" at Chuck's raised eyebrows, Steph merely raised hers right back, daring him to tell her she was wrong about what was coming for his protagonist down the road- "and relocated to this haunted house, it will be difficult for Dean to find him in time for whatever Yellow Eyes is planning."

The prophet swallowed a little roughly because, uh, yeah, those…uh, those were all good points. He should probably write them down. But mostly because Steph sounded displeased. (Maybe she, uh, was getting a little too invested? That certainly didn't sound like his editorial assistant, though.)

"Chuck…" His assistant paused as if weighing her words, which was a foreign sight on his regular weekday houseguest, who was sometimes so disciplined and in control that Chuck found himself wondering if she even had thoughts in those moments or was just executing internal programming like a robot. A cute, scary robot. Who liked to read books.

Maybe that could be his next series, if he survived this one intact.

The look she leveled his way seemed far too serious for their current conversation and he gulped. Scary, scary robot. Chuck's already wayward thoughts turned to the laundry. Had he done it recently? Did he have a clean pair of boxers to change into when this was all over and he'd soaked through the ones he was currently wearing which were definitely more than a day old? He honestly couldn't remember. He probably had a stick of deodorant lying around somewhere, at the very least. Well, he'd definitely paid the water bill last month, so at least he could shower if it came down to that.

Movement next to him drew Chuck's attention back to his assistant. Her hand was on his desk, her weight shifting into him with a subtle slide of those curvy hips. It was probably supposed to come off as innocent curiosity. Maybe a little incentivizing even. Chuck just found it incredibly intimidating and leaned away.

"What is Yellow Eyes planning?"

"Ah, ha ha." The writer suddenly laughed: a little sheepish, a lot relieved. That had not been what he'd been expecting her to ask. He…

okay, to be honest, Chuck hadn't really been expecting anything, because he hadn't had a clue what was going on other than his editorial assistant was really confusing sometimes and very scary all the time. Now, though, he felt back on somewhat familiar ground. Steph was always trying to wheedle what came next out of him, no matter how she denied it. (Chuck liked to think it was because Steph was invested in the story, but he knew it was more likely her way of reporting back to his publisher that he was actually working.)

The writer blushed and grinned all in one go and waggled a finger at her like she was a naughty kid with one hand in the cookie jar. He'd gotten away with it a time or two, and now he was (probably overly) confident in the tactic. "You'll have to read to find out."

Steph stared at him long enough to make him nervous, despite that confidence (which was now nowhere to be found). When he finally looked away, she sighed in that judgmental way of hers that went right to the heart of his creative soul, withering it to dust, and also sent pure panic to that admittedly tiny part of his brain that worried about things like deadlines, paychecks, bills, and job security. So, yeah, absolutely familiar ground again.

"You don't know, do you?" Oh, the judgement was tangible. He could feel it in the air. His soul (and his wallet) kept right on withering.

"It's still…uh, formulating!" Chuck leaned back in his chair, tilting it off the ground a little with a sheepish smile. He waved away her perceived concern with a flopping hand. "It'll come together, don't you worry."

She smacked the stapled pages of her chapter into his open palm with the brisk formality of a middle school principle delivering a detention slip. "I do not worry."

Chuck took the papers with a teasing smile and a glint of something older in his eyes that he wasn't even aware was there most days. "But you are, aren't you? Worried for Sam? And Dean, I mean."

Stephanie's eyes narrowed dangerously, that same school principle now considering full-blown suspension and a parent teacher conference (Chuck tried not to let his nerves show. She'd yet to actually get mad at him so, he figured his chances were good she was more bark than bite. Or, you know, scary glares and judgmental silences.)

"It's okay, you know," the writer stumbled on, those nerves showing with a hesitant chuckle, which was then swallowed halfway through as her murderous look only increased. "Getting attached to characters and worrying about them is kind of the point of reading books in the first place. Isn't it?"

"I am a professional, Mr. Shurley. I do not worry," she repeated before turning on her heel (really, she was just missing the square-framed glasses, a so-tight-your-scalp-hurt-just-looking-at-it bun, and about six inches in stature and she'd have the whole principle thing nailed). Stephanie retreated to her chair near the window and, once settled, added (like a puffed up peacock defending its territory (nothing at all like a penguin, Chuck thought with a little sadness he couldn't place and definitely shook off because his thoughts were getting weird today)), "And I certainly do not get attached."

The writer stared at her, a little hapless and lost for moment (because he'd been sure that had been worry he'd heard in her voice…), before his look shifted into more. It morphed into the wisdom of someone far older who saw much more than they simply wrote down, into the petulant pout of a creator whose creations had just very much been insulted, and most certainly into the narrowed eyes of a challenge accepted.

"Yeah, well," Chuck put his fingers back to his keys, striking them with harsh determination as he muttered, "we'll just see about that."

-o-o-o-

"Sam and Andy are psychics."

Sam's eyes widened at his brother's words, his spine straightening, shoulders drawing back, all reflexively. He'd known Dean was going to tell everyone the truth about Azazel: what that demonic bastard had done to Sammy as a kid, about his plans and the shitstorm that was going to rain down on them in the next three or four years. But Sam hadn't realized Dean was going for broke; he was going to tell them all of it. Including the bit about time travel, which would also mean the part about angels, particularly the one sleeping upstairs.

(Okay, knowing his brother like he did, Dean would manage to leave out a lot of that anyway.)

"Just Sam and Andy?"

At Ellen's sharp question – the woman didn't miss a thing – Sam's gaze flitted to his brother, who looked a little green around the gills, but was holding the elder Harvelle's stare with a rather convincing one of his own. The silence stretched. For just a moment, Sam wondered if Dean would take the out, throw himself into the group of psychics and freaks and kids with demon blood just to keep from having to explain that an angel, which no hunter here currently believed in (at least, none to Sam's knowledge) had sent him back in time to save the world.

Dean swallowed, his Adam's apple bobbing with the movement, but his eyes didn't waver like the rest of him did. "Yeah, Ellen. Just Sam and Andy."

Jo shifted in her seat, face drawn down into what Sam privately thought was an incredibly cute frown as she stared at the older Winchester from across the table. "But Dean, I thought you said-"

"From birth?" Asa asked at the same time, his question far louder than Jo's, who'd spoken hesitantly to begin with.

Dean glanced between the two of them, but Jo didn't finish her thought or even seem to know fully what she'd been about to ask. So the focus of the conversation tilted Asa's way. It was obvious from his question that he was thinking about Mary Winchester, wondering if his personal hero had been a psychic as well.

Sam ducked his head a little, voice tinged with a bitterness he hid well, but not quite well enough. "Not exactly."

Before he said anything else, Sam turned in his chair towards the two leaning against the kitchen counter (or, in Andy's case, sitting on top of). It wasn't Asa Sam's eyes sought out, but the Jedi's. This wasn't just his story, after all. It was Andy's too, and he and Dean hadn't exactly had time to chat with their friend about this little secret council (in part because it was a surprise council to the people keeping the secrets. 'Thanks for that, surrogate family'). Andy lolled his head side to side, an easy shrug on his shoulders that suggested he didn't mind being a part of the story being told, but Sam would have to do all the talking (the joke about his inability to do so was fully implied with a smirk, of course).

"What does that mean?" Bucky Sims broke the tense silence at the table, glancing between the two supposed psychics as they had a silent conversation. Sam turned back, eyes not quite meeting anyone's (which wasn't reassuring). It was proving difficult not to like Sam Winchester, though, even with the clear tension in the room and whatever craziness was going down with him and his brother and these psychics. The younger Winchester was downright bashful, despite his six and a half feet of pure bulk and what was clearly skill backing it. Bucky had heard his fair share of Winchester stories and not all of them were about John. But Sam looked less likely to hurt a fly than he was to be some dangerous psychic (Bucky didn't assume most psychics were dangerous, but given the current feel of the room, it wasn't hard to put two and two together and get five.)

The kid (and he wasn't really a kid, although with his head ducked like that, shoulders slumped, and big brown eyes looking so damn down, Bucky was having trouble thinking of him any other way. Plus, he was only twenty something to Bucky's late thirties, so, yeah, the kid) sighed, like he was bracing for a beating. "I get death premonitions."

While only a revelation to Asa and Bucky (and that's what all this tension was about? Premonitions?! Bucky had a grandmother that was more dangerous than a psychic who happened to see death a little prematurely), the kitchen remained thick with unspoken questions. The Harvelles didn't know if there was more to Sam's abilities than they'd previously been told and were now starting to wonder. Given the little black raincloud hovering over the Winchester's heads (and Bobby's too, though it was hard sometimes to tell what was new raincloud versus the usual grumpy raincloud always floating over his ball-capped head), it seemed likely there was more to this story. After all, both boys had kept the details of their powers (or just Sam's powers now? Who knew what was going on with Dean or the game he was playing) largely to themselves. And neither Harvelle woman had ever been told the origin of those abilities. With the implication that Andy was somehow a similar case, maybe even linked…. Well, the hunting gears were turning and churning out nothing good.

"I…see people before they die," Sam clarified somewhat unnecessarily, but he was used to telling non-hunters, people who wouldn't necessarily believe him right off the bat, and he had that spiel somewhat memorized. "Sometimes in time to save them, sometimes, um…not." The younger Winchester looked away, whether from guilt or a replay of bad memories – or both – didn't matter much. It was obvious the weight the kid carried in tandem with this secret. A weight that wasn't getting any lighter with its divulgence. "But all my visions have been linked back to the yellow-eyed demon."

"Azazel." Seven pairs of eyes turned to Jo, who glanced around with more self-doubt than her confident voice had suggested. She still wasn't used to commanding attention among hunters. Most of them ignored her or hit on her. She could get used to it, though. "That's… his name, right? The demon that killed your mom?"

"Mary was killed by a demon?" Asa straightened from where he'd been leaning against the kitchen counter. His hand was tight around his beer and the look in his eye was nothing short of anguish. Anguish and anger.

Briefly, because they really didn't have time at the moment, Dean wondered just what the story was between this guy and his mom. Whatever Mary had done saving Asa as a kid, it left one hell of an impression.

"Yeah," the older Winchester answered, voice catching ever so slightly on the admission. Even years – years and years – later, it was still so hard talking about Mom. So damn hard. Never seemed to get easier.

"Andy's mom, too," Sam added, confirming what the crew gathered around them had all started to suspect. Whatever was going on, the two of them being psychics was closer tied together than just a gift for the supernatural.

"Adopted mom, actually," Bobby said with his gruff voice, drawing the attention of the room to himself, but his eyes were locked on Andy. The kid was gesturing away, with still-bandaged hands (but no longer penguin fins, at least. He had five fully functional fingers, just wrapped in a collage of gauze, Band-Aids, and medical tape) forming clumsy Sign that was only understood by Bobby and Sam (mostly Bobby). "Kid says he never met his biological mother."

Andy nodded at the acceptable translation, dropping his hands to lean back on them, feet swinging against the counter cabinets. Despite the purposefully casual posture, there was a dark look in his eyes, distant but readable to those looking for it. After all, it was hard not to think of Weber, given the current conversation, and what his evil twin brother had done to their supposedly biological mother. It didn't matter if whether or not she'd meant anything to Andy; dousing someone in gasoline and setting them on fire just wasn't okay, abandonment issues or no.

"Why?" Asa asked, glancing between Andy and Sam, then briefly at Dean, who was obviously the head of this Show-and-Tell, even if Sam was the one doing the sharing. "What was the demon after?"

"Me." Sam's answer was curt, an anger buried beneath it that wasn't intended for anyone in the room. No one would blame him for it, either. "Us, I mean. Andy and me. Kids, with, um, powers like ours. He, he finds them, found us, before we- when we were still young, and, and, um…"

"He finds kids – normal, human kids – who are six months old and bleeds in their mouth." Dean's sharp words, taking over when his brother started to flounder, silenced the room so completely that not even the chairs creaked beneath their occupants.

"What?"

"He does what?"

"Why!?"

The room erupted in questions. Asa pushed away from the counter, the concern and horror in his eyes earning him bonus points in Dean's book (not that Asa freakin' Fox needed more points in his – or anybody's – book). Bucky was white as a sheet, glancing between Bobby and Ellen like they might call the whole thing out as a bad prank. Ellen was shaking her head.

"That don't make any sense, kid," she argued, but Dean could see she just didn't want it to be true. He could relate. "Why the hell would a demon do that?"

"Because it gives you super powers," Sam muttered under his breath, the bitter and callous cut to his tone made Jo flinch beside him. He didn't notice, mind's eye stuck in the past, in the parking lot of a Faith Healer's church with a yellow-eyed murderer offering him a jar of blood for the first time.

"He's looking for someone," Dean said loudly over Sam's mumbling. They did not need anyone in this group thinking either of them were pleased about what Sam could do. What Andy could do either. Kid might have liked his abilities before, but Dean was pretty sure he had a different opinion of his luck now that his throat had been friggin' slashed because of 'em. "Someone special. One 'very special child."

The way the man said it, each word emphasized with distaste and frustration, was enough to clue any of the doubters in that this conversation, wherever it was going, was nowhere good.

"What child?" Bucky asked, but it was Ellen, staring narrow-eyed at the older Winchester, who realized what he was getting at.

"How special?"

Dean smiled at her, all teeth and no mirth. "The prophecy-fulfilling, world-ending kind of special."

"Well that doesn't sound good," Bucky muttered under his breath.

"Oh, it's not." That grin remained stretched, tight and ugly, across Dean's face.

Jo took a deep breath, spine straightening and hands splayed out on the table in front of her. Cataloguing the information and processing it to move forward. Hell of a hunter she'd be, Dean thought. Already was. "How bad?"

That smile-that-wasn't-a-smile dropped an inch as Dean met her eyes. God, he wanted to keep her out of it this time. He wanted that so damn badly. He was sure his eyes said as much, especially with the way hers narrowed, just daring him to keep her out of it. That was a Harvelle woman for you.

"Apocalyptic."

The silence that followed, thick and heavy as a dead body, was eventually interrupted by Bobby clearing his throat, garnering everyone's stunned attention. "Any of you ever been to Sunday School?"

The implication of the question, even in jest, was a dozen times heavier than that dead body in the space between them. It was an entire world of soon-to-be dead bodies, hanging in the air, just waiting to see what they'd do next.

Asa let out a slow whistle, startling a couple of the others. It was the needle that popped the balloon of tension; Ellen swore and Bucky slumped in his chair, hand fiddling nervously with his beer. Jo glanced between her mom and the two Winchesters, gauging how serious Bobby was.

"Are we-" she cut herself off with a headshake, blonde waves tossed back and forth. A short huff followed. Whether she didn't believe it or simply couldn't was unclear in her expression. "Are we talking about the Apocalypse, here?"

When no one answered in the following breath, Bucky, still slumped, took up the charge. It was clear from the fidgeting of his fingers around his beer bottle that he was nervous, but the skepticism in his voice bordered on the edge of this all being a bad joke. "What, like raining hellfire? The four horseman? Oceans turning to blood and half the world going up in flames?"

"The damn devil walking the earth," Bobby confirmed with a stiff, unhappy nod. "That's the one."

It was interesting for those already in the know to watch, actually, having the distance and experience to watch it all objectively. It was clear Bucky didn't believe them. Jo didn't want to, but she knew better than to think her mom or Bobby or even Asa would pull this kind of joke. She didn't think Dean or Sam would either, which left only really bad options as to what this actually was. Ellen, though. Ellen was sharp as a tack and Dean should have known she was the one they should be most wary of in all this.

The Harvelle woman leaned forward, one arm braced on the table in front of her, Dean utterly trapped under her gaze with nowhere to run. "How do you know all this?"

Green eyes darted to his brother, but they were a bit too far down the rabbit hole to escape now. She'd given him an out at the start and he hadn't taken it. He probably still wouldn't if she offered it again, but damnit, Dean was really starting to wish he'd taken the red pill. Sam looked sympathetic, a little too pale, but as supportive as he could considering he wanted a role in this conversation about as much as Dean did. But in for a penny, in for a pound. Dean had started this, and he couldn't exactly call it quits just because he wanted to.

"Because I've seen it all before."

"In your visions?" Jo asked, not tentative but quite. She was as sharp as her mom, only less suspicious. She'd been stabbed in the back fewer times, seen less of the world – less of life – and lost less to it to be so wary and jaded.

"Thought you said Sam and Andy were the only psychics." Damn, but Ellen wasn't going to give him an inch on this, was she?

"They are," Dean parroted, trying not to snap back at the attack. She was only on the attack because he wasn't being a hundred percent straightforward. And he wasn't being that because this was friggin' hard, alright? He took a deep breath and tried to shove the frustration and dread down to his feet in equal parts.

'In for a penny…'

"I'm not psychic," he insisted, and the fact he managed to do so through clenched teeth without sounding like it was said through clenched teeth oughta have earned him a damn Oscar. "I know what's coming cuz I've lived through it. I've done this all once already."

He let the silence fall, the words sink in, the questions on their faces all go unanswered. He let them stare: at him, at each other, at Bobby and Sam, looking for the same answers. No one asked, and this time, Dean didn't stand a chance with those clenched teeth.

"I'm from the future," he ground out.

Bucky straight up snorted. Didn't even try to hide it, which earned him one hell of a glare in return. Asa turned to the closest person, Andy, if for no other reason than to read another's reaction. But Andy had a tight-lipped smile of his own and shrugged his shoulders haplessly. It had taken him a while to believe it, too, and he'd had the added benefit of knowing Dean wasn't lying because of his own powers. It wasn't like Andy could expect any of their new friends to nod along, all 'keep calm and carry on'. He'd be more worried if they did that than if they freaked or just flat out refused to believe.

"I'm…sorry, what?" Jo asked, another little head shake as she kept checking between her mom and the others. Like someone would tell her she was being Punk'ed any second now. Ashton Kutcher was in the other room with the camera crew, right?

"It's true, Jo." Sam's words were quiet and he didn't turn to look at her, just sort of glanced out of the side of his eye. Jo opened her mouth, then closed it again, brown eyes wide and blinking.

"I'm from 2016," Dean continued before their confusion and disbelief derailed the conversation any further (not like anything could derail it as wholly or completely as the conversation itself was a derailment). "An angel sent me back."

An angel that he, conveniently, would forget to mention was upstairs.

"An angel," Bucky echoed, the disbelief definitely on the side of mockery rather than shock. It was funny how that part had actually been easier to admit than the time travel. Probably because he could prove one a hell of a lot more easily than the other.

Bucky chuckled, glancing to Asa to support his disbelief, only to find his friend staring contemplatively at the older Winchester. Bucky frowned, incredulous and concerned. "Come on, tell me you're not buying this? Asa?"

But Asa didn't take his eyes off Dean and the man from the future met that gaze with a hardened stare the other man couldn't find a lie in. "…Why?"

Dean didn't have a clue if Asa Fox believed him, but he appreciated the fact the guy wasn't outright calling him a liar like his buddy all but was.

"What, we're just not gonna talked about the 'Touched By An Angel' part of this ridiculous joke?" Bucky added on the in-between breath, another snort following. Bobby was giving him the kind of warning glance that suggested he wasn't gonna be welcome in the Singer house much longer if he kept up the attitude, but Bucky didn't catch it.

Asa was still staring at Dean, ignoring his friend for the time being, and the older Winchester took that as a cue to answer him first.

"To try and save the world?" He said it sarcastically enough to garner a few weak laughs from the others. At least until they realized that, sarcasm aside, he wasn't joking. None of the others – not Bobby or Sam or Andy – were laughing.

Jo stared at them, something ugly and cold pooling in her stomach, eyes widening as she realized they were serious. Asa looked as grim as she'd ever seen them, and the fact that her mom had stopped with the third degree… Holy shit, they all believed him.

She stared at each of them, then back to Dean, who looked like the bearer of bad news if bad news was the end of the world. He met her gaze briefly and it was all Jo could do to blink and form words of any sort at all.

"Holy shit."

-o-o-o-

It took Azazel years. Years wasted down in the Pit – the equivalent of weeks topside, at a bare minimum, if he was lucky – trudging, wading, slogging through the depths of Hell, the roiling masses of the damned and the demons torturing them. Shoving, gutting, barreling his way through, layer after layer, level after level. Years. All to reach Lilith, who damn well should have been on her way up, preparing for the opening of a Hellgate, not whining down in the lowest layers, still making backups of her backup plans. They were well past the time for planning.

"This is your fault, Azazel!" she screeched, not a full minute after he had finally made it, irate and furious and, even for one as old and strong as he, tired.

"It was a calculated risk," the demon replied, seething. "It happens when you go up against an angel."

"A risk you shouldn't have taken!" The little girl Lilith wore, even here in the deepest depths of Hell, stomped her foot, tiny hands balled up at her sides, skinny limbs shaking in a fury far too big for her tiny body. "At least not without consulting me!"

"We do not have time to converse about every little detail of this plan," Azazel snapped back, quickly losing his patience. "My plan, Lilith."

He usually took the time – the effort and energy and sheer will – to remain calm and level-headed in the presence of Hell's Princess. She was the key to all of this and if he wanted to succeed, he had to keep her placated. But they were now approaching the point of no return – they may have already passed it – and the time for bribing and pandering was over. They were in this together, to the bitter end.

True to form of a spoiled brat who liked to play with dolls and dress-up, Lilith crossed her arms over her diminutive chest and jutted out her chin. "Without me, 'your' plan is useless."

"Without you, Lucifer will never rise," Azazel confirmed, though his tone hardly sounded accommodating, spoken through clenched teeth. "Which do you actually care about, Lilith? Getting your way? Being the 'Queen of Hell'?"

The title was obviously a mockery. A name given to her by those who toiled in the pit, those who looked up a ladder they'd spent their entire lives trying to climb only to end up on the lowest rung of the afterlife. Those who needed leadership. Demons like Lilith and Azazel had always found them, their need for guidance, for royalty and riches to pander after and dream of, truly pathetic.

The yellow-eyed demon pinned her with that gaze now, challenging what she had always stomped her foot about he'd messed up and gotten himself stuck back in the Pit. The two of them had been a pair, as close to agreeance and getting along as a pair of demons actually could. He knew what she was doing now (panicking, or at least as close to as a creature of her caliber ever came) and he would set her straight. They could not afford carelessness or ego, now.

Something he, himself, would also bite his tongue and swallow, no matter how it burned on the way down.

"Or setting him free?" Azazel dropped his voice, a speck of the closest thing to kindness demons were capable of: tolerance. The little girl in front of him still looked pissed, but those curled fingers loosened at least a little. He knew her answer; she wanted what he wanted. She wanted their creator, their father, their God. Far more than she wanted anything else, including clinging to pride and ego. "I had a chance to take down the angel helping the Winchesters. I took it and I lost. It was worth the attempt, but now my schedule cannot afford any more delays. So you'll get no more risks from me, Lilith. Well, none that are optional to the plan, at least."

Lilith bit her lip, fury still radiating off of her, but some of it had been placated.

"Your schedule on the other hand." Azazel managed to keep that tolerance ongoing in his tone, despite the abundance of irritation still more-than present in his system. "You still have quite some flexibility for risks and dalliances. And while those are yours to do with as you see fit, I don't recommend chancing the Hellgate – your only chance to make it topside this century – as one of them."

His voice rose at the end, unable to keep the biting reprimand in check. Lilith narrowed her eyes and tapped her shiny, black shoe against the steaming rock beneath them.

"I was planning on leaving," she snapped back, but the snide comeback was less than intimidating given that she hadn't left. "But I had to wait around for you. Once word came that you were on you way here, it was pointless to start upward."

"I would have caught up," Azazel seethed, annoyed all over again that he was her excuse for not having left a year ago. It took time to move through hell. The stronger you were, the harder movement became. You dragged the very essence of the Pit with you, bending and curving behind you, bogging you down like mire. And with it came all of the demons and damned souls caught in your wake. It was exhausting and tedious, and time was not one of the things they had much wiggle room to be risking.

The look she gave him called him on his bullshit. He knew she wasn't necessarily wrong, even though it grated on his nerves like a knife on the flayed edges of a wound. Lilith would take a quarter of Hell with her on her way up. She'd leave with nothing more than the lightest of entourages – a handful of her closest people – but by the time she reached the top level of Hell, the plane that rested cheek to cheek with the land of the living, her wake would clog the hole for months, regardless of the fact that the gate would only be open for minutes, at most. The flotsam and jetsam of thousands of damned souls alone would ensure Azazel never reached the surface in time to escape the Hellgate while it remained open.

But that 'calculated risk' of taking on the angel had not included the possibility of him being permanently stuck in Hell. He had too much to do. The plan could not afford his absence. So he would have found another way – had one of his many children find him another opening, a smaller one he could sneak through alone – and so Lilith should not have waited.

But, as he'd noted before, the Princess was as close to panicking as one of their kind came. Which meant arguing with her only got more stomped feet and crossed arms and a stubbornness that could rival the actual child she was wearing. So Azazel let it go.

Too much of their plan had been compromised, too many challenges that should have been simple to overcome had steamrolled into massive delays. He understood her worry. It felt like Time itself was against them. Not something a demon down in the deepest pits of Hell had ever had to worry about before.

Admittedly, it was why Azazel had taken on the angel. If he could eliminate the unknown variable – the spanner in the works – than maybe they could get back on schedule, retain the upper hand.

They would only have one real shot at this, after all, and if the full force of Heaven stood as their opposition, they would not succeed. They had to get Lilith topside without the angels knowing about it. The opening of a Hellgate was perfect cover. Thousands of smaller demons and a handful of stronger ones (her hand-picked entourage), would muddy the water, masking Lilith's presence. If Heaven learned of her presence on Earth, they would launch a manhunt for her. It wouldn't stop them, of course – they were far too prepared for that – but it would be a nuisance and a risk to their plans down the road.

They had to get the true Righteous Man in hell. John Winchester had proven a poor choice (which they'd all suspected was the case, but why waste the opportunity to torture the hunter into submission, one way or the other?) but his eldest son was lining up quite nicely. Once they had Dean in hell, there would be no way of hiding their intentions any longer. Heaven would know exactly what they were up to when a Righteous soul didn't turn up on their doorstep like it should, and then it would become a battle of the seals. Hell had the upper hand there. They would have the numbers from the Hellgate, the element of surprise, and, most importantly, time. They had been planning this for centuries in Hell. They knew all of the seals, which ones were lined up for breaking this century, which would be easy to crack, which would be easy to defend, and which to not even bother going for. Heaven would spend the first few precious days – maybe even weeks – just playing catch up. It would be a fight, but Hell had stacked the deck with all the right cards, and a couple more hidden up some sleeves for special occasions.

But the key to all of that – all of it – was that Heaven stay in the dark until the time was right. None of this worked without the element of surprise. And that one stupid angel sitting on Dean Winchester's shoulder – for all that Azazel was sure she was working alone (even if he could not figure out why) – was putting it all at risk.

She had to be dealt with. Azazel had made the first move and taken the first blow. He would have to make sure, no matter what it cost, that the second was to the angel. It would have to be a large enough strike to take her head.

"Well?" Lilith was tapping her shoe again, staring expectantly, arms still crossed over her chest but now in petulance rather than anger.

"After you." Azazel swept his hand past, but Lilith didn't move. He raised an eyebrow at her, straightening back up, ready for the next tantrum they didn't have time for.

"I want a word with Crowley before we leave."

The yellow-eyed demon all but rolled his eyes at the request. Not a request. Lilith didn't make requests, she made demands. "Crowley?"

"Yes." That little chin jutted up once more, as if to ask what he was waiting for. "The next step is getting the Righteous Man to make a deal. Don't you think talking to the 'king' of the crossroads is pertinent?"

"You've had plenty of time to talk with him while you 'waited' for me," Azazel growled, partially under his breath, though he didn't much care if Lilith heard him.

"Go get him for me. And wait outside while we talk."

Azazel stared. He just stared at the peevish little child standing in front of him where a millennia old, incredibly powerful, cunning and devious and wickedly smart demon should be. That chin tilted up further and the Prince of Hell wanted to start throwing things. A temper tantrum of his own, and it would be damn well warranted at this point.

"You get your secrets, Azazel – your calculated risks – and I get mine."

He did want to throw things. Namely, one princess of Hell clear out the nearest window. Not that Hell's architecture had too many of those.

"And you're taking that risk with Crowley."

It wasn't a question. It wasn't even a statement. It was disgust, mostly. But her chin stayed jutted out and Azazel knew there was more going on in that little girl's brain then the petty mask of a spoiled brat she'd wrapped herself in for decades, now. He just hoped it was the cunning demon behind it.

It likely was, for all his anger and annoyance. Lilith was more than competent. If she was taking risks and didn't want him to know about it, she likely had her reasons. No matter how they annoyed him. She was Lucifer's first born (the key to all of this, made by his hand) for a reason.

"Fine," Azazel spoke through gritted teeth, bared through what might be called a smile if you stretched the word as far as it could go. "I'll get you the crossroads demon, but then we're leaving."

Lilith watched him go with the same smugness of a child who'd won the right to set her own bedtime through sheer obnoxiousness, but smiled slyly the moment he was gone. Well, until she realized that she had to talk to Crowley of all demons. That took the smile right off her pretty little face.

-o-o-o-

"You summoned me, Oh Queen?" Crowley scuffed his shoe along the rock floor, ignoring the way the Zegna Italian leather melted against the boiling heat of the stone. How he both loved and loathed Hell. He would have to fix the shoes up once he was topside or put a call in to his tailor to place another custom order.

"I have a task for you," Lilith said it with the air of authority of a true leader, something she actually wasn't half bad at. It was always spoiled by the look she chose, though. Authority on a preteen just sounded like overreaching contempt. Rather ruined the whole leadership bit, in Crowley's oh-so humble opinion.

"Shoot," he returned and wasn't entirely sure he meant metaphorically. There was something about the scheming Princess of Hell's presence that made him, literally, want to shoot himself. Or someone else. Perhaps he should start making those sneaky inquiries about the whereabouts of the Colt. He was fairly sure Azazel had it, the yellow-eyed bastard. But one didn't make plans based on assumptions. Well, not good plans anyway.

"As you know, it's almost time for the Righteous Man's deal."

"I have my best girl already lined up for it," Crowley tossed out easily enough, partially because he knew Lilith was about to ask him to handle it personally. He wouldn't want to volunteer such a service, if only because he never volunteered for anything. Even if it would work out far better for him should he handle the deal himself, he wouldn't want to give that away. With all of the mishaps going on lately, Lilith would request it personally. Better for everyone if she thought it as her own idea.

Not that it would be, of course. Ever since the Winchesters had summoned him with the most preposterous, insane, and frankly suicidal idea of helping them avert the apocalypse, Crowley had been placing the chess pieces to make sure he was the one negotiating the Righteous Man's deal. If he was the one handling the transaction, it would be far easier to spin it to his own needs while screwing Hell (without them realizing it) and likely Dean Winchester as well (if he felt like it. Crowley hadn't made up his mind on whether or not he wanted to risk being on that hunter's wrong side yet.)

Or he could botch the thing up so completely that Hell never got it's Righteous Man. That one would be harder to talk his way out of, but he'd weaseled out of worse. He was fairly confident he could do it. However, Crowley hadn't quite decided which would be his play yet. But he knew he wanted to be the one calling the shots when it came time make that decision.

"Fine, fine," Lilith agreed so offhandedly that Crowley actually blinked. "I want you somewhere else anyhow."

Surely he'd…misheard? The King of the Crossroads stood there like a baffled idiot, staring and blinking as the Queen of Hell agreed to one of his minions handling the most important trade deal of the millennia.

"You…what?" Crowley physically shook himself, reminding his disquieted brain to pull its shit together before he blew his only cover. He wrapped affronted confusion over him like a cloak of invisibility and hid his racing thoughts safely beneath. "Where?"

"With Ruby."

"Ruby?"

There'd been rumors going around Hell, only whispers for now but Crowley could tell they were getting louder and would eventually make the full rounds. Ruby was on the outs with Lilith. Maybe even a deserter. No one had seen her for years and there'd been the quietest of hints, not quite ready to be spoken but certainly implied, that she might have made her way topside. That she might be the spanner in the works for whatever Azazel and Lilith were cooking up that hadn't quite been working the way they planned it to.

Last Crowley had seen her had been half a century ago, at least. Not long before those whispers had gotten started, actually. She'd come asking questions about Lilith's plan, the seals, and the…

Crowley straightened, a trill of discomfort worming its way down his spine.

There was something here that he was missing and he did not like it. He was no assassin, he was in sales for crying out loud! So why in Hell's own name would Lilith want him going after Ruby? The discussion they'd had sixty, maybe seventy years ago – chump change in topside's currency – suggested those rumors were true. Ruby was on the outs, trying to put a wrench in Hell's apocalypse plan and she'd used Crowley as her source of information. The King of the Crossroads had never followed up because he didn't care. He had his own plans, and they didn't include allying with anyone but himself, regardless of others out there who might also want to avert the end of the world.

(Okay, the Winchesters had put a bit of a kink in that original plan, but Crowley was nothing if not adaptable. His plans didn't include allying with anyone else.)

But if Lilith was sending him after Ruby…. Well, that suggested maybe, just maybe, Ruby wasn't on the outs as the rumor mill suspected, but instead was working for Lilith in secret. A triple cross, if you would. Hardly unheard of among demons. Hell, by the time they really go going, the double crossing was usually in the double digits. Which meant whatever those rumors might say, wherever they had come from, there was something not entirely accurate about them. Trouble was, Crowley didn't know which part was wrong, and Lilith was unlikely to tell him. Which was problematic considering he was working on a double or triple cross of his own.

One did not make plans based on assumptions, damnit.

"And where is Ruby?" Crowley tried for nonchalance, unsure if he hit his mark.

The little princess's smile was full of teeth and did not particularly lend credence to substantiating or disproving those pesky rumors, one way or the other. In fact, it only made everything that much worse.

Crowley felt another thread of discomfort weave through his twisted essence. He was behind the curve, one of his least favorite positions to be in, and would now have to play catchup. Only question was, who to go to for the information and how long would it take to obtain in relation to whatever plan Lilith was oh-so-very-clearly cooking up.

And…was he part of that plan? Or it's intended target?

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: Dun Dun Duuuuuuun!

Penguins: For your Jeopardy stockpile, a group of penguins is called a 'rookery'. You are now that much more knowledgeable (and currently one step ahead of God. Good for you)

Up Next: Dean gets to explain time travel and angels to a group of hunters who have mixed reactions to their entire world views being rocked. Go figure.

Up Next Timing: I'm going to have to keep the two week posting schedule for now. I am just not getting a chapter out a week in Covid Land. In the meantime, I'm purposefully making each of these chapters longer than a normal one, to at least make up for missed weekly content.

Till next time,

Silence

Chapter 105: Season 2: Chapter 72

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: I hope everyone is staying safe as they can right now. The world is a mess and the States is busy adding extra special crazy sprinkles right on top (I am so, so frustrated with the state of my country right now. I don't often bring politics into this forum because I rarely agree that it's the place for it, but to any readers out there of color: you matter to me. I stand with you, even if I can't understand what you go through). To any of you in cities with protests and riots right now, please stay safe. Do what you gotta do, but do it as safely as possible and help others stay safe as well!

Mental Health Note: During all of this, please, please, please pay attention to your mental health. These are really trying and dangerous times for mental and emotional well-being for us all. Talk to someone if you can (I highly recommend a trained professional, but if not that then a friend, a guardian, someone you can hopefully be open with and who is supportive in return). Stick with your friends; stay up to date with them, talk with them in any fashion you can if it can't be in person. Making sure we maintain our support pillars in a world where we can't physically see them anymore is really important. (Remember, family don't end in blood.)

And now, please enjoy what I am oh-so-happy to serve up just for you: a lengthy distraction from the world and weary woes!

Chapter References: Oh boy. Um…there's a lot. The whole story? [insert weak grin here] We're definitely bringing up the whole original Apocalypse timeline from the show (and a specific reference to 3.1 The Magnificent Seven), the Baku's Dreamland where Sam realized Dean was older than he should be (see Chapters 20-22), Meg's death right after that (see Chapter 21), John's death (see Chapters 36-37), the fight between Cas and Azazel in Rivergrove (see Chapter 77), and Uriel's death (see Chapters 94-95). Uh, I think that's it…

Chapter Warnings: Prepare for the world's longest chapter. Seriously, I think I beat my previous record. And this one is all chatter. It's, oh boy, it's a lot. We got tons to cover, from the apocalypse and angels to Dean's humiliation, to memes and killing Lilith, then back to Dean's humiliation, with panic attacks and a comatose Cas upstairs (and did we mention Dean's humiliation? We did? Oh, good.)

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 72

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The ribs went back in the fridge, packed away in a handy little Tupperware container that Dean stared at for a good thirty seconds, not quite believing Bobby had something so domestic lying about his house, just awaiting use. It looked fairly new, too, not something he'd had since the dinosaur age before he'd become a hunter. (Bobby had eventually pulled it out of his hands with one hell of a look.) About half the rack was left uneaten, right along with the rest of the food and most everyone's plates, and it all went into the fridge. No one had much of an appetite after hearing the world was right along on its way to ending. It would get eaten later, at least by those who weren't having the rug pulled out from under them this evening. (The Winchester-Singer-Gallagher rug was long gone by that point, nothing left to pull or even tug at.)

Andy helped Sam with the dishes diligently while Bobby and Dean packed it all up, the others trying to step in and help on occasion, but Dean knew why the four of them were hiding behind the supposed 'host' role that not a one of them had ever taken a particular liking to before. If they were too busy cleaning up, they weren't talking or taking questions. Dean could argue they were letting the information sink in for the Harvelles, Asa, and Bucky, but he also knew it was just as good an excuse to stall dropping any more bombshells (or, possibly worse in Dean's book: explain further on the ones he'd already dropped).

But eventually the dishes were done, the food was packed up, the kitchen was cleaner than it had been before dinner (or possibly ever), and their four guests were milling about the kitchen, scattered along the table or resting hips against counter tops or fridges. They were waiting, like sharks in the water, for the eventual chum they knew they'd get.

Ellen didn't even bother with preamble, looking right at Dean as soon as the sink was shut off and the last of the dishes dry. She nailed him with those sharp eyes of hers, demanding (although not in an unkind tone), "Start at the beginning."

"It's time travel, Ellen," Dean sighed, running a hand down his face and settling where he was against the kitchen counter, right in front of the sink, ankles crossed and arms following over his chest. "There's a lot of beginnings."

"Start with yer angel," Bobby suggested gruffly (less of a suggestion that way, really) from the table next to Ellen. "Can't talk about angelic DeLoreans without explaining that part first."

Dean didn't even bother telling the old man that Cas wasn't his angel. Not like anyone ever listened anyway.

"So, you're serious about the time travel?" Jo asked, the hesitant lilt of her voice and smile suggesting she was still expecting a joke out of it, even though she seemed to know it wasn't one. She was leaning against the counter as well, right next to Dean. He liked to think it was for support and not the opportunity to get more out of him by being, literally, right next to him.

(He swallowed a little roughly. Yeah, sure, it was totally about support. Cuz Jo didn't know how to play the innocent, naïve woman in need of comfort, who could then wheedle just about anything out some poor, dumb schmuck. Nope. She didn't know how to play that role at all. Not at all. Totally about support, here.)

"Yeah," Sam answered for his brother. Whether it was because he saw what Jo was doing (more like he saw what Jo was doing to Dean, who was inching his way down the counter to put that much more space between them) or he knew that one guy could only repeat himself so many times with less and less effect with each go. "I, uh, I don't know how we can prove it to you right now, but I've seen it." Sam's gaze flickered to his twenty-seven year old brother, thinking about the much older man approaching his forties that he'd seen in their dad's dream. "He really did travel about ten years back in time."

"I've seen it too," Bobby agreed, speaking more to the evidence they'd encountered since that unfortunate incident with the Baku. Dean knew things no man – psychic or not – could ever know, and acted on them with the confidence of someone who'd done it before. Besides, the man leaning against his kitchen counter now was so clearly their Dean, and so clearly not their Dean, that the honest-to-God truth was time travel made more sense than anything else at this point. Bobby believed it, believed him, which should be enough for anyone sitting at his table.

He eyed them each in turn, daring any of them to disrespect him in his own home. The truth of it was, there weren't many hunters alive who didn't respect Bobby Singer as an authority of all things supernatural and hunting, and Bobby knew it. If the boys needed that kind of clout in their corner, then he was sure as hell gonna be there to give it.

His gaze ended on Ellen, who was watching him with that scary, intense gaze of hers but no real heat or retaliation. She knew exactly what he was doing, and she'd stand by it. Something in Bobby twinged, somewhere in the vicinity of his heart. God, he sorta loved that woman. The corner of her mouth quirked up in a tease of a smirk, like she could hear his thoughts.

Bobby cleared his throat and turned back to the rest of the table. "Boy's a time traveler. Just don't ask him lotto numbers. He doesn't remember any of the important stuff."

He got a chuckle around the room for that, some a little forced, some a little too eager for the excuse to laugh, but it did help diffuse the tension all the same.

"How is that possible?" Asa asked once the last of the chuckles faded. His voice was even and almost pragmatic, like the vocal equivalent of having his hands up and offering to play referee. Putting aside Dean's inner fanboy, the serious-when-it-was-actually-necessary man from the future was starting to respect Asa Fox for how he'd handled this conversation so far.

"It's not."

His friend on the other hand…

Bucky had spent the last thirty minutes while everyone else cleaned up, processed, or pried for further information, sitting at the table with a cynical smile, nursing a beer with the kind of overconfident nonchalance that suggested he wasn't buying a word of this. Dean hadn't cared at first – he hadn't actually expected all of them to believe – but the smug attitude Bucky Sims was bringing along with it had rubbed him the wrong way minute after minute until he found his shoulders ratcheted up around his ears and his irritation levels climbing right alongside them.

Asa was ignoring his buddy for the most part, though. On occasion he would spear Buck with a warning look, but otherwise the two weren't engaging much on the topic. Asa was clearly willing to suspend some disbelief to hear the Winchesters out. Bucky thought the only reason he was bothering was an overly exaggerated loyalty to a woman he'd met only once, more than two decades ago.

"So, thing about angels," Dean started, deciding to follow Asa's lead and ignore Bucky (it was his friend, his call, after all, at least for now.). He aimed for calm and collected, like they were talking about any other topic any other day. That's what he was going for, anyway. Whether or not his brain caught on, at least his mouth seemed to have gotten the memo. "They can apparently bend time. Not often and not always well-" Bobby snorted and Dean tried not to look his way- "but they can do it when it's necessary. I don't know how it works, I never asked for details. Trust me, just getting a handle on the groundwork spins your head enough."

The groundwork didn't come with non-linear, overgrown gardens and ripples in a pool that was somehow not a pool and oh, yeah, those weren't ripples either, because fuck your life. Groundwork was simple. Pretty much: 'follow the rules from Back to the Future and you'll be fine.' Groundwork was good. Dean really didn't want to get into anything more complicated than that because he knew his tongue would mess it up even more than his brain already had (it wasn't like the whole time concept was a clear, logical thing up there to start with. Cas shoulda sent Sam back. He was the smartone). If he tried anything more complicated than the basics, Dean would just sound even crazier than he already did, and that was plenty crazy enough, even for a group of hunters.

"Wait, you've done this more than once? Time traveled?" Jo's eyes were both narrowed on him and also somehow wide. Women, man. How did they even do that? The look wasn't one of suspicion, at least. More along the line of incredulity with just a dash of more-playful-than-not sarcasm, just for extra flavor.

"Uh…couple times," Dean admitted, feeling embarrassed about that though not entirely sure why. Probably because there was no way they'd believe him. Traveling through time once was already asking a lot for people to believe. Four trips, though? Like time travel was a ride at the amusement park you had to be yei high to ride and you did it just for kicks. Yeah, he probably should have lied about that part. Dean rubbed the back of his neck (cuz, too late now). "Cas sent me back three times before this. Those trips were nothing like this though."

First, because he'd always returned. But this trip had always been a one-way ticket, even before he knew he was taking a trip at all.

"The other trips, they weren't about changing or stopping anything." Or learning that he couldn't stop things, like his mother's deal or her death. Which was too much of a reminder most days and turned his stomach. Cas had promised they could change things.
They had changed things. Dean cleared his throat and fought to focus on the present (which was equally "fun". One catastrophe at a time, he supposed). "Once of 'em was to get Phoenix ashes to, uh, well, for, uh…for a thing. It's not important."

Dean waved away the explanation that was Eve, realizing he'd dug himself a deep enough grave as was and should probably quit while he was already behind.

"But they're extinct." Asa was rocking the frowny face hard from his spot leaning against the counter on the other side of Jo. "No one's seen a Phoenix in centuries."

"If they ever existed in the first place," Bucky muttered into his beer but was, for the most part, ignored.

"Hence the need for time travel, buddy." Dean's smile was a tight one, more teeth than mirth, but it wasn't as caustic as it otherwise could be. Asa's eyes widened further as his brain made the connection it had previously missed. Yeah, it took time (ironically) to wrap your brain around time travel.

"Cas?"

Dean turned back to Jo, his arms tightening over his chest subconsciously. It had nothing to do with her or even her question. More of a protective instinct he couldn't shake. A need to feel that warmth in his chest (which still hadn't returned since Rivergrove) and keep the angel right where he was (a need that had only increased since learning his friend was possibly fading in there).

"Yeah, Cast-" Dean cut himself off, realizing even as he spoke that names had power, and maybe he shouldn't be handing that power out so freely. He trusted Jo and Ellen. Trusted that they would trust him or, at the very least, trust Bobby. But Asa and Bucky were unknown. Despite the slow-building trust and respect he had for the former, there was something distinctly uncomfortable (sitting in Dean's stomach, right below the angel in his chest) about giving Bucky the guy's full name.

At least…for now. Maybe Bucky would change his tune or Asa would bring him around, but Dean wasn't risking the only angel on their side (not to mention his (future?) best friend) on a maybe.

(Of course, none of these hunters knew Enochian warding or spells yet enough to know the power of having an angel's name, but they all knew how to research and were versed well enough with demons and pagans to understand the concept and go from there. So Dean was going to play it safe.)

"Cas," he repeated a little more firmly. If anyone suspected there was more to the angel's name, they didn't say anything. "Angel of the Lord, if you can believe it. He helped us with the apocalypse the first time. Kinda gave up everything to make sure our side won."

"Our side?" Ellen echoed, eyebrows up. "And whose side is that exactly?"

"Humans'," Sam picked up on the next beat, almost before Ellen was done asking the question. "The apocalypse is a showdown between Heaven and Hell, and neither of them seem to care what happens to those of us caught in the middle."

"You're telling me Heaven-"

"Doesn't care who lives or dies. Yeah, that's exactly what we're telling you." Dean's harsh words cut through Asa's abruptly. Given the lack of discussion on Heaven being real or not, it looked like they had a semi-believer, at least, on their hands. Another hunter like Sammy, who didn't have a problem believing in Heaven, maybe even angels and God. Asa Fox wouldn't be the first or the last hunter to do so, though each one still struck Dean as so damn weird. Dean had to remember to sort of pull his punches here, though. "Turns out, angels are winged dicks."

Only sort of, of course. Jo snorted, even as Sammy gave his brother a look.

"Most of them," Sam emphasized snidely from the far side of the table, still glaring at Dean, who rolled his eyes (because of course he hadn't meant Cas. Just every other angel). "Cas thinks there might be other angels who'll stand with us. If she can get to them first, she might be able to convince some of the angels to join our side."

"Don't count on it, Sammy," Dean grumbled under his breath, arms still crossed tight across his chest. There was a dull ache there that was, for once, all his own.

"Uh…she?" Jo glanced between the two brothers, one eyebrow elegantly raised in that oh-so-judgmental Harvelle way. "Dean called him a 'he' a minute ago."

Oh goody. And they were on to his favorite part of the 'angels are real' talk.

"Uh…yeah." Dean cleared his throat, scratching just beneath his ear in nothing short of stalling while Sam, conveniently, decided he didn't want a part of this conversation after all. "Angels don't actually have a gender. They take on the, uh, appearance of whatever vessel they're using."

Three of the four hunters new to angel lore stiffened (Bucky was still busy snorting softly into his beer every other sentence) and Dean tried not to tense in response. This might have been why he wasn't bringing up Cas's full name or the fact that she was currently asleep upstairs. There wasn't a hunter alive who handled the vessel concept with elegance or ease.

"Vessels?" Ellen's voice was tight. Anyone used to dealing with demons, or at least having heard the horrors of possession, would be. She glanced at Bobby, who gave her the kind of look that suggested patience was a virtue. The look he got back was anything but virtuous.

"Angels true forms are, uh, kinda hard for most people to see without…erm…exploding." Dean frowned at the word choice. Probably not helping Cas's case here. "So they have to possess a human to interact with us. But," and Dean definitely stressed the exception before people could start casting stones, "unlike demons, they have to have permission."

"They seek out the devout," Sam added, standing in Cas's corner with his brother, even knowing it wasn't the easiest corner to defend. But that was Sam Winchester for you.

The corner of Dean's mouth twitched up, remembering how Sammy had just accepted him at his word when he'd told the kid Cas wasn't a demon. That he was an angel, of all things. He'd trusted it because he trusted Dean. Damn, but Dean didn't deserve his kid brother.

The younger Winchester had as much of a sympathetic, I-understand-this-is-hard-to-believe-and-feel-for-your-situation, puppy dog look as he could get right now, hands spread out on the table in a placating, understanding way. Dean wanted to shake his head but didn't dare. Sammy was going to get these people to listen. He always did. And Dean wasn't about to interrupt that.

"They look for people who have faith in God and, well, angels, and they request permission to use their bodies for their work on earth."

"So, what? It's a noble possession?" Bucky snorted, finishing off the last of his beer. However, since he didn't believe angels were real to start with or that one sent Dean back in time, his opinion on the matter was disqualified. At least in Dean's book.

"It's not great," Dean admitted, ignoring Bucky Sims to look between the Harvelle women because, while not voicing their doubt quite so disrespectfully, he knew it was still there. Dean could see it in their faces. "Even Cas knows it's not an ideal situation. My Cas- uh, the one from 2016-" Dean winced, realizing he was now just as guilty of calling the angel 'his' and would forever face backlash anytime he told everyone else to stop doing it- "he had a male vessel, Jimmy, and he always regretted taking the guy away from his family, alright? So this time, Cas found- uh, the Cas from this timeline that's helping us now, I mean, found a woman in a coma, braindead with no surviving family. He's- um, she's trying to minimize the collateral damage."

But there would be some. This was the apocalypse, with Heaven and Hell raging on either side. There was going to be collateral damage. A lot of it.

Jo raised a hand to her forehead and buried her eyes behind it temporarily. With a heavy breath, she ran her fingers up and through her hair, turning towards Dean as she did with an almost pained expression. "This all sounds really crazy, Dean. I'm not saying I don't believe it-" she held up that same hand before he could respond- "I'm just saying. It's crazy."

"It sure as shit is," Bobby huffed, giving the kid a wry look that ended up with Jo's lips curling into a slow, crooked smile. She shook her head in disbelief, but Dean could see that it was more about the circumstances than the truth they were claiming.

"The only crazy here is all of you believing it," Bucky sniped. He was still going for that laid-back, Margaretville vibe of taking in a bad joke, but it was clear he was starting to get annoyed at being the odd man out. Not to mention ignored.

"Buck, come on." Asa nudged the leg of his friend's chair with one of his long legs, never leaving his spot against the counter. "You really think all o' these guys – some of the best hunters in the country – would make this up? Joke about it?"

Bucky stared at his friend with something between surprise and annoyance. "You can't really be buying this, Asa. The apocalypse? Time travel?"

"I may not be all on board at the drop of a hat," Asa replied, eyes narrowed at his friend, seemingly offended by something Bucky had said. "But that's the job. Believing in things no one else does. How often have we run into a hunt we couldn't explain? It's always something new, something we hadn't heard of or thought didn't exist. How's this any different?"

Bucky set his empty bottle down on the table a little harder than strictly necessary. "Because it's time travel! It's not real. It's- it's movie magic at best."

"So are vampires to the rest of the world, Buck."

"You don't have to believe me, pal," Dean cut in, voice on the edge of a warning, "but I'm not gonna stand here listening to you call me a liar much longer, either."

The room grew quiet at that. Not a threat, but a promise. The cold, dark kind that was more than frightening, more than real. It was that moment, oddly enough, that cemented Dean's story as fact in Ellen's mind. She'd met John's boys only once before that day they walked into the Roadhouse, where Dean sat at her bar and claimed to be psychic. Before that, John had only brought 'em around once, a long time ago now, when they were just kids. They'd been too young for her to be judging much of the men they'd turn into, but the one sitting before her now, with that look in his eyes, that promise of action on the tip of his tongue… That sure as shit wasn't coming off some twenty-something year old. That was older. Way older. Someone who'd been around not just the block but half a dozen more to boot. In that moment, Ellen more than believed this kid was a good ten years older than he looked, at least. Something in that look told her, though she couldn't explain it, that it might be more than just ten years, too.

Bucky broke eye contact first, looking away. He didn't answer, didn't so much as nod, but he didn't keep on with the disrespect, either. He got sullenly quiet after that, and Dean took it as the silent acceptance between hunters. The others took it as the defusing of a bomb.

"Look," Dean started again – tried again – with a punishing run of his fingers over his short hair, resettling his arms over his chest once he was done, "forget about the time travel. It's over and done with. Not even a big deal."

Someone at the table snorted and he'd bet money it was Bobby.

"What matters now," Dean emphasized with a glare to all occupants, since they were all pissing him off considering it was because of them he was here having this wonderful little chat that was going so damn well, "is the apocalypse."

"Okay," Jo reasoned, leaning back against the counter, elbows on the tile and hands shoved in the pockets of her jeans in a move caught somewhere between relaxed and defensive. But her face was set; she was on board for the Crazy Train and apparently happy to help it get moving forward. "How do we stop it?"

Dean opened his mouth to reply only to shut it immediately, brain sparking with that guilt-ridden, pessimistic little voice that was always there to remind him that he didn't actually know how they were going to stop it. If they even could. Kill Lilith, the Casses had said. Yeah, like it was just that easy.

Yet, he had to be the bearer of positive news, like it really could be that easy. Because no one wanted to hear the real truth; that they stood less than half a chance of pulling this off with any better results than the last go around. And that's if they were lucky. With the kind of shit luck the Winchesters were used to, they'd be lucky if they didn't make the whole thing go down worse.

Dean sighed, scratching at the base of his scalp and wishing this wasn't his life. Wishing he was back in 2016 dying in a graveyard beside his brother and best friend. Would certainly be easy.

(What was the line? Dying's easy, living's harder?)

Okay. So one step at a time, then. Dean forced his limbs to uncross, to leave that little sliver of angel in his chest open (vulnerable) (No, not vulnerable. At least, no more than the one upstairs) and instead braced his palms on the counter behind him, letting his upper body lean on locked elbows.

"We have to kill Lilith."

Said like that, it seemed so simple. Easy as pie. But the statement still carried the weight of the entire room and a whole world beyond. Dean could feel it, reverberating through his chest even as it left his mouth. Could see the way it settled around the others like a physical thing. A task they were all taking up just by sitting there.

God, he hoped they knew that wasn't true. They could all walk away, right here, right now, and any time after. They should all walk away.

"Who's Lilith?" Ellen was the first to ask and Dean quietly loved her for the way she didn't even blink. They were talking about the apocalypse but Ellen Harvelle was going to break it down, step by step, into any other hunt. Just like that. Just like she had in Carthage.

And how had that turned out, again? Dean's stomach tightened, turning to cement. He turned away from her.

"Demon. First one Lucifer ever turned. His 'first born' is what they call her. Princess o' Hell," Bobby answered for the older Winchester when he didn't speak up. He was eyeing Dean with a look of concern carefully hidden under gruffness and raised eyebrows. "She's the key to the whole damn thing. The Final Seal."

"Seal?" Jo looked between Bobby and the others, shaking her head a little. "What's that?"

"They're like locks on a door to Lucifer's cage." Dean cleared his throat and carried on, having buried every bit of that bitter voice that told him he was killing the Harvelle women all over again just having this conversation with them. They could still walk away from this. He'd make them walk away after this. "There are six hundred and sixty-six of 'em. Hell only has to break sixty-six, doesn't matter which, except for the first and the last. Those are set. Lilith's death is the final one, but it only unlocks the cage if the other sixty-five have been broken."

Bucky muttered something too under his breath to make out, but Dean's gaze snapped to him regardless. His carefully controlled nerves, already on edge and reaching their breaking point, snapped with it.

"Hey, pal, I didn't make this shit up, okay? So back off." Dean's voice was sharp – feral sharp – and he felt more than saw Andy and Sam both flinch at it. It was probably the only thing in the room that could have made him swallow his own words and back off too. He resettled against the counter, pointedly ignoring Bucky, who was glaring at the beer sitting in front of him and not meeting anyone's gaze in the silent, tension-filled room.

"Why don't we just stop the first seal?"

Ellen was the first to break that silence (again earning Dean's undying love and gratitude. At least until her question registered). She glanced between the boys as that broken silence shifted into a different kind. Less tension, more dread. A lot more dread, she reckoned, by the way they all immediately grew shifty, squirming in their seats like elementary school kids caught doing bad by the teacher. She raised her eyebrows, wondering what sort of ant hill she'd just gone and poked. "Wouldn't that be easier?"

"Trust me, it's not," Dean muttered, still not looking her way.

"The first seal's a mess," Bobby answered a little more directly, though no less vaguely. "Demons got a million ways of making it happen. We're working on it-" here he looked over at Dean, who pointedly glared at a spot on the kitchen floor and nowhere else- "but we can't be stupid about this. No point putting all our eggs in one rickety basket."

"Okay," Ellen agreed, despite not being entirely sure what was going on between Bobby and the eldest Winchester. Whatever it was, it clearly had to do with this seal business. Still, she let it go for now. Lord knew they had enough on their plate without internal drama to boot. "How do we kill Lilith? I'm guessing something that big and that old ain't gonna be easy?"

"Can't we just exorcise her?" Jo jumped in, sitting up a little with the idea. "You said she's a demon, so…?"

"She is, but it's not going to be that easy." Sam shook his head, sending an apologetic look her way. "We're not even sure we can exorcise a demon that powerful. And if it does work, all she has to do to put the apocalypse back on track is get topside again."

Which wouldn't be the easiest of things – Azazel still hadn't shown his face and it had been more than two weeks since they'd managed to send that bastard back – but it was more than possible. And with what was riding on her getting topside, Dean bet they'd manage it pretty quick. No, an exorcism wouldn't be enough. They had to take her out before Hell found out a way to make Sam – or someone else that fit whatever fucked up rules the damn last seal required – to do it.

That reminded him; he needed to have a chat with Cas when she was back on her feet about the exact requirements of those seals. Make sure they weren't going to stumble right into any loopholes they hadn't thought to cover.

"We gotta kill her dead. Sucks, but it's the only way," Dean cut in with a tight-lipped grimace. "Holy water won't do jack squat to her. A devil's trap should keep her down, but it won't be for long."

Powers like hers? Even if they got her into the trap, it would take her minutes, at most, to break it wide open. Meg had managed it once, and she'd been way lower on the power ladder than Lilith.

Asa let out another whistle, shaking his head minutely. This was big fish they were talking about. Real big fish if a devil's trap wouldn't be enough. "How are we even supposed to kill her, if we do somehow manage to get her in a trap? Only thing I know that can kill a demon is Kurdish blade-"

"Yeah, a demon-killing knife. We'll get one of those eventually," Dean interrupted out of habit more so than impatience. He was still annoyed that they didn't have Ruby's blade, and more annoyed that they'd have to voluntarily play nice with Ruby in order to get it. "What we really need is the damn Colt."

It might not have killed Lucifer, but Dean was betting Lilith was a few tiers down the food chain and a lot closer to that 'evil' part of the Latin inscription on the gun. Lucifer might be the devil himself, but he'd started out as an angel. Something that, in hindsight, they probably should have considered before marching into Carthage.

"The Colt?" Ellen's eyebrows were back near her hairline. She checked with Bobby and back again. "As in the Colt? Samuel Colt's magical gun that can kill anything?"

Sam opened his mouth, most likely to say, 'Well, not anything it turns out-' but Dean caught his brother's eye and shook his head. Story for another time. Any other time.

"That would be the one," Bobby mumbled, getting up from his chair to grab a beer from the fridge. Andy, perched on the counter next to it, practically bumping shoulders with Asa (and wasn't that budding friendship adorable?), helpfully opened the door with his sneakered foot before the old hunter could even get to it. He got a glare for his efforts, which was returned with the sunniest smile imaginable. Bobby, while he was up and there, grabbed a round for everyone else as well, using Andy to pass them around since the kid was so eager to help. He finally got a glare in return, but it quickly morphed back into the classic Andy Smile when the kid got around to handing Jo hers.

"No one's seen hide or hair of that thing in at least a century," Asa picked up from where Ellen dropped off, clearly thinking along the same lines as she was as he accepted his beer from Andy. He did a double take Dean's way, one eyebrow up. "Unless this is another time travel thing?"

Dean actually huffed at that, shaking his head. "No. We know where it is, but we can't get our hands on it yet."

"Why's that?"

Sam and Dean exchanged a guilty look before Sam turned that look Ellen's way and answered, "We think Azazel has it."

The 'ah, I see. Is that all?' look that crossed Ellen's face only somewhat sarcastically (and rather matched the looks on Asa and Jo's faces too), pretty much ended that conversation before it had to get any more complicated. (Like, just how the magical gun that could kill anything ended up in the hands of the yellow-eyed demon.)

Eager to make sure that conversation stayed dead on arrival, Dean offered another solution. "An angel blade would work too."

"An angel blade?" Jo's eyebrows perfectly matched her mother's, both up near their hairlines.

"A divine sword made from an angel's grace," Sam offered with a weak smile, remembering how defensive Castiel had been about hers. All he'd done was ask to look at it one time. That hadn't gone all that well for him, while Dean just sat on the sidelines grinning his head off in what looked like long-awaited retribution. Sam had a feeling last time around it had been Dean getting lectured for even thinking himself worthy to touch an angel's blade. Looking back on it now, and knowing Cas better, Sam could almost see why his brother found the whole thing so hilarious. "It's their go-to weapon. It can kill almost anything."

"Well, great!" Bucky's voice was too loud and half the table winced with it. In part because it wasn't obvious whether he was serious or still the outlier at the table. The ring of sarcasm just underneath the words didn't bode well. If it was the latter, and it certainly seemed more likely to be, the rest of the room didn't really want to see how

Dean responded (or Bobby, for that matter, who had made it clear he had the kid's back). "Why don't you get your angel buddy to fork over one of those and we're all set?"

"Each angel only has one, far as I know," Dean answered through, sure enough, clenched teeth and a tight expression. Otherwise Cas would have been handing them out to the boys like candy last go around No, even just the memory of Cas's face when Dean had taken Uriel's blade from the center of his burnt out wing prints was enough to make Dean's jaw ache with tension. "I'm not taking the only defense Cas has away from her. She's got her own enemies to worry about."

He conveniently didn't mention that they had a second angel blade, tucked away in his duffle bag upstairs, stolen from the corpse of an angel killed by the very same weapon. Bucky Sims of all people did not need to know there was a method for killing angels.

(Dean actually doubted Bucky was any real sort of threat. He wasn't coming across as the type of hunter who learned about a new Supernatural badass and thought, 'I gotta go kill that.' At the moment, it sure sounded more like he didn't even believe angels were real. So Dean wasn't all that worried about what he might do with the knowledge of how to kill one. Well, other than run his mouth to some hunter who might be a bit more willing to believe (and a lot more inclined to kill). Which is why, regardless of Bucky Sim's threat level (which was pathetically low in Dean's book and sinking with every word the guy spoke), Dean would not be mentioning Uriel's blade.)

"Buck," Asa cut in, not quite sharply but definitely with an edge of warning. "Come on, man. You don't gotta buy into this, but either stow it till we leave or take the jeep and I'll meet up with you tomorrow."

Asa tossed the man a set of keys and Bucky caught them with the sort of wide-eyed look of a follower who'd just been ordered off by the guy he swore to always follow. Which, given the stories Dean had heard about Asa and the similar lack of tales about Bucky, who always seemed to be with the guy and yet didn't feature prominently in the legends, was probably exactly what was going on here. Bucky looked almost hurt that his buddy wasn't backing him, but Dean couldn't call up much sympathy for the guy. He certainly wasn't reading the room well enough to know that wasn't going to be the case, here.

Bucky dropped his eyes to the keys in his hand, chancing a glance around the table but not meeting anyone's eyes long enough to gauge a reaction. With a squared jaw and a huff of air, he tossed the keys back to Asa, who caught them effortlessly, like he'd expected that to be his buddy's play.

"Yeah, alright, fine." Bucky slumped in his chair, not quite meeting Dean's gaze as he nodded his way. "Sorry."

"You don't gotta apologize," Dean answered after a beat, finally getting Bucky to actually look up and lock eyes. It wasn't often Dean was able to reign in the anger that seemed to fill every inch of his being, even on the good days. So he was trying, here, long as he could, to be civil. And he got it. He really did. He got where Bucky was coming from, so he said as much. "This shit's insane, man. Trust me, I wish I was lying. I really do."

After a prolonged moment in which Bucky Sims stared Dean Winchester dead in the eye, the older man dropped his head with a nod. He settled back in his seat, intent to stay quiet for the time being rather than make enemies of the relatively dangerous collection of people sitting around Bobby Singer's kitchen table.

Asa caught Dean's eye over the top of Jo's head and nodded to the man. Which, sure, sent Dean's inner fanboy flipping and flailing his shit, but the actual adult residing in there, too, nodded back solemnly. He understood Asa's appreciation for not kicking his buddy out just because he was acting like an ass at the moment. Dean certainly had his own such faults. He knew what it was like for Sam to stick by him anyway, regardless of how much of an ass he'd made of himself.

Ellen cleared her throat, more than happy to be the wrangler of conversational direction, here. (Men.) "So, if we can't get a blade off this angel of yours-"

"She's not mine-" Dean grumbled, while no one listened.

"-Is she willing to join us in the fight?"

Dean almost laughed at the question, which was ridiculous to anyone who knew Cas. But these people didn't. And he shouldn't take for granted that they were willing to believe him – believe in angels and even believe in the possibility of this one angel working with them – so he hunkered down that urge to joke and nodded, solemn as possible. "Yeah. She's down."

Ellen waited a beat, watching the oldest Winchester boy, before her daughter beat her to the next obvious question.

"So…I take it we're waiting for something?" Jo glanced around for confirmation. If they had an angel and an angel blade, and all it took to stop the apocalypse was killing this one demon…there had to be a reason they were sitting around Bobby Singer's table chatting after a partially eaten meal of ribs and beer.

"Yeah," Sam answered with a weak smile. "Lilith's not on Earth right now."

Bucky snorted, calling the room's attention to himself once more, and this time he actually looked contrite about it. He raised a halfway apologetic hand. "Sorry, it…uh, it sounded…like an alien thing."

He trailed off at the end, realizing how stupid that sounded out loud, and shook his head, muttering a second apology.

Jo actually chuckled though, seeing what Bucky was on about. Sam shared a quirked grin with her while Bobby rolled his eyes. For once, though, Bucky hadn't been disrespecting his guests, so there wasn't much heat in the action.

Dean actually laughed. He grinned conspiratorially at Sam, raising his hands about a foot apart and said, with half-lidded eyes, "Aliens."

Sam chuckled back, but it was with a look of confusion, shaking his head back and forth with the Mother of all Furled Brows. "Dude, what?"

The man from the future dropped his hands. "Damnit, you're telling me the Alien meme's not a thing yet?"

Jo snickered as well, though it was clear she thought Dean might be losing his mind by the way her forehead furled right along with Sam's and she stared at him like she was definitely so much better (debatable, but not without merit, Dean thought). "What's a 'meem?'"

Dean's face went slack. "No. No, you're messing with me right?" He glanced around the table, but a couple of slow headshakes and more than one look of confusion sealed the deal. The horrifying deal. He slumped back against the counter, shell-shocked. "Memes aren't a thing yet?"

When the looks just continued, Dean threw his arms out. "How did I travel back to the friggin' stone age!"

Jo sniggered next to him and she, at least, got a conspiratorial grin out of him, annoyed as he was (because seriously. How the hell was ten years such a friggin' long time?!)

"Oh, cry me a river," Bobby groused with absolutely no sympathy, eying the kid with the kind of stink eye that reminded everyone they had better things to be talking about. "If yer done whining, can we get back to Lilith and the apocalypse?"

Ducking his head with an appropriate level of contrition, Dean cleared his throat. Even with his head down, though, he managed to catch Jo's eye again. She was staring sidelong at him and once she had his attention, she mouthed, 'I want to know what a 'meem' is.' Dean had to bite back the chuckle, but grinned her way anyway. Like kids playing under the table while the adults ordered another round of coffee and talked about boring, adult things.

Sam sent Dean a look, a kid-brother-who-sees-what's-going-on-here look, and then Dean truly did look contrite, despite the reddening of his cheeks. He and Jo weren't like that. Couldn't be like that. Even if sometimes (pretty much any time he was actually around her), a part of Dean thought otherwise.

"So, Lilith's in Hell." There was something in the way Ellen said it that had Dean looking up, and he had to fight off a second round of reddening (and he did, because he was a boss) at the very blatant look on the older Harvelle woman's face. Like she knew exactly what those kids under the table were doing while the adults sipped their coffee.

Dean cleared his throat, suddenly quite happy to move the conversation along. "Yeah. She, uh, she comes topside through a hellgate that's supposed to open later this year. In May."

Not that they could count on dates. Not only because Dean couldn't always remember the exact one, but more so because Time seemed to change shit up on them all the time, despite 'wanting to stay the same' like everyone kept friggin' telling him. His dad had died almost two months early, so no, Dean didn't really put much faith in dates anymore.

"Well, if you know when and where a hellgate's going to open," Asa reasoned, straightening up against the counter as it occurred to him just how incredibly handy having someone from the future might be, "we gotta make sure it stays closed."

Dean and Bobby exchanged a less than happy look. It was Dean who cleared his throat, though, and glanced to his left, meeting Asa's expectant look head on. "It's not that simple."

"I'm starting to get that's a theme, here," Ellen muttered, loud enough for everyone to hear but not with enough to heat or intent to derail the conversation. Bobby sent her a look he got right back in return.

"It oughta be," Asa countered, tone firm for the first time since this whole confab started. He stared at Dean, broad shoulders only getting broader. Jesus, but the guy really was huge. "Dean, that's hundreds of demons we're talking about-"

"Trust me, I know," the man from the future countered right back. He'd been the one to deal with it the first time. The one to bear the guilt of a hunter dead at the hands of seven of those demons, and his wife hell bent on getting herself killed avenging him.

For half a year after that hellgate opened, right up until his own impending death became his total focus, he'd asked any hunter they bumped into for news on Tamara. On the surface, Dean was doing it to check in on her, but deep down he knew what it was really about. He expected her to meet the short end of some monster's claws. Not out of lack of skill or stupidity, but because he'd seen the look in her eye after Isaac was killed. He'd been her rock; hunting with him was what had kept her going after the death of their daughter. Without him… Well. It was only a matter of time.

(It wasn't until years later he found out what happened to her, but he hadn't been wrong.)

"-we can't just stand back and let it happen." Asa's words weren't forceful. He didn't seem the type to yell. But he sure as hell had a commanding voice, confident and solid like stone.

"That's not what we're talking about doing!" Sam came to his brother's defense, his own defensive nature and indignation on Dean's behalf making his voice not unlike Asa's in immovability. The only difference was that his came with rising anger.

(He might not remember being blamed for letting that hellgate open, for being responsible for hundreds of demons loosed on the world, but Dean had told him enough of future events for him to imagine plenty of self-blame.)

Dean waved him off, though. He wasn't a damsel in need of defending, much as he appreciated Sam having his back. Before he could get into the complications of even attempting to change the timeline and all that came with it (even the smallest of shit, and keeping a hellgate from opening was far from small), Jo spoke up from between him and Asa.

"Look, I'm not trying to play sides between you two, but I'm with Asa on this one. Letting a hellgate open sounds, you know," she shrugged her shoulders, hands still in her pockets as she met Dean's eyes, "bad?"

The older Winchester sighed and wished, not for the first time, definitely not for the last, that he wasn't having this conversation. "I'm not saying we let it open."

"Then what are you saying, Dean?" Ellen's tone was even, her eyes hard as ever but not unkind.

Dean wanted to sigh again. Instead, he scrubbed one hand over his face, shifted his weight against the counter and went right back to crossing his arms over his chest. He didn't care if it was defensive, it was familiar and (he'd never admit it out loud) comforting.

"I…I don't know," he answered honestly, trying not to let it sound like he didn't have a clue what he was doing, even if that's exactly what was happening here. What had been happening for a whole friggin' year now. At least the group around him didn't react much to it. Didn't exchange worried looks full of doubt and accusation. They kept their eyes on him, waiting and patient, and he kind of loved them all for it. At least as much as he hated them for getting together in Bobby Singer's kitchen to play Twenty Questions with the impending apocalypse.

"Look, this time shit is complicated. There's…a bunch of crap that Cas says is gonna happen whether we try to stop it or not. And the more we try to stop..." Dean shook his head. "This isn't just about letting Lilith topside so we can gank her. For starters, Cas is pretty sure Hell will just open a different gate if we keep this one closed. But more than that-"

"If we keep acting on stuff we ain't supposed to know," Bobby took over, for which Dean wanted to friggin' kiss him, "the more demons are gonna start asking questions. Like how and why. And I don't know about you-" he eyed each of them in turn, "-but I don't really want Hell starting to think creatively. It'll cost us the one advantage we have in all this mess."

The silence that settled after that declaration was pretty solidifying. It sank over the others, the factor they hadn't been considering. The more Hell realized something was up, the more their plans were likely to change.

'Welcome to our world,' Dean thought with no small amount of bitterness.

"Why can't we just make something up?" The table turned, almost as one, to Bucky sitting at the head. He almost shrank back at the sudden attention, realizing as much as everyone else that he was suddenly participating like he was in on this conversation. Like he believed what they were talking about. On board the Crazy Train.

No one called him out on it, but he seemed to come to it all on his own. Bucky went back to his sullen silence after that, a little grumpy, a little surprised, and busy asking himself a bunch of questions he wasn't entirely sure he wanted to bother answering.

"It might work once," Sam offered, not unkindly given Bucky might just be coming around (though he clearly needed more time than the rest of them). "But we'll only get away with vague lies a couple of times before Hell starts poking around more seriously."

Bucky just nodded, though it was obvious from his grumpy expression that he wasn't really listening. The rest of the group turned back the conversation at hand, but Asa nudged the leg of his buddy's chair again, this time with a small smile. Bucky tried returning it, but it was weak. Asa had all the faith in the world that it would get stronger, given time.

"Way we figure it, we need to keep Hell in the dark as much as possible about this," Dean started up again, keeping his voice calm and even now that some of the tension in the room had shifted internally. "The longer we can keep 'em, the longer we have the advantage of knowing what comes next." Well, at least somewhat, but they didn't need the details of how fucking hard that actually was. "Cas says we stick to the timeline as much as possible. So that's what we're gonna do. Whatever we would do normally if we didn't know what was coming."

"No hunter would ever just let a hellgate open," Ellen offered up, gently, before anyone else could do it. Asa had probably well been on his way, but coming from Ellen it wasn't defensive or accusatory. It just was. The woman had power that way Dean would never understand (or ever be able to emulate).

"No," Dean agreed. "So we're gonna try to keep this one from opening too."

And just hope Cas was right and they didn't somehow screw their only chance to get Lilith before it was too late. Of course, Dean supposed it was far more likely Hell would get their way and they, the lowly humans, would always be scrambling to catch up, not the other way around. Figured that the one time he'd wish for the former, he had to hope they got stuck with the latter.

"So we have till May?" Ellen leaned back in her chair at the natural pause, the shift and slowing, of a ridiculously tense conversation.

Dean shrugged, even as Bobby reached across Ellen to the paper tray he kept beneath his array of landline phones. He slipped his hand under the stack of papers on the top tray, pulling a legal pad out from beneath it all. Dean recognized it immediately, its yellow pages, dog eared and worn, covered in Bobby's scrawl. Page after page of it, not that they could tell as Bobby set it down in front of him. Those were the notes he'd taken when Dean laid it all out for him, back when their Dad had narrowly escaped a Baku and Meg had taken a bullet from the Colt.

The man from the future swallowed roughly. There was a lot in there – including the death of the Harvelles at the hand of that same demon bitch and her squad of hellhounds – that he didn't want everyone in this room knowing so freely.

"Uh, we, um," Dean shook his head, looking away from that legal pad. Unfortunately, on his way to meeting Ellen's gaze, he caught Bobby's, which was both apologetic, unapologetic (they needed to know, at least some of it) and, probably the worst, sympathetic. Dean swallowed past the frog suddenly lodged in his throat and focused on Ellen's question. "We should have till May, but don't count on it."

"What's that supposed to mean?" Jo jumped on the question. "Why would the date change if we don't change anything?"

"Because we have been changing things." Sam offered a half smile – weak but trying – when everyone turned towards him. He shrugged self-consciously at the attention, but his brother shouldn't be the only one handling with this, after all.

"What things?"

Dean rubbed at his chest automatically, and Jo eyed the movement like a hawk. A frowning hawk. The man from the future sighed, dropping his hand.

"Well, for one thing," he began, trepidation thick like mud in his voice. God, he didn't want to be talking about this. "We brought Cas in early. So…Hell knows there's an angel involved now."

"Fortunately, they think it's only Cas," Sam jumped in. "From what the demons have done to try and catch her, they seem to think she's working alone. That she's rogue from Heaven."

"She is rogue," Dean muttered, voice bitter with an undercurrent of worry and regret. Beside him, Jo's eyes narrowed, but Dean didn't notice it.

"What would happen if they thought she wasn't?" Ellen asked, catching on to the thread of concern in the room buried beneath the tension and dread. It was shared between the four men who knew the whole story, which was ringing all sorts of alarm bells in Ellen's head.

"Bad shit," Bobby answered with a sardonic eyebrow. "If Hell thinks Heaven's on to them, they'll only try harder. And work faster. They've already sped up their plans, far as we can tell."

"How?" When Bobby's gaze shifted to Asa, he gestured to the notes in front of him. "How can you tell they've moved up their plans?"

"Uh…" Sam exchanged a weak look with his brother when their surrogate father turned that question directly their way. Sam cleared his throat. "Our dad died two months early in, uh, in this timeline."

Silence settled thick and heavy, both out of mourning and respect. Ellen was the first to break it. She always was.

"John's death had to do with the apocalypse?" she asked softly, eyes wide and hand on top of Bobby's forearm. The older hunter didn't pull away or reciprocate, which was as good as hand-holding in Singer terms.

Sam dropped his gaze, unsure how to proceed without breaking the eggshells that topic was less than skirting.

'Ah, hell,' Dean thought.

"He sold his soul and the Colt to Azazel. To save me." Dean tried to get it out neutrally, like ripping off a Band-Aid, but all that accomplished was it coming out sharp. Harsh. Ellen's eyes widened. Beside him, Jo physically jolted.

"Jesus," Ellen whispered, taking that hand off Bobby's arm to hover over her mouth.

"There was a car crash," Sam whispered, hands in his lap, eyes locked on the table but really eight hundred miles and seven months ago in a hospital in Flint, Michigan. "Dean was, um…it wasn't good."

"Azazel set the whole thing up. Crash included." Dean's words were spat through clenched teeth, hands fisted against his torso, tight to his chest. He could still feel that gutting agony deep inside, that flare of white and explosion of pain as Cas's grace had reacted to a demon soul-searching them both. Dean should have been a goner. Sometimes he still thought his dad should have let him go. "He knew dad would sell his soul."

"Why?" All the eyes turned once more to Bucky, who looked again like he wanted to duck away from the attention. But he didn't. He squared his shoulders, gesturing with one hand. "I'm not trying to start anything. But…one soul in hell? This Azazel sounds like big fish. John was a hell of a hunter, but what's one more guy in Hell to something as big as the apocalypse?"

Bucky took the way Dean squared his jaw, the way he worked that muscle till he might hurt himself, as a sign that he'd overstepped. Which, given that he certainly hadn't made the best first impression with these guys (and he was still questioning whether they were all insane), the Winchester probably had grounds. Bucky raised his hands, not wanting a fight. Especially not one with odds seven to one.

"I didn't mean anything by it. I'll uh, shut up."

"You're not wrong." The words were out of Dean Winchesters mouth before Bucky even finished apologizing, leaving the older man to stare at him, eyes wide and eyebrows up in surprise. Dean was still clenching his jaw, but there hadn't been any heat in his words, just bitter frustration Bucky got a feeling wasn't because of him.

"Dean…?" Sam's voice was soft. Quiet. Questioning just enough to bring his brother back from whatever edge he was teetering on. "We don't have to."

The man from the future shrugged one shoulder so jerkily it nearly dislodged him from the counter. He was agitated, that much was clear. "They're gonna find out eventually, Sammy."

"Find out what, boys?" Ellen kept her tone even as the rest of them. She could sense the precipice they weren't far from. And while she wanted to know what was on the other side, she also wasn't inclined to go jumping off cliffs without some form of parachute to keep her up. When no one answered right away, Sam staring at Dean, Dean glaring at the floor, and Bobby looking between 'em both, she cleared her throat using the 'mom' setting. Even Dean glanced up, though she could tell it was a weighted, reluctant look. "At best all you got – all any of us got – is us. Together. Bad shit's coming and it's coming fast. Better to tell us now than after it's too late to help, boys. So no secrets or half-truths, here."

"Ellen," Bobby warned, worried what her pushing too hard on the boys might do. Dean was all the more likely to shut down for it. Even if she meant well, patience had never been Ellen's strong suit.

"It's easy for you to say, Ellen," Dean said in the beat just after Bobby. "You're not the one holding all the secrets."

"We're not gonna judge you, Dean." The older Winchester turned to the woman at his side, Jo's eyes were big and honest while somehow still looking pissed off. Just like her mother, Dean thought. She tipped her head cockily, a smirk at the corner of her lips, but those eyes remained sincere. "I think the End Times coming kind of suspends the petty stuff, don't you think?"

Dean huffed, shaking his head. He didn't dare look at anyone else as he said it, just keeping his eyes on Jo as he answered her, "How about if Sam and I are the whole reason it goes down in the first place?"

Sam dropped his eyes to the table, shoulders taught.

Jo scoffed, straight up laughing in his face with the kind of innocence of someone who thought they were playing along. "Dean, come on. You're not gonna end the world. Even your ego's not that big."

When he didn't laugh with her, she glanced around the room, face slackening. But everyone was watching them, so she turned back to Dean, a little paler and a lot more shaken as she regarded him warily. It hurt to see, but he also knew Jo was anything but scared of him. Wouldn't happen in a million years, so he knew now what this look was. Disbelief, pure and simple, in the Harvelle style of suspicion and skepticism over shock and raw emotion.

"You're not serious…are you?"

Dean stared at her, into her beautiful face, full of life and laughter (even as it was slowly disappearing and in his mind's eye he watched the color drain from her face as well, leaving it ashen grey, her eyes nearly lifeless-) for as long as he could. Then he turned to the rest of the room. "The first seal on the devil's cage breaks when a Righteous Man spills blood in Hell."

Ellen sucked in a small breath, the only audible reaction in a room that could have heard a pin drop. "John was…?"

"No. Dad never broke." Dean shook his head. It wasn't just that, honestly. Dean doubted that deal his dad made had ever been entirely selfless. He loved his father, but if him sacrificing his life for his son's had been entirely selfless, John Winchester never would have asked Dean to do what he'd asked him to do next. Something even ten years later, Dean hadn't forgiven. Couldn't forgive.

The real truth of it was everyone broke. He'd learned that down in the Pit. They just broke differently. Some took the deal. Took up the knife and tore into others to save being torn into themselves. Those were the souls that turned. That twisted and knotted and burned until there was nothing left of what they'd been, not even their name. That kind of breaking left only black and pain and a need to cause it in others. Those were the souls that became demons.

But there were others. Others who never picked up the knife. Who retreated into themselves so they never could. Those people, those souls lost themselves just as surely as their counterparts. No one survived Hell. But those that didn't take up the knife eventually withered into nothingness down in its depths. They'd had a name for where those souls went, but Dean didn't remember it. Hadn't cared. He'd been more interested in the ones that turned, the ones that he could make bleed so that he didn't have to, take up the knife so he could put his down, however temporarily, until the next soul was escorted in.

Everyone breaks. Just some break differently. The only ones who make it out – and not intact, never intact – were the lucky ones who managed to escape Hell. And they were few and far between.

"Dad never took up the knife, never used it on another down there." The man from the future closed his eyes, arms crossed over the remnants of the angel who'd gotten him out after he'd broken, but before he'd lost himself completely. "But I did."

Forget a pin drop. That night in Bobby Singer's kitchen, you could hear the blood pulsing in everyone's veins. Or, more appropriately, the skip that everyone's heart took.

"Dean…" Ellen's voice was a whisper. Suddenly she understood where that feeling had come from, the one that told her this man was more than just ten years older than he should be. Now she knew why, and she wished she didn't. Wished it wasn't true.

Across the kitchen, her daughter put a hand on Dean's arm, but withdrew it again when the hunter flinched beneath her touch. He opened his eyes to give Jo a half smile, stretched across his face with force, but she understood. She nodded, backing off and tucking her hands back in her pockets.

"You've…been to Hell?" Asa asked over her shoulder, the shock and horror clear on his face. It wasn't the disgust Dean had quite been expecting. He supposed most hunters had at least thought about it – thought about selling their soul for that loved one that had gotten them into the life – but most weren't dumb or desperate enough to actually do it. That was the difference. They knew that the ones that sold their souls sealed their own fate. Dean had known that and done it anyway. Learned the hard way.

"They kill Sammy." Dean hated the way his voice caught. He knew what was coming and still he couldn't even begin to prepare for it. "May first, 2007. At least, that was the date where I came from. There's a battle between all the psychics. Azazel set it up so only one gets to walk away. And that…that wasn't Sam."

"Dean-" Sam started to climb out of his seat, but Dean shook his head adamantly. So the giant of a man settled back in the kitchen chair while his brother's green gaze flickered over to Andy, sitting in the corner, a silent compliment to this party. The kid wasn't looking up, staring at his lap. Dean wouldn't have been able to hold his gaze, either. He'd barely known the kid last time, his death just another blip on the radar, but that didn't count for nothing. And this time…

This time Dean would make sure Andy stayed out of it. He'd already faced down his psychic battle and crawled out of it, barely alive and permanently maimed. He'd done enough. Been through enough. Dean wasn't letting anything more happen to him.

"Or anyone else," he added softly, causing Andy to look over at him. And he could tell by that sad, pathetically understanding, sympathetic face – a face that didn't seem capable of hating anyone, and that just wasn't fair – that Andy understood. He'd known for a while now that he was supposed to have died at Cold Oak. That the fact he hadn't was a chronological abomination. Borrowed time, nothing more.

Well, not if Dean got any say in that.

The hunter straightened up, shoulders squaring off with a new burst of determination. It was the same determination he'd always had, reignited by the surrogate little brother who didn't deserve the fate coming to him any more than Dean's actual brother.

"I got a year," he continued abruptly, not bothering with the details. Every hunter there would immediately understand what he was talking about. "Hellhounds dragged me down in 2008." His throat worked double time, swallowing past lumps that felt more like shards of glass. But he didn't dare stop talking, or he'd hear his friends – his family – reacting to events he still pretended most days hadn't happened to him. "I broke the first seal four months later. Climbed off the rack and took up the knife in exchange for- for-"

This time when Jo settled her arm on his forearm, Dean flinched but she didn't remove her hand. He spared her a glance he couldn't hold longer than half a second, water very clearly filling his eyes. He fought it back valiantly, refusing to cry in front of a bunch of hunters. In front of his family.

"Cas dragged me out," he managed through a throat that felt like death itself. Swollen shut and hot. He could practically feel that scar on his arm – the one that wasn't there – burning in response. He probably would have reached up to grab it if Jo didn't have a hand on his lower arm. Dean shared a bitter, broken smile with the room. "Imagine that. An angel pulling my ass out of hell after I started the apocalypse."

"Okay," Ellen started with the very distinct mom tone that called for a change in direction. It was obvious Dean wanted no part in the possible pity party headed his way. She couldn't blame him, even if her heart hurt for the man who so clearly expected harsh judgement from those around him more than their sympathy. "So…don't sell your soul this time."

Dean snorted, the movement shaking his shoulders enough that Jo pulled away, giving her mom a look.

"Gee, why didn't we think of that?" Bobby interrupted from beside the older Harvelle woman, backing his boys. Ellen turned a narrowed glare on him, but there wasn't much heat. The two had always exchanged glares with the same ferocity of an old married couple bickering.

"You haven't…done it already, have you?" Jo asked hesitantly, getting very much the big brother glare right away in return. She'd take it over the scary blankness that had been all over Dean's face for the last three minutes. Like a wall had closed between him and the rest of the room. A shield, no doubt, but she didn't like it any more for its purpose.

"Okay, first off, no." Dean's adamancy – clearly affronted by her assumption – was almost adorable. Jo smiled at him, pleased when his already narrowed eyes got even narrower. "Second, not doing it this time around is the plan."

Dean speared those last words in Ellen's direction. The woman raised her hands in surrender.

There was a beat of silence, a very obvious one, which Asa eventually pointed out. "But?"

"But…" Dean sighed, and this time he did reach up and rub at his bicep. Like a phantom itch he couldn't completely scratch. "Cas doesn't think it'll be that easy."

"Hell's shifty," Bobby shrugged casually when the group's attention turned his way. "We all know that. They'll find another way around it. Another way to make it happen."

"If it's not Sam, it'll be someone else. A dozen someone else's till they get what they want," Dean muttered, dropping his hand from his arm to rub at his chest instead. Jo followed the movement, once more like a hawk. Once more, Dean didn't notice, a little lost in the conversation. "I, uh…there's only so much I'll be able to take before..."

"We get it," Jo suddenly said. It was a completely supportive, not questions asked kind of tone and she stared at him with those earnest eyes. Eyes he was much more used to seeing narrowed and teasing. "Everyone has a breaking point."

The words, a mirror of his own thoughts, were almost like a slap to the face, but Dean managed not to flinch. He was pretty sure he paled but… Well, she wasn't wrong. In fact, it was the most damn supportive thing anyone could have said to him. Not expecting him to face the world alone after everything had been taken from him. After he'd somehow found it in him to still say no. He knew that wasn't a possibility, wasn't even an option. And there was Jo, holding him up and saying she knew it too and, what's more, didn't blame him for it.

But the words still hurt. Because it was a reminder that he would break, and then he'd break again, thirty years and levels of fire and pain and guilt later. If he even made it thirty, this time.

Something flickered in his chest, like a fluttering tap against the back of his sternum, and Dean sucked in a breath. He pressed a hand to his chest, blinking rapidly and not breathing in hopes of feeling it again. He didn't, his chest had gone silent, but Dean wanted to cry (because of this stupid, emotional and difficult conversation he was being forced to have, and no other reason, obviously).

That…that had been Cas. His Cas. His trenchcoat wearing, nerd angel, 'I gripped you tight and raised you from Perdition' Cas. Dean dropped his arm from his chest, crossing his arms as casually as he could manage (which was not that casually at all) and closed his eyes. Cas was in there, reminding him of that. That he'd be there for him, every version of him. Dean's hand, fisted where it was tucked into his other arm, was shaking.

Cas would come for him. He hadn't- he'd never- well, Dean hadn't gotten that far. But since they were starting to talk about him selling his soul like it would happen ('It's not an inevitably Dean', Cas's voice was in his head, even if he had trouble taking solace in it), maybe he should. Because if he sold his soul (and that was still a big if in his book), Cas was coming for him. In all her Miss Hawaii and Warrior of God glory. This Cas – the Cas of whatever year it actually was – would go after him. That…he had no doubt about that.

Maybe he could make forty years knowing she was coming for him, knowing it would end. Maybe. Dean swallowed roughly.

"Plan A is still not to sell my soul," he clarified, just to say it out loud. To make that promise to himself, once more, if to no one else. "But Plan B or – er, the overarching plan – is to kill Lilith so it won't matter whether I break the first seal or not. No final seal, no apocalypse."

"Alright then." Ellen nodded, and that was, somehow, miraculously, unexplainable, that. No one dared tell her otherwise. "We work with that. How are we gonna know if this whole thing goes down early?"

She directed her question at Bobby and his legal pad of notes, and something vaguely like relief and a lot like needing to throw up flooded Dean out of nowhere. The man from the future swallowed the feeling down, but it never made it back down past his ribs. The rest of the room turned to the conversation of stopping this Hellgate without breaking time, and Dean was bracing against the kitchen counter like he couldn't breathe. Probably because he couldn't breathe.

"I'm uh, gonna go, and uh…do…something…bathroom." Dean shook his head, blaming the utter lack of oxygen getting to his brain for that rambling, muttering mess. Luckily, most of the crew didn't pay him much attention. Dean wanted to think it was because he was a smooth operator just going to do something…in the bathroom (uh-huh, right). … The rest of him knew that he probably looked like crap warmed over and they were giving him some space to pull it together.

Sam nodded at him as he slipped out of the room, those puppy dog eyes knowing full well what was going on. He didn't look at anyone else, but no one tried to stop him so Dean slipped out of the kitchen under the guise of, uh, bathroom things, and bolted for the stairs the moment he was out of view.

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

A/Ns: Oh nose, sounds like Dean's in for another panic attack. I do love tormenting that poor boy….

I had to cut it off here because, no kidding, this chapter grew to be the length of three (now it's just the length of two! Yipee!) Also, cutting it here leaves much lighter stuff for next chapter, rather than all this heavy doom and gloom (I always get self-conscious and second-guess-y with the chatter chapters, man)

The Colt: I read an interesting fanfic once upon a time that suggested the Colt didn't kill Lucifer because he was an angel and the gun had been designed to kill creatures of darkness or evil origin. It was a cool theory, since we've never been given a canon reason for why the gun can't kill five things, or what those fives things are.

More Trivia Knowledge: For your Jeopardy collection, the word 'meme' was coined in the 1970s, but the internet meme didn't really come into play until the 1990s. It wasn't until Youtube released in 2005 that memes became more widely known. The earliest news article I could find that didn't have to explain what a meme was, was from 2008, so I think I'm safe to say some hunters back in (late) 2006 probably hadn't caught on to an early internet craze yet :) Isn't research fun?!

Bucky Sims: Okay, this boy gave me some trouble all chapter long. I liked him well enough in the episode we got, at least until the end. I sort of felt a little bad for him, actually; he got judged pretty harshly by the others. Now, I get it – dude pulled a dick move and should be held accountable. But I didn't feel like he was evil or like he deserved having every hunter turned against him and shunned. I don't know, it's possible I'm in the minority on this (I mean…yeah, going through with stringing your friend up with a noose gives you a lot of time to second guess your life choices and Bucky didn't….), but I felt the reactions against him were a little extreme for the crime. Asa's death was accidental, the crime was that he hid it and lied. Anyway. Long story short (too late), this chapter was hard to write in that regard. I kept switching back and forth between BUCKY = EVIL TERRIBLE DIPSHIT because the show (kinda) went that way with him (debatable), but my gut instinct was to make him a halfway decent guy (because the show also kind of went that way with him?). You know, maybe a bit of a coward and a follower, not too relatable, but not a bad dude, maybe even redeemable. Anyway, I'm a tad all over the place with him at the moment, but I think I've got character growth set for Bucky Sims and we'll see if we can't redeem him over the next however many years till the apocalypse (which, of course, isn't coming, cuz we're totally gonna stop that. cough)

Lemme know what you all think of my take on him. We're still in the early stages, so fixes can still be made!

On the Topic of Race in Writing: Time to get real for a second, because this topic is important even if it is incredibly uncomfortable and I have my own work to do as a white woman who claims to be an ally. I currently feel pretty comfortable in my ability to write characters of color and I like to have a diverse crew whenever it's my choice to make it that way. But if I am ever off, or could improve how I write characters that are not white-cis-woman (aka: what's default relatable to me), please do not be afraid to speak up. To be perfectly honest, I struggle every damn time I write a description of a character as black or dark-skinned. I can never figure out what to say without worrying it's not cool to say it that way (and then I try and think how I'd describe a white person in reverse and get completely flail-worthy-flustered when I realize WE DON'T FUCKING DESCRIBE WHITE PEOPLE WE JUST ASSUME THEY'RE WHITE AND HOW MESSED UP IS THAT?!) ahem Anyway, if there are ways I can be improving how I write characters outside of my admittedly small, single-white-woman perspective, please let me know. I am genuinely interested in improving myself in and outside of writing (even if it's hard and sucks and I wanna whine about it a lot).

Up Next: Dean's little panic attack is gonna take him right to Cas's room (cuz…honestly, who here thought any differently once he went for the stairs?) but he's not alone. Jo's got a couple of questions, and she's way too smart for her own good. Andy's finally joining the conversation (much to several people's headache-induced surprise, this little Confab gets wrapped up with some motherly threats of being kept in the loop, and the boys get back out on the road, looking for their next hunt or any sign of Ava Wilson.

Reviews: I would really love to hear from you guys. Thoughts, opinions, predictions, or the standard-but-always-more-than-acceptable, "Like Button Pushed!" would be really appreciated in these times of isolation and discord (even if both are, unfortunately, quite necessary).

Chapter 106: Season 2: Chapter 73

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Well, my brain is kinda fried today. It's been a whirlwind of two weeks for me. Big things happening when big things were not supposed to be happening. I'm supposed to be relaxing C'est la vie. Anyway, you'll get to read all about it in the end notes when I ramble and babble. Hope everyone is doing good and staying safe!

New Readers: WELCOME!!! We have had what feels like a swell of new readers the last two months, but particularly this week. It's awesome. Thanks for checking out mah little beast of a story and sticking with it for, uh, like seven hundred thousand words or something (good god. And we're in what season? head thud)

Reviews: I have become quite terrible at replying to reviews/ comments, which I am most ashamed of but I also know the priority is getting new chapters up for you all :D Anyway, if you haven't heard from me, know that you guys are still keeping me going, new and old readers alike. Seriously, you guys are amazing. Thank you SO MUCH for your time and your words and your encouragement.

Chapter Warnings: Dean's having a panic attack, Cas is calming him down while also, uh, doing absolutely nothing as a comatose-slash-healing-tranced angel in a hospital bed. Jo's sneaking and teasing. Sam's eating salad. Just another night in the Singer household.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 73

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Dean didn't really know how he ended up in Cas's room, staring at the comatose body of Angela Garrett. He'd had taken the stairs two at a time, heart pounding in his ears like he was being chased by the hounds of hell themselves. The rest of him felt pretty much par for the course, as well. Blood rushing, veins pumping, skin tingling, adrenaline spiking. He couldn't breathe, his chest was tight and his stomach was a black hole, and yet still he wanted to throw up.

He backed himself into the first wall at the top of Bobby's stairs, then doubled over with a hand on his knee and the other on his chest, heaving shallow, rasping breaths towards the floor. What the hell was happening? Was he having a panic attack? In Bobby's house? Literally the safest place in North America, second only to the bunker (which was so damn safe they couldn't even currently get inside)? What was wrong with him?

Body busy panicking, brain busy trying to figure out why, Dean didn't actually realize he'd slowed his breathing 'til he realized wasn't breathing loud enough to drown out a freight train. That was when he noticed he could hear the steady intake and whoosh of a ventilator. A rhythm he was breathing in time to.

Dean straightened in the hallway, rubbing a chest that felt like it had taken a battering ram straight to it, and headed for the partially open door to Cas's room with the kind of speed that suggested desperation but the caution that said straight up paranoia. The ventilator wasn't loud, but it was a steady rhythm, impossible to ignore now that he'd noticed it. Without letting himself think too hard about it (thinking was a big no-no that immediately ratcheted up all the pounding and pulsing and buzzing and breathing and he was done with that now), he walked into the angel's room, stopping at the foot of the bed and watching her breathe.

In and out, in and out.

Dean didn't even know how long he stood there, just watching the rise and fall of the woman's chest. He told himself he did it to match his own breathing, to make sure he didn't start freaking out again. He told himself it was like before, back in the first days they'd hooked Angela up and Dean was terrified she'd stop breathing and they'd have killed some innocent woman. He was just making sure she kept breathing. That they both just kept breathing.

And if he found himself wishing – wondering – that he could somehow get back into that dream with the two of them and the bunker, where he'd felt safe and the furthest from lonely he'd ever been, well…no one was around to give him shit for that wish. Or see him rub knuckles over his sternum in a steady circle, trying to create some of that missing warmth.

"So, that her?"

Dean jumped hard enough to knock his knee and his flailing arm both into the metal railing of the hospital bed with a ridiculously loud clatter and a good dose of pain. He spun around to find Jo standing a foot inside the doorway, looking at him with wide eyes and what were definitely judgmental eyebrows.

"Jesus, Jo."

"Sorry," she said, sounding far from apologetic as she bunched her shoulders up. Her hands were tucked in her jeans again, revealing a long stretch of skin along her torso with the shrug. Dean's eyes darted down to the expanse of soft, pale skin, an inch strip exposed by the way her shirt rode up with her shoulders. "Figured if you heard me coming, you'd run for the hills."

Her expression turned at least a modicum – really, the tiniest of bits – sheepish (and a lot expectant, still judgmental as shit and damn this woman he never could seem to fault). Dean cleared his throat, dragging his eyes away from her and her stupidly exposed skin that he somehow still found himself completely attracted to despite repeatedly reminding his little head that he thought of Jo more as a sister.

(Okay, that wasn't quite right. There wasn't a word for what he and Jo were. Had been. Would be? No, wouldn't be. Because if there was a word, it was more like star-crossed. Something simple and pure, that came together but bounced apart like repelling magnets. Not meant to be, even though all that possibility was right there, waiting patiently (tauntingly, Dean thought) just out reach.)

The hunter sighed, turning back to stare at the passed out angel so he didn't have to look at Jo. Whether she followed his lead out of graciousness or curiosity was anyone's guess. As she came up beside him, he conceded grumpily, "I wouldn't have run for the hills. I'm not a coward."

Her sidelong glance, endlessly amused with that same eyebrow still raised, made him grumble all the more. Alright, fine, he wouldn't have run but he might have…snuck away. Awesome. So he'd be a sneak over a coward. Fan-freaking-tastic.

"That Cas?" Jo asked, thankfully changing the topic (and damnit, he would not be grateful for her changing a topic she'd picked in the first place! After following him. He wasn't the sneak, she was the sneak!)

(And why was he having this argument in his head like a five year old? One who'd pulled his crush's pigtails and got punched in return and was now pouting about it. Friggin' ridiculous.)

Dean eyed her warily from his periphery. When he turned more fully to her, it was with a mask of confidence and pure diversionary tactic. "You seriously think an angel would be strapped to a hospital bed?"

Because he didn't want her to know the angel was currently strapped to a hospital bed. He trusted Jo, he really did, but for some reason that he really wasn't up for exploring, he didn't know if he trusted her with Cas.

(And how silly was that? Like he continuously insisted to everyone around him, Cas wasn't his. There was no sharing him – er, her – with others because she wasn't friggin' his to pass around.)

Dean sighed internally, brain cloudy with frustration and irritation and impatience, all because there were feelings going on up there and, damnit, he didn't have time for them, let alone to sort through or make sense of any of it.

Cas was like a secret this time around. His secret that he had to keep, or he risked losing it. Losing her. Not to Jo or other hunters, but to Azazel. Damnit, Azazel had almost taken the angel out – taken her from Dean – once already. Twice if you counted that chest explosion in Michigan. And it was only going to get harder from here on out. Experience had taught Dean that and taught it well. That yellow-eyed bastard had taken his father from him, would take Sam from him no matter what he did to try and stop it (and fuck it all, but he would stop it. Somehow). That son of a bitch wasn't getting Dean's angel too. Fuck that, and fuck anyone who gave him shit keeping Cas close to his chest (literally, some days).

Dean wasn't losing anyone else he cared about to Azazel or to Hell. And Cas felt like one of the few he actually had some control over.

Jo, oblivious to all that going on in Dean's head, shrugged one shoulder nonchalantly. "My mom likes to say I'm an idiot but I'm not stupid." She quirked a grin his way which was returned out of force of habit but not backed by much. Jo looked back at the angel, starting to get a hint of the headspace Dean was floating around in. She cleared her throat, tone a little more serious. "You said the uh, vessel?-" and here Dean gave a small nod at her expectant look- "she took was in a coma."

Damnit, he had said that. He'd been trying to defend Cas, not give away she had a weakness. Double damnit, of course Jo knew this was Cas. Andy had sent her a friggin' picture, the two of them all cuddled up together, and Dean had all but labeled her as the woman comatose'd upstairs. The hunter managed to tilt his head back, throat rumbling with an angry growl even while his cheeks reddened.

(It was an interesting combo, Jo thought personally.)

It was a damn good thing it had just been friends down there in that kitchen while Dean tried to defend Cas's need to take a vessel and inadvertently alerted half the room to her vulnerability. He and Sam and Bobby had all silently agreed (Andy too, extra emphasis on the silent part for him) that they wouldn't mention Cas was upstairs. It was bad enough they were telling hunters almost abstractly that angels existed and one was on their side, but if they'd mentioned she was upstairs, within view or reach, they'd find themselves contending with curiosity at the best and a whole lot uglier at the worst.

Dean wanted to bang his head against something hard. He resisted by reminding himself there were friends downstairs. Just friends. Down there and in this room with him.

"Yeah, that's Cas," he mumbled, trying not to feel like he was somehow betraying the angel by admitting it. Was he just being way too protective? Damnit, was this that chauvinistic thing rearing its ugly head again? Would he feel this same way if it was Jimmy Novak's body lying there instead? (Not that that even made any sense. If it was Jimmy, he wouldn't be lying in that hospital bed, therefore Dean and Jo wouldn't even be up here talking in the first place.)

God, he hoped it wasn't that and hoped harder Jo wouldn't pick up on it. One lecture about vessel equality from Cas and about half a dozen more about women's rights and suffrage (like it was nineteen friggin ten) from Sam had been more than enough to last a lifetime. Dean did not need more (and definitely not from Jo of all people. She wouldn't stop at the verbal ass-kicking, he was sure). The subtle twinge in his chest sure wasn't doing much to help, either, and he poked at it irritably (conveniently ignoring the fact that he was happy to be feeling anything at all from Chest Cas).

"She gonna be okay?" Jo received another sidelong look which she couldn't quite read (protectiveness? Defensiveness? Who knew Dean Winchester was so…touchy). She buried the urge to poke him for it and instead shrugged. "Not stupid, remember? She's hooked up to more machines than a hospital even has. And from the way you went full Mama Bear back there on Bucky of all people…I kind of got the impression she might be, you know, hurting."

"I did not go Mama- I do not go Mama Bear on people," Dean all but growled. He friggin' watched the way Jo's shoulders tensed up with restrained amusement and growled again, for all the good it did him. As his eyes landed back on his injured friend, the fight in him deflated and he sighed, scrubbing a hand through his hair with a half-hearted sigh of defeat. "Azazel tried to catch her in a trap."

"Like a devil's trap, but for angels?"

"I don't know, I didn't get a good look at it." He lowered his hand back to his chest before dropping it completely, realizing what he was doing and that Jo was eying him for it. "Think it was more painful than that. She took a beating from it. I got her free and we bolted before I got a good look."

Not that there'd been much to look at after Cas exploded half that damn gym, taking Azazel with it. After that, they'd had bigger things to worry about. Like the angel squad that no doubt showed up to sniff around.

"Jeez," Jo shook her head, closing the last foot between her and the bed, resting a hand on the metal railing, eyes still on Cas. "I can't imagine the kind of power it takes to bring down an angel."

Coming from anyone else, it might have made the man from the future tense. But this was Jo, and Dean saw past that that tough exterior – to the woman beneath trying to be a hunter more than herself – to the actual concern beneath. Jo cared. That's who she was, no matter how she tried to bury it beneath guns and knives and pure female badassery. And yeah, those all might be the things that turned Dean the hell on around her (always, without fault), but they weren't the reason he loved her.

But her question took him away from those thoughts. Back to a terrifying dark night, to the stupid florescents of a high school gym and lightning forking through the air, shattering every window and bulb. He could still see the bright flashes of wings as they – as Cas – was speared by those streaks of light. Could still hear Cas's screams. Dean tried not to think about how that would have ended if he hadn't stayed conscious through the beating. If Cas hadn't managed to heal him first.

He sucked in a breath and shook his head. "Nothing good, that's for sure."

Jo was giving him the side eye again. Dean tried not to twitch under that gaze. What was it with Harvelle women and their piercing friggin' looks? Like expectancy and judgement and understanding all wrapped up in one unblinking stare. Made no damn sense and wasn't friggin' fair, to boot.

"She'll be alright though?"

Dean huffed out a laugh, thinking of Cas and her – well, his at the time – annoyed glare in that parking lot, hovering over Dean's bloodied corpse as the soul of the man dared suggest she – he – didn't have it in him – her? – to bring Dean back.

'I will be weakened.'

He thought of the half dozen other times he'd heard that. Those stupid words that meant anything from 'gonna need to take a nap' to 'I'll be coughing up blood for the next three days'. In this case, at least they were somewhere in the middle.

"Yeah," he breathed out with a headshake that was more amusement than worry by sheer will. "She's healing right now."

A peaceful silence settled between them.

Too peaceful. Too settled. Dean's eyes narrowed.

"You know," Jo finally broke it and he could already hear the smile in her words without seeing it growing on her face (despite her mediocre efforts to hold it back).

"Jo," Dean countered immediately, warningly. He didn't know what she was going to say, but he knew that type of silence. It was gonna be nothing good for him.

"I thought she looked a little old for you in the picture," she kept going, heedless of his warning. Her words were thick – clogged – with that smug little grin. "But now…"

Dean pulled his head back, entirely unsure which to be more offended by. The fact that she was bringing up The Photo, the fact that she'd seen The Photo, the fact she was calling him a cradle robber (and what exactly did that make her?), or the fact she was calling him old.

There was just so much to choose from.

(And how, how, for even the last five seconds, had he forgotten about that damn photo?! Oh, right, because he'd been distracted by friggin' apocalypse Story Time! Well, that and panic attacks, but he wasn't acknowledging that last one had happened.)

"No, really," Jo interrupted before Dean could even get his mouth fully functional. "It'll be good for you. You know, someone your own age instead of a day over jailbait."

"Hey!" Dean barked, though any heat that it actually carried bounced off her shaking shoulders and shit-eating grin like a goddamn, impenetrable force field. "I'll have you know I like women of all ages. I'm an equal opportunity lay!"

The words had sounded good in his head, they really had. A strong defense, a stance of equality. A decent womanizer! And that's sort of how they came out…right in tandem with the utter lack of denial that he and Cas were a thing. Which they weren't. Damnit, he'd been dreaming, alright? That was it. And it took climbing into bed with the angel because the chair Dean had wanted to stay sitting right in hadn't worked out so well for him!

Damnit. Dean sighed and weighed the pros and cons of going out back to go dig an ever bigger hole and curl up to die in it. He was too busy thinking which junker in Bobby's yard probably had the softest dirt for digging under to notice the silence. The second silence. A long silence. The expectant kind that sat, just waiting on the edge of a joke he'd walked himself right into.

"…Just women?"

Dean's head whipped around and his eyes laser-focused on the woman standing next to him, currently giving Angela Garrett a run for the title of Devil Lady. "What the hell, Jo!"

She had the audacity to look innocent of all things. Oh, Jo and Angela had better never meet, because if they did, Dean would just save everyone the trouble and shoot himself in the head.

"It's just, I couldn't help but notice…" Oh, oh, he was very sure she could have helped a lot of things, "…the Castiel in your world was a guy. And since you two are all cozy in this time, and you've only been here for like…a year…"

Dean turned on his heal and left the room.

"I'm just saying it would explain some things!" Jo called after him, voice so full of laughter she actually struggled to get the words out.

Dean was not having this conversation (with Jo, or anybody else. And, for that matter, what the hell was going on? Was everyone drinking the gay Kool-Aid or something?!) At least she didn't seem serious about it, unlike the Devil Lady they left behind in the hospital bed, who was probably cackling even in unconsciousness (Dean just knew it). Which is why Angela was retaining her title and Jo would just have to try for it another day.

"Come on, Dean!" Jo followed after him, still laughing with the payback of years of bad jokes she didn't even know existed between them. "I thought you were an equal opportunity lay!"

-o-o-o-

The two hadn't been gone for long, maybe twenty minutes by the time they came back downstairs, Dean stomping and Jo following with less-than silent chuckles, punching him when they got to the landing with a look that said 'get over it, you know I'm just kidding and the longer you pull the sourpuss face, the longer I have rights to make fun of you for it.' Yeah, Dean knew that face well too. He glared at her for it though. For reasons (and only one of them was her being mostly, sort of, partially right).

The others were still in the kitchen. Ellen and Bobby were in a quiet but heated discussion about something over in their corner of the kitchen table. Dean could guess what (what else, but apocalypse plans?) but really wasn't up for getting involved. At first, panic flared – that legal pad was still out on the table, available for just anyone to grab, to see, read, know – but Bobby caught what must have been quite the stricken look on his face and shook his head ever so slightly, eyebrow cocked. He laid a hand on that stack of notes, inching it just ever so much closer to him. Dean got the message. Bobby wasn't an idiot. He wasn't spreading information like a wildfire or letting anyone feed off anything they shouldn't.

Ellen remained in the dark about her daughter's fate where Dean came from (and hers, too, but Dean knew which one the Harvelle woman would actually give a damn about). Good. The man from the future planned to keep it that way. Wasn't gonna happen this time, so no one needed to know.

Someone had broken the ribs back out, as well as the next round of beers. There were a couple bags of chips open on the kitchen counter, reached for occasionally here and there or passed around when called for. Sam was munching on a salad that he hadn't done much more than pick at earlier. Andy was eating a bowl of ice cream (because of course he was) as he chatted with Asa and Bucky in half Sign, half haphazard gestures. Given the shaking heads, failed attempts not to laugh, and, in Bucky's case, shouting of random answers like they were playing a game of charades, it wasn't so much of a conversation as it was code breaking.

So, yeah, life was almost normal despite everything this group had learned tonight.

Some wonders never cease, huh? Dean thought, not entirely sure if his brain was being sarcastic or not. Either way, the fact that all these people – his future family – were still here, discussing the apocalypse like they believed him, believed in him, and were possibly on board to help…. Dean knew better than to knock it, sarcastic or not. He was damn lucky, was what he was.

He had to pass between Andy and Asa, interrupting their, uh, 'conversation', while Jo still followed right behind. He figured he could begrudgingly get her a beer as well. Very begrudgingly. Andy smiled lazily as Dean stopped right in front of him – purposefully in front of him – and glared until that smile grew into nothing short of a little brother's shit-eating grin. Dean was getting a lot of those lately.

"You're dead," Dean said incredibly evenly, holding Andy's half-lidded eyes. The kid had definitely taken a sabbatical of his own while they'd been upstairs, seeking out some comfort of his own in the form of good old Mary Jane. For once, Dean couldn't even fault him.

Not that he'd let the kid know, of course. Nope. He held that reddened gaze for a second longer, his own eyes narrowed in a promise of big brother bodily harm, then he turned for the fridge to get those beers.

Andy responded with, 'Who, me?' and, 'Whatever do you mean, Dean?' as well as, 'I didn't do anything!' and 'Oh, so Jo brought up the picture finally, huh?' All at once, in a series of images that were (mostly) in order and actually (somewhat) discernible. Apparently, the kid had been practicing. The images also, given the way the entire room around them both simultaneously silenced and seemingly flinched as one, didn't go just to Dean.

Guess he hadn't gotten much farther on the whole sending images to one specific target front.

The room stayed in that stunned silence for another beat before it erupted in chaos.

"Gah!" Bucky spilled his beer half across the table and into his lap.

Asa was holding his head and shaking it at the same time. "What the hell was that?"

Jo stuck her head out from behind Dean, blinking at Andy in surprise. "Was that you, Andy?"

"Oh, uh, yeah…" Sam sent an apologetic look around the room on behalf of their resident Jedi, who looked more sympathetic than apologetic, but that could just be the stoned expression on his face. "Andy does that now."

"Now?" Ellen practically barked, massaging at her forehead. The headaches Andy caused never lasted long (well, unless you were Sam, who seemed to have a natural defense against his powers, which included a headache all its own, but the younger Winchester hid it well) but they were annoying anytime they flared up. Like a phantom pain you knew you felt a minute ago, even if you weren't feeling it now. Especially if you didn't know one was coming. "What the hell did he do before?"

Ellen knew the kid was a psychic, but she'd never gotten much out of Jo regarding him, and the boys hadn't bothered with specifics when they were busy telling her about Cold Oak and their missing girl.

"Oh, he was a total Jedi," Jo answered with a wide grin. Andy leaned over from his spot on the counter and held out his fist. She gleefully bumped it with her own, offering a wink that had that lazy smile getting even lazier. She just laughed and turned to her mom. "He could make people do what he wanted with just his voice."

"Until someone wised up and took that away, I see," Ellen said somewhat caustically. She got multiple, immediate frowns for her effort and realized only belatedly (though hell if she would take it back) that these boys (and even Bobby) seemed to care about the kid more than just some random stray would suggest.

"What the hell, mom!" And apparently her daughter as well. Jo was frowning at her possibly the hardest of all of them. She crossed her arms over her chest and Ellen wondered just how much time she'd spent with the Winchesters. Because it sure seemed more than Ellen had been aware of. Or, perhaps, comfortable with. "Not cool."

Over her shoulder, Andy waved it off, catching Jo's attention too. She looked ready to argue, but the kid shrugged, the bandages around his neck more obvious than ever with the movement. A second image accosted them all. A bumper sticker with the words 'Shit Happens' slapped across them. Still at the table but in the closest seat, Bucky choked on his beer.

"He's family, Ellen," Dean stepped in while Jo rolled her eyes and gave Andy a look (possibly a look that said 'stand up for yourself, you idiot.' She just got that same lazy smile and an exaggeratedly slow wink in return. Jo looked caught between hitting him and throwing her arms up in surrender).

Ellen Harvelle drew up with a blink of surprise. She knew what that word mean to a Winchester. Forced to reevaluate, the woman glanced at Andy, who was grinning at her daughter like a harmless puppy. Truth was, she was less than comfortable with a person able to control anyone with his voice alone (particularly a person building a very obvious friendship with her daughter). The hesitancy must have shown on her face.

"Back off, El. Boy's a good kid," he'd muttered low enough that the words were just for her. Ellen cast him a side glance, but Bobby was close, eyes buried beneath a furled brow. Ellen took in a breath. Okay. She trusted Bobby, and hell…she might not want to, but she trusted those boys to. And even her daughter, though her worry as a mother almost always trampled right on over that.

Ellen nodded and backed off, as requested.

"So you don't really need Sign, do you?" Asa asked in the lull that fell over the group, not quite calm but not too uncomfortable either. Bucky was still cleaning up the spilled beer, Jo was still glaring at her mom, but Andy gave Asa his full attention. The giant of a man was looking at the kid with obvious interest, backed with a touch of wariness he hid well behind a cheerful smile.

Andy returned the cheerful part a hundred fold, set his bowl on the counter beside him with a clatter of spoon against ceramic, and raised his gauze and band-aide accosted hands. 'Not really,' he said in sign. 'Bobby makes me do it.'

"You'll thank me one day, ya idjit," the older hunter grumbled loud enough for the rest of the room to hear.

"So…you get death premonitions and he got Jedi powers?" Bucky was glancing between the two, hand absently running an already-pretty-soaked paper towel over what was left of the puddle on the table. Andy and Sam shrugged identical shrugs. Off to the side, Ellen shook her head; apparently 'family' hadn't been that far from the truth. Bucky laughed, the first honest, unrestrained noise he'd made since the apocalypse had first come up. At least outside of his and Asa's half-conversation with Andy, who had that effect on people. Bucky looked at Sam, eyes wide but also somehow okay. "Man, you got the shit end of that stick."

Andy cracked up hard enough to knock himself off the counter, silent even as it was. He reached over to Bucky, hand raised high. The hunter looked hesitant for a second, but Andy just flapped his hand and sent a picture of a kitten hanging onto a rope, the inspirational words 'Hang in There' big and bold above the picture.

'Don't leave me hanging, man.'

Bucky chuckled after he was done wincing, still a little wary, but high fived the psychic. Andy beamed like he'd just won an Olympic gold and hopped back up, recovering his ice cream with a gleeful expression, utterly heedless of Bobby barking to get off the damn counter.

Through it all, Jo looked over at Dean and smiled. Smiled, like it was just another night, just another gathering of friends and family. Dean caught the look and couldn't have stopped the warmth that blossomed in his chest if he tried.

-o-o-o-

"I expect check-in's, boys," Ellen said as she stood in the front door the next morning. Asa and Bucky had split late last night to find a hotel. Jo decided to stick around, spend the night with her mom and the boys. The Harvelles had camped out in the den, though by the time everyone actually called it a night, it was pretty much morning. They'd agreed to meet back up before noon, with Asa, Bucky and Jo headed for a possible hunt in Indiana. Ellen hadn't looked happy about, but she'd kept her mouth shut. She had a business that wouldn't run itself to get back to.

"Will do, Ellen," Sam agreed as he bent over for her to wrap him in a brief farewell hug. She patted his back harder than any man Sam had ever known.

"We're all we got," she repeated her words from the previous night as she pulled away, hard but also loving eyes locked on him. They slid over to Dean next and the older Winchester straightened under that gaze. "Shit-storm that's headed our way? Best way to prepare against it is to know it's coming. So you call when you have new information. I don't care how insignificant it is. Got it?"

"Got it." Dean gave her a nod, going in for his own hug (knowing from experience he'd get hit if he tried to get out of it).

"And for God's sake, if your brother goes missing, you call me." The words were only for him, her arm tight around his back, keeping him from retreating. Dean closed his eyes, tightening his own grip before he could think too hard about it or the words that caused it.

"Yes, Ma'am," he whispered, chin tucked over her shoulder. She patted his pack like a mother (and damnit, that thought did not make his insides squirm with the stupid fuzzies) before finally loosening her hold.

"Nothing's gonna happen to him," she promised the one thing she couldn't possibly promise, pulling away. She held Dean by the biceps, eyes as fierce and full of that promise as he had ever seen them. "Or you."

Dean couldn't look away, for all that he wanted to. He eventually had to, if only to hide the way her words were worming under his skin and straight to his heart (and soul). He wanted to believe her, for all that he did and didn't. So he just nodded and she stepped back, dropping her arms from him.

"And you."

Jo gave her mother a raised eyebrow and expectant look when that gaze turned to her next. She stood just to the left of Sam, arms crossed but features somehow still soft. Like she knew this wouldn't devolve into a fight (even if she was ready for one).

"You take care of yourself, you hear?" If anyone noticed the way Ellen's words came out thick, despite the brave face and refusal to voice anything more than that about her daughter's life choices, well, no one in that room was dumb enough to bring it up.

Jo smirked in response but there was a grateful smile buried beneath it. She stepped up to her mother, wrapping her in a hug completely of her own volition. "I will, mom. You don't need to worry about me."

"I'm your mother, Joanna Beth. That's the job." Ellen tucked her head over her daughter's shoulder and held her for an extra long moment. She didn't let up when Jo started to squirm, or pat her back in an attempted signal.

"Okay, mom."

"Right." Ellen pulled back, the look in her eye saying she knew exactly what she'd just done and didn't regret it for a second. She regarded her daughter for another long beat before turning and leaving the house with no further fanfare. She and Bobby had already exchanged their customary farewell over a cup of coffee that morning ('Headed back?' 'Bar won't run itself' 'Be safe. Poor one out for me.' 'Always do, Bobby.')

Jo turned to the brothers as soon as the rumble of her mother's truck faded into the dust and distance. Asa and Bucky would be pulling up any minute now. "You sure you don't want help on this one? I could tag along."

Sam smiled but it stretched across his face wrong. "We don't even know where we're going, Jo. We don't have a lead on Ava."

"Last time we searched for weeks. Never found her." There was bitterness in Dean's tone that Jo was starting to associate with repeated events, even if she didn't know what those events were. "Not much reason to think that'll change."

Not until Azazel came after Sam. Then, and Dean could only hope to a god he didn't believe in, Sam would somehow find a way to tell him where he and the others had been taken. Like he had last time.

(Dean wasn't thinking about the fact that it had been Andy who'd gotten that message to him last time and that, if Sam were to have any hope of repeating the past, the kid would have to be at the new Cold Oak with him. Something he hadn't walked away from and which Dean had no intention of letting repeat this time. And yeah, he was aware there was a problem with that equation. He just didn't friggin' know how to fix it.)

"So…what will do you now?" Jo tucked her hands in her jean pockets even as the rumble of Asa's Jeep became audible on the main road.

"Don't know," Dean admitted with a frustrated sigh. "Cas is out of commission for a while. I guess…we'll start looking for Ava anyway. Pick up hunts on the way."

That's what they'd done last time, at least. And while Dean was getting increasingly frustrated by their default of 'just do what you'd normally do,' it was the advice everyone with any basic understanding of Time kept telling him.

Jo nodded as the engine rumble grew louder. Asa and Bucky were pulling up outside. She stepped forward, leaning up onto her tiptoes to wrap her arms around the two of them together. Both Winchesters had to bend over for her to do it, but they surrendered to the hug before she had to start yanking them down.

"I'm glad you told us," she said from between them, squeezing once before letting go and stepping back. The boys straightened, Sam with a light blush and a much more genuine smile, Dean trying to look like he wasn't touched in the slightest. She was getting to know him so much better than that, though.

"Your mom's right," Sam admitted with a self-conscious shrug of one shoulder. "We need all the help we can get."

Jo eyed him for a moment, head cocked to the side, before she shook it. "It's more than that." She put her hands on her hips, glancing at Dean before looking back to Sam. There was a little quirk to her lips, playful and yet somehow earnest as always. "It's family."

Sam's grin only grew, as did that light dusting of pink on his cheeks. Dean shook his head, blatantly ignoring his own warm and fuzzies doing flip-flops in his chest (and thinking maybe that was Cas in there. He'd forgotten how much the angel had grown to like the Harvelle women after their one night together). He reached out, wrapping one arm around Jo's shoulders to pull her into a hug.

"Be safe," he said, planting a brief kiss to the top of her head. She wrapped her arms around him shortly, and he could feel her grinning into his chest.

"You too." She pulled back as Dean released her, turning a rather demanding eye on Sam, whose eyebrows went up in questioning innocence at the look. "That goes for you as well."

The younger Winchester chuckled even as the front door opened, Asa and Bucky stepping through. He gave Jo a nod, mirroring his brother's words to her mother, "Yes, Ma'am."

Her looked definitely took on the echo of a glare, which made Sam laugh more, but it was interrupted by the morning greetings from Asa and Bucky. Jo's bag was already packed and ready to go, hanging out next to the front door, so there wasn't much left to do but head out.

(Andy had already said his goodbyes that morning, giving her a big hug and a high five. He'd suggested joining them sometime, but had been swatted down (literally, swatted on the back of the head) by Bobby. He, in no uncertain terms, was not going anywhere until he could communicate without giving people a headache. The images that had followed had gotten him another head-slap. 'I meant your hands, ya idjit!')

Jo gave each of the boys a look on her way out, duffle slung over her shoulder. Dean shook his head with a wry grin and a stupidly warm swirl in his torso. Sam sent him a knowing look, which he glared at immediately.

Asa held his hand out to Dean as Bucky followed Jo out to the Jeep. "Well, it was a wild night," he said with a wry grin. Not the usual wild night for any of them – in either of the two usual contexts hunters ran into – but wild all the same. Dean shook his hand with an understanding nod. "You guys need anything, you call. Bucky and I'll be there."

Neither Winchester knew how sure Asa was about Bucky's commitment to their so-called cause, but the guy had seemed to turn a corner by the end of the night. Was almost one of 'em, though the barrier of not-quite-on-board-for-an-apocalypse had remained.

Regardless, Sam shook his hand next with a grateful nod, too. "Take care of Jo for us."

"Always." Asa gave his tall counterpart a playful wink, then both brothers a two-fingered salute as he headed out to the car, screen door banging closed behind him. He climbed into the driver's seat, the glare off the windshield too bright to see the people inside the car, and then they were backing away from Bobby's house and pulling out for the main road.

The Winchesters exchanged a glance as the Jeep disappeared into the distance. Dean let out a haggard sigh, running a hand down his face and leaning his hip against the nearest surface, which happened to be the stairs.

"It could have gone worse," Sam offered in condolence, a rallying but cheap smile on his face. He was feeling as weary as his brother. Neither had slept all that well last night, or gotten much of it between the extended Apocalypse planning with Ellen and Bobby, maneuvering around certain facts that no one needed to know (like upcoming deaths outside of Sam at whatever replacement Hell found for Cold Oak), and the racing thoughts it had left them both with for hours afterward.

Dean dropped his hand from his face, giving his brother a light glare. His gaze drifted back to the open front door, the dusty yard beyond the screen. "You think they actually believed any it?"

Sam shrugged. The answer to that, he thought, probably varied from person to person. "I don't know, I thought they took it pretty well. Don't know if that means they believe it, though," he said instead, crossing the couple of feet to lean against the wall next to his brother, tucking his large hands into his jeans pockets. He tipped his head back against the solid surface behind him. "Does it matter?"

No, Dean thought with another pent-up sigh. It didn't. The Apocalypse was coming, whether or not anyone believed it was.

"Hey!" The call for attention immediately grabbed theirs and both boys turned to find Bobby standing in the entryway to the kitchen, cell phone in hand. "You boys up for a case? Got what sounds like a salt-n-burn in Omaha."

An ampersand, a stack of pancakes, and half a dozen exclamation marks immediately followed Bobby's words, searing across the inside of their eyelids. The Winchesters both winced. Bobby didn't even flinch.

"And pancakes, apparently," the man said with a roll of his eyes. He disappeared back into the kitchen, hollering something at Andy about setting the stove on fire. Dean and Sam exchanged yet another look.

"A hunt sounds good," Sam offered with a small, tight smile. It wasn't like they had anywhere else to be than sticking to a timeline that was ultimately going to screw them over and searching for a woman they both knew they'd never find.

Dean huffed but pushed himself off the wall. "So do pancakes." He raised his voice as they both headed for the kitchen. "You better be putting chocolate chips in those!"

-o-o-o-

They hit the road the next day. Both boys still needed the sleep catch up (and, though they'd never admit it, the downtime) so they stuck around Bobby's for a full day, researching the hunt one of his buddies had called in so as not to completely be 'wasting time' (as any hunter generally called 'resting'). It looked pretty run-of-the-mill ghost, but they'd know more once they got there. It was only a couple hours from Sioux Falls, so they agreed to set out early the next morning.

(It was run-of-the-mill once they got there. Exceedingly so.)

After that, it was back to the grind of everyday routine for a hunter. Catching a case, getting to town, talking with the witnesses, researching at the local library. Nights spent in dingy hotels and days driving place to place, stopping for gas and greasy diner food. Asking after Ava Wilson with a picture Sam had scrounged up from the internet somehow (Dean hadn't asked). No one ever knew anything about her, same as last time.

Dean didn't want to say he disliked the monotony (this was his life, after all, and when the world wasn't actively ending, he usually liked his life), but he was getting twitchy. There was an itch just under his skin he couldn't reach, a curling dread just over the horizon, getting every closer with each day they drove toward it, and its name was the Apocalypse. More specifically, Sam's death date.

December turned to January, the boys ringing in the New Year with a solemn clink of beer bottles, false cheer, and their best efforts to pretend that 2007 wasn't going to be the beginning of the end.

They spent three weeks on the road in total, that stupid itch growing every day. Sam was feeling it too, Dean could tell. And it wasn't just spillover from him. His kid brother was aware of the looming future well enough on his own. It was getting to the point where all they had to do was exchange a look to know how little impact they were making killing some werewolf in Utah or doing a salt and burn in Nebraska.

But they didn't have anywhere else to be or anything else to be doing yet, despite how wrong that felt, day in and day out.

"Yeah, alright, thanks, Bobby," Dean said into his cell before snapping it shut, tossing it on the table with the same growing frustration that he did everything these days.

Across from him, Sam glanced up from the newspaper he was scouring over for their next case, phone in the other hand as he cross-referenced information on the internet. "No change in Cas?"

"Still breathing. Still comatose." Dean shrugged, but Sam could read the concern in the tightness of his shoulders. At least, for once, his brother wasn't rubbing at his chest. He didn't know how Dean didn't have a flat spot in the center of his sternum by now, worn down by sheer repetition.

Sam set the paper down, trying to offer his brother a supportive expression. He guessed he overshot given the grimace the older Winchester immediately adopted in return. "She'll be fine, Dean. She said it could be a couple of weeks."

"One week," Dean corrected. "She said it would be one week, maybe more. It's been four. A whole friggin' month, Sammy."

"It's been three," Sam corrected. "Three weeks and two days, Dean. Give her some time. She was pretty beat up."

'And, you know, raised you from the dead,' the younger Winchester thought, still with a tinge of bitter nausea in his stomach that always came with a reminder of his brother's death. Of that bloody, messy photo on Gordon's phone.

Dean huffed and growled and mumbled, but eventually nodded, shoulders dropping. "I know, damnit. Tell me you have something for us to do. Sick of this town."

Which was a ridiculous exaggeration, considering they'd only been in Dayton, Ohio for the night and a breakfast stop. A stopover from the case they'd wrapped in Zanesville, heading back towards Sioux Falls for lack of a better direction to take. Lately, though, Dean was sick of everything that wasn't progress, and nothing felt like progress.

"Uh, maybe. Check this out." Sam spun the newspaper around. He pointed to an article at the top of the page, complete with a photo taken of the inside of a jewelry store, police tape still stretched across several open, empty cases. "This is the second robbery in Milwaukee in a month. Both of them – the first one was a bank – were done by someone on the inside. A teller at the first one, and uh, the head buyer at the jewelry store. But get this."

Dean looked up from the article, something uncomfortable in his stomach that was usually a precursor to the déjà vu of knowing things he couldn't remember. Sam locked eyes with him, the morbid excitement of a mystery lighting those brown babies right up.

"Both employees committed suicide right after the robbery. Like, the night of." At Dean's sharp frown, opening his mouth to no doubt tell Sam that didn't make any sense, the younger Winchester continued, "But the money was never found. And everyone who knew them – friends, family, coworkers – insist they weren't the type to do it."

"So what do you think it is?" Dean asked, but the question rang hollow. He already knew what it was…he just couldn't seem to remember it.

"I don't know," Sam answered, that tinge of excitement still an undercurrent in his posture and voice. He may attest to not liking hunting much, but kid sure did like the deduction and problem-solving side of it. He typed something on his phone before sliding it across the table to his brother, too. There was another article about a different robbery, this one the bank. "It could be nothing – maybe they're being held hostage, forced to rob their businesses, and then the suicides are faked. But the reports don't mention any kind of nervous behavior. There's a security guard from the first robbery who witnessed the whole thing. Talked to the guy who robbed the place. Uh, Ronald Reznick, from…" Sam took the phone back to skim part of the article, eyes jumping back and forth rapidly, "Milwaukee National Trust."

He slid the phone back around for Dean, who stared at the name with much harder intensity than two typed words should ever require.

"The teller that heisted the place, Juan Morales, was a friend, and the security guard let him in after hours. Said he was acting completely normal. 'Too normal,' is actually what he said. At least until he beat Ronald within an inch of his life." The younger Winchester shook his head, sitting back in his chair. "The guy survived, but he's insisting that wasn't Morales. So…I'm thinking, maybe-"

"Shapeshifter."

Sam straightened, realizing only in that second that Dean's face was slack with that same blankness he always got when preoccupied with future memories. Sam glanced down at the paper, then back to his brother, anticipation and tension growing like a knotted ball in his stomach. It was always a good sign, Sam thought, when they stumbled on hunts they'd done in Dean's time.

"We did this one before?"

"Yeah," Dean mumbled, slowly leaning back in his chair but his eyes were still on the paper and also a decade away. "Yeah…Ronald…With the, uh, the laser eyes."

"Laser- Laser eyes?" Sam was staring at Dean with a frown now, wondering if maybe this wasn't a future thing after all and Dean was just…uh…tired. He'd only had half a cup of coffee at that point. It had been a rough couple of weeks of idleness and frustration.

Suddenly, the older Winchester was up and out of his seat, grabbing his breakfast sandwich right off the plate with one hand and his jacket off the back of the chair with the other. He shoved one in his mouth and the other through an arm. Then he tried to tell his brother they had to go, only through a mouthful of bagel, egg, and bacon, it came out more like, "Whey ghattah ghoh!"

"What?"

But Dean was already headed for the door. Wide eyed and taken by surprise, Sam scrambled to follow, hastily throwing down some money and scooping up his half-eaten muffin. He chased after Dean, lamenting the loss of his glass of orange juice and a calm breakfast, all the while resisting the urge to shout questions after his brother as they left the semi-crowded cafe in a real hurry.

Chapter End Notes

Dean's Panic Attack: I love writing Dean panicking because his brain literally only supplies physical reasons for discomfort and completely misses all other reasons one might be having a panic attack. Like just telling all of your closest friends and family that you sold your soul, got dragged to Hell where you tortured others willingly, started the end of the world, and, oh, you might go and do it all again in a couple of months. Then to just have them accept that and accept you. But no, honey, it's definitely something physical freaking you the freak out. You go with that ;)

Farewells: I find writing the end of a conversation/parting of ways to be super awkward, almost always. Like, I don't get why, but the minute I have to wrap up a conversation, my brain goes "uh…how does this happen naturally, again?" Ugh!

Up Next: It's time to save Ronald! All Dean's gotta do is convince him to let this whole Mandroids thing go, find and catch a shapeshifter, and not accidentally rob a bank this time or hold anyone hostage. How hard can that possibly be!

Up Next TIMING: Okay, I have good news and I have bad news. The good news is Real Life oriented and, sadly, is not actually good news for you. In fact, it's the reason for the bad news . So, I have been offered what is pretty much my dream job (with the downside of it being offered in the middle of Covid so I will be working at home, which I am terrible at) and am moving down to Los Angeles! Like…tomorrow. Oi vey. It's been kind of a mad scramble to get things ready. I had to buy a car. Guys. I own a car. And a car payment. And an insurance payment. I'm…like… even more of an adult than I was before. (whispers I'm not sure I like it…)

Anyway, two weeks ago when I posted the last chapter, I already had 90% of this one written, and I was so excited thinking I'd actually get a stockpile going again. Yeeeeah. The company reached out literally the next day and I haven't written a word since -_- So, there's probably going to be quite the delay. I'm really hoping that in the in betweens of the hectic whirlwind that is about to be my life ("about to be"?! -_-) , writing will come easy and naturally as an escape from the chaos. If that's the case, it may only be two or three weeks until the next chapter. If that's not the case, it, uh, it's gonna be a while as I get my life settled in a new city, in the middle of Covid , find a place to rent, set up a home office, start at a new company and learn an entirely new software all while stuck in my house 24/7. Hehe…heh…did I mention it's a dream job except for that little tidbit? Oh boy. It's fine, it's gonna be fine. Totally fine. Is it hot in here? It seems hot in here.

I will keep my progress posted on my profile on both sites, and I'll try do to that every Sunday so you guys know how it's going on my end. I've got fingers crossed for both this job and this story, so we'll just see how it goes.

Thanks everyone for bearing with me and for missing this story when it's delayed. Honestly, knowing my writing is wanted is the biggest motivator to keep going.

Chapter 107: Season 2: Chapter 74

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Oh my god. I made it. I finally made it, guys! It's only been about three weeks' worth of effort, but the muse and I finally did it! WE GOT A CHAPTER UP!

Now we just have to follow it with one more every week (maybe every two weeks?) from now until, uh….the end of season two. Sure. No problem. No pressure. Totally, totally got this o _ O

Anyway, I will try to keep this short to get you guys your story ASAP. I just want to say THANK YOU so much to each and every one of you for your patience, your understanding, your comments and reviews, and your support. It means the world to me, and it is absolutely what helped me return, what kept me motivated every week, after so long off.

Alright, let's get this party back on track!

Chapter Reference – Croatoan: Quick reminder that during the Croatoan fiasco, Sam spun a lie for the Sergeant that they were from a nameless agency that dealt such biological attacks. See Chapter 75, Season 2: Chapter 42 for a refresher.

Chapter Warnings: Ronald Reznick's about to get the accidental job offer of a lifetime, Dean needs to learn when to stop talking, Sam's throwing in the towel, and Time's right back at it making absolutely nothing easy (actually, pretty sure this one's on Dean this time, and Time's just sitting on the sidelines with a bowl of popcorn)

Actual Chapter Warnings: Uh, well, this chapter took weeks to actually get written, so I think it's a little up and down and all over the place. I definitely wrote a whole chunk of it after taking an edible, so it got a little loopy there for a min. There is a balance of silliness and realism I'm not entirely sure I kept on the right side of, but hopefully you all will enjoy the comedy after such a long absence.

AO3 Folk: Apologies that these notes weren't in the standard AO3 pre-chapter note format. They were too long :P So they got put in front of the chapter instead.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 74

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

"Number five. This is it," Sam announced as they pulled up outside Ronald Reznick's address, Dean putting the Impala in park and shutting of her purring engine. The younger Winchester closed the folder he was holding – a compilation of what he'd been able to find and Dean had been able to tell him to look for – and spared his brother a long glance. "So this security guard, Reznick-"

"Ronald," Dean corrected, almost as an afterthought as he pulled the key from the ignition and opened his door.

"-he thinks there's, a, uh...a what, robbing people? You said he thinks it's some sort of robot?"

Dean's smile was the kind Sam had grown up learning to be wary of. "Yeah," he bobbed his head, grin only growing. "A mandroid. Half man, half android. Mandroid."

Sam resisted rolling his eyes, but it was a close thing as he sighed, closing the folder and storing it in the glove compartment. Dean was already climbing out of the car and the younger Winchester followed suit.

"Alright, so the plan, then…" he started as he closed the passenger door, straightening his tie and jacket. Across the roof of the car, he watched Dean round the hood and head right up the walkway to Ronald Resknik's house. Sam was forced to follow after him again. "… is to tell this guy the truth?"

Dean didn't say anything as they marched up to the nondescript house with its glass storm door and – Sam did a double take – dual security cameras and flood light aimed right at the front entrance. The younger Winchester gave his brother a raised eyebrow even as Dean reached out and rang the doorbell.

"Seriously? That's our actual plan? Dude, that's a terrible plan."

Dean shrugged, pulling at the collar of his dress shirt and the tie he always hated wearing, no matter how many times he put the monkey suit on. He'd never understood how Cas could wear it all those years. His collar had itched the whole first year any time he so much as looked at the overdressed angel. It had been a physical relief for Dean once Cas finally lost it. "He's already got most of it figured out. And telling him to forget about it and fuck off sure didn't go well last time."

Sam huffed out most of a chuckle, having heard Dean's rendition of the last go around – including the two robbing a bank by mistake – and was in no hurry to repeat whatever events had led to that truly spectacular fallout. But the crook of his smile wasn't so much mirthful as it was sarcastic. "And you think telling him the truth and then telling him to fuck off is going to work better?"

He got a glare for that. "Look, we'll just…play it like the Croatoan job."

Sam's heart practically stopped, all mirth instantly evaporated like a flash fire had just swept through. The physical equivalent of which sent him lurching half a step forward in terror. He managed a choked out, "What?" that sounded a bit too much like a prepubescent boy than the fully grown hunter he actually was and Sam immediately swallowed down the second sound that tried to escape.

Dean immediately looked at guilty, sharing an apologetic grimace with his brother. "I meant the whole nameless, faceless government agency thing," he hurriedly said, reaching out to ring the doorbell again. "Not, uh, not any of the rest of it."

The 'rest of it' being Sam very nearly drinking demon blood voluntarily to save his family (again), Dean beaten within an inch of his life, and Andy both almost dying and going missing, culminating in the worst night of the Winchesters' lives to date, let alone Andy's. Yeah, no, Dean had just meant the lie they'd told the Sarge that night to cover why they knew what was going on and how Andy and Sam had been supposedly 'immune' to the virus.

Seeing how Sam had to take another stabilizing breath and physically shake himself out of the lingering alarm, Dean realized he definitely could have been more specific.

"Come on, Ronald. We know you're in there." The older Winchester, for lack of any better way to break up the barrel of awkward-snakes he'd just stirred, switched to pounding on the door with the side of his fist.

The security light flashed on a second later, flooding them in way-too-bright light. It was all the more ridiculous given it was full daylight out, being 2pm on a somewhat cloudy day. Sam squinted beneath it, unamused, and Dean rang the doorbell again, several times just to be as obnoxious as the spotlight they were standing under.

The older Winchester raised his hand to pound on the glass door again, rattle it in its frame real good this time, when Ronald's head poked out from the end of the hall they could see through the glass door. The larger man approached cautiously, brow furled in confusion with a hesitant tension in the rest his frame. Not that either Winchester could blame him. If they'd been normal citizens beaten within an inch of their life a month ago, they'd be a little wary too.

"FBI, Mr. Reznick," Sam announced, already pulling out his badge to press it against the glass pane. He was getting so much more confident with committing felonies, Dean thought with a smirk. His little brother was growing up. If they weren't on a case, Dean might have wiped away a fake tear.

"Yours too," Ronald demanded snappishly and Dean blinked at the man. "Badge. Let me see it."

Oh, right. Dean shook his head a little, trying to get it back in the game as he dug into his monkey suit pocket and pulled out his faked credentials to slap against the glass. Ronald approached a little closer, glancing between the two sets with squinty eyes. Finally, he pulled back, still staring a little skeptically between the two men but less out of mistrust and more confusion.

"I already gave my statement to the police."

"Uh, yeah, Ronald, we just, uh…"

Sometimes the déjà vu of words once spoken and events repeated was so spot on it was dizzying. But it also came with the benefit of having some clarity for what came next. Dean remembered a Ronald who was excited to see them, practically chomping at the bit to tell them his theories. And it wasn't hard to remember what had changed his suspicion into excitement, now that they were well into the script and repeating it word for word. The man from the future tried for a reassuring smile as he tucked his badge back inside his jacket, but he was pretty sure by the return of the squinty eyes that he didn't quite nail it.

"We have some follow up questions. About your statement. We read it, you see," he added quickly, recalling that the man in front of them wanted to tell them. Wanted to be believed. "And, we, uh, just have some more questions about your, er…theory."

"You read it?" Ronald repeated, tone suspicious at first but edging into hopeful. He reached for the door, already unlocking it.

"Sure did," Sam added as well, smile tight but still more genuine than Dean had managed. Although definitely less amused. "That's why we're here, sir. To hear what you, uh…what you have to say."

Dean managed not to roll his eyes over to his brother ('Could you try to sound any less convincing, there, Sammy?') and instead smiled widely at their 'witness'. Ronald seemed more receptive of it this time, at least.

"Well, come on in." The larger man opened the door outwards with enough enthusiasm he almost clipped Dean's nose right off his face. Sam was significantly more amused after that, following his brother into the house while Dean rubbed at the tip of his nose like he had an itch.

"None of the cops ever called me back," Ronald said over his shoulder as he led them down the hall. "Not after I told them what was really going on."

"And what's that, Mr. Reznick?" Sam asked almost absently – routine questions in their line of work, after all – as they followed him to a room at the end of the hall.

Dean didn't even blink as they turned into what was clearly a conspiracy theorists wet dream, but Sam stumbled at the door, eyes widening but hidden behind a cough and a quickly ducked head. There were newspaper articles for alien landings, UFO sightings, robots with – and Sam did a double take because yup, those were laser eyes – and dozens of other conspiracy theories plastered over every inch of available space. Sam kept his head ducked, eyes still the size of saucers, as he definitely started second guessing (translation: regretting) his brother's decision to include this nutcase in their case.

Why, oh why, couldn't they have skipped over him and just gone after the shifter themselves? If this was Dean's idea of a joke…

"They all, uh, they all thought I was crazy," Ronald continued, looking around the plastered walls with pride before turning back to the two 'agents' with an expectant expression.

Sam coughed to cover a muttered something that would not have been well received (yet was entirely too true). Dean elbowed his brother in the side, offering Ronald a way-too-wide-to-be-genuine smile that the man from the future had no idea was way too wide to be genuine.

The frenetic man didn't seem to notice. "First off, Juan Morales never robbed the Milwaukee National Trust, okay? That, I guarantee." He waved a finger at them, both energetic and almost a challenge. Dean glanced at Sam. Sam glanced right back at Dean. "See, me and Juan were friends. He used to come back to the bank on my night shifts, and we'd play cards."

The younger Winchester straightened at that, gears turning. The shifter would have known that, once he'd taken Mr. Morale's skin. Shifter's absorbed memories, too, so long as their victims were alive to absorb from. So he would have known the best way to get into the bank with the least amount of witnesses. "So you let him in that night? After hours?"

"What I let into the bank wasn't Juan!" Ronald immediately fired back, almost defensively if it weren't for his eyes. They were alight with something terrifyingly close to excitement. Sam resisted sending Dean another 'glance' and kept his eyes focused on their witness. "I mean, it had his face, but it wasn't his face. Every detail perfect, but too perfect. You know? Like if a dollmaker made it. Like I was talking to a big Juan-doll."

Sam had to choke back the fact that he practically choked on his own saliva there for a second. "A, uh…a Juan-doll?"

This time he did not spare his brother that glance, but Dean was just grinning like an absolute idiot. When he caught Sam's more-than-just-a-little judgmental glare, he just mouthed, 'Mandroid' with a little nod and eyes about as alight as Ronald Reznick's.

Sam instantly had the urge to knock his head into the nearest flat surface. Or possibly his brother's head. Instead, he just sighed and turned back to the security guard, smile tight. But Ronald was distracted, already launching into the next part of his rant, grabbing a folder off a nearby surface – was that a mini fridge? Dude, they were less than a dozen feet from the kitchen – and handing it to Sam, who accepted it with a look that was less than willing.

"Look, this wasn't the only time this happened, okay?" He nodded encouragingly at Sam, who cracked open the file. The hunter was surprised to see newspaper clippings from the first and second robberies, sewer system maps, and a page full of notes. Not unlike a case profile from any hunter worth their salt. "There was this jewelry store, too. But the cops, a-and you guys, you just won't see it!"

Sam closed the file, giving Dean another side glance, but his brother had been expecting it, waggling his eyebrows like he'd just proven a point. Sam glared. This was still a terrible plan.

"Both crimes were pulled by the same thing," Ronald insisted, eyes still alight as he grabbed a magazine off the nearby desk, covered in clutter several layers thick. He turned back around, tapping the front cover several times. Sam found himself staring at a robot man shooting lasers out of his eyes under a title that read, 'BIRTH OF THE CYBERMEN'.

Dean was nodding along in a way that wasn't helping.

"Chinese've been working on 'em for years," Ronald said, nodding his head in time with Dean's. Sam wasn't sure which one of them he wanted to smack upside the head harder. No, that was a lie. It was his brother. Definitely his brother. "And the Russians before that. Part men, part machine."

"Like the Terminator," Dean cut in with a wide grin, and Ronald matched it.

"Yes! Exactly like the Terminator! But, but the kind that can change itself. Make itself look like other people."

"Like the one from T2." The man from the future was still bobbing his head up and down, smirk growing, and Sam definitely wanted to hit him. Dean was playing this like it was a game, and not someone's life – multiple someone's' – on the line.

If Sam had voiced any of that out loud, Dean would have told him to back off; how often did he get to actually have some fun with his future knowledge instead of battling a never ending clock that was always several steps ahead of them?

"Exactly! See, so not just a robot." Ronald didn't seem to be picking up on the tension between the two agents. "More of a- a- a…"

Dean's smile could not be beat as he finished Ronald's thought for him. "A mandroid."

"Yes!" Their witness blinked after a moment of excited agreement. Then Ronald hesitated, drawing up a little as things started adding up that his brain might have been cataloguing all along, even if the man hadn't noticed. "Wait…how- how did you know that?"

Sam cleared his throat, deciding the time for this little cat and mouse game to end was well past. The mouse didn't even know he was being played with. "We're FBI, Mr. Reznick. We know everything."

"Including," Dean picked up his brother's lead, even if a little of that grin lingered despite his attempt to pull on more of the Fed persona, "mandroids."

It was, after all, not the easiest thing, keeping a straight face while saying the word, 'mandroid' in all seriousness.

Ronald's eyes near doubled in size. "You…you believe me?"

"Sure do," the older Winchester answered smoothly. "Only it's not a mandroid."

The ex-security guard blinked, confusion clouding his face for a minute before it cleared with something a step shy of awe and muddled up with hope. "Then what- what is it?"

"That's classified, Mr. Reznick," Sam stepped in efficiently, the two hunters pulling on the full force of the FBI disguise like a well-worn role. Dean avoided looking at his brother, but he couldn't quite hide the smile that played at his lips. Little Sammy, growing up to impersonate federal agents and commit felonies. He was so proud.

"But- but- I-"

"Now," Sam continued, drawing on every inch of his ridiculous six and a half feet to tower over the poor guy, "you've done some great work, and you're onto something. But we'll take it from here."

"What? No!" Ronald protested immediately, eyes wide but in such a way that Dean just knew they were going to have a hell of time getting this guy to back down. Not that he needed Ronald's eyes to tell him that. He remembered the guy chaining the front door of the bank closed and then not-robbing it just to prove a point. Getting him to back down was always going to be a challenge. "I can help! I can help catch the mandroid-"

"It's not a mandroid," Sam practically snapped and, beside him, Dean flinched. He remembered a much angrier version of his brother practically shattering this man's soul by telling him such things didn't exist. This Sam was, thankfully, a lot less bitter, but no less harsh when it came to protecting innocent civilians from getting involved in the kind of life the Winchesters' led.

"But-!"

"No buts, Mr. Reznick," he interrupted again, but this time Sam managed to keep his tone a little more professional. He waved the folder Ronald had given him as if it was his closing argument. "We will take it from here."

"Why?" Ronald was glaring now, meaty fists balled up at his sides. He glanced between the two agents, both hurt and anger in his eyes. Dean was getting a bad feeling about this. The kind of bad feeling that was time planning to repeat itself all over again. "You say I did all the work finding this thing, why can't you tell me what it is? Why can't I help catch it!"

He didn't say it out loud, but the unheard 'This thing beat me unconscious, I earned hunting it down' was very much heard by the two hunters. Dean cleared his throat, remembering that same face staring at him, bloodied and grey and a ghost in Bobby's house, accusing him of getting him killed.

"Because your plan ends with you dead, Ronald."

The conspiracy theorist blinked, then frowned, definite guilt causing him to shift his weight and look anywhere but at the two FBI agents standing in his house. "P-Plan? What plan, I'm not planning anything."

Dean gave him a single look, then started scanning the room around him, almost nonchalantly. "So, you're not planning to rob the bank – Milwaukee National Trust, right? It's the only other bank on that sewer line – with…" The hunter pointed to a duffel bag shoved hastily under a couch strewn with dirty clothes, an empty Doritos bag, and several more files like the one Sam was holding. "…chain, padlock, and, I'm going to guess, assault rifle that's in that bag?"

Ronald's mouth flapped open and closed like a fish stuck on dry land. Then his eyes got real squinty. "How- How do you know that? Have you been spying on me?"

"We're the FBI, Mr. Reznick," Sam cut in, tone almost bored but expression damn near ready to leap right off his face and walk out the door even if the rest of him couldn't. "We spy on everyone."

"What my partner means to say," Dean said in a loaded tone, sending Sam a 'cool it' look followed by a tight smile Ronald's way, "is that we're always keeping tabs on all, uh, potential…er...agents."

The slow turn of Sam's head – and just his head – in Dean's direction was not the first clue of how badly he'd just stepped in it. No, his tongue gave the first clue, his brain the second, and Sam the third.

"Uh, recruits, I mean. Not- not recruits! No, uh, definitely not…those. Uh, I meant, um, people who, erm…can help us. Do the leg work. Like, um, like you've done. Great work, Ronald."

Dean gave the guy a thumbs up while Sam's eyebrows disappeared well into his luxurious hairline and he rubbed at his forehead, eyes sliding closed. The older Winchester's rough smile definitely turned into a grimace as Ronald straightened up in surprise, shock overtaking his features for a second before the blank expression was wiped away by a slow, dawning smile.

"Are you- is this- A-are you recruiting me?"

The single eyebrow Sam somehow managed to raise in Dean's direction, despite both eyebrows already being clear and gone from his forehead, very much said, 'What the hell, Dean?' Dean tried to return it with an equally expressive, 'I don't know, man, I'm winging it here!' look. Despite his best efforts, it was chump change compared to Sam's face, and Dean turned back to Ronald, the clear loser here.

Time for some damage control.

"Yes," Dean said, even as Sam, very sternly, said, "No."

The glaring and silent-but-most-definitely-yelling-yes-lots-of-yelling exchange resumed between the two of them.

"Maybe," the older Winchester practically growled out in some very skewed concept of a compromise. He stared daggers at his kid brother, demanding with eyeballs alone that Sam get on the same page.

Sammy's return look told him with equal vexation to pick a damn page, then, and stick with it. And maybe, while he was at it, he could pick a page that wasn't insane!

(It was possibly a new bitchface worthy of categorization and a number all its own. Dean would have to see if it repeated itself enough times to make Official Bitchface Status.)

"Gr-Great!" Ronald exclaimed, clutching that Cybermen magazine to his chest like a well-earned carnival prize and he was a twelve year old girl. "I'll go with you then!"

Dean's head whipped around faster than a whore hearing the expensive rumble of a loaded John's vehicle approaching her corner. "Uh, no, now, uh, wait a minute…"

But Ronald wasn't listening. He was busy grabbing papers and blueprints like a crazed chicken with its head cut off, if that chicken had also made plans to rob a bank. "I know the layout of Milwaukee Trust! All- all the exits. And I-I've got everything we need!"

At this point, Sam had given up all pretense and actually buried his forehead into his hand, his last look at Dean a very clear indication that the older Winchester had gotten them into this and it would be his job – and only his – to get them out of it.

"Um…" Dean racked his brain for a solution that would keep Ronald from running straight to Milwaukee National Trust with that duffle bag and a death wish. But as he was trying to run through every possible idea his preoccupied brain could come up with, his eyes just stayed locked on the frenzied man, ready to rob a bank – to throw away his career, his life – to find a monster and stop it from killing again.

Dean remembered the look in Ronald's eye – the crushed devastation, the determination, the surefire will to carry through if only to find out if he was actually crazy – and suddenly knew that nothing he said here was going to stop the man. Ronald was going to show up at that bank. It wouldn't matter if Sam and Dean beat him there. Hell it wouldn't matter if they beat him there, found and killed the shifter, and got back out before Ronald ever showed up. He'd still go, thinking there was something in the bank that needed to be taken down, and he'd still get himself killed.

If they took him with them, they wouldn't waste time having to re-earn his trust when he showed up on his own. They could do this job like they'd planned the first time, find the shifter on the cameras then follow him home and take care of him where it was quiet and deserted. No bank robbery, no cops, no feds, and no snipers. Just an extra tag-along who would walk away alive at the end of it.

The solution, then, was obvious. Dean caved, totally and completely.

"Yeah, sure. Why not."

The hunter yelped as Sam punched him not-so gently and less-than-subtly right in the bicep.

"Ow, dude! What the hell!"

His little brother towered over him, brow furled, dark, and stormy. "Can I have a word with you, agent Simmons? Alone?"

Dean grimaced at his brother's gritted teeth, words squeezed past in obvious anger. He gave Ronald a nod and a smile, the still-somewhat-nervous man now eyeing between the two of them with a roller coaster of hope, then doubt, then hope again.

"What the hell, Dean?" Sam hissed the moment they were far enough away to do so without Ronald hearing them. The two brothers could still see him from their spot in the hallway, listless in the little conspiracy room they'd left behind, poking at his own files and glancing their way not-so discretely.

"I don't know, okay!" Dean shrugged both irritably and self-consciously. "Why not, Sam? He's gonna go to that bank, no matter what we say to him. You can see it in his eyes, man!"

His brother glanced away, a sure sign that Dean wasn't missing the very obvious mark in the next room, even if he hadn't already lived through this all one time already.

"Tell me I'm wrong," he challenged, Sam looking back at him sullenly and Dean knew he wouldn't. Couldn't, because Dean wasn't wrong. "At least this way we'll be there to keep him from getting shot. And maybe he'll actually listen to us this time, because we didn't lie to him!"

At Sam's blatant stare, Dean shrugged, looking away guiltily.

"Okay, we lied…less this time."

The man from the future knew the look that crossed his brother's face. Sam wanted to roll his eyes and was doing everything in his power not to. (Dean just thought he looked constipated whenever he did that.)

"He's still going to get himself killed, Dean," his brother argued back, practically hissing it. They both glanced Ronald's way. The man who was not-so-subtly trying to listen in very abruptly turned and studied the article-covered wall. Sam closed his eyes, and Dean knew he was doing everything in his power to remain the adult in this conversation. Sucked to be him. "Only this time, we're going to be responsible for it."

Dean immediately looked away, the grimace of knowing his brother was right spread tight across his mouth. "We'll watch out for him. Come on, man. If we do this with him, maybe we can give him some pointers. Put him in contact with some hunters who can teach him how not to get himself killed."

Sam's scoff could have shaken the damn house. Dean glared to cover the flinch. He hated that stupid sound Sam made when he thought Dean was being an idiot and was about to prove it with law-speech and college-boy verbs.

"You want to turn him into a hunter?" The younger Winchester's stare was both incredulous and pissed the hell off. Dean shrugged.

"What's so bad about that?"

"Everything, Dean. Our lives suck!" Sam threw his arms out and this time Dean did flinch, but pulled his head back and double-downed on the glare. "Being a hunter is a shitty career path! You can't have any friends-"

"Hey, we have friends-"

"-almost everyone we know is going to die a horrible, bloody death at some point-"

"That's not-"

"-including us. Hunters end up miserable and alone, Dean, or they end up dead." Sam dropped his arms, something haunted crossing his face for only a second before it smoothed out, buried down deep. "Why would you want to push anyone into this?"

Angry and defensive – this was his life after all – Dean shrugged, throwing his own arms out if for no other reason than to be on the same level of angry and defensive as his brother. "What else do you want to do with him, then, Sam. Huh? Because if we lie to him and tell him nothing's happening, he'll go to the bank to prove us wrong. If we tell him he's totally onto something, he'll go to the bank to prove he's right. Either way, he's going to that damn bank, and if we don't help him, it's going to look like he's robbing the place, and he will get himself killed!"

Sam turned away, jaw clenched and vein popping just below his temple.

"Either we lie to him and take him with us, gank the son-of-a-bitch shifter, and convince Ronald that was the only one. Maybe he drops it and lives out the rest of his life chasing, I don't know, aliens or something else safe." Dean shrugged self-consciously, lowering his arms and resisting the urge to rub at his chest for no other reason than to feel a little less alone in this argument. Cas would have his back. Cas always had his back. "Or we tell him the truth – the real truth – and we point him towards the Roadhouse. He spends the rest of his life as a hunter, but maybe he doesn't get dead."

Sam, for all his grinding teeth and popping veins, also knew a lost argument when he saw one. Especially with his brother. Especially with his brother and the crazy they had waiting for them in the other room, now just blatantly watching them with no attempt at subtly.

"For the record," the younger Winchester ground out, "this is a terrible idea."

"Totally noted," Dean agreed, not even fighting Sam on that one. Then the younger Winchester grumbled something not entirely discernible but definitely unpleasant, and turned back into the Conspiracy Theory Wet Dream Room with a grimace stretched so tightly across his face it was no wonder Ronald didn't accuse him of being a mandroid right then and there.

"So…I'm in?" Ronald asked, the hope clear in his voice, as his eyes darted between the two agents.

Sam looked like he'd rather swallow razor blades, but begrudgingly conceded with, "You're in, Mr. Reznick. But there are some ground rules-"

However, their new favorite conspiracy theorist wasn't listening. He dove for the couch, Dean having to scramble to the side not to be taken down with him as the man grabbed his duffle bag. Sam threw his arms out to the side and Dean offered his best, apologetic, work-with-me-I'll-handle-this smile. Then Ronald straightened up, assault rifle in hand and the kind of excitement in his eye that made even Dean think twice about this plan.

"No," the hunter said immediately, like a master barking at his dog for obedience. Ronald blinked, glancing down at the weapon in his hands then the man denying him it. Dean pointed his finger at the floor, chin jutted out, and gave that finger a firm jerk downwards. "Just no. Leave the gun."

"B-but…" Ronald glanced down at the rifle again, then turned those big eyes right on Dean. "I don't go anywhere without Betsy."

Sam dropped his arms, pinched the bridge of his nose, mouthed the name Betsy to himself, and then promptly announced he would be in the car. He left the room without looking back.

Dean turned to Ronald, eyebrows up and expression clear: Now look what you've done.

Ronald looked down at Betsy with nothing short of mourning, fingers curling around her sweet, dark metal. It was Dean's turn to bury his head in his hand and question everything that had brought them to this moment.

-o-o-o-

"So…you want to look at our camera setup?"

The woman in front of them, the first employee of Milwaukee National Trust that they'd run into once inside the doors, was staring at them with bored, skeptical eyes while she chewed gum that definitely wasn't professional but certainly served the sarcastic-and-also-couldn't-care-less attitude she was definitely rocking. Sam's smile was so tight Dean was worried it might actually split his face in two in the not-good way.

"Yes, ma'am," Dean said in lieu of making Sam deal with it. Sam had been dealing with enough today, including the crazy who had driven over here with them in the back of the Impala and not stopped talking once. "We just need to do a routine system update. Make sure this branch's monitors are good to go."

The woman popped her gum loudly. "We haven't had any problems. Security would have flagged it to us."

Dean felt his own smile getting tighter. "Yes, we understand that. This is a glitch in the overall grid. Just want to make sure everything's kosher."

Her bored eyes slid over Dean's shoulder, between the two brothers, to a twitching Ronald, who was pulling at his Securiserve Guard service technician uniform in the most obvious way possible. Dean wanted to groan. Instead, he kept his eyes forward on the not-so-helpful woman helping them.

"And that takes three of you?" she asked, that tone growing more skeptical but no less sarcastic and definitely no more interested than before.

Sam's smile really was going to split his face in two in the not-good way. "He's in training," the younger Winchester offered, something off in his voice.

The woman raised an eyebrow, looking like she was about to start asking more questions, but instead just shook her head. "Whatever. I don't care. Come with me, I'll get Roger. He's head of security. He'll show you the monitors."

With that, Ms. Bubble Gum Pop turned and escorted them past the row of tellers and towards the back, where a security guard was standing beside a hallway marked for employees only, hands on his belt.

"Roger, these men are here to check the monitors. Something about a glitch in the system." The woman was already turning and walking away practically before she'd finished speaking. Apparently, they were Roger's problem now.

Dean turned his ever-weakening smile on the poor security guard, who offered them each a handshake and a far friendly, actually invested smile.

"Howdy, there. I'm Roger, head of security. What's this all about?"

Sam repeated the spiel they'd come up with about the tech company that maintained the bank's video monitoring equipment having a temporary glitch over the weekend that might have effected the branch's monitors and recording abilities. Dean assured him it would get them in the door, since it already had once before.

"Huh. Well, we haven't had any flags go up on our system yet," Roger said, even as he escorted them down the hallway without further question. He did give Ronald a second glance, the man still pulling at his uniform as discreetly as possible (which was to say, not discretely at all)

"Yeah, this is an overall glitch," Dean reiterated, following after and glaring over his shoulder at Ronald, who looked guilty but didn't stop, either. "Might not effect this branch at all, sir. Just want to be sure."

"Well, better to be safe than sorry, I guess," Roger agreed as he opened the door to a small room – little more than a closet – full of monitors actively filming the bank lobby, vault door, and teller stations. Dean and Sam went ahead into the room, Ronald following a little too enthusiastically, still pulling at his jumpsuit. Roger gave him another look and Dean wanted to smack away Ronald's hand until it stayed by his god damn side. "All righty, you guys need anything else?"

"Oh, no, no we'll be, uh, we'll be in and out before you know it," Sam said as Dean dragged Ronald further into the room and all but shoved him into one of the seats in front of all the monitors. Sam had to forcefully pull his gaze off the live train wreck and smile encouragingly at the poor security guard, who was still glancing back at Ronald with less than assuredness. "Just a routine check."

"Well…" The guard sent one more questioning look their way before smiling and nodding at Sam. "Okie-dokie."

He turned to leave, closing the door behind him and Sam and Dean both let out a breath of relief as soon as the latch clicked into place. The slight déjà vu that came from Mr. Okie-Dokie (Dean remembered liking the guard for no other reason than he said things like Okie Dokie) wasn't enough to derail him from his current source of frustration.

"Will you stop pulling at that thing?" Dean hissed at Ronald now that the three of them were alone.

Ronald, still tugging at the back thigh of his jumper like he had a wedgie, despite currently being seated, made a face that was both sheepish and annoyed. "Sorry! It's just, this thing's kinda tight. You guys couldn't have gotten a bigger size?"

"Sorry, last minute disguises aren't exactly sold at Big and Tall!" Dean snapped back. Ronald frowned, the look nothing short of a pout on his round face, knowing an insult when he heard it.

Sam sat down in one of the two chairs stationed in front of the monitors, deciding to ignore his two 'coworkers' and get to work, since he was pretty sure it would be a while before either of them actually did.

"Why did we have to wear disguises at all?" Ronald asked, tone at least dropping some of the whining as he glanced at Sam to see what the other man was doing – searching the feeds for the laser eyes – before copying him. His attention lasted for about three seconds before he was back to looking over his shoulder at Dean. "I mean, why couldn't we tell them we're FBI and- and we're looking for a, a you know-" Ronald glanced between the two 'agents'- "mandroid?"

Dean did not manage to stop his eyes from rolling despite giving it his best effort (which was to say, really no effort at all). "Gee, I don't know, Ronald. Maybe because, one, you aren't FBI, and B, that's going to call a hell of a lot of attention to us? Not to mention the shift- the, the thing would run and we'd lose him. And it's not a mandroid, so stop calling it that."

Beside him, a little more calmly despite being annoyed for his own reasons, Sam added, "It would raise a lot of questions we don't have answers to, Mr. Reznick. Trust us, people do a lot better if they get to keep living their lives, oblivious to the things we hunt."

The larger man frowned, still pouting, as he looked between the two men again and then turned back to the monitors. "But you're the FBI," he mumbled.

"Yeah," Dean agreed easily enough, even though they were lying through their teeth about that. "And the reason we're able to do what we do is because people don't know about it. Now, let's just find our, uh, perp, and get the hell out of here before we get caught."

"If it's not a mandroid-" Ronald leaned forward in his seat, eyes narrow slits as he squinted at the different monitors, bank employees and customers going about their everyday lives, just as Sam had said. Utterly oblivious to the danger they were in. "-then what is it?"

"Classified," both Sam and Dean answered at the same time. Ronald frown-pouted with a huff.

"Thought I was a potential agent," he muttered grumpily.

Dean, leaning over his shoulder to watch the monitors as well, glanced at the guy with a hell of a look he, thankfully, didn't see. It was nothing compared to the look he just knew Sam was giving him.

Ronald, meanwhile, was still whining. "I can help, but you guys gotta read me in!"

Dean tried not to roll his eyes again at the dramatic wording. He'd been the one to go the whole FBI-slash-secret-agency route. Couldn't exactly get mad that the excited nerd he'd gone and fed that to was running with it. The older Winchester turned back to the monitors, looking for the tell-tale sign of a shifter. "Don't get ahead of yourself, Ronny. You're doing great, but we're the professionals. Let us handle the big stuff, yeah?"

Ronald was still pouting, but eventually he gave a one shouldered and mumbled, "Yeah, okay."

"There," Sam announced only seconds later, pointing to the upper most left monitor. It was on one of the teller stations, where two employees were talking, one a young woman smartly dressed, the other a man in a suit. His eyes were glowing.

"Laser eyes," Ronald breathed in, voice both awed and excited.

"Shit," Dean muttered, staring at the image. "It's the Bank Manager."

Which he only now remembered was spot on with the last time this went down. Sam glanced over and up at him, and Dean gave a subtle nod to indicate it was the same.

"Okay," Sam breathed out, leaning back in his seat. "So we watch him, make sure he doesn't change skins again, then follow him home. Take him out there."

Beside him, Ronald mouthed, 'change skins?' while gaping a bit like a fish, before he glanced over at Dean. "It can do that?"

"Told you, you weren't far off with the T2, mandroid theory," Dean answered with half a shrug, still watching the monitor.

"What if he tries to rob the bank today?" Ronald countered, glancing between the two of them, then to the monitor where the Bank Manager was still discussing something with the teller. "Shouldn't we stop him now?"

"No, Ronald," Dean practically growled, hanging onto his patience with a single thread labeled 'you got yourself into this' and not much more. "Because that would call a lot of attention to us. Remember?"

The bigger guy didn't look happy about it, scrunching up his mouth, but he kept his eyes on the monitor, watching as their not-mandroid nodded at the teller and then walked out of the camera's range. They tracked him across two more screens as he headed back to his office.

"Look, the bank closes in twenty minutes," Dean continued, glancing at the watch on his wrist. "We'll track him till then, then follow him home like Sam said."

"Mr. Okie Dokie may come back before then," Sam muttered quietly, not looking away from the monitors. Beside him, his brother shrugged.

"Then we'll deal with it. Say we're just wrapping up and will be done before closing time."

"We could wait for him outside," Sam suggested instead, though his little half-shoulder shrug said his heart wasn't really behind the suggestion. Dean shook his head.

"If this thing shifts while we're not watching, we'll never know about it until it's too late." Plus, his new victim would probably get killed in the meantime.

"So…" Ronald glanced between the two of them again, eyes a little wide but a little less enthusiastic than they had been a minute ago. "We just wait?"

Dean cocked a half smirk his direction. "Job's not all gunfights and glory."

Ronald sighed, looking ridiculously downtrodden considering what Dean had just told him usually ended bloody, but he went back to looking at the monitors with a studiousness that the real FBI probably would have appreciated.

-o-o-o-

They waited until just three minutes before closing time to start packing it up. The bank manager was still reading the glowing laser eyes in the monitors when Roger the Security Guard came to check on them. They wrapped up and headed back out with Mr. Okie Dokie leading the way, thanking them for their time and for double checking their system.

The group was almost back to the lobby when the absolute worst thing that could have happened did. The Bank Manager walked out of his office, practically colliding with the group of hunters and their tag-along recruit.

Ronald froze, eyes so wide there was no way he wasn't giving them away immediately. The shifter froze, half-formed apology on his lips when he met Ronald's eyes and paused. He glanced between the other members of the group, immediately dismissing Roger, who had switched from his discussion with the service technicians to say hello to his coworker (whose name was apparently Thomas), and focused on the two hunters. The way the Bank Manager's eyes widened and then turned hooded – dangerous – told both Winchesters immediately that they'd been made.

Dean tensed, itching to draw the silver blade he'd stashed in his ankle (no way he was coming in here unarmed, no matter what Sam had suggested about leaving their guns in the car), but he was too late. The bank manager suddenly surged forward, shoving both hands into Sam's ribcage hard. The beanstalk toppled backwards, taking the security guard with him to the floor.

"Hey!" Ronald yelled suddenly even as their shifter took off running for the front of the bank. Dean started after him, leaving Sam to disentangle himself and Ronald to do whatever it was he was doing. Which, turned out, was a drastic mistake.

Dean was a dozen feet behind the shifter, nowhere near catching the much faster creature, when he heard Sam's cry.

"Ronald, no!"

It was quickly followed by the loud, sub-bass pops of an automatic rifle. Instinctually, Dean hit the floor, covering his head. At the same time, he watched the shifter stumble, blood splattering from a fresh whole in the back of his suit. The creature hit the ground on one knee, but managed to stumble up and disappear behind the row of teller stands, blocking him from view.

Dean spun onto his back, staring with wide, horrified eyes at Ronald, holding Betsy, which he'd somehow, somehow managed to stash in his 'too-tight' jumpsuit this entire time.

Ronald's eyes were wide, maybe not quite believing he'd shot someone, or that that someone had gotten right back up and kept running. But the shifter wasn't even their main concern right now, as the bank had erupted in screams and chaos. Customers ran for the front doors, others hit the floor. Employees ducked behind their stands, and Dean knew, without a doubt, that one of them had already hit the silent alarm.

He stared at the unfolding scene in complete shock, still lying on the floor, almost unable to contemplate how, once more, they'd landed themselves in the same god damn situation as last time.

Time really did fucking hate them.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: First, sorry for any typos. This was kind of speed edited. I thought I did pretty good, but I'm sure I missed something (I always, always do!) Second, hopefully you can suspend some disbelief for some of the funnier bits. There's no way Ronald could have snuck Betsy in, but I just couldn't resist. It was too funny, especially with him pulling at his jumper the whole time. Anyway, as I said, probably not my finest work, but I decided to surrender to the comedy. I hope you all enjoyed the ride!

Up Next: Dean's got a tough choice to make. The shifter's still in the bank, but so are a dozen innocent civilians, and the cops are already on their way. They could run and probably make a clean break, but they'd leave behind a shifter who'd no-doubt be in the wind before the night was over. Or, they could stay. But if they stay, they can't just let those innocent civilians go; without hostages, the cops won't hesitate to storm the bank and they would need time to find the shifter again. Damnit, Dean was really hoping to stay off the FBI's most wanted list this time around.

Stay safe until the next update, and thank you all again for your support!

Cheers,
Silence

Next Chapter: The next chapter is NOT A CHAPTER. It is a trailer for the rest of season 2, written and posted with the hope that it would kickstart the muse during the great Covid-creative-recession of 2020/21. It didn't really work in that regard [insert grimace here] but for anyone interested in a written trailer, please enjoy! Anyone who's not interested in teases of what's coming, please skip! :D

Chapter 108: Season 2: Teaser Trailer

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Oooooh boy am I nervous about this one guys.

First thing first, THIS IS NOT A CHAPTER. I know that may disappoint some of you, but hopefully not for long. This is a teaser trailer for the rest of Season two! I wrote it up for a couple of reasons. First, as a warm up to try and get myself back in the writing spirit, something I've been struggling with during the lockdown. See, I don't usually write well at home. Too many distractions, too many things to do. But pop me off to a cafe, throw some headphones in, indulge in a nice Chai Latte, and I'm usually pretty productive. Cue Covid, and I am now stuck writing at home. Which...as you may have noticed from a severe lack of updates for months now...is not going so well XP So! This was a writing warm up, if you will. The second reason is to hype you all up for the rest of the season, and to that end, the third reason is that hopefully your hyped up responses to everything I have planned will remind the Muse WHY WE LIKE WRITING IN THE FIRST PLACE. huff I'm not annoyed with her at all. NOT AT ALL.

Trailer: The following clips are not in any necessary order (though for the most part they are chronological. Mostly). There is a mix of good times, not so good times, and really not so good times. They are also a liiiittle no-good-dirty-rotten in places (cough cliffhanger-y cough) because...well...this is me, here. Those cliffhangers can be a little spoilery as to what's to come, but only so much as a normal trailer for an episode or a season of a show would be. The main goal of it is to get you excited for what's to come, and some of that requires a little twist, a little turn, and some minor spoilers.

If you don't want to read because you don't like the idea of that, no worries! Like I said, I've not done something like this before and I have no idea what I'm doing! XP

Reviews: Okay, not gonna lie, the primary incentive behind this is to hear from you guys! Hearing from readers every week or two was like a friggin' drug for me and I have been in withdrawal for MONTHS. I'm not going to be surprised if that is partially responsible for Covid-Creativity-Drain. MAMA NEEDS HER FIX.

(It's late and I'm a little loopy, y'all. #SorryNotSorry)

Lastly, Thanksgiving! In the spirit of Thanksgiving Weekend, I want to take a moment to say how thankful I am for all of you. Several of you check in with me on a bi-weekly basis to make sure I haven't died or been maimed in a horrible accident. So many of you have mentioned in your comments that you will wait this story out, no matter how long it takes, and I remind myself of all of you every time I struggle with another week gone by without writing productivity. More still remind me to take care of myself first, and to you I say a deep-hearted and sincere thank you. I am super thankful for the incredible spur of new readers and reviewers this story has gotten in the last three weeks (the ending of the show being the cause, no doubt). You all have made smile so much as you comment throughout your reading journey or unload all at once when you finally catch up! I am also incredibly thankful to be part of this fandom, which is so full of supportive, wonderful, beautiful souls. And I am very thankful that creativity and coffee shops are the only real thing Covid has taken from me. I know I am lucky in that regard.

Enjoy!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Season 2: Extra Chapter

Teaser Trailer

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Giving Ronald another fierce, 'stay put!' glare, Sam pulled Dean off to the side of the vault where they'd just finished locking their brand-spanking new hostages inside. The older Winchester looked like he knew exactly what was coming and would rather be hunting down a shifter.

"Dean, this is crazy," Sam hissed, which was almost verbatim what Dean had, indeed, guessed was coming. Sam's grip on his arm remained, a sure-fire example of how just not-joking Sam was right now. "We should get out now."

"Little late, don't ya think, Sammy?" Dean muttered, gesturing with his free arm to the closed vault door. In for a penny and all that.

Sam released his arm to run that same hand through his hair, the other still holding Betsy. "What aren't you telling me?"

Dean frowned, pulling his head back and attempting to look affronted by the accusation. "I told you everything about this."

"Then what aren't you telling me about after this?"

The man from the future stiffened, immediately cursing his brother's ridiculous intelligence and instinct. Okay, so, maybe he hadn't told Sam everything, he hedged in his own mind. But he'd told him everything that seemed important at the time.

"Dean." His thoughts must have shown clear across his face, because Sam was regarding him with a warning look. "Seriously. Because this is insane. We should ditch Ronald and get the hell out of here. We can find the shifter again later."

"The Rising of the Witnesses." Dean blurted it out before his brain could fully process what his tongue was already committed to. Sam blinked, brow furling in confusion. Before he could ask, Dean continued, "It's one of the seals. When it breaks, ghosts of the people we got killed or couldn't save…they come back, and they come back angry. A lot of hunters died. You, me, and Bobby were almost among 'em."

Sam paused, taking a moment to process that new gem of information. He swept his bangs out of his face and glanced over his shoulder at Ronald Resnik, standing restlessly, like he couldn't figure out what to do with his arms, by the vault door, 'guarding' their 'hostages.' Sam pursed his lips and turned back to his brother.

"Ronald?"

Dean nodded, not quite able to look at the larger man he remembered more as an angry, hurt, volatile ghost than the buffoon they'd taken with them into the bank today. "Him and Meg."

It was Sam's turn to pull back, that heavy brow furled over his brown eyes. "Meg? The demon?"

"The human she was riding. Meg Masters." Dean shook his head, trying to block that poor girl's voice from his memory, the look in her face as she'd beaten the crap out of him. Retribution. "She died last time. After we exorcised Meg."

Because first they'd thrown her from a third story window. And then when they'd managed to exorcise her, they'd left behind a broken, crumpled human to die a slow and miserable death in Bobby Singer's living room. Dean shuddered and turned partially away from his brother.

"Dean…that's not your fault. And neither is Ronald."

The man from the future immediately rounded back on Sam, eyes fierce and filled with that terrible, angry guilt he was so damn good at. "Not my fault? Yeah, it was Sam! And it will be this time! Ronald might have been planning out an attack on the bank to trap the shifter, but we have no idea if he'd have gone through with it without us showing up and pushing him over the edge. Telling him he was crazy. We drove him to the bank."

This time, literally.

"If he dies, it's on us."

Sam sook his head. "You don't know that, Dean."

"Yeah, I do!" The hunter threw his arms up, startling Ronald who was far enough away to be out of ear shot for all but the loudest of the argument. "That's literally what the Rising of the Witnesses means, Sam. It means we got them killed!"

Sam had his doubts about that – sounded like some twisted logic and twisted memories – but ultimately he couldn't argue otherwise. He hadn't lived through it. And when Dean lowered his arms, a crestfallen and haunted look crossing his face, Sam found he couldn't argue for other reasons too.

"I can't go through that again, Sam," his brother muttered, finally glancing over at Ronald and looking away just as quickly. "I won't. I'm not letting them die on our watch. Not again."

Sam scrubbed his free hand down his face with a rough sigh, but finally nodded. "Okay. We save him this time. But after this, Dean-" he shoved Betsy into his brother's arms, not wanting much more to do with the damn semi-automatic rifle that had gotten them into this- "no more crazy."

His brother nodded, firm and resolute, fingers tight around the gun. "No more crazy."

-o-o-o-

"Run!" Dean yelled, charging at Sam, who straightened in alarm. His brother was gesturing wildly while sprinting at full speed right towards the younger Winchester. Sam registered the look on his face, the comically wide eyes and red, flushed skin, before movement over his brother's shoulder caught his attention.

Sam stared, frozen to the spot, at the giant snake slithering, head sliding smoothly back and forth, not a hundred feet behind Dean. The logical part of his brain broke; how was a snake that big – and this thing was as tall as his brother, at the very least, with a head that could very likely swallow a human whole – even moving in a tunnel this tight? The less logical part of his brain could only stare, thinking, 'what?' and 'how?' and maybe also, 'why us?'

"Run!"

Dean grabbed Sam's bicep hard as he flew past, hauling Sam into an awkward hop-wobble before he turned fully and put those long legs to use.

"What the hell, Dean!"

"I don't know!" the older Winchester screamed back, partially over his shoulder as he checked on their gaining adversary.
Their quickly gaining adversary.

"I thought we said no more crazy!" Sam yelled from slightly ahead of him. Damn those long cricket legs of his. Dean whipped his head back around to glare at his younger – and therefore, should-be shorter and slower – brother.

"This is not my fault!"

The giant snake chasing them let out a truly hair-raising hiss and Dean redoubled his efforts to not become snake chow. He would never again think Indiana Jones a wimp for his fear of snakes. Never. Again.

-o-o-o-

The object in the kid's hand wasn't what Bobby was expecting when he looked up from the desk in his den, neck-deep in sea witch lore. Olivia Lowry had managed to stumble into a nasty one off the coast of Maine. The cavalry was already on the way – she'd managed to filter just about every curse word in the book between explanations of how the bitch had nearly gotten her and this was definitely not a solo gig – but they'd need all the backup they could get when it came to killing the thing. Witches. They really were the worst.

The flash of a question mark searing itself across the inside of his eyelids for a second time in as many minutes brought Bobby back to Andy Gallagher, standing in the doorway to the den, holding a thick, leather dog collar and an old, empty, dusty tin bowl.

Considering his hands were full, Bobby would forgive the lack of Signing for the easier, headache-inducing telepathy. (To be honest, the kid was getting good enough – or Bobby was getting too used to – his new powers to even cause much of a headache anymore.)

"Rumsfeld," Bobby huffed, going back to the books. "My old dog."

As silence settled like a weighted blanket in the wake of that statement, a third question mark (well, actually three question marks all together now) flashed through his brain once again. Bobby sighed, realizing he wasn't gonna get this research done for Olivia while Andy had questions apparently. Like, given the raised eyebrows and exaggerated nod to the disused items, the whole story.

"Demon got 'em," the gruff hunter admitted, managing to hold back the emotion that welled inside at the thought of Rumsfeld. He'd gone quick, at least, but Bobby had sure wished Dean had left something of that demon bitch for him to kill himself after what she'd done to his dog. He'd been a damn good boy and hadn't deserved an end like that. Dogs were meant to grow old, damnit.

He turned back to his research.

Andy audibly huffed, entering the den and setting the items on Bobby's cluttered desk. Loudly. Bobby knew he could chase the kid off with some not-unjustified anger at digging through his personal belongings, at bringing up some painful memories and then continuing to poke at that bear. But he'd been the one to tell the kid digging around was fine as long as it kept him busy.

Turned out, a twenty-something year old psychic with nothing to do and nowhere to go got bored about as quick as a toddler. Just so long as he didn't touch anything that looked like "occult stuff" as Bobby had said it (or "adult stuff" as he'd meant it) than Andy wandering through the basement and closets at least kept him out of the old hunter's hair.

This twenty-something psychic was gesturing to the collar, and forming the word for 'another' in Sign, eyebrows up to make it a question. Bobby did not want to be having this conversation, but considering the kid was using his hands and not his mind, he begrudgingly answered.

"Getting too old for training a new pup," he muttered, almost under his breath. Too old to lose another one, too, not that he'd ever admit that part out loud. Unfortunately, Andy was a perceptive twenty-something toddler. Bobby turned back to his books, gruff rising like hackles. "Got enough strays as it is, kid."

It was Andy's turn to look sad at that, but Bobby chose not to notice, going back to his research. It was a terrible mistake, in hindsight. If he'd been paying more attention, he might have seen that sadness turn into the furled brow of thought, which evolved into the wide eyed delight of an idea, followed ultimately by a dangerous amount of determination.

All of which would might have clued Bobby in to the inevitability that he was getting a new dog well before he walked into his house three weeks later to find that very thing had happened while he was out for groceries.

-o-o-o-

It took him a minute, but as soon as that déjà vu settled into full focus, Dean turned them right the hell around.

"Dude, what the hell?" Sam muttered as his brother practically pulled him back off campus towards the Impala. He glanced over his shoulder at the retreating school buildings, one of which had been the scene of a tragic death. A professor, flung from his top story office, to die on the steps below with no witnesses and a hefty number of shady connections: right up their alley.

"Not this one, Sammy," Dean muttered, keeping his voice low as he looked around like someone might be watching them. Sam frowned, looking around as well, but it was largely a deserted college campus, give it was the middle of the night and had only stopped raining about twenty minutes earlier.

The younger Winchester pulled his arm free of his brother, dragging them both to a stop. Dean looked irritated, but Sam didn't let that deter him. "You said no more running."

"No," the man from the future countered immediately, "I said we'd pick our battles. Well, I'm not picking this one."

"There are people dying here, Dean." Sam tried for the honor-and-duty angle that usually was enough to win his brother over, or at least make him pause. Not this time, apparently.

"Yeah, douchebags who deserve it," the older Winchester harped back almost immediately. "That's what the trickster does, alright? And trust me, we don't want to get involved."

"A trickster?" Sam's voice rose in surprise. They'd never run into a trickster before. They were old and powerful, usually pagan gods or half-gods. Through no fault of his own, the younger Winchester was intrigued. Dean could tell, given his deadpan return glare. Sam cleared his throat, trying to look a little less curious. He failed. "What, uh, what happened last time?"

His brother grabbed his arm again, once more hauling ass for the Impala. "Let's just say Taco Tuesday was permanently ruined for you, for like…ever. And I never got to listen to Asia again. So, yeah, we're leaving."

Sam was still trying to argue his case in and among attempts to get more out of Dean than that jumble which had made absolutely no sense, when the Winchester boys rounded the corner of the building closest to the school parking lot and went out of sight. From a darkened alcove of that building, a short-statured man stepped into the light of the courtyard lamps, eyes narrowed and lollipop clacking against his teeth.

Gabriel pulled the sweet from his mouth with a pop, eyes still locked on where the Winchesters had disappeared. Well. That was…weird.

Good thing a trickster such as him liked weird.

Popping the lollipop back in his mouth, the archangel-turned-Loki tucked his hands in his pockets and followed after the pair of hunters.

-o-o-o-

They landed hard, or maybe it was an illusion of a hard landing that came with the adrenaline of Angel Air and the knowledge that Dean was bleeding to death. That, and the apparent chaos they'd landed in the middle of. Their third party member was screaming in that kind of what-the-hell-just-happened manner and for some reason there was a dog barking fiercely – the scary kind that meant you were about to get chomped on – in the not-so-distant background.

Sam managed to shove all of that to the side and scrambled back to his brother, hands curling over the bullet wound more out of instinct and fear than anything logical. Especially considering that Cas was right there, already pressing two fingers to the older Winchester's forehead. Dean had time to grunt in pain from his brother trying to keep him alive before he was miraculously and immediately healed.

"Son of a bitch," he muttered, head thunking back to the floor of Bobby's living room as his body went limp, all that pain and tension suddenly gone. Sam could relate, sagging back onto his heels, struggling just to breathe normally in the wake of an adrenaline crash.

Their tagalong, on the other hand, seemed to be ratcheting up in anxiety.

"How are we…where are…but we were in the….what is happening?" The larger man spun around, eyes wide as he tried to take in Bobby Singer's den but likely saw none of it. "Did…did we just teleport?"

As his voice climbed in volume, Cas finally spun on her crouched knee, gracefully standing in one swift move, and pressed those two fingers to the man's head. He went down with a hefty thud that shook Bobby's bookcases. Then the angel spun once more, fierce blue eyes locked on the German Shephard still barking ferociously at them from the hall, but not entering the room. It fell silent with a reproachful whimper.

"What the hell is going on in there?" Bobby came charging in, still in his pajamas but shotgun in hand. He straightened, pulling the butt of the gun away from its braced position against his shoulder when he spotted the newest round of houseguests. He glared at the angel who seemed to be having a staring contest with Sarge, then shifted his eyes to the Winchesters and the puddle of blood slowly soaking into his rug. "Balls."

Sam, on the other hand, was looking between him and the German Shepherd with wide eyes and a confused brow, brown hair flopping over his forehead. "When did you get a dog?"

Bobby huffed and lowered the shotgun. Dean was clearly no longer dying if those were the first words out of Sam Winchester's mouth. Damnit. What did a man have to do to get one good night's sleep in his own friggin' house these days?

-o-o-o-

Jody Mills looked up from her phone, which was still pinging with text messages from her latest 'pen pal' (if it could be called that in this day and age – and she just knew said pen pal would make fun of her for such an old fashioned term. Squirrely little kid) as the door to the small Sheriff's office opened and a stranger strolled in.

"Howdy," she greeted with a share of Midwestern friendliness at the unfamiliar face. The suit, sans a jacket, rolled up sleeves of a pristine dress shirt, and solid colored tie all said important. The multiple files tucked under his arm, a photograph paper-clipped to the outside of one of them, said Fed. Not something they saw a lot of in Souix Falls, South Dakota.

"I'm not interrupting, am I?" the man asked congenially enough, though there was something dark in his eyes that immediately set Jody on edge. Nothing aimed at her, per say, but it was obvious this man was here on a mission.

"Nah, 'course not," she answered in an equally light tone, setting her cell down on her desk. "Just helping a wayward kid handle his first dog. What can I do for you, Mr. ...?"

"Henriksen." The man offered his hand, which the Sheriff shook. "Agent Victor Henriksen, FBI. I'm looking for a couple of boys, and word is there's a man in your town who knows 'em."

The agent set his files – three of them, it turned out – onto the counter, and the smile slid right off Jody's face at the picture attached to the top one. The spitting image of Bobby Singer's 'nephew,' new to town as of two months ago. The young man who'd bumped into her outside the grocery store last month with a favor to ask. The goofy, tragically mute kid who was, in fact, the very same 'pen pal' she'd been texting thirty seconds previously regarding taking proper care of that damn favor.

"Don't suppose you know a resident by the name of Robert Singer, Sheriff?"

Jody raised her eyes back up to the federal agent. She let out a huff of air and forced the corner of her mouth into a smile. She doubted it was convincing. "You mean the town drunk?"

-o-o-o-

Bobby shut his front door on the retreating figure of one, FBI special agent Victor Henriksen, to share a wide-eyed look and a relieved breath of air with Andy – a wanted felon, mind you – who'd been hiding behind the door for the entire length of conversation. Every awkward, hair-raising minute of it.

"Balls," the hunter muttered. He was gonna have to call the boys and tell 'em a Fed had been sniffing around, looking for 'em. The thought was not five seconds through his brain when a pounding on the door caused both hunters to jump. Andy scrambled back into the protective corner created by the door once it was open, and Bobby gave him one hell of a warning look before he turned the knob once more. Like he needed the reminder to stay quiet. Him. The wanted felon.

"Alright Bobby," Sheriff Mills said loudly from the front porch, hand on hip, with a tone that sounded about ten seconds away from murdering them both. "Where's the kid and what the hell is going on?"

-o-o-o-

He was still humming the catchy tune under his breath as he left the diner, pie in hand, only to draw up feet short of the Impala.

The empty Impala.

The empty Impala that should not be empty, because it should have his stupidly tall, stupidly long-haired little brother in the front seat.

"Sam?" Dean glanced around the parking lot, hoping Sam had just hopped out to help a stranger with directions or take a piss in the woods (and…not the fully working, indoor bathroom complete with plumbing located just feet away inside the damn diner. Sure.) "Sammy!"

The hunter spun in a full circle, only to halt abruptly ninety degrees to his left. There was a woman, standing at the far end of the parking lot, right on the edge of the only street light along the deserted country road. She was short, legs spread in a solid stance that suggested she was waiting on a fight, and her eyes were glowing green.

Son of a bitch.

Azazel's girl. Which meant that Sam...

Dean dropped the pie and drew his gun, but the woman was already turning, bolting into the night.

"Hey!" The man from the future – now very damn certain it was about to repeat itself – took off running after the supernatural bitch who'd just kidnapped his brother this time around, leaving the toppled pie abandoned in front of the empty Impala.

-o-o-o-

Sarge's whining finally caught Andy's attention and he pulled the ear buds out of his head to notice the German Shepherd standing at the entrance to the panic room, tail tucked, head ducked, and eyes looking about as uncertain as Andy had ever seen them. Sarge was nothing if not stalwart most of the time.

'What's up, buddy?' he asked in his own head, signing along with the question, knowing the dog could neither hear or read him, but it hadn't stopped him from chatting to himself in either form yet. He uncrossed his legs from the cot they'd dragged into the iron-walled room once it was obvious Andy would be spending more than just an evening hiding out down there. He stood, stretched, and crossed the small room to crouch in front of the dog. 'You gotta go pee?'

He made the hand signal for bathroom that Jody had taught him and Bobby – the one Sarge's previous handler had picked – and the dog whined again, turning and heading for the stairs up and out of the basement. Andy stood, following after with only a moment's hesitation and a quick glance back at the panic room. Five minutes out of it wouldn't hurt, and it was only to go upstairs and grab Bobby so he could take Sarge for a walk.

The two climbed the stairs, Andy trailing behind the much faster four legged beast. When he got to the top of the stairs, Sarge was already waiting at the front door. Andy held up a finger – not that they'd actually taught Sarge what 'one minute' meant, and ducked his head into the study.

Bobby was on the phone, back turned to the psychic, and from the sound of it, he was buried up to his elbows in a case for another hunter. Andy didn't have a convenient way to interrupt the man without using his powers. He glanced back into the hall. Sarge was staring at him with desperate eyes, and whined once he had eye contact again.

How long had he been asking to go out? The hunt must be a bad one, Andy figured, if Bobby hadn't noticed.

Well, he could take Sarge out. Yeah, the Winchesters and Bobby had both told him not to leave the panic room, and definitely not to leave the house, but what was five minutes going to hurt? Besides, Bobby's property was warded seven ways to Sunday. No demon – Prince of Hell or otherwise – was setting foot in the salvage yard.

Andy grabbed Sarge's leash and opened the front door, following after the dog as he ran out into the night in nothing short of desperation.

It wasn't until a good ten minutes later that Bobby finally hung up the phone after shouting Carl Bates through a Banshee banishing spell after the thing had almost taken the head off his hunting buddy. Which meant a follow up shouting bout of how to keep a man alive when his neck was kind of hanging on by a thread. Bobby heaved a tired sigh. He really was getting too old for this.

It took another second for him to realize that Sarge was barking in the distance. Not inside the house, but from…the yard. Bobby straightened and spun around, dread pooling in his gut. Sarge was in the yard. The front door was open. And so was the basement door.

"Andy!" Bobby surged to his feet, but the stairs to the basement were deserted and no psychic came answering back with his telepathic powers. The old hunter bolted for the front door, heart pounding. Sam's death date was just around the corner, and the kid knew better than to leave the panic room!

When he found Sarge, the dog was barking furiously at the far fence of his property, nothing but empty night beyond it. His leash was attached to his collar, dragging on the ground around him, but there was no sign of Andy.

-o-o-o-

Chuck stared at the freshly printed page. So fresh the ink would still smudge if he rubbed at it hard enough. For a moment, he entertained doing just that. Just rubbing away the last hour of work – the last year's, the last millennia, the last…forever, really – and do it all over again.

The writer shook his head, freeing himself of such morbid and… existential thoughts. The story was what it was; it always seemed to write itself more than Chuck ever being an active participant. There was something weird about that, but the prophetic author didn't dwell on it. He had bills to pay and he supposed this was at least one way to do that.

"Here you go. Final chapter." There was something flat to his voice Chuck didn't like, but he didn't know how to fix it. He stared at his editorial assistant as she sat up in her chair, legs curled up beneath her short body, and took the papers from him. His hand brushed hers, and he stared at the contact. His fingers were overheated and kinda tingly.

He wondered if Steph noticed, because she rubbed at the back of her hand where they'd touched, the motion absentminded. Chuck wondered at that, at that contact and the fact that she was always somehow nicer after moments like this. The poor writer tried not to read too much into that. He turned to head back to his lonely computer.

"Hey, Chuck?" Steph had dropped her hand, but she had a distant look in her eye she always got around him. Chuck didn't know what to make of it, but something deep within Chuck, something he didn't even realize existed most days, always took notice and great care to nurture that slowly growing ember. "Do you know what's going to happen next?"

It was a weird question to ask of an author, Chuck thought. Then again, he seemed to be the kind of author that didn't know what was in store for his characters. Last minute writer, his publisher had teased, but Chuck always wondered if it was more than that. If it was weird not to feel in control of your own story.

"No," Chuck answered honestly, because he liked to think he was at that point of friendship with Stephanie. "I don't. Sometimes I think the story will go one way, but usually when I write it…it's completely different. Not the way I'd have taken it at all."

He frowned at that, scrunching up one side of his face. He wondered what it would be like to write the story he wanted to write, and not the one that came to him in flashes of bright lights and a lot of head pain.

"What do you want to happen next?"

Chuck – and something altogether not Chuck – blinked in surprise. He glanced over at his editorial assistant, not sure why the question affected him so. He supposed…no one had ever asked him that before. Probably because it had never occurred to anyone to need to.

"Oh. Um. Well…" Chuck had to pause, had to actually think about that answer. Funny, that. No one had ever bothered to ask, including himself. The prophet smiled almost idly. "I think something big is coming," he admitted with a slight shrug. "And, well…it sounds silly, but….I want everyone to pull through."

He smiled shyly at Steph and she smiled in return. It was nice, even if he was pretty sure it was a smile born of pity.

"Guess it's not very good writing if everyone makes it out unscathed, though, huh?" Chuck sighed with another shrug, this one far more self-deprecating than the previously awkward one. "Tragedy maketh money, and all that. Not that I'm making much money, of course."

He chuckled awkwardly, completely missing the sad downturn to Stephanie's smile. But the thing that lived deep inside him, that saw all when it wanted to, didn't miss a thing. And when he picked up those papers thirty minutes later, he brushed Chuck's fingers across her's once more, blowing on that growing flame. One whisper at a time, he would remind Persephone of what she used to be. And maybe, Time permitting, they would save Sam Winchester this time around.

-o-o-o-

Sam's knees hit the wet, uneven pavement in a way that should have hurt. That did hurt, but distantly, because the hurt was nothing compared to his back. Sam couldn't breathe. Or maybe that was the fluid filling his lungs. Blood, his brain supplied unhelpfully.

"Sam!"

That was Dean's voice. But it was far away. Which…was really unfortunate. Sam didn't think his brother was going to make it in time.

"Sorry, kiddo," the demon said from above him, wiping the sharp, curved blade in his hand off on a rag. Wiping Sam's blood off with that rag. "Your brother's gotta pay his entry fee."

"Sammy!"

Sam bent forward, finding it harder to support his own weight. The rough cement bit into the palms of his hands. Breathing was hard and…metallic. Ah. The blood in his lungs. That made sense.

"No! Sam!"

He could hear Dean's pounding feet now, but his brother was still too far away. Sam knew he wouldn't make it. The younger Winchester hit the wet ground before Dean ever got close.

"Sammy!"

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: oooooookay, GO. YELL AT ME. :D

I hope you all enjoyed the teaser trailer, and that it hit it's goal of getting you guys psyched for what's to come. If it did, please let me know. Which clip are you the most excited to get to? Are you freaked out I'm (totally not) killing Sam? (Or Andy) (ducks and hides real good for that one) Or, in the spirit of this weekend, tell me what you're thankful for, because I am thankful for you and want to hear it! 3

Next Update: I can not give you guys a solid timeline, unfortunately. The muse and I are close to getting back to writing, I can feel it. If nothing else, every time I open up Word to write and it just doesn't come, I use that time to outline what is coming up so, so, so heavily that when the Muse is finally ready, all we have to do is turn bullet points into full sentences XD

Hope you are staying safe. Happy Thanksgiving, thank you for reading, and thank you for hanging with me through this uncertain and rough period. Until next time!

Cheers,
Silence

Chapter 109: Season 2: Chapter 75

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: HI GUYS! [waves incredibly enthusiastically] Boy, have I missed you all! I know some of you probably screeched when you saw the e-mail update, while others are reading this warily, wondering if they should believe their eyes. Well you can believe it! THIS IS A REAL CHAPTER!

[insert crazy Kermit dance here]

It has been a looooooong time coming. A year, actually. I really wanted to get this chapter up last weekend after checking the trailer for a detail I thought I'd missed and realizing that I put a thanksgiving note in there. Which means this story hasn't updated for a year (eek!). I really wanted to get you all a post on the year anniversary, but I wasn't able to as I was visiting family for the holidays and had very little free time.

So please accept this humbly delayed chapter, and what I absolutely hope is a return to routine posting.

Chapter Reference – Recap: I have super exciting news for everyone! Due to the growing length of this story and the horrendously long covid-related break we took, I decided to write up a summary of this story. It is short and sweet (well, at least for me ;) and only really covers important plot-related events. It's should be a great tool for anyone who doesn't have the time it takes to do a full re-read of this beast! You can find it linked to this story in the series section on A03, or in my profile on ff-dot-net.

Reviews: O. M. Chuck, guys. So, while the delay in posting this story has been awful, I read every single review that comes in, and I read every one with great joy and appreciation. And I gotta say. Just, holy shit. Not only were all of your reviews humbling and inspiring and touching, I didn't realize over the course of a year just how many there were. I went back to the trailer to check something I wrote and OMG. The trailer alone has over a hundred and fifty reviews. HOLY CRAP. You guys are just so amazing. I know I say it a lot, but seriously, this story exists because of you. Thank you so, so much for sticking with me through the last crazy year and a half, and for being here today. I can't wait to share the rest of this story with you.

Quick Side Note on that Note: A belated but very happy birthday to Forestpelt, who has stuck with me through the entirety of Covid as a friend, confidant, and endless encourager of this story. Thanks so much for your friendship, enthusiasm, and feedback!! Happy late birthday, friend.

Chapter Warnings: Dean's robbing a bank, Sam's so done with this insanity, Ronald is doing his best (which, admittedly, isn't great), and an evil shifter's being shifty.

Quality Warning: I don't feel this is my best work, by far, but I am still getting back into the groove of writing. I happen to think this chapter is a little short and could use a little more oomph in activity, but I also had to end it somewhere and struggled to do so . Hopefully you guys will give me a little grace period to get my writing legs back under me and get us back into the truly interesting stuff!

Enjoy!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 75

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Roger 'Okie Dokie' Miller sat bolt upright at the unmistakable sound of a semi-automatic gun firing. Roger had never heard a semi-automatic gun firing, not in real life, but instinctually he knew. Which really didn't make sense, because there was so very little reason to jump right to gunfire. But that's definitely what had just happened.

The group he'd escorted right to the bank monitors, those nice fellows he hadn't thought twice about, the ones he'd been escorting back out of the bank innocently enough, were now robbing it.

Roger scrambled up, only making it to one knee as he pulled his pistol from his hip holster, leveling it at the man who'd opened fire in the bank. The same man who'd just shot the bank manager. Thomas. Oh god, this man had just shot Thomas.

"Drop it!" Roger yelled, but neither he nor his target had any time to choose their next action.

Before the shooter could spin fully around – already shouting that it was okay, this wasn't a robbery! – the taller of the other two men was upright, clocking Roger right in the temple. The security guard and his gun both slumped to the ground, out for the count.

Sam grabbed for the gun, tossing it far away from the man's unconscious body. All of which gave Dean time to clamber to his feet as well, marching over to Ronald with the kind of fury that had the bigger man stumbling several feet back, eyes wide. Dean ripped Betsy straight out of his hands.

"Are you kidding me right now!?"

Dean spun away from the wide-eyed, only-slightly-guilty, much-more-stunned-and-lost-and-maybe-a-little-upset eyes of Ronald Reznick. The god damn idiot didn't get to look like a kicked puppy, damnit. Ronald had just started the exact same damn timeline that ended with a bullet in his heart that Dean was doing everything – everything – he could to prevent. So no, Ronald didn't get to look sad and wounded here, damnit.

The man from the future had about three and a half seconds to survey the chaos around him – people screaming or cowering, several of them sprawled on the floor, some eyeing the front door, wondering if they should make a run for it. Most of the tellers were crouched behind their stations, watching him with terrified eyes. There was blood splattered on the lobby floor where the bullet had clipped the shifter, a trail of it leading back behind the teller stands, which, damnit, led to the back of the bank. Just like last time.

Dean closed his eyes, dread settling in his stomach like a friggin' ball of cement. He could not believe what he was about to do.

With Betsy aimed at the ceiling, Dean fired two quick automatic rounds. More screams echoed around him. Bits of dust and plaster rained down. Sammy shouted his name from behind and oh, yeah, he'd get the honor of explaining his absolute insanity to his brother in just a second. Yay him. Until then…

"This is a robbery, everybody down, nobody move!"

He was spun around by Sam's hand, curled right around his bicep in a damn near death grip. "Dean! What the hell?!"

Dean ignored their newly acquired hostages. The simpering, sobbing, fear coming off civilians who had every reason to be afraid, despite the fact that they weren't in any real danger. Instead, he focused on his brother, who looked very torn between freaking out and punching something. Probably Dean. It was usually Dean. And Sam, unlike the others in the bank, actually did have every reason to be afraid. The Winchesters were now in very real danger, of being shot or, worse, arrested.

"The shifter's still in the bank," Dean growled quietly, hoping his brother would understand. The look Sam gave him definitely said he needed a hell of a better reason to fake-rob a bank than that one. "Look, the cops are already on their way, Sammy-" There was no way one of the tellers hadn't hit the silent alarm, and definitely no way the people who had made it out the front doors hadn't found someone to call 9-1-1 by now. "-so either we run right now, or we stay here and do the job."

Sam's look – the one that labeled his brother as completely off his rocker – did not change. "Dean, we absolutely run. We found the shifter once, we'll find him again. This isn't worth getting arrested over!"

They weren't talking breaking and entering, grave desecration, credit card fraud, or any of the other small-time, non-violent offenses the Winchesters committed on a near daily basis. This was bank robbery. Armed bank robbery. With hostages.

Dean just shrugged, keeping half an eye on the scared people littering the lobby floor. They'd need to lock and secure the front doors and quickly if they were staying. Then get their hostages in a more contained, controllable location while they hunted down the shifter. "Sure, we'll find him again," Dean answered, keeping his volume down, "after he drops two or three more bodies."

It was a low blow. Because Sam was right; landing in federal prison for armed robbery was probably not worth saving one or two people. Not with their destinies and all the shit they had to do to stop it. But they were hunters. A zero tolerance for loss of innocent life was written right into the contract when you signed up. Usually didn't matter what it'd cost you in exchange.

"Damnit," Sam muttered, looking devastated by that realization. "Dean…this is insane."

"Hey," Dean tried for his most encouraging smile. "We got out of it last time, we can do it again."

The arched brow Sam aimed his way stung because yeah, alright, the kid must be damn sick of hearing that promise shortly before everything – and Dean meant everything – usually went to Hell in a handbasket.

If Time really was a sentient being, Dean couldn't wait to find her and strangle her.

"Ronald." At Dean's barked command, the larger man – standing empty-handed several feet away, still looking like someone had stolen his puppy – jumped about a foot off the floor. "Get the front doors."

The ex-security-turned-bank-robber blinked, then looked up towards the set of double doors and the darkening street just barely visible beyond the reflective glass. He patted himself down, like their might be more than a semi-automatic assault rifle hiding in his too-tight jumpsuit. "I don't have anything…"

Dean's glare could have melted steel. Because of course the man had figured out how to sneak in a semi-automatic rifle in his jumpsuit, but hadn't made room for anything actually useful. "Figure it out, Ronald!"

The man scrambled away, posthaste. Dean turned back to his brother, only feeling a little guilty for being so hard on Ronald. The guy had blown their cover, sent their shifter running (and he no doubt had a new skin by now, which meant another civilian dead, this time on their watch), and set them up perfectly to be arrested for robbing a god damn bank.

Again.

Again.

How did this shit keep happening?!

"We need to get these people up and get them into the vault," he said to Sam, handing Betsy off to his younger brother, who took her quite reluctantly. Dean, meanwhile, was keeping an eye on Ronald as he scurried off to grab a stanchion from the nearest teller line – causing a woman to scream as he got too close too quickly. He tried to calm her down, completely unsuccessfully, by telling her in the least calm and convincing voice ever that it was okay, they were FBI. Dean wanted to go over there and hit him with his own gun, only he'd already handed Betsy off to Sam. So instead he put his head in his hand and prayed to a god he did not believe in for some level patience. Any patience at all would be great.

Luckily, having no idea what else to say to further calm the terrified hostages he was busy terrifying, Ron hurried back to the door, sliding the pole between the handles of the doors. It wouldn't last for long but, then again, the doors were made of friggin' glass. So nothing would. All the cops had to do to get in was break them.

"Why can't we just let them go, Dean?" Sam asked quietly, eying Betsy with unease and pointedly not looking at the room full of terrified people that they'd created. "It'll be easier to hunt for a shifter in an empty building anyway."

Sam knew that wouldn't actually be the case; letting everyone go meant it would only be too easy for the shifter to slip out with them. But in that moment, forced to confront the dozen scared faces glancing their way, that knowledge didn't make this feel any more right.

"We can't, Sammy," the older Winchester muttered, actually sounding contrite about it. He reluctantly met his brother's eyes. "Cops are gonna call the FBI, the FBI will call for SWAT. That's our ticket out of here. Without hostages, none of that happens. The cops just shoot their way in right off the bat."

And they'd all end up dead or in jail. Dean didn't need a Hollywood-certified degree in bank robberies to know that. Hostages made good shields, whether or not you cared if they got hurt. And Dean cared, which meant every one of these people, while slightly traumatized, would walk out of this bank physically unharmed by the end of the night. The Winchesters just needed them to function as shields to buy time to find the shifter first.

"I know it sucks, man," Dean muttered again, this time quirking a small, utterly mirthless smile. "But we'll get through it. And they'll be one less murderous monster in the world after we're done."

That was the Winchester way, was it not?

Sam did not look mollified in the slightest (after all, there might be one less monster, but two more wanted posters in its place) but eventually he sighed, resigned to this insane plan. Gripping Betsy with at least half-faked intention, he walked past his brother towards the largest group of huddled hostages. As Sam began herding people to their feet, then towards the hallway that led to the vault, Ronald made his way back over to Dean, footsteps both excited and hesitant.

"What now?" he asked nervously, eyeing the crowd Sam was gathering like any one of 'em could be the mandroid. They technically could, but Dean's money was on the shifter having made for the back of the bank, most likely to hide and change skins in private. That's what had happened last time, and, as the man from the future well knew, time liked to stay the goddamn same.

"Now we hunt that piece of shit down before he kills again," Dean growled, mostly under his breath but by the way Ronald's eyes widened, it had been clear enough. "You, on the other hand, are gonna shut up and guard the hostages you took, you giant idiot."

The look of hurt that crossed the man's face was only matched by the look of confusion. Dean was understanding of the first and wanted to slap off the second. "But- I- you said-"

"No buts, Ronald," Dean snapped, grabbing the man by the jumpsuit and pulling him over to the downed security guard. Mr. Okie Dokie was still out and would likely have one hell of a shiner when he eventually came 'round. Dean bent over, scooping up the guard's discarded gun from several feet away and tucking it in the back of his jeans. Then he got Ronald to help him haul the man off the floor and across the lobby to the gathered crowd of terrified civilians. Sam was more or less escorting them single file towards the vault, having one of the tellers lead the way. Dean, Ronald, and their unconscious security buddy brought up the rear.

Once the same teller had opened the vault, her nicely manicured hands shaking the entire time, Dean called for them to hold up. He had them line up against the hallway wall leading to the vault so he could make his way over to his brother. Ronald stayed at the back, propping Mr. Okie Dokie up against the wall next to the last hostage. She eyed the unconscious security guard nervously while Ronald patted him down for any other weapons. He removed a can of pepper spray and a pair of handcuffs. Then awkwardly took a few steps away from the guard and the woman who was clearly terrified of him.

"It's okay-" he started to say before Dean barked at him to shut. Ronald scurried further away, at first headed for the brothers but freezing at a second bark to stay where he was and watch them. Right. That made sense. If all three of them were at the front of the line, that left their 'hostages' free to run back to the lobby. It left the mandroid free to bolt.

Ronald stationed himself at the front end of the hallway, clasping and unclasping his hands nervously as he eyed any one of their potential murderous robots.

"Jesus Christ," Dean muttered as he joined Sam, who raised a single eyebrow that succinctly and clearly reminded him just whose fault all this was. "I know, I know, shut up. Here."

Dean crouched down, pulling a silver knife from an ankle holster. As he stood back up, offering the knife to his brother, Sam's forehead had smoothed out in that way that screamed, 'danger!'

"Dude!" the younger WInchester hissed, pushing the knife back towards him with a look of disbelief and a quick glance to the hostages. Most of them were keeping their eyes on the floor, but a few watched on with wide-eyed fear. Sam dropped his voice. "I thought we said no weapons."

Dean had the decency not to outright laugh, but his eyes shifted sardonically to Betsy, still in his brother's hands. "Yeah. Cuz that worked out so well for us. Besides, like I was really walking in here naked." He rolled his eyes, half at the idea of him going anywhere unarmed, half at his brother for flipping his predictably girly shit about this. "Look, just use it to test them."

Sam looked like he'd thrown a disc or maybe burst something. "We can't just cut into them, Dean!" he hissed, keeping his voice so low it was almost hard for Dean to hear him, less than a foot away.

"Oh come on, it's a scratch," Dean argued back, balking at how much of a pain in the ass Samantha was being about this. He knew the situation sucked, but it was the one they were stuck with so they just had to deal.

"It's also incredibly unhygienic, for starters," Sam argued right back, throwing out the arm that wasn't holding Betsy. As the nearest civilian jumped from the sudden movement, scooting closer to the person next to him, Sam lowered his hand with a guilt grimace. Dean could see from the way he slouched that he was trying to make himself less intimidating in stature alone (bit late for that). "I'm not slicing into these people for the same damn reason junkies don't share needles, Dean!"

Huh?

Oh.

Ooooh. Shit. Dean hadn't thought of that.

"Uh…" the man from the future grimaced. "Alright, well, touching their skin should be enough. If they're the shifter, they should react to the silver."

Sam didn't look any more appeased, but at least he stopped arguing. He still hadn't taken the knife, though.

Dean tried again to get them back on track. They were on somewhat of a time limit here, after all. "Once we're sure the shifter isn't in the crowd, we lock them in the vault and go hunting."

"The vault is a sealed room, Dean." At the confused look Sam got in return for that statement, the brains of the operation sighed and tried not to hate everything about his life in that moment. "There's no air, in or out, in there. They'll suffocate."

Oh. Right.

Dean grimaced. Damnit, why was robbing a bank and taking hostages so complicated?He did remember them mostly leaving the vault door open last time, with one of them guarding it at all times. This was probably why. Not that he remembered that conversation. "Okay, uh…test them anyway, we need to make sure this group is clean, and get them inside. Then you and Ronald stand guard with the door cracked, and I'll find the shifter."

The way Sam opened his mouth immediately let Dean know just what he thought of that plan. But he held up his hand, face as serious as he could muster.

"I'll move faster alone," he argued, which wasn't a lie. They didn't have time to teach Ronald how to hunt right now. Which, yes, Dean knew was his own damn fault and he'd own that….Later. "And it's not like we can leave him here, alone, to guard the hostages while you and I hunt this thing down."

Sam's jaw clenched, the vein in the corner of his cheek jumping. Dean offered a weak smile, but the younger Winchester was having none of it.

"How about I hunt the damn thing down and you guard the hostages you took with the idiot you brought along!" Sam hissed, emphasizing each accusing word with a push of Betsy towards Dean's chest.

Fair point. Not that Dean would admit it.

"Because I know how this goes down," he countered. Future knowledge almost always won him this type of argument. And when that wasn't enough, there was always his charming personality to consider. "Besides, people like you more. They trust you and that puppy-dog innocence. They'll feel safer with you. You know I'm right."

He might be right, and Sam might even know it, but it sure didn't make the younger Winchester any less murderous about it.

"Fine," Sam breathed out, the word hardly an acquiescence. "But I swear to God, Dean, if Ronald does anything-"

"He won't," Dean reassured immediately. "I'll talk to him. He's just going to sit here and be a good little hostage guard, alright?"

The man from the future jiggled the knife in his hand, encouraging his brother to take it.

Sam closed his eyes briefly, clearly not believing a word of that promise, but took the strap attached to Betsy, threw it over his shoulder and slid her around to his back. He swiped the knife out of Dean's hand and turned to the first hostage, who eyed the blade nervously.

Dean left his brother to start awkwardly explaining the deal to the civilians – into the vault, but first I'm going to press this blade to your skin, no, I won't hurt you, I promise – and headed towards the back of the line where Ronald was waiting eagerly. Dean didn't have any more silver on him, and he was damn reluctant to give Ronald another gun, but there wasn't much choice. He needed Ronald as backup in case the shifter was in the line and decided to bolt before the silver gave him away. A gun wouldn't kill him, but it might slow him down enough to give Sam time to catch up.

"Jesus," Dean muttered to himself again, taking a deep breath of his own even as he pulled the gun from his waistband to hand over to their way-too-happy-about-this tagalong. Jesus, this had all gone to hell already and the night was only getting started.

-o-o-o-

The bank manager's office was very much as Dean remembered it. Empty but for a disgusting pile of shed skin and goo in the middle of the room. The blood trail that lead from the lobby to this office was new and quite convenient, but it ended at the pile of nasty. The shifter had switched skins and healed, as shifters were wont to do.

"Damnit," Dean muttered from behind the desk, poking at the pile of gooey leftovers with a pen he'd stolen off the desk. He hadn't expected anything more than this exact scene, but it was frustrating all the same.

The man from the future stood with a huff and a groan, looking around the office. Last time, the shifter had stashed the new body….somewhere. Dean couldn't remember where, but it didn't really matter. Knowing what the new skin looked like hadn't helped them much last go around and Dean didn't want to waste precious time searching for wherever he – or it – had stashed the body.

What he needed was a weapon that would actually work against the creature. Leaving Sam with the only silver knife had been risky, but they needed to eliminate the pool of hostages so they could safely release them later without worrying about the shifter walking right out of the bank with them. Then he needed eyes in the sky.

Dean started ransacking the manager's desk, searching for anything silver and hoping the guy hadn't been a cheap bastard. The action along with that thought cause his vision to nearly spin from the déjà vu. That was usually a good sign, so he kept going. It took a couple drawers and a search of the desktop before he found it; a letter opener that came with such a dizzying amount of 'been there, done that' that Dean knew it was silver-coated before he even inspected it.

He pocketed the knife, grabbed the light switch on his way out, and headed for the security room Mr. Okie Dokie had first lead them to before this hellish night began. He had a shifter to find, and the cameras were his best and quickest bet.

Dean was well on his way to the security booth, leaving behind the manager's office, when the phone inside started ringing.

-o-o-o-

Sam left Ronald to guard their certified-human hostages while he went in search of water and a first aid kit. One of the bank tellers had told him where to find the supplies; a break room for the first and the last of the teller's stations for the second. He'd easily found the unopened case of water in the break room, stacked next to a mini fridge. The first aid kit to treat the security guard's minor injuries took a little more searching and Sam was just standing up from retrieving it when he heard the distant ringing of a phone. The hunter straightening from behind the teller's stand, eyes wide.

The phone rang three times before abruptly cutting off. Sam waited a beat in the silence of the lobby, wondering if whoever had been calling hung up, or if maybe Dean had decided to answer it.

Another beat passed before Sam realized with a jolt that it was probably the cops calling to negotiate. Immediately, the well-trained hunter dropped back down, crouching behind the teller stand. The upper windows of the lobby would give any sniper a pretty clear view of the lobby, and with it, Sam. There were no flashing lights, no obvious cop cars or uniformed officers beyond the glass of the front doors, but it was also hard to see from his obscured angle and the growing dark outside. What glass he could spot from his position mostly reflected the lights of the lobby, not giving much away of the outside world.

"Shit," Sam hissed, realizing if it was the cops, they hadn't hung up. Someone had answered the phone. Realization sunk like a led ball in his stomach – Dean wasn't his only 'partner' at the moment – and Sam scrambled back towards the hallway, staying as low as possible.

In his head, he was praying over and over again that Dean had been the one to pick up that phone. Because, if not, they were so damn screwed. If prison life didn't beat him to it, Sam was going to murder his brother.

-o-o-o-

"No, no, we're not bank robbers! You've got it all wrong. We're the FBI!"

Ronald's voice was easily audible halfway down the hallway and Sam rearranged his priorities. He was going to murder Ronald long, long before he murdered his brother. The dumbass was standing at the start of the hallway leading to the vault, where a phone was attached to the wall next to a time-punch clock – likely out of use for years now – and a plaque with a photo of the employee of the month. Ronald had the security guard's gun in one hand, phone pressed to his ear with the other, running his mouth loudly and paying about as much attention to the open vault door as he had to anything else remotely important this entire day.

"Demands?" Ronald's eyes were wide as he shifted his weight, turning his back even more so to their hostages and catching sight of Sam booking it his way. "We don't have any demands-"

Sam grabbed the phone out of Ronald's hand and slammed it back onto the receiver, the case of water and first aid kit tightly gripped in one hand. Big, round, stupidly vulnerable brown eyes stared at him, and Sam clenched his free hand, resisting the urge to break the phone or, even better, Ronald's face.

"Are you insane?" he yelled instead, lowering his voice only when the hushed, panicked whispers of the hostages inside the vault reminded him they weren't alone. One of the male bank employees ducked away from the cracked door as soon as Sam glanced their way, having clearly been watching them. They needed to be so much more careful than they were being, darn it.

"Wh-what's the problem?" Ronald asked, oblivious as always. His shoulders were almost up around his ears, a tinge of red on his cheeks from both embarrassment and defensiveness.

"The problem, you idiot, is that we're not really FBI!" Sam hissed, but kept his tone as low as his broiling anger would allow. He did not understand how this moron could be so damn blind to what was really going on here.

"You're…you're not?"

By the way Ronald's eyes doubled in size, rounding out like giant, bulging saucers, he really didn't have a clue as to the mess he was in. Sam rubbed at his forehead hard enough to redden skin – anything to keep him from lashing out any more than he already had – then grabbed Ronald by the sleeve of his jumpsuit. Angrily, he led them around the corner, out of sight of the hostages. This was not the sort of thing innocent civilians needed to see or hear.

"Of course not," he hissed back, setting down the water and first aid kit. "Come on, Ronald! We dress up as service technicians and hunt monsters. Of course we're not with the fucking U.S. government!"

The way Ronald's free hand slowly curled into a fist, the other starting to shake and the handgun with it, was the least of recent events to inform Sam that things were quickly getting out of control. He owed his brother the biggest damn 'I told you so' in the history of the phrase.

-o-o-o-

Dean's eyes were starting to hurt staring at the multiple feeds of low-quality CCTV footage. That could probably be fixed if he blinked more, but the hunter didn't want to risk it. They didn't have a lot of time before the cops would cut the power – a step Dean remembered clearly from their last go around – and the shifter wasn't going to be just up and wandering around, turning those pretty glowing eyes towards every camera in the joint. By now, he obviously knew there were hunters in the bank with him, which meant he'd by lying low, trying to figure a way out.

The front doors were currently locked, and Ronald had rigged up enough of a contraption to keep 'em that way even if the shifter had a set of keys. Removing that setup would make noise, enough to hear from the front half of the building. Plus, Dean was keeping an eye on the camera feed for the lobby and front door, just in case the shifter made a run for it. There was a back door, of course – all buildings had to have at least two viable exits to meet fire and safety codes – but the bank's was strictly a fire door; alarmed to go off if opened. They hadn't heard any alarms, so Dean knew the guy was still in the bank. And his first move, even before searching the manager's office, had been to barricade the shit out of that door with every piece of office furniture he could find in the nearby rooms. So the shifter wasn't getting out that way (and, added bonus, the cops weren't coming in. At least not easily).

"There!" Dean exclaimed aloud, despite being alone, as he finally spotted someone on the cameras. It could just be a straggler from the lobby who'd managed to stay hidden and avoid being led into the vault, but Dean doubted it.

Still, he had to be sure. Between the quality of the image – which was crappy – and the angle on the crouched, partially obscured man, Dean couldn't get a good read on the guy's face. He could discern race (dark-ish skin, probably Black but the camera sucked balls so Dean wouldn't go strictly by that alone), clothes (pressed dress-shirt and tie) and either short-cropped hair or buzzed. Maybe even shaved? The grainy quality of the video wasn't helping much there.

The guy who originally owned that skin was probably an employee of the bank, given the half monkey suit. He'd likely been in the back when this shitshow got started, bumping into the fake bank manager as he'd come running back to his office.

Dean had little doubt this was their guy, but stayed glued to the screen, hoping the figure – crouched behind a desk in the one and only conference room the bank had – would turn towards the camera and confirm it.

It took another thirty seconds, time Dean wasn't sure he had, before the man finally turned.

"Got you," Dean growled, jabbing a finger into the monitor, right over the creature's glowing eyes.

The hunter grabbed the silver letter opener off the counter and bolted for the door. The minute he hit the hallway, the building went pitch black.

"Son of a bitch!" he muttered, sparing the lights overhead a second's glance before he broke into a run for the conference room. The emergency spotlights flickered on with the whir of a far off generator, but it didn't matter. Dean had known the power would get cut eventually, but he'd hoped it would be after he got to the shifter. This guy would be jumpy as hell, knowing he was being hunted, and even the smallest change in environment was likely to trigger action.

It certainly would have triggered Dean, if he'd been the one hiding away with a couple guys out to kill him. Staying in one place was the best way to get dead. And now, with the power out and the cameras down, they'd lost their best and fastest way to find the guy if he'd fled to another part of the building. If he lost the shifter now, they'd have to clear the bank on foot, one room at a time. Dean doubled his pace to the conference room.

Sure enough, by the time he burst through the door, knife at the ready, the room was empty.

"Son of a bitch!"

Chapter End Notes

Next Up: Ronald does not like Sam and has himself a right little hissy fit, Dean's calling in the FBI, and Sam wants to know when he bought a ticket for the bus to Crazy Town, and when that bus took a sharp left turn right off Insanity Cliff.

Updating Schedule: I did not get as many chapters written pre-posting as I had hoped, but I also realized that I needed to stop focusing so solely on that. I missed you all. I missed hearing from you, hearing your ideas and hopes and excitement. That is going to get me writing routinely more isolation ever could.

So while I am going to aim for a two-week posting schedule for now, my goal is to get it back to weekly once I get into a rhythm. I can't promise I'll succeed or that there won't be any more delays or breaks. The world, my life, and my schedule are all still fairly unpredictable and also not back to normal. But I've got high hopes and I want to get you all what I can when I can!

Reviews: I would love love love love LOVE to hear from you! It doesn't even have to be about this story – how have you been? Is everyone fairing okay? I hope you're staying as healthy and sane as possible in trying times. Let me know how you've been. I can't wait to talk with you all again, and thank you so much for waiting so long and tuning back in!

Cheers,

Silence

Chapter 110: Season 2: Chapter 76

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Gah, I can't think of much to say tonight. I am super tired and feeling the effects of my booster shot (good god, my neck muscles are tight and ACHEY. Grrrr) I'm actually going to go to bed right after posting this (at...like...an incredibly reasonable hour? Who AM I?) I hope you all are having a wonderful start to the holiday season and get some rest and relaxation in the coming week!

Chapter Warnings: Ronald's yelling, Dean's 'negotiating', Victor's getting late night phone calls, and Mr. Okie Dokie is having a panic attack. Just another Tuesday at Milwaukee International.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 76

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

"I don't like you! You're a liar!"

Those were the first words – yelled, at full volume, with an almost childish level of resentment – Dean heard as he jogged back to the vault, as well his first clue that all was not good and right. Well, the fact they were in a powered-down bank, cops piling up outside to come in here, armed and ready to kill, was his first clue. This was the second, though.

Dean rounded the last dimly lit corner to find Sam and Ronald in each other's faces, both about seconds away from taking this confrontation to the next level. The older Winchester hurried towards them before they could get to exchanging blows.

"Whoa, whoa! Hey!" Dean pushed his brother and Ronald away from each other forcefully. Sam went a lot more easily, being about half the size of Ronald, despite towering over him height-wise. It helped that the younger Winchester let himself be pushed, backing off on his own accord as he turned away from the man that was damn near close to making him homicidal. With Sam safely a few feet away, Dean turned to Ronald, who was red-faced and huffing angrily. "What the hell is going on?"

"You lied!" Ronald accused, glancing briefly at Dean before refocusing his attention on Sam. "You're not FBI!"

Oh for fuck's sake. Dean wanted to roll his eyes, but instead closed them and bit his tongue. As he started counting to ten (uselessly, he might add), the older Winchester grabbed the other two men by their forearms and forcefully dragged them further away from the vault. They were already halfway to the entrance of the hallway, but Dean didn't want to risk any of the civilians hearing them. Last thing they needed was panicked hostages.

He didn't quite make it to a ten count, but Dean figured five was about all they had time for anyway. When he brought them all to a stop them further away from the vault, he fixed Ronald with a look he usually saved for the things they hunted. It shut the other man right up.

"Yes, we lied. People don't usually let you into their houses, or banks, or security systems, when you tell them you hunt monsters, Ronald. Of course we lied." As Ronald's grumpy face came back, cheeks reddening again, Dean gave another shove against his chest with his open palm, still up and holding the man back from Sam. The armed man, Dean couldn't forget, eyes dropping briefly to the security guard's gun gripped way-too-tightly in Ronald's shaking fist.

"Look," he tried again, tapping Ronald's chest lighter this time to get the man's eyes back on him. "Yeah, we're not FBI and we probably could have told you that much-"

"Probably?!"

"But-" Dean emphasized sharply, keeping the man's protests to just that one word, "there is still a monster in this bank, Ronald. It's killed someone and taken their skin, and it's gonna do it again if we don't stop it."

Those big brown eyes, still angry, softened around the edges just enough that Dean could see he'd gotten through. He shifted from holding Ronald back to gesturing with an open palm to the man in front of him. Ronald's brow furled as he glanced down at that hand, then realized what Dean was asking for. With an even heavier frown, he handed over the pistol.

In return, Dean offered him the letter opener from his other hand. Ronald took it hesitantly, clearly confused but not objecting.

"We're going to hunt it down," Dean confirmed, hoping the man would accept the peace offering for what it was, and not see Dean's true motive: getting him far away from Sam. Sam, who wasn't even looking at them, jaw still clenched tight and knuckles white around Betsy.

Yeah, that was going to be an ugly conversation Dean knew he couldn't avoid. But one damn crisis at a time.

Almost on cue, the phone just around the corner started ringing and Dean realized immediately what had started all this. Jesus. Fucking. Christ. He pointed at Ronald with an accusing finger.

"No more answering phones," he ordered, then turned to Sam, who just shook his head, barely looking at his older brother. He was still too angry to speak. Dean knew that anger wasn't just aimed at Ronald this time (and god, who knew what the man probably said to the police. Dean could imagine it was something along of the lines of 'we're the good guys!' and could only pray it stopped there, before he got into mandroid territory. Dean resisted the frustrated sigh and counted to three this time). Sam had every right to be pissed; his kid brother hadn't been much of a fan of the way things went down in the original timeline, when Dean hadn't known this was going to happen and they'd ended up buried up to their eyeballs in shit before they could get out of it. This time Dean had walked them right into the shithole, holding the shovel with pride like he'd dug it himself, and on purpose to boot.

Yeah, Sam had every right to be pissed.

The phone was still ringing, so Dean rounded the corner, eyes briefly alighting on the still open vault door and the hostages inside, backlit by a single emergency light. There was one guy - expression dark and wary – watching them pretty boldly from the cracked door, even as the others were trying to call him back. They were speaking in hushed voices and, catching Dean's eye, the man finally relented, moving away from the door.

Dean kept his gaze on the vault for another second, eyes narrowed. He didn't remember the hostages giving them trouble last time, but he was also pretty sure they were a day or two off the original timeline. Which meant they were probably dealing with different hostages. Great, like they needed any additional problems. The hunter turned his focus to the phone and picked it up, slamming it against his ear with punishing force.

"Get me Victor Henriksen from the FBI," he demanded harshly, cutting off the negotiator on the other end before he could get much more than a word out. "My name is Dean Winchester, I'm wanted by the FBI and I'm not talking to anyone but Henriksen. So you better get him here fast."

With that, Dean hung the phone back up.

Sam, having rounded the corner probably right around the bit where Dean just gave them his name, looked seconds away from exploding. His brown eyes were blown wide and all that anger he'd been harboring – the frustration of being walked hand-in-hand into a bank robbery with a brother who wasn't listening to how insane all of it was – was now hyper focused on said brother standing in front of him having just invited the FBI to the party.

"Have you lost your mind?" he yelled, no longer caring if the hostages heard them. Dean glanced briefly around the corner at the vault door, eyebrows raised, but the civilians had moved away from the partial opening. There was nothing to see but the wall of poorly lit safety deposit boxes. He turned back to his brother as Sam grabbed his arm, fingers digging in. He was clearly expecting an answer and wouldn't be walking away without one this time.

"We need the FBI to show up, Sam. They're our exit strategy. It was always going to happen, might as well speed it up."

"Might as well-" Sam let out a noise Dean had only heard a handful of times. It usually preceded him getting clocked in the jaw. While he'd love to avoid that this time around, his explanation had done nothing to calm the younger Winchester down. If anything, it seemed to irritate him more. "Yeah, you said that, but I'm not seeing an exit strategy here, Dean. Everywhere I look, the walls are just getting closer."

Which was…more than fair from Sam's point of view. Dean winced, remembering his brother sitting in the Impala some months back, telling him to back off because he wasn't like Dean. Sam didn't get to know what happened next and be reassured by it (not that Dean was finding his future knowledge all that reassuring these days). To him, this situation was flat out crazy-pants, completely avoidable, and now utterly screwed up with no happy ending in sight.

To be honest, Dean wasn't entirely sure he was seeing the situation any differently. He was just damn good at bluffing. Fake it till you make it, and all that.

"I get it," he said, dropping his voice to a low murmur. He tried to lower his own irritation and frustration levels – with the situation and with his brother – to at least aim for something sincere and reassuring. Well, maybe just the first. "I get it, Sam. I fucked up, alright? This isn't going the way we wanted-"

"Understatement!" Sam bit out, and Dean got a flash of déjà vu that he wanted to physically wave away like a fly in his face. He managed to resist the urge, gritting his teeth instead and reminding himself that Sam had every reason to be furious and he had to be the one to stay calm here.

"I know, okay? I tried avoiding this and walked right into it instead. But…we gotta deal with it now. You can be pissed at me later."

His brother's jaw rotated angrily, jutting out to the side before grinding down and causing a vein to pop along his temple. He didn't say anything – Dean sorta suspected he was still too angry to really argue - but he nodded sharply in the silence that followed. Dean let out an equally quiet sigh of relief. He needed Sam with him on this one, even if it was a shitshow and his brother had every right to hate it. To hate him. It didn't change the facts, though.

"Alright. When the FBI shows up, Henriksen's not gonna waste time. He'll send S.W.A.T in the moment he gets here." Dean rubbed at his jaw, happy it wasn't sporting a new fist-shaped bruise. He glanced back towards the vault door. The civilians seemed to be behaving, tucked away from view, and Ronald was leaning grumpily against the wall halfway between the Winchesters and their hostages. "Last time we knocked two of them out and stole their gear. Walked out of here in the mayhem and nobody stopped us. This time we'll just have to take down three."

The sigh that left Sam's mouth, followed by the way he raised a hand to rub at his forehead and pinch the bridge of his nose like he was warding off an incoming headache, rang a few warning bells.

"Dean," Sam started, and it was clear from his tightly controlled voice how hard he was reining in his frustration, "last time I checked, S.W.A.T. gear doesn't come in extra-large."

As one, the brothers turned to Ronald, who noticed their attention after a beat and frowned deeply at the two of them. He looked away, his petulant child act still in full swing.

"Son of a bitch." Dean looked back at Sam, his own frustration mounting, mostly at himself (though he'd already admitted his fuck up once, he really wasn't ready to do it again). He wracked his brain for a back-up idea that still had all three of them getting out of this alive. "Okay…. Okay. Same plan, but we'll escort Ronald out as a hostage – or a prisoner. Get him into a cop car, and, uh…steal the car, I guess. You two can get the hell out of dodge and I'll double back for Baby."

His brother just stared at him, jaw still clenched, forehead scarily smooth. There was so much wrong with that plan – with all of this – that Sam didn't even know where to start. Not like Dean would listen if he did.

"It'll work," his brother affirmed. Dean was nodding his head, apparently convincing himself about as much as he was convincing Sam. "We'll make it work."

"Dean-"

Whatever the younger Winchester had to say about plan B (er…C?) Dean never got to hear it. The increased voices of their hostages – rising in pitch and concern – drew both Winchesters' attention to the vault door, where a woman was very hesitantly poking her head out.

"H-Hello? Don't shoot! We, um, we need help! Please!"

Ronald was already pushing off the wall, grumpiness forgotten now that there was something to do – someone to help – and Dean gave Sam one last look. He tucked the security guard's gun into the waistline of his pants and took off after Ronald, catching up to him just as he got to the door. He didn't think the hostages would try to stage some sort of revolt, but at this point he wasn't taking any possibility off the table. Time didn't like them enough to let take anything for granted.

He grabbed Ronald by the arm, holding him back before the man could enter the vault. "What's going on?"

"The security guard," the woman – a customer of the bank based on the way she was dressed in jeans and a loose, floral print blouse – was switching between looking at the two of them and then over her shoulder at the other hostages. "He woke up and he's- I don't know, he's having some kind of fit. I think he might be asthmatic and panicking."

"Okay," Dean said, thinking this sounded a hell of a lot like a ruse, but also vaguely remembering escorting someone out of the bank last time for a similar reason. Could have been the security guard. All he remembered was the shock – and fear – of realizing how many cops and reporters were out on the street, waiting for them, and how screwed they'd really been.

Dean sighed internally. You know what would have been real handy in a not-robbery in a bank full of civilians? A fucking Jedi. Fate had chosen a shit time to mute one of their biggest assets.

(Not that they knew if Andy's previous power would have even worked on a Shifter. Hadn't worked on demons, after all).

Dean pushed that mostly useless thought to the side – he was allowed to be cranky and complain, damnit – and tapped Ronald on the shoulder, signaling him to move out of the way and stay outside the vault. Luckily, the man seemed to understand and didn't fight him on it, though his answering frown was still plenty childish. Dean followed the scared woman into the vault.

The security guard was actually in some pretty clear distress. He was taking giant, gulping breaths but they didn't seem to be helping, if his reddening face was any indication. His eyes were blown wide in panic and his grip on the surrounding crowd trying to help him suggested whatever was happening to him was getting worse.

"Alright, everybody move," Dean commanded, pulling his no-nonsense voice usually reserved for FBI roles. It worked almost too well; the group scattered, leaving the poor guard even more terrified. That sucked. He'd liked the security guard. He said things like, 'okie-dokie', and didn't deserve to be part of this hell for just doing his job.

"Help me get him up," Dean ordered the nearest civilian – an African-American guy he barely even looked at as he knelt down beside the guard. The man was clearly an employee with that light blue dress shirt and nice tie, but all Dean cared about was that he helped. The civilian grabbed the other side of the guard, helping him to his feet and then walking with Dean out of the vault.

"What's going on?" Sam asked, having come closer to the vault door. Ronald was waiting anxiously beside him, the two apparently in a tentative truce now that they had an all new problem.

"He's having a panic attack. We gotta get him out of here," Dean answered, handing the guard off to Sam. He turned back to the man who'd helped, only now realizing it was the same one who had been staring him down from the vault door. The same one that got Dean wondering if they were going to have to pursue a stricter containment of their 'hostages.'

At least he knew for sure the guy was human. Still, a human could be plenty dangerous. The man was regarding him warily, glancing between the gun at Dean's waist and the hunter himself. Dean squared his shoulders to the man, wary for all his own reasons. "Thanks for your help, man. Why don't you, uh, head back into the vault."

"I could help you carry him out," the guy said in response, those dark eyes never leaving Dean's and definitely keeping him on edge. The hunter moved his hand to the gun tucked securely at his waist, a reminder of who was in charge here.

"Nah, man, we're good. Now head back in."

There was a beat of silence where Dean wondered if they were about to have a fight on their hands. The dude was built: broad-chest, well-muscled physique, and a shaved head that all screamed ex-military. Dean was started to think they were about to have a problem.

"Michael."

One of the other hostages – a woman – was hovering just beyond the open vault door, eyeing the exchange warily. Given the pencil skirt and matching blazer, she was probably another employee. Likely a coworker, now staring in open concern at Michael, who was about to get himself killed.

(An exaggeration, at least somewhat. Dean wouldn't kill him, but he would incapacitate him in a heartbeat.)

Sam was watching the exchange warily as well, grip tight on the security guard's wrist and waist. He was prepared to drop the man if a fight broke out, but neither Winchester wanted that. After another tense beat, 'Michael' finally yielded to his coworker's concern. He gave a slow nod, raising his hands to indicate they weren't going to have a problem. Then he backed into the vault one step at a time and, at a nod from Dean, Ronald closed the door.

They'd have to open it soon enough to give their hostages a refresh on oxygen, but that could wait until they got the guard outside.

Speaking of which…. The gasping breaths of a person clearly in need of medical attention drew Dean's focus away from the vault. Right, Mr. Okie Dokie. He ducked under the man's free arm, wrapping it over his shoulder and balancing the ailing guard out between him and Sam. He told Ronald to watch the door but keep it closed; they'd be back in a minute.

"Wh-what if that's the mandroid?" Ronald whispered in anything but an actually quiet voice even as the brothers hefted the guard between them.

"It's not," Dean answered confidently, knowing by the way Sam was gritting his teeth that his brother wouldn't be answering any more questions from their tag-along. Not without some serious yelling involved. "They react to silver, and Sam tested all of 'em as they went into the vault. And stop calling it a mandroid."

Ronald's mouth formed an 'oh' like he understood far better than he possibly could, before it took on a frown. Not like they'd told him what else to call it, which he pointed out under his breath. His eyes dropped to the letter opener Dean had handed him, coated in silver. New understanding lit his eyes, but Dean didn't stick around to wait for more questions. The guard needed help and Dean wasn't letting murder, even third degree, get piled on top of armed robbery for his FBI rap sheet.

As they reached the end of the hallway and the phone on the wall, Dean halted them for a second to grab it off the receiver. He'd only ever robbed a bank once, but he was pretty sure he wouldn't have to dial – the cops should be listening. At least, that's totally how it worked in the movies.

"We've got a civilian who needs medical attention. I'm coming out with him. Don't shoot or my partner retaliates against the other hostages."

Sam shot him a sharp look over Mr. Okie Dokie's shoulder, but Dean ignored it. It wasn't like the younger Winchester would actually hurt anyone (or that Dean would ever ask him to for real), but Dean didn't want a sniper getting itchy trigger fingers while his head was in their scope, either. Maybe he didn't remember anyone taking pot shots the last time he'd escorted someone out of the bank…but he hadn't remembered Gordon Walker capping him either. Turns out that coming from the future didn't stop you from getting shot in the head.

"Relax, Sam," Dean bit out as they resumed their staggered walk for the front entrance. His brother was still leveling him with a glower that approached Ultimate Bitchface. "No one's going to get hurt."

"Yeah, Dean? Can you really promise that?" Sam asked as they reached the front doors and he took most of the wheezing guard's weight so Dean could undo the station barricade that Ronald had hastily setup. "To any of us that at this point?"

Dean growled as he dropped the gold pole and rope. He grabbed the security guard off his brother and pushed open the bank door with hostage in hand, stanchly ignoring his brother and his too-close-to-home point.

-o-o-o-

Victor Henriksen hadn't been asleep twenty minutes when his cell started ringing, and he immediately knew something had happened. Field agents might be on call 24/7, but most days Victor worked a desk. It was only in the past month that his case had gotten enough traction to warrant late night phone calls.

"What is it?" he growled into the receiver. He was a workaholic well enough on his own without getting called in in the middle of the night. This was the first night he'd actually taken off – purposefully leaving the Winchester files at the office – so he could get to bed at a decent hour for once.

"The Winchesters were identified robbing Milwaukee International Bank in Wisconsin twenty minutes ago." Deputy Director Steven Groves had an annoying voice any old day; it was light, exasperating, and pompous as all get out. The effect was multiplied several times over when it was after work hours.

Victor sat up in bed, surprise temporarily distracting him from how much he disliked the man he was obligated to report to. Arrogant prick. "They robbed a bank?"

That wasn't in the Winchester's standard repertoire at all. Far from it, actually. They usually stuck to crimes they could manufacture and then play the hero role in. Armed robbery didn't exactly fit that bill.

"Yup," his boss confirmed, dragging the word out in a way that rubbed Victor all the wrong ways, but he didn't let it affect his professionalism. He was too good an agent for that, and eventually he'd have Groves' job anyway. "Still at it, currently, holed up inside with nine or so hostages. They asked for you by name."

That stopped Victor's train of thought so abruptly it almost broke his brain for a second. He switched his cell to the other hand and threw the covers off. "They what?"

"Dean Winchester requested you by name. Said he'd talk to you and only you."

Victor just blinked, taking a moment to process the thrown-for-a-loop sensation currently buzzing under his skin. He wasn't even aware the Winchesters knew he was after them – other than the chance encounter at Sturgis Hospital – let alone his name.

What the hell was going on?

"I'll be at the office in twenty," he reported instead, steadfast as he started throwing clothes on.

"Make it the airstrip. I've already got a jet waiting for you," Groves responded, and for once Victor appreciated his boss's micromanaging personality.

"Yes sir," was all he said – and honestly, his boss was lucky he got that much – before he tossed his phone onto the mattress and grabbed his go bag from below the bed. Apparently he was heading to Wisconsin.

-o-o-o-

Sam and Dean were just making it back to the vault, rounding the corner that led to it, when the phone rang once more. Dean wasn't all that surprised. They'd gotten Mr. Okie Dokie off to the medics – the hunter glaring at the two SWAT officer's who'd met him up the stairs and taken the guard off his hands (both heavily armed and a reminder of the full forced they'd be facing very shortly) – in about as big a media storm as the last time. Between the couple dozen cops, at least one helicopter, and a half dozen news outlets, the city street had been downright crowded. Just like last time.

Dean certainly hadn't forgotten (or missed) the overwhelming dread that sunk his stomach like a lead weight. He'd take déjà vu any day over déjà vu and a cement cannonball in his gut.

"That you, Victor?" Dean asked as he picked up the phone on the third ring, ignoring the tense look Sam shot him for the call out. His brother's looks had been growing increasingly more of the do-I-even- know-you variety over the course of the night, and each one left Dean with a worst taste in his mouth.

There was the distant sound of propellers in the background for a second before the noise dimmed almost to the point of Dean not being able to hear it. He recognized the kind of static that came with sound-canceling headphones and the faint hum of an engine warming up. He might not be familiar (or comfortable) with planes, but it turned out he knew when someone was calling from one.

"That's Agent Henriksen to you, Dean."

Despite the situation, the older Winchester couldn't help his caustic grin. Victor Henriksen had been a pain in his ass – and definitely not good for his health – for more than a year last go around. But once the man had seen proof of the very real monsters that went bump in the night and taken that stick out of his ass…well, Dean could admit he'd found the guy not half bad. Almost tolerable, actually. In another lifetime, Henriksen would have made a damn fine hunter. Maybe even a halfway decent friend.

If they were lucky (and also didn't get dead in a bank in Milwaukee tonight), maybe this time he could bring the guy around sooner and avoid the whole Lilith fiasco entirely. Henriksen was a class A dick… but he wasn't a bad guy. And no one deserved a fate dished out by Lilith.

"Well, I'd say that's Mr. Winchester to you, but I think we both know that's not how I roll."

"Hardly," Victor snorted. And if they'd been friends, Dean would have heard the humor in it. But they weren't friends. ThisHenriksen still thought they were murderous sons of bitches, and any humor there wasn't meant for Dean. The older Winchester bit back a sigh. Sometimes being from the future sucked. It was kind of easier when he'd just hated the guy and had every right to do so. "I'm surprised you knew my name at all, if I'm being honest."

"What," Dean began with that same cocky grin, leaning against the wall with phone pressed to his ear. Like it was just another bank-robbing-chat-it-up-with-a-Fed Tuesday. Sam was giving him that look again (not like he'd ever stopped). "You didn't think I'd look you up after the hospital in Sturgis?"

There was a chuckle down the line that was anything but amused. "Oh, I know all about you too, Dean. I know about the Houdini act you pulled in Baltimore. I know about the desecrations and the thefts. I know about your dad. Ex-marine, raised his kids on the road-"

"Yeah, yeah, you know my whole life style starting with a crappy childhood." Dean shifted against the wall, glancing over his shoulder at the vault door. Sam, who'd decided he'd be of more use standing guard by the vault (or, more likely, that putting as much distance between him and Dean as possible would save Dean a bruised jaw and Sam some busted knuckles), was playing almost civil with Ronald. Meaning they were mostly ignoring each other; the larger man's attention was on the vault and Sam's was locked on Dean. The older Winchester turned back to the phone. "Good for you. You here yet?"

He could almost picture the look on Victor's face. Probably pulling the phone away from his ear to give it a double check. Or, Dean supposed, if he had a headset on then that probably wasn't what Victor was actually doing. But the surprised beat of silence on the other end was telling all the same.

"No," the agent hedged, and Dean could tell he wasn't a hundred percent certain it was the correct answer to give. He could count on one hand (using just one finger) the number of times he'd seen or heard the agent unsettled, and he was pretty sure he'd just broken a past record. Dean might not know him all that well, but he gathered Victor Henriksen wasn't the type to be comfortable with uncertainty. "I'm on my way. It's pretty late in DC right now. Not a lot of courtesy pulling an after-hours bank robbery."

Dean shrugged – not liked he'd planned this to be convenient for anyone, himself included – before he remembered Victor couldn't see him, but by then the Agent was back to talking.

"And what's with that anyway, huh, Dean? Robbing banks isn't really your style."

The hunter wondered if that was standard FBI negotiating tactic: try to get the psychopath comfortable and talking. Well, it wasn't going to work on Dean. Two could play the game of pointlessly beating around the bush with nothing but a sarcasm stick.

"We're branching out," he responded as neutrally as possible, giving as little information as possible.

"We?"

Dean winced. Not little enough, apparently. Alright, maybe there was some merit in that whole 'pleading the fifth' option.

"So Sam's with you then?" Henriksen sounded all too smug. Or maybe Dean was just imagining it. "The Bonnie to your Clyde?"

The older Winchester glanced over his shoulder at his brother. The silence hanging between him and the FBI agent on the other end was all levels of tense and unfortunate. Dean considered lying for a moment, but scrapped the idea pretty quickly. He'd already screwed the pooch there. With the way Sam was glaring at him from the end of the hall, holding Betsy and looking for the world like this, right here, was probably the end of it, he knew it too.

Well shit.

"Yeah, he's here," Dean responded, turning back to the phone if only to avoid seeing his brother's reaction. The kid was probably too far down the hall to properly hear his side of the phone call, but Sam was smart. He likely already knew what was being discussed. Or, at the very least, knew that it wasn't good (not that much in this situation could be).

"And Andy Gallagher?"

Dean physically recoiled from the phone in surprise, realizing far too late that it wasn't surprisingly at all for Henriksen to know the kid's name. Andy was a wanted murder suspect, and last anyone had seen of him he'd been with the Winchesters at the Sturgis Hospital. The feds had photos of him from that very hospital, and running facial recognition was kind of a thing for the FBI. Like, what they did.

Henriksen didn't know Andy was out. Violently so.

Dean swallowed.

"I know you've got a third man in there," Henriksen continued in lieu of the silence. "Eye witness reports don't exactly match Mr. Gallagher, but-"

"Andy's not here," Dean bit out, probably a bit too defensively. So what, sue him. He was under some stress here, damnit (whether he'd admit it to himself or not), and the kid was a sensitive topic. "There is no third person, it's just me and Sam."

There was a low tsk-tsking in the background as Victor clucked his tongue. "Dean, there's no point in lying to me. I told you, I did my homework. It's my job to know all about you, and I know you've got a three man team in the bank."

Dean looked over his shoulder again, this time eyeing Ronald. The man caught sight of the sudden attention and straightened, eyebrows climbing towards his hairline. Dean held his gaze for a moment, thinking out his next move, before turning back to the phone.

"Don't know what to tell you, man. It's just me and Sam."

"Uh-huh, sure." Victor's voice couldn't possibly be more condescending, and Dean realized the conversation was well past the point of being beneficial or even entertaining.

"Just call me when you get here," he cut in abruptly before Henriksen could get going on any other topic that would get Dean's hackles further up. Like circling back to his dad, god forbid. "Then we'll talk."

He put the phone back in the receiver a touch harder than was strictly necessary, but Dean was comfortable putting that squarely in the 'hey, I'm under the stress of robbing a bank here' category of excuses and move the hell on. He jogged back to the vault door and his two partners in crime. God, literally.

"We've got an hour, maybe two to find the shifter. Once Henriksen gets feet on the ground here, he'll send in SWAT." The hunter glanced between Ronald and his brother. "When that happens, we gotta be ready to go."

"Fantastic," Sam muttered, anger still clearly at full capacity. Not that Dean could blame him, but it wasn't exactly helpful in the moment. So Dean ignored him, turning to Ronald.

"You and me are on monster duty. Sam, you're the babysitter."

The tight-lipped grimace he got in affirmative wasn't exactly a good sign either, but Dean threw it on top of the ever-growing, probably-overflowing box of things to handle later. When they weren't, you know, in the middle of robbing a bank.

Ronald looked surprised to be chosen – like the kid used to being chosen last at just about every activity ever was finally getting picked first – and the enthusiasm showed. Dean resisted groaning and instead gestured for the man to follow him down the hall. It wasn't like he actually wanted the trigger-happy conspiracy theorist with him. He just knew he couldn't leave him with Sam again if he wanted either of them – let alone both of them – to survive this.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: I know a lot didn't happen this chapter - I read through it and was like...'how did that take up 10 pages?!' but I was hesitant to start combining chapters both for the natural stopping points getting messed up, and because my stockpile is still pretty low and the more spread out the material, the more likely I can continue to provide two-week updates reliably for now. Hope you all don't mind having a little less happen until I can get my writing feet back under me.

I'm on vacation for the next two weeks, yaaaaay, so hopefully that will present many an opportunity for some hefty writing.

Up Next: My brain is foggy enough I am straight up trying to remember what happens next (insert head desk here) Uh...let's see...Ronald's getting a crash course in Monsters, their shifter is a sneaky bastard, Victor's on scene, and a sniper gets itchy trigger fingers. See you in two weeks!

Happy Holidays!

Cheers,

Silence

Chapter 111: Season 2: Chapter 77

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: I'm dancing right now, hands in the air like a total doof because we're at three posts on schedule! I haven't had as much time to write as I'd really hoped lately, so that stockpile of chapters is starting to dwindle and the two week thing's going to be the new norm for a while - le sigh - but I'm really hoping to get some stuff out in the next couple days. We're getting real close to the good stuff, and that should keep the Muse moving her little tushy :D

Chapter Warnings: Ron's pouting, Dean's teaching, Victor's demanding, and Sam's just along for the ride at this point. Poor Sam. Oh, and a police sniper decides to take a lucky shot.

It's been a right proper minute since our latest cliffie, no? [insert no good, dirty rotten grin here]

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 77

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

As they made their way out of the vault hallway, through the lobby and towards the manager's office, Dean could feel the grumpy tension pouring off Ronald in waves. Eventually, he bit the bullet he wanted absolutely nothing to do with, and started talking. "Look, I get you're pissed-"

"You lied." Oh yeah, the pout was in full swing. Like arguing with a child. Dean resisted sighing, but pretty much failed.

"Okay, first, even if we were FBI, Ronald, they lie too. You know that, right?" The grumpy tension turned to grumpy silence, but Dean would take it as a win all the same. He pushed open the door to the office, gesturing Ronald inside. "Besides, what were we supposed to tell you, huh? We're brothers who drive around the country hunting monsters? You'd have called us as crazy as everyone was calling you."

The larger man frowned back at him, half turned as he walked into the office. "You keep saying that - monsters What do you mean, monst-"

His question turned into a startled squawk mid-word as Ronald's foot connected with the pile of skin and goo that was the whole point of bringing him back here. The conspiracy theorist managed to keep his footing, but just barely, and only after an awkward half-split and a hand to the floor to balance himself.

A hand that landed smack dab in the middle of said skin-goo.

Ronald recoiled immediately, almost falling over once again, this time to the side. Once he had his balanace again, he lifted his hand up to his face with saucer-sized eyes, fingers spread wide. He stared in horror at the slime looping from digit to digit and stretching back down to the similar pile below.

Then he screamed. Dean popped a finger in his ear almost nonchallantly, having expected at least half of that reactiong and turning his head away from the noise. Ronald scrambled back onto his butt, shaking his hand furiously to free it of the skin-goo. Dean took a step back to avoid the spray as Ronald leveled his letter opener right at the pile of harmless shifter leftovers (like that was gonna do a thing).

"Wh-Wh-What the hell is that?!"

"That would be what we're hunting," Dean answered, calming walking up to the pile and crouching down in front of it. He, of course, had known it was there from the last search of this office. And he'd been prepared to warn Ronald, had the man been paying any attention.

"The mandroid is…a pile of muck?" Ronald looked up at him, unsure, as he wiped what was left of the shifter's skin on his hand hastily.

"No, the 'mandroid' is a shapeshifter. It ditched it's skin – the bank manager's skin – when it realized we were onto him." No thanks to you, Dean wanted to add but resisted. Sam had antagonized their tag-along enough, and Dean might actually need Ronald's help by the end of the night if their luck continued at its current level. "They shed their old skin and change into someone else through physical contact. So now it could be anybody in the bank."

Hesitantly, Ronald leaned forward, poking at the wad of good with the tip of the letter opener. He managed to snag a piece of skin, lifting it up into the dim emergency lighting. "It's so weird. So…lifelike."

"Because it is alive, Ronald," Dean muttered, reminding the man with a sparse glance that this wasn't a robot covered in skin. Ronald dropped the skin back into its goo with a disgusting glop. "A murderer - and a greedy one at that, given it's using its abilities to rob banks and jewelry stores - but not all that different from a human. Just as killable."

"And…silver will do the trick?" The larger man was looking at his borrowed blade, then glanced up at Dean. The hunter shared a half-smile. In another life – maybe this life – Ronald would make a halfway decent hunter. He caught on fast. So long as he didn't get himself killed with that charge-in-first heroism and stubborn levels of hard-headedness.

(Not that Dean would know anything about that.)

"Sure will. Now come on, let's go find it." Dean stood, Ronald scrambling to follow. The two were making their way towards the office door, only a scant few feet away, when a creaking moan stopped them. Dean glanced over his shoulder, first at Ronald, but then past him. Green eyes slowly tracked upward to the source of the sound as it happened again. It was coming from the ceiling.

"What's that, you think?" Ronald asked. Instead of waiting for an answer, though, he started towards the spot the noise was coming for.

"Wait, hang on a sec." Dean was getting another bout of déjà vu, and this time he was pretty sure what was causing it. The shifter had hidden the body somewhere, he just hadn't wasted time trying to find it. And good thing, too. He was pretty sure it was about to find them…the same way it had last time. "Ronald-"

The man let out his second scream of the evening as a body broke through the cheap suspended ceiling tiles and crashed down practically on top of him. Ronald managed not to go down beneath the body, but he certainly acted as a partial landing pad.

The naked, fit, dark-skinned man hit the ground with a thud and a quarter roll that left him face up on the ground. Ronald was shakily pointing his letter opener at the corpose once more, having scrambled a couple steps back after taking at least a hundred-eighty pound corpse to the shoulder and shoving him off. Dean hurried over, dread growing as he got a good look at their latest victim.

"Son of a bitch," he muttered, immediately recognizing the man, even without the intense gaze. Michael, the guy in the vault who'd helped him carry the security guard out and left him worried he was going to have to shoot a human in a non-vital limb. The very same man he'd caught a partial of on the security cameras, only the pixelated quality had been too shit to make the obvious match. "He was in the vault."

Ronald frowned, looking back at the hunter and lowering his 'weapon' as he realized the guy wasn't getting up. "But…I thought you said you tested them all with silver. That's how you knew the guard wasn't the mandroid- I mean, shifter."

"Yeah, we did." Which meant the shifter had found a way to sneak in. Even the alpha shifter had been reactive to silver, so Dean knew there wasn't a way otherwise. But how? Sam and Ronald had kept the vault door under constant guard for that reason-

Dean closed his eyes with a muttered curse. The fight. The two of them had been fighting, way up by the hallway entrance, right after the lights shut off. Then Dean had joined and dragged them even further away. He'd done it to keep the hostages from over-hearing the argument, but damnit…he'd opened up the door for the damn shifter to sneak right in, posing as a terrified hostage who'd initially escaped but decided he had better odds with the others.

God damn it.

"Well…that's a good thing!" Ronald exclaimed with a bright smile. "Now we know what he looks like and where he is!"

"No, not good, Ronald," Dean interrupted sharply – probably more sharply than the man deserved. He let out a haggard sigh. He was tired and on edge, and dealing with a noob in those conditions was never easy or pretty. Still, it wasn't Ronald's fault. If anything, this was on Dean. "If he's in the vault, he has hostages."

"I thought…we had the…" The man frowned, tilting his head as he thought it through. Yeah, Ronald had the gusto to be a hunter, but he'd need a hell of a lot of practice and someone to keep him alive long enough to become a good one. His eyes widened as he caught on, though. "Oh. You mean he could hurt the others in there with him."

"Yeah," Dean sighed, standing up straight and turning away from the dead body below, "that's exactly what I mean."

He checked his watch for the time. Thirty minutes left if Henriksen was on a fast jet. An hour if the FBI hadn't splurged on a speedy ride. That wasn't much time to figure out how to isolate the shifter from the other hostages and take him out. Shit.

"Come on, we gotta get back to Sam." Dean hoofed it back into the hallway, Ronald following behind with a tight grip on that letter opener. The older Winchester wasn't too worried about his brother. It was unlikely the shifter would attack at this stage, not if he thought he'd gotten away with his innocent-hostage deception and might make it out of the bank with the other civilians. Besides, Sam could handle himself. Even wimpy 2007 Sam (who was, admittedly, less wimpy with every passing day.)

No, Dean needed to get back to Sam because he needed the real brains of this operation. They had to figure out how to get the shifter away from the other hostages without tipping him off that they were on to him. Piece of cake. Sure.

-o-o-o-

In the end, after several minutes of hushed debate (too many minutes, given their ever dwindling time) held as a group at the end of the vault hallway (closer this time, and always with at least one eye on the door so there'd be no more surprises), the hunters and their tagalong decided to take the civilians out in groups of four. They'd start with the women, so they would know their shifter would be at the back of the group, with less hostages to potentially take. And if he bolted in his group, he'd only have three potential victims. It was the best they could do to limit the possible collateral damage without tipping their monster off before they could get in a position to kill him.

They'd test each group (even though it was highly unlikely the shifter could manage to change skins in a tiny room crowded full of people and not cause a massive freak out, Dean wasn't taking any more risks), then lock them in the conference rooms and offices that lined the lobby. That was the best option for keeping as many civilians as possible out of the way of the shifter should he bolt or fight, and out of the way of the police when they came storming in (in…Dean checked his watch again. Eight minutes at the fastest, and Dean sure hoped Agent Henriksen wasn't feeling particularly rushed tonight).

It was a win-win, or as much of one as the Winchesters could hope to get.

The toughest part of all of this would be not giving the ploy away to the shifter. Which meant little to no eye contact. Something that was never easy when you were a hunter and you knew there was a monster in the room, just itching to hurt somebody or escape. If Dean was reading this particular shifter correctly – and given the fact he'd willingly put himself in view of the hunters but also surrounded himself with potential hostages – this guy knew how hunters worked. Knew how much they cared about civilian casualties.

Sam and Dean would be on the front lines. The primary contact with all the groups. Dean, armed with their one and only silver knife, would go in, select the four hostages, and escort them into the hallway. Sam would stand guard at the vault door with Betsy. Bullets wouldn't kill the shifter, but they could slow him down enough to stop him from grabbing a hostage. Or deter him from trying all together. If the shifter didn't try anything, they'd close the vault door, test the group quickly with the flat side of the silver blade, and then escort them to the nearest lockable room.

In the event that their monster did try something, Ronald was their last line of defense. He'd man the mouth of the hallway. If the shifter got past Dean or Sam, it would be Ronald's job to take him down with the letter opener. It wasn't a great backup plan, as far as backup plans went, but it was what they had. Dean was far more optimistic about it than Sam.

(And while Sam was usually right about most things…Dean really hoped this wouldn't be one of them.)

So the two Winchesters approached the sealed vault door with a single decisive look shared between them, and then Sam pulled it open and Dean entered, knife visibly in hand. The older Winchester tried not to take it personally as the hostages backed away from him, hushed whispers and gasps and fearful murmurs the only sound in the small vault.

"Alright, people," he announced in a clear, firm voice, only having to clear his throat once when his voice tried to falter at the looks of fear that surrounded him. "We're going to be taking you out in small groups, four at a time-"

"Are you letting us go?" one woman asked, and Dean belatedly realized it was Ms. Bubblegum, who had first taken them to see the security guard. He tried to ignore the fact that from her point of view, he'd lied his way in to hold her and her coworkers hostage. He tried to focus on his job, without glancing at the shifter in the back.

"Uh," Dean had to clear his throat again. "In a minute. We're going in small groups, and we'll get you out of the vault for now, then, uh, we'll escort one group at a time out of the bank."

He knew it hardly sounded convincing, given he'd made it up entirely on the fly, but Ms. Bubblegum and several others sure looked relieved. The shifter, as Dean glanced quickly his way and back again just as fast, didn't look sold.

Dean swallowed, lifted the knife as a way to point to the four women closest to him (there were only five women total, with another six men after that, including their shifter), and told them to go out into the hallway one at a time, and stand single file. They did so reluctantly, giving Dean a wide berth and Sam, standing at the door with the assault rifle, as much room as possible in the small space.

The older Winchester kept a sharp eye on the remaining civilians, trying not to pay their monster any more attention than the rest. "We'll, uh, we'll be back for the next group shortly."

He backed out of the vault, not turning his back on the shifter, and let Sam close the door after him. Dean let out a breath, catching his brother's eye before glancing at the four nervous women lined up between them and Ronald.

"One down."

-o-o-o-

Victor stepped down from the helicopter that landed a block from the bank, wind whipping at his FBI vest. The copter lifted off, disappearing into the night, as he and the other agent they'd sent with him – some mousey, bespectacled man he hadn't bothered to get the name of - jogged towards the crowd of officers gathered across the street from the bank. He flashed his badge at the first cop who tried to stop him, and the second didn't even bother as he hastened up the steps to the mobile base of operations, opening the door without bothering to knock.

"Lieutenant Robards," Henriksen announced, making what would be a question coming out of anyone else's mouth sound more like a command.

"Oh great," the man in question – yet to identify himself but definitely in charge given the pissy expression and shit-eye he was spearing Henriksen's way – muttered under his breath. He blew out a breath, hands on his hips, before he turned to the FBI agent. "Yeah?"

"Special Agent Henriksen," Victor introduced himself without really caring if the local LEO remembered it or not.

"The guy our suspect asked for." Robards sounded less than impressed. More annoyed than anything. Victor knew he was throwing his non-existent weight around in retaliation, knowing he'd already lost this case to the feds. "Let me guess. You're lead dog now, but you would just love my full cooperation."

Henriksen plastered on a peaceful, cooperative expression. One he was well known for in the home office. The one that said he didn't give a shit, because he knew he was in charge. "I don't give a rat's ass what you do. You can go get a donut and bang your wife for all I care. What I do need is your S.W.A.T team locked and loaded, ready to breach in five, and the rest of your men canvasing a five block radius looking for a black, '67 Chevy Impala. You got that?"

Robards pulled his head back, brow furled in clear annoyance and bemusement. "You want to send S.W.A.T. in without even trying to talk the guy down? And meanwhile, what, waste my men looking for a car? Listen, Agent, I don't know who you think you are or what you've been told-"

"No, you listen," Henriksen cut off the Lieutenant, done wasting time talking to the man who was, in his opinion, now inconsequential. "You have no idea what you're dealing with, do you? There is a monster in that bank, Lieutenant. Now prep your men to go in and find me that damn car."

"This is crazy. You're crazy."

"Nah, Robards." Henriksen unzipped his jacket and grabbed the nearest phone, confident it would connect him to the bank and, consequently, Dean Winchester. "Crazy's in that bank, and I'm about to have a conversation with it."

-o-o-o-

"They're going to kill us."

The shifter wasted no time trying to counter whatever the hunters were up to on the other side of that vault door. He turned to the humans around him, face dark but determined.

The tense silence that filled the small, stuffy vault didn't disagree. Nor did the panicked mumrering that came after. Still, the last of the female bank employees, the one who had earlier urged what she thought was her friend back into the vault, hissed out a gasp of air.

"Don't say that, Michael!"

He cast her a dismissive glance, tired of playing at one or more of her coworkers. He wanted out of this vault, and he didn't care if this bitch thought he was acting 'out of character' for Michael. Whoever that fool was.

"They're going to kill us," he repeated more firmly. "Why do you think they're taking us out in small groups? We're more manageable that way."

"It's still four against three," one of the other men – an older customer of the bank – muttered. "If they wanted to kill us, why not take us out of here one at a time? Why risk being outnumbered?"

"Outnumbered? Please, they have all the weapons!" Another man argued back, and the shifter focused on him. He sounded liked he might help charge the hunters and, if 'Michael' could rile him up enough, he might take the first bullet or knife, giving the shifter the chance to get past or take out a hunter.

"We should charge them," Michael said, waiting until he got a nod of agreement from the aggressive human before looking at the others. "You said it yourself, we outnumber them. Weapons or not, we could stop this before they kill us."

"And what if they are planning on letting us go?" that same woman argued, hugging herself like the pathetic human she was. "We could get ourselves – any one of us – killed, and for nothing!"

"I know a lie when I hear one," the shifter countered. It didn't matter if the lie had only been meant for him. If he wasn't walking out of this bank, than neither were any of the humans in there with him. And, with a little luck, none of the hunters would walk out of here alive, either. "They're going to kill us. This is our only shot."

"I agree," the human male nodded firmly. He reached up to his breast pocket, removing a ballpoint pen and uncapping it. He made a jabbing motion with it, locking eyes with the shifter he so wrongly assumed was on his side. "It's not much, but just about anything can be a weapon when you need it to be. When they come back in, we charge them."

"No, not me." The female was shaking her head, staring at that ballpoint pen in true horror. "You want to fight them, you let me go in the next group first."

"Me too," the older man spoke up. He was maybe in his fifties, possibly sixties, and he was shaking his head solemnly. "I want no part of this. I plan to cooperate."

"Cowards, the both of you," the shifter hissed, letting a little too much of his lack of humanity shine through, perhaps. Several of the others shuffled away from him or shifted their weight nervously. He gave a frustrated sigh, but relented. "It's your funeral. But fine, walk headlong into it.'

He gestured for the vault door just as the lock once more began to rotate.

-o-o-o-

When Dean opened the door to grab the next group, the tension that greeted him was noticeably thicker. And that's what sent it to hell in a handbasket, he figured. Because even with all the mantras and determination in the world, a room that tense raised every hair on the hunter's skin, and his eyes darted right to the shifter. And then stayed on him for way too long.

"I-I'd like to go in the next group," the last of the women, a young, cute blonde who looked vaguely familiar to Dean's déjà vu, stepped forward. Just as Dean turned his head, eyes still locked on the shifter, to address the poor, scared girl, a phone started to ring in the hallway, signaling a call from the police. More importantly, it startled everyone and pulled Dean's attention away from the hostages.

The shifter didn't hesitate.

Before anyone could make sense of the sudden movement, the shifter had surged forward, ripping the pen out of his potential ally's hand, and stabbing it right into the same human's neck. The man started to cry out in surprise, more from the sudden movement and aggression than the thievery, only to be cut short in a gurgling mess of bubbling and squirting blood.

The woman who'd so nervously asked to be next to leave let out a blood-curdling scream. Dean pushed past her to do something – be it tackle the shifter or help the bleeding innocent – but the shifter intercepted him. The two slammed into one of the walls of safety deposit boxes, and Dean's silver blade went skittering across the floor towards the vault door. He wrapped one hand around the shifter's no-longer pristine work shirt, the other catching the monster's wrist as he tried to murder Dean with a friggin' pen of all things.

Sam's first instinct – to shoot the monster who'd probably just taken yet another life and was currently trying to add to that count with the oldest Winchester – was thrown out the window by the chaos of the vault. There were too many innocents that could easily get in the way (including Dean), especially with the overkill that was Betsy. They had hoped to get down to the last group before the shifter made his move, so there'd be less people in harm's way if it came down to a shootout. So much for that plan.

The younger hunter swore as his brother and the shifter grappled against the wall, slamming limbs and heads into the metal boxes with painful, loud bangs. Sam tucked the strap on the gun back over his shoulder, shoving the weapon towards his back, and instead darted into the chaos, in the direction of the choking civilian, still gripping his bleeding neck. Another man – older, probably mid-fifties with wrinkles around his steadfast, determined eyes – had caught the injured bank employee, and was desperately trying to get pressure on the wound.

"Move your hands, son," he murmured to the injured man, voice reasonably calm despite the chaos around him. A veteran, no doubt. Sam slid to his knees beside him, adding his own to the cause by pulling the bleeding guy's hands away from the wound. The older man clamped down and clamped down hard.

Given the amount of blood coming from his neck – impressive but not as much of a spurting fountain as Sam had seen before – the shifter had intentionally wounded the guy instead of going for the kill. A good distraction to occupy a hunter, Sam thought, uselessly. Not like he was going to change his course of action now. This man could be saved, if he got medical attention immediately.

A sharp grunt, the sound of flesh hitting flesh, and a heavy thud drew Sam's attention back to his brother. Dean was laid out on the floor, clearly still conscious but dazed. The shifter didn't waste the opportunity his punch had afforded him. He leapt over the downed hunter and burst out the vault door, knocking into the blonde woman - who'd been trying to sneak out the vault door - hard enough to bounce her head off the wall. She hit the ground as a pile of dead weight.

"Hey!" Ronald's cry could be heard from the hallway, a lot closer to the vault then he had been before. He must have been coming to help.

"Damnit," Sam muttered, knowing the ex-security guard, for all his good intentions and letter opener, wasn't ready for a full-fledged fight against a monster whose strength he couldn't comprehend.

"Ronald!" Dean called out, best he could while still shaking off that punch. He climbed to his feet using the wall of security boxes for balance even as the shifter overtook the larger man in the hallway, thankfully just shoving past. Ronald wasn't hard to knock off balance, though he recovered a hell of a lost faster than the shifter – or Dean – had given him credit for. "Ronald, no!"

"Get back here!" Ronald yelled, stumbling back to two feet after hitting the hallway wall. The shifter was fast, already down the length of the hallway, but Ronald was determined. He took off after the monster.

"Not again," Dean muttered, loud enough for Sam to hear. He shoved off the wall, propelling himself out of the vault and after the pair.

"Dean!" Sam called after his brother to no avail. The two civilians left conscience and unharmed in the chaos fled out the door as well, risking the opportunity to escape. Damnit! The younger Winchester wasn't an idiot – Dean had told him how this all played out and they looked to be walking – no, running – right into the same end result as last time. Which meant Ronald was about to die and Dean was going to do something incredibly stupid to stop it from happening. Damn it, damn it, damnit!

Sam turned back to the older gentleman beside him, who was still trying to save the slowly dying man in their arms. "Keep pressure on the wound and stay in the vault. You're safest in here, and the cops will be here soon."

Of that, Sam had very, very little doubt.

Scrambling back to his feet, the younger hunter took off after his idiotically heroic brother and their idiotically heroic tagalong, picking up the discarded silver knife as he ran for the hallway. He hoped to change what he knew was coming and, well, if he couldn't…maybe he could at least save his brother from a suicide run.

As he took off after Dean, he ignored the phone, hanging on the wall at the end of the hallway, still ringing.

-o-o-o-

Dean ran out of the vault like his life – and Ronald's life – depended on it. (Because, at least for Ronald, it friggin' did). This was exactly what had happened last time, damnit, as Dean ran into the lobby – darkened but for patches of bright, spotlight-streaked floor coming from the upper windows – he'd be damned if he let it happen again. Damned if he let Ronald run into one of those friggin' spotlights only to get shot through the back. Not this time. Not on his watch.

"Stay out of the light, Ronald! Damnit, stop!"

Ron hit the lobby floor, either unhearing or unheeding as he ran through the first beam, fist still tight around that damn letter opener as he chased after their monster. Dean doubled his speed. It didn't matter what happened once he caught up to the larger man – and at the breakneck, full tilt speed he was going, it wasn't going to be pretty – just that he caught up to him before that sniper did.

He couldn't help glancing between the upper windows – where he knew the shot would come from – and Ronald as he closed in on the heavier man. They had seconds, if that, and Dean didn't know if he'd make it. The shifter was on the far side of the lobby now, disappearing into the darkened tunnel that was the hallway to the manager's office. But the escaping monster was a secondary problem. Keeping Ronald alive came first.

"Dean!"

Sam's strained voice echoed across the lobby, bouncing off the high ceilings and marble-plated walls. Dean didn't stop, didn't slow down. Either unhearing or unheeding, he thought. Ironic. Instead, with only feet to go and absolutely no time left to close that distance, he tackled Ronald with dual grunts, giving up none of the momentum that had carried him lightning-fast across the darkened lobby and into the light.

One of the upper windows broke with a singular crack. Two bodies hit the floor but not before a sniper's bullet tore through one of them.

-o-o-o-

Victor frowned as the phone rang and rang and continued to ring without answer.

With Dean's insistence that he call once he landed, Henriksen had expected the pick-up to be prompt. Another Winchester ploy, most likely. The special agent frowned, considering his next move – the car was still his best bet; Dean was unlikely to leave without it – and reached over to set the phone back in its cradle. He didn't quite make it before all hell broke loose.

"Shots fired, shots fired!" yelled one officer sitting at a command module, a headset covering one ear and hand pressed to it. The radios around the multitude of cops in the small room burst to life, relaying similar information.

"What the-" Lieutenant Robards started towards the first officer to speak. Henriksen, phone abandoned beside it's empty cradle, went to follow – intent to reclaim control and get these people to calm down and report – when another voice spoke from the other end of the mobile unit.

"Confirmed sniper hit!" that officer called, turning to look at Robards, but finding Agent Henriksen staring him down instead.

"Report. Now," the agent insisted, the order leaving no room for discussion. "Who shot who, officer?"

"Uh…" The cop glanced at his lieutenant, who was standing just behind the agent and looking for all the world like he wanted that answer as well, regardless of who was asking it.

"One of our snipers had a shot," a third officer took over, more composed than her colleague. She was also wearing a headset, sitting at the last station in front of several screens showing the bank, security footage, and several media outlets reporting on the robbery. "They took it. Confirmed hit, fatality uncertain, but one of the perps is down."

Henriksen spun on Robards, eyes fierce. "We go in now, Lieutenant."

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: A proper cliffy this time, as I don't think I left much in the way of clues on who got hit or how bad. Don't worry, I'm sure it's just a flesh wound! ;)

Deleted Scene: I had a fun little exchange written down a long time ago, before the chapter kinda wrote itself and went in a slightly different direction, where Ronald was all mad about the not-FBI thing, but ended up realizing something. It didn't end up fitting into this version, but it's too good not to let you all have :D

Ronald: Hey, wait a second...if you're not FBI, how- how did you know all that stuff about me?

Dean and Sam: exchange looks We're psychic.

Ronald: Yeah right. Um...okay...so...you're crazy.

Dean: waving Betsy around in the middle of a bank they took hostage Really? Really, Ronald? Armed Robbery, Mandroids, no problem, you don't even blink. But Psychics? That's where you draw the line?!

XD

Next Up: Aaaaah, I don't think I can say anything without giving too much away. So...er...things happen! In...a particular order! And...some of them are good, and some of them are bad. And some of them are funny!

Happy New Year everyone!

Cheers,

Silence

Chapter 112: Season 2: Chapter 78

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Holy crap did I struggle to get this one out. Not writing it, but editing! What the craaaaaaaaaap. I had all weekend and several calendar reminders and every day was just….ugh, I'll do it later. Anyhoo, sorry it was late, ladies and gents! Hope you enjoy the conclusion to our (of course) three chapter long bank episode (because nothing can ever be shorter than three chapters).

Quality Warning: So I did manage a full read through and lots of edits, but given my mood the entire time and the thick lines in the carpet from me dragging my feet, I have serious doubts about the quality of said edits. Please forgive any errors and I apologize for the interuption they may bring to the story.

Chapter Warnings: Some blood, some near death, some freaking out, some smoke, some barking, some laughing, and some serious Deus Ex Machina rescues going on (I think we can blame Chuck for that one). Oh, and some love from our new favorite dog!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 78

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

'Cas?'

Dean was aware of someone grabbing his ankles and dragging him across the floor, but it was a distant sort of awareness. The kind that says, 'sure, this is happening to us, but really…do we care?' And the answer to that was no. Not really. All of his care was currently taken up by his shoulder and chest, which were on fucking fire.

'Cas!'

"Owwww, fuck. Fuck, shit, shit, shit, fuuuuck," he groaned once Sam had stopped pulling him across the lobby floor and his jaw unhinged itself from the death grip pain had on it. His brother rolled him onto his back and that jaw went right back to clenching around every swear word in the book as the hard, unforgiving lobby tile jostled his entire upper torso and, oh yeah, bullet hole.

Sam frantically searched his brother for the wound that had left a trail of red gleaming over polished tile as he'd dragged him. Dean was clutching at his left shoulder, fingers digging in to cloth soaked red, his knuckles white. The wound was way too close to his heart, just a couple inches up and to the left, and Sam's own dropped into his stomach once he found it.

"Oh god," the younger Winchester whispered at the bloody mess that was his brother's chest. There was a small but gaping hole in Dean's torso, and it was gushing blood out in raging rivulets that Dean's fingers were doing nothing to stunt. Sam could feel the color draining out of him, matching Dean's pallor for entirely different reasons. "Oh god, Dean."

The older Winchester raised his head at his brother's whispered words, eyes bleary and half closed. He stared down at his own blood-covered hand and soaked chest, only to drop back with a thud and a groan. "That's- that's a lot of blood."

Sam's brain – momentarily stalled by shock and 'Dean's going to die' and also 'Again' – kicked into survival mode. He tore his arms out of the security uniform he was still wearing, desperate to get to the flannel he had on beneath. Shrugging the long-sleeved shirt off, Sam balled it up, shoved Dean's hand out of the way with no extra time to be gentle, and pushed down hard.

Dean gurgled and grunted and groaned another set of swear words to make even a sailor blush, but he managed not to scream. He knew it needed to be done if he was gonna live through this (and he was significantly concerned about that bit. He was losing a lot of blood and the cold seeping through his body felt terrifyingly familiar).

"Okay…" the older Winchester shut his eyes against the pain and tried to reason with a brain that seemed to be shutting down inconveniently quickly. "T-time for plan, uh…E. Are we on E?" He let out a hiss as Sam shifted, applying as much pressure as he could which was painful, damnit. "Tell me you have a plan E."

The look on his brother's face – as close to panic as Sam was ever prone to get – was answer enough, and that answer was a resounding no. Dean tried to look around the bank for something, anything, even though turning his head pulled at the wound, and wasn't that just peachy? "Wh-where's Ronald? What hap-happened to…"

Sam looked irritated at the question (and he absolutely would be annoyed – infuriated even – if he wasn't busy trying to keep his idiotic brother alive), but glanced back to the center of the lobby where he'd dragged Dean from. Next to a puddle of fresh red, Ronald was unmoving, stomach down on the tiles, upper body cast in the light from the windows.

His eyes were open wide, staring.

Dean met those big eyes – bulging and all but frozen in shock – and almost collapsed at the life in them. Those terrified, confused, oh-god-oh-god-I-almost-just-died, but very much alive eyes.

"Fucking finally," the hunter muttered, all but going limp against the cold, blood-slicked floor. "A win."

"Yeah, maybe don't celebrate just yet," Sam grunted right back, still applying the full weight of his upper body to his brother's wound. The blood just kept seeping through. Dean's head was listing to the side and Sam knew he was losing him, for all that he refused to admit it. "We still have to get out of here."

Which was looking less and less likely. Sam was holding back the panic but he knew – he knew – that wound was fatal. Even if they surrendered themselves to the cops, no medic was going to be able to save Dean now.

Shit. Shit!

"C-Cas can get us out," Dean mumbled like it was the most obvious answer in the world, belied only by slur starting to effect his words. Sam purposefully jostled his brother as he pushed just that much harder. The older Winchester groaned, but those slowly drooping eyes popped back open with momentary awareness. His fingers fumbled near his hip like he was trying to dig out his phone. "J-just gotta call him."

"Cas is still healing," Sam growled back, but there was little heat. Just desperation. "She can't help, Dean."

"Oh." Dean blinked, and it took half a second too long for his eyelids to open again. Just like it took his brain a good half a minute too long to process his brother's words. "Shit."

Ron shifted, his expression (which was definitely shock along with a healthy dose of fear) slowly changing with the realization that he should try to help. As he started to rise, Sam sent him a fierce glare, barking, "Don't get up, you idiot! Stay low, and get out of the light."

The man froze, then glanced around him, realizing the light from the windows is what had given him away to the sniper. A sniper that had taken out Dean instead. Ronald swallowed roughly, his eyes already as wide as they could go, feeling the shaky shock of mortality racing through him faster than the adrenaline, but nodded hastily. He started inching his way out of the light like a wiggling worm. It took a couple minutes, but he was able to clear the line-of-sight from the windows and climb to his knees. He stayed mostly still, crouched in the shadow cast by one of the standing counters.

"Is…is he going to be okay?" Ron asked, voice hushed and trembling. His eyes remained wide as saucers, locked on the groaning older Winchester.

"I don't know," Sam responded desperately, even though he knew the answer to that question. It wasn't one he was prepared to accept yet, though.

"Th-they're gonna come in here. The c-cops," Dean muttered, his words becoming breathy and labored in an entirely un-encouraging manner. "You g-guys gotta go."

"Shut up, Dean."

"It'll be 'kay, S'mmy," the older Winchester whispered, and Sam refused to acknowledge the wetness in his eyes at his brother's tone. He wasn't losing him again. Not again. "C-Cas'll bring me back."

At least, Dean sure hoped the angel would be up for a rescue run to Heaven once she woke up. Dean could probably help, up there as a soul. At least once he figured out he was in a memory again. The actuality of a rescue was probably a lot more complex than the concept, but Dean's ability to think beyond 'ow, ow, and more ow' was kinda fading.

"Man, I r-really wasn' plannin' on dyin' ag-gain anytime s-soon," Dean groaned in one long, mumbled breath. Next to the counter, Ronald had a cute little frown pulling at his brow, made far less cute by those saucer-sized eyes. He was mouthing the word, 'Again?' and somewhere in the back of his mind, past the blood and the leaching exhaustion, Dean thought that was funny. "'Sp-specially not from 'nother frig-friggin' b-bullet."

"Shut up, Dean!" the younger Winchester growled, repeating himself almost on rote as he looked around desperately for a Hail Mary. An exit, a miracle, something they hadn't thought of. But there was nothing. Nothing! And Sam was starting to feel the true panic creep in. "You're not going to die."

The look Dean gave him was a little bit sad, but mostly sardonic. And yeah, shit, this wasn't looking good, Sam could admit. But his brother could be helping.

"'M helpin'," Dean mumbled back, and Sam hadn't realized he'd spoken aloud. His brother's eyes had fallen closed, and something deep down – something desperate and terrified that he often kept locked away – told Sam they wouldn't open again. "Callin' C-Cas. L-let him…uh, her... Let her know…to come get…me."

By the end, Dean was almost unintelligible, the words so slurred together and quiet. Dean's eyes stayed closed and, while his chest was still rising and falling, he fell too still. Too calm and peaceful. Dean Winchester was never at peace, and the thought terrified Sam.

"Damnit, Dean, you have to stay awake!" Sam yelled frantically, even as he took one hand off his brother's wound, soaked in blood, and scrambled for his own cell. He left bloody, smeared fingerprints on the buttons as he speed-dialed the number they'd gotten Cas after the fiasco with Gordon. They hadn't had time to teach her how to use it – she'd pretty much passed out the minute they made it to Bobby's – but the old hunter promised he'd keep it by her bedside. Just in case.

It took several attempts, between his trembling fingers and the slippery blood coating each button he pushed, to find Castiel among his contacts before he was pressing the phone desperately to his ear.

It rang, and rang, and rang, long past the point it should have switched over to voicemail. Distantly, Sam realized they'd never set it up for the angel.

The younger Winchester cried out in frustration and futility, letting the phone slip through his numb fingers to clatter on the floor. Then suddenly Ronald was freaking out, glass was shattering in the distance, and muffled shouts of police officers identifying themselves all erupted at once. There was a scream from far away. Probably one of the civilians that had run from the vault, yelling for someone not to shoot.

"What the-" Ronald tried to scrambled back, away from Sam and Dean, but there was nowhere to go against the counter. "Wh-Where did you come from?!"

"Move, Sam."

Sam looked up even as heavy feet pounded down the stairs to the lobby and from the hallways that led to the back offices and alleyway exit. No doubt the police he'd promised their 'hostages' were on the way. Five minutes ago that had been a major concern. Five seconds ago it had been a resigned reality. But now…now…

"Cas," Sam breathed out, starting up at the angel in all her righteous, Warrior of God fury, tan peacoat and pantsuit. Two fingers pressed to his forehead, another hand sliding over Dean's wound as Sam stiltedly pulled his own away.

Then they were no longer in the bank.

They landed hard, or maybe it was an illusion of a hard landing that came with the adrenaline of Angel Air and the knowledge that Dean was seconds away from death yet again. Well, that, plus the chaos they'd landed in the middle of sure wasn't helping.

There was a dog barking close by – loud and scary and way too close for comfort – and Bobby hollering, his heavy footsteps pounding down the hall. Sam knew, instinctually, that they were in the den. They always landed in Bobby's den when Cas angel-aired them to safety. The dog was new, though.

Things got infinitely worse when Castiel disappeared in the next second, only to return with a positively freaking out Ronald. He was screaming in that kind of what-the-hell-just-happened manner, which definitely wasn't helping the dog barking in the not-so-distant background (in that extra fierce kind of way that you just knew meant you were about to get chomped on). Sam managed to shove all of that to the side and scrambled back to his brother's side. It was panic and instinct more than logic, especially considering Castiel's presence kneeling right beside them. Sam's knew, subconsciously at the very least, that the angel would have healed his brother. She must have. When his fingers found no torn cloth, no slick but cooling blood, no life-threatening wound, he almost collapsed atop Dean. His brother's chest was heaving with all the strength and surety of a healthy, twenty-eight year old man.

"Thank God," Sam whispered. The younger Winchester closed his eyes, shutting out the chaos, the adrenaline and fear, and the sight of his brother, wide-eyed and still recovering from the near miss.

"Son of a bitch," the older Winchester muttered, hand pressed to his perfectly fine chest. His let his head thunk back to the floor of Bobby's living room as his body went limp, all that pain and tension suddenly gone. Sam could relate, sagging back onto his heels, struggling just to breathe normally in the wake of an adrenaline crash.

Ronald, on the other hand, seemed to be ratcheting up in anxiety.

"How are we…where are…but we were in the….what is happening?" The larger man spun around, eyes wide as he tried to take in Bobby Singer's house but likely saw none of it. "Did…did we just teleport?"

As his voice continued to climb in volume, Cas spun on her crouched knee, gracefully standing in one swift move, trench coat swirling, and pressed those two fingers to the man's head. He went down with a hefty thud that shook Bobby's bookcases. Then the angel turned once more, fierce blue eyes locked, this time, on the German Shephard still barking ferociously at them from the hall. It fell silent with a reproachful whimper.

"What the hell is going on here?" Bobby came charging in, still in his pajamas but shotgun in hand. He straightened, pulling the butt of the gun away from its braced position against his shoulder when he spotted the newest round of houseguests. He glared first at the not-so-comatose angel currently having a staring contest with his dog, then shifted his eyes to the Winchesters and the newest blood stain on his rug. Bobby lowered the shotgun with a look the entire household was coming to expect any time their resident angel wasn't upstairs on life support. "Balls."

Sam, on the other hand, was looking between him and the German Shepherd with wide eyes and a confused frown, brown hair flopping over his forehead. "When did you get a dog?"

Bobby huffed, sharing a look with the dog which was very much returned. Dean had the audacity to look insulted. Still not the oddest thing to happen that night, not by a long shot, Sam figured. The old hunter, meanwhile, finally relaxed and set the shotgun against the wall. Dean was clearly no longer dying if those were the first words out of Sam Winchester's mouth. Damnit. What did a man have to do to get one good night's sleep in his own friggin' house these days?

"Cas," Dean interrupted, still a touch breathless (which left Sam frowning and visually inspecting him for any remaining injury, to which his brother gave him a look). The angel knelt beside the hunter, who hadn't attempted to get up from the ground any further than bracing on his elbows. "There's a shifter, in the bank. You gotta find him before he escapes."

Castiel nodded with all the intent and seriousness of a Warrior of God. She stood, prepared to take flight, but was stopped by a hand wrapping around her wrist. She glanced down, noticing the warm slide of liquid, and realized Dean Winchester's hands were still coated in his own blood. Blue eyes slid over to Sam, noticing a similar state. With a frown and a blink, the Winchesters were properly restored. Neither seemed to notice, though that was hardly a concern to the angel.

"Baby," Dean muttered, offering a weak grin that was hardly convincing. Beside him, Sam's forehead immediately smoothed out and he hit his brother in the arm. The expression did not relent, even when Dean yelped and rubbed at the targeted limb. "What? She's one of us and you know it." He turned back to the angel. "She's parked, like, a block south of the bank, in a parking structure attached to one of the buildings. Grab her for me, will you?

Castiel looked about as annoyed as Sam. At least, she did to Dean. To everyone else they may have only imagined it on the angel's face, whose expression hardly shifted. But Castiel disappeared once more, leaving Dean's hand hanging empty in mid-air.

"Really, Dean?"

"What?" the older Winchester grunted, rubbing at his newly wound-less shoulder as he hauled himself to his feet. Sam offered an assist halfway and Dean took it gratefully, clasping his arm and heaving himself upwards. "She's going back for the shifter, she might as well get Baby too."

"Somebody want to tell me what the hell's going on?" Bobby asked, sarcasm turned all the way up, just like his eyebrows. The boys turned to him, one sheepish, the other trying to get away with a hundred watt smile that clearly wasn't cutting it.

"Uh, sure, Bobby. But seriously. When did you get a dog?"

-o-o-o-

Glass shards crunched and shifted beneath the feet of police and SWAT and federal agents alike as they cleared the rest of the bank, securing hostages that hadn't made it out on their own or were locked away in private offices. Victor Henriksen stood in the middle of the organized chaos, staring down at a puddle of red that a sniper swore – on his job, on his badge, on a bible, and so on – had come from one of their perps. He couldn't be sure which one, but that didn't really matter now, considering Victor was short two, possibly three perps, one with a life threatening wound. And no one could tell him how in hell's name those men got out of the building, right underneath the noses of half of Milwaukee's finest and a damn federal agent.

The radio in his hand crackled to life and Victor raised it to his lips without looking away from that damn puddle of blood. "Tell me you found something."

Lieutenant Robard's voice was hesitant. No more pleased to be bossed around by the federal agent than he had before this newest round of shit hit the fan. But Victor knew by the clench in his gut that it wasn't just that.

"My, uh…. My men found that car you wanted."

Victor turned sharply away from the puddle, already making his way for the front doors. "Where?"

"A parking garage a block south of here, but…uh…"

"Spit it out, Lieutenant."

"It's gone."

Henriksen stopped mid stride, frowning harshly. "What do you mean, gone? I told you to have your men sit on it!"

"They were," Robards bit back defensively. "I don't know what to tell you, agent. My men had eyes on the vehicle one second, and the next it was gone. They can't explain it."

"Are your men drunk?" Victor accused sharply, though he knew it was unlikely and probably unfair to put this failure squarely on the Milwaukee police. Nothing about the Winchester case ever came easy, and although he refused to believe those boys had outsmarted him, he also knew there was something he'd missed. Something that let them get away every damn time. Henriksen didn't know what – another partner, an inside man, something.

It made him furious just thinking about it. Certainly furious enough to take it out on the Milwaukee police.

"Listen here, Agent Henriksen," Robards barked back, clearly out of patience for being bullied about by the federal agent. "My men are good men. Good officers. You can talk to them yourself if you don't believe me, but that car is gone and security footage from the parking garage is going to back my men's story. I can tell you that."

Henriksen snorted, but didn't bother holding down the radio button for Robards to hear it. The lieutenant was probably right, but Victor didn't really care, and he certainly wasn't worried about wounding egos or making enemies. He had two monsters to catch, no matter the means or cost.

"It better, Lieutenant. And I will be talking to each of them. Separately. So bring them in and keep them apart. We'll see whose story holds up."

With that, he turned the radio off, resisting the urge to chuck it across the bank, and instead strode purposefully – angrily – out the front doors. How? How did the Winchesters keep slipping through his fingers, always leaving behind more questions than answers? Disappearing suspects – and not for the first time – and now disappearing cars?

Victor wanted to know just what the hell was going on. And how to put an end to it.

-o-o-o-

"Wait, Andy got you a dog?"

Dean's grin said it all – that hundred watt Winchester smile that was somehow charming as much as it was infuriating – and Bobby didn't miss a lick of it. His eyes narrowed at the boy, leaning against his desk like they hadn't just shown up in the middle of the night (again) half bleeding to death and scaring the crap out of his household.

"What are you grinning at?"

Which was apparently the wrong thing to say to wipe that smirk off Dean's face (something Bobby definitely should have expected). If anything, it only got more damn smug.

"Nothing, just, uh…it's kinda sweet."

The old hunter harrumphed. It might be a lot of things, but sweet wasn't one of 'em. "It's a pain in the ass, s'what it is."

Sam managed to stifle his disbelieving chuckle behind an incredibly poorly faked cough. He blamed his recent trauma, only minutes passed and still buzzing through his veins like something ugly. Dean, meanwhile, had a big smile on his face that was just about ready to split in two. Sam tried not to stare. Tried not to think too hard, either.

Bobby glared at them both as Dean's eyes dropped quite pointedly to the dog sitting obediently by the old man's side, long snout resting atop his thigh.

"Oh yeah," the older Winchester said, eyes switching from Sarge to Bobby with a pair of eyebrows that were gonna get him kicked out if he wasn't careful. "You're really suffering there."

Bobby glared, expression saying what he didn't bother to: Watch your tone in my house, boy.

Sam, who was struggling to hide the shaking of his shoulders right along with the laugh causing it, cleared his throat. He turned on the puppy eyes, and Bobby knew he'd just lost any ground he had in his own damn house. "For only having him a couple weeks, he seems really well trained, Bobby."

The younger Winchester's sincerity didn't go far in soothing Bobby's ruffled feathers – what ever did? – but he allowed the change of topic. Of course, he sent Dean a look that said he was allowing the distraction and damn well knew it (to which the insufferable kid just raised those eyebrows again and Bobby reconsidered changing the locks and warding the house against late night, winged visitors and her cargo).

"Sarge is a retired K-9 unit." Ignoring the fact that he was being watched by two nosy brats, Bobby gave the dog a pat on the head and a scratch behind the ears. "Already knows his commands, fully trained."

Sam's smile turned more genuine, less teasing-slash-overly-pleased-with-himself-because-he's-a-damn-Winchester-and-it-runs-in-their-blood. "And now he gets a cozy retirement."

"With another retiree," Dean snuck in under a loud clearing of his throat. He ignored the look Bobby shot his way, immune by now, and pulled his head back as a thought occurred too him. "How the heck does a mute kid new to town wrangle up a retired police dog in, what, like two weeks?"

"Four." The old hunter just huffed again, shrugging uninterested shoulders with such controlled nonchalance that neither Winchester believed his disinterest for a second. No way he hadn't needled that story out of Andy the second such a particular dog showed up on his doorstep. "You can ask him."

Sam glanced around the study. Ronald still lying unconscious on the ground (though Sam and Dean had moved-slash-rolled him over towards the couch to keep him from getting stepped on) and the younger Winchester was pointedly avoiding the smears of red leftover on the carpet. The rest of the house was quiet. It was just the three of them, no stray psychic in sight. "Where is Andy, anyway?"

"Out in his van."

The way Bobby said it – the verbal equivalent of a head shake mastered by a parent in charge of a would-be rebellious teenager – had both boys equal parts curious and wary.

"What van?"

-o-o-o-

It wasn't much. An old Dodge Tradesman, probably a '77, maybe a '78, painted an absolutely hideous orange color that was now patchy with rust and faded from age and sunlight. The expanse of the driver side of the van, free from any doors or windows, had been spray-painted with a mural of…erm…something. There were two large blobs of white, with something resembling beady black eyes and a pink nose enough to vaguely (emphasis on the vague) identify them as polar bears. One sported a stick figure upon its back, adorned with a particularly large pair of boobs (just about the only detail added to the painting) and a sword raised high above her head.

Dean snorted out a laugh at the attempt of a Viking Queen and her polar bear warriors. An ode to another van from another life.

"Is that what that's supposed to be?" Bobby muttered under his breath as they circled to the other side of the van, where an impressive dent suggested she wasn't exactly in working shape. Dean wondered if the poor thing even had an engine in her. Bobby banged his fist on the cargo door twice. "She don't run, but the look the kid got when he saw her…"

The hunter just shook his head rather than finish the thought (which was unnecessary anyway. It was obvious Bobby hadn't been able to deny the kid the van the second he saw how happy it made him) then the doors were sliding back with an obnoxious creak of poorly treated metal. Smoke poured out of the van, revealing what could only be a contained wildfire given the amount. Dean let out a choked sound caught between a cough and a laugh as both Bobby and Sam stepped back, waving away the tainted air in front of their face.

Through the clearing haze, Andy recognized them with slowly widened eyes and a smile worthy of one of those sloths from Zootopia (shut up, Dean could enjoy kids movies if he wanted to. It wasn't like he watched them on purpose, of course. Just channel surfed and gave up when nothing else was on. Yup, that's how it went down, always.) He raised his hands in joyous greeting, mouthing their names with such excitement that he almost dropped the bong he was holding. Sarge jumped into the van with no hesitation, tongue lolling as he settled against Andy, happy as could be and soon to be high off second hand smoke alone. Andy lazily scratched behind his ears, grin never fading.

The images that flashed through their heads made absolutely no sense, but Andy was cracking up like he'd mind-said the funniest thing. Bobby just harrumphed, shaking his head once more, and both Winchesters got the feeling this was a pretty standard occurrence when the kid got stoned.

Sam, ever the mother hen and absolute rain cloud ruining the city parade, made a little frowny face with his brow. "Andy, should you really be doing that?" he chastised, still waving away the haze. "I'm pretty sure someone with a throat injury as severe as yours, even healed, shouldn't be smoking anything."

Bobby let out a snort that clearly said he'd tried and lost that argument at least once (probably more). Andy, however, developed a thoughtful look. The next image they all received was a whole lot clearer and Dean barked out laughter.

"Yeah, kid, definitely go for the pot brownies," he said, still chuckling.

Before Bobby could retort - face already screwed up and ready to start hollering about exactly who could be cooking what in his house, damnit - the sound of wingbeats interrupted the group. They turned almost as one to find Cas standing behind them, stoic as always even as she tucked a bloodied angel blade back into her trench coat.

"The shifter is dead," the angel announced, then turned directly to Dean. "And your 'baby' is in the front yard."

Despite the finger quotes, Dean looked so damn thankful that Cas was slightly – just slightly – less annoyed by the request to 'rescue' the car in the first place. Then, as humans were wont to do, he opened his mouth.

"That's my girl," Dean said with a bright smile. The moment of silence that followed seemed to stretch longer than just a moment and was certainly long enough for Sam's cough-covered laugh to fill it, before Dean's eyes went wide. "Not my girl, I mean. And not a girl! Woman. Or, uh…not…woman. Angel. Definitely an angel. Not my angel, just… you know…an angel."

As Bobby sat there staring, wondering when Dean would just go ahead and shove the whole foot in his mouth, and Sam had to press a fist to his mouth to keep from laughing (an almost hysterical relief bubbling up that he was trying not too hard to examine), Dean groaned.

"This is definitely blood loss talking," he announced, rather loudly.

Cas tilted her head to the side, frowning at the insinuation that her healing job may not have been adequate. She scanned her charge from head to toe, looking for proof. "You are no longer suffering from blood loss."

Sam's face said it all. Or it did before he had to turn away to hide the growing laugh. And if that laugh sounded a little off…well, he'd almost just lost his brother. Again.

"Thanks, Cas" Dean said, grimacing. The angel frowned, but righted her head.

"You are welcome, Dean."

Several seconds too late – minutes really – Andy's eyes lit up through the new layer of smoke he'd just finished expelling. He waved his hand lazily in a big arc and, given the flashes of wings, a halo, Gilmore Girls (for…some…reason), a TV-rating, a clock, and the letters U, S, and T presented Sesame Street style (again…what?), said something along the lines of 'Whoa, hey Cas! When did you get here?'

Dean let out another groan, this time completely unrelated to his own foot and mouth, as Sam shook his head in bewilderment. Bobby was harrumphing again, staying well out of this one. The angel only stared, momentarily concerned by the state of one of the humans under her protection, if not charge.

"You are intoxicated."

Andy's shoulders shook with a silent giggle and lazy grin. He raised his hand well above his head and they all saw a classic red and white kite fly through their brains.

'High as a kite.'

He held out the bong to Cas.

'Want to join me?'

The angel looked just curious enough that Dean immediately reached out, took the bong, and tucked it right back into the van out of sight. Images of a human Cas drugged to the gills, holding orgies and just… wrong flashed through his memory. So that was gonna be a hard no for the angel there.

"Not happening," he growled lowly to Andy, who shrugged hardly apologetic shoulders, but raised his hand in truce. Dean pulled back, crossing his arms over his chest. Time for a pointed change of topic. "Alright, kid. How exactly does a mute psychic find a retired police dog anyway?"

Andy's grin shifted from lazy to downright pleased with himself. He raised his hands, and body language alone spoke the words faster than the ASL he started rapid firing.

'Let me tell you a story.'

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: How's that for a crazy turnaround? Cliffhanger, blood, blood, blood, near character death and then Wham! German Shepherds, marijuana, polar bear riding Viking queens, and Cas! Not my usual style – and oh boy was it both hard and weird to suddenly go goofball with it (but very fun). Hope you all enjoyed reading it as much as I enjoyed writing it!

Next Up: Guys, guys, guys! Next chapter, heehehehe, next chapter is an entire filler chapter. But don't groan! I swear, it's the best filler chapter to ever fill a chapter, cuz it is allll about Andy and how he managed to get Bobby a new dog XD

See you all in two weeks!

Cheers,

Silence

P.S. Happy Martin Luther King birthday to those in the US. I hope you'll join me in honoring the holiday by giving back to your Black community, patroning a Black-owned business or artist, or donating to a charity that helps fight racial inequality in our country. Black Lives Matter!

P.P.S. Not to take away from Doctor King or the BLM movement, but today is Betty White's 100th birthday as well. If you can spare it, please donate just $5 to your local animal shelter in her name! Together we're going to change the world, one injustice and one animal in need at a time <3

Okay, I'm done preaching causes now. Have a wonderful day everyone!

UPDATE: 2/1/2022 - Hey guys, so sorry for the missed chapter this weekend! I went skiing with a friend for his birthday and didn't end up getting the chapter edited beforehand like I had hoped I would. But it'll be up this weekend! Thanks for your patience <3

Chapter 113: Season 2: Chapter 79

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Alrighty, we're back! Sorry for the extra week delay. This chapter's a bit of a beast and it took me extra long to edit it. I've been kinda slow these last couple weeks as well, both busy with Real Life and unmotivated overall (damn you, Covid Fatigue and Depression! [shakes fist at sky]), so it took some extra time to get this done.

Sioux Falls: So, while the actual Sioux Falls, SD is a decent sized city, I noticed that the show kinda plays it off has having a small town vibe. Not super small, but small enough that there's a Sheriff rather than a police department (where as in reality, Sioux Falls has a PD because it's a city), implying that wherever Bobby lives, it's an unincorporated community. I like that vibe for Bobby way more than a decent size town anyway. So the way I'm going to play this to keep to both show-canon and reality is that Bobby lives far enough outside of Sioux Falls to be another town – a sub-division if you will that has its own name and everything, but is so small and unknown everyone just refers to where they live as Sioux Falls for simplicity's sake. It has its own Sheriff department, small downtown area, etc, and only enough residents to warrant the small-town feel the show plays. Sound good? Sweet.

P.S. On that note, if anyone knows any better than that or has more specific info on where in Sioux Falls the Salvage Yard is supposed to be, lemme know! I didn't find anything in my research, but that don't mean it doesn't exist :D (I also tend to slack on in-depth research when I'm happier with my own head canon and don't want to find research that discredits it, LOL)

Chapter Warnings: Andy goes digging about Bobby's house outta boredom, finds a couple of things, gets yelled at, goes digging again, finds a couple of things missing (namely a dog), and decides to make a new friend in town. Not really in that order. The cutest, fluffiest, furiest, and most heart-warming of filler chapters to ever fill a chapter.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 79

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

- Three Weeks Earlier -

It hadn't taken long for Andy to get bored once Dean and Sam left.

There was only so much to do around the salvage yard, and one could only take so much ASL learning before needing a break. Castiel was comatose, in a 'healing trance' or so Dean had said (with a very stern threat of 'leave her alone or I will murder you via death wedgie and you will regret it' completely implied by glare alone), so she was out as a source of entertainment. As far as Andy could tell, his new mental abilities either didn't work on angels or didn't work on comatose bodies anyway.

Not that he'd tried of course...in any way that might have left evidence for Dean to murder him with, at least.

Bobby wouldn't let him venture into town until he could speak 'properly' to normal folk, his words not Andy's. He could accompany the hunter when he went, but Bobby, it turned out, was pretty much a hermit. And Andy could only poke and prod him into leaving the house, doing something, anything, so many times before Bobby's hackles started rising.

The old hunter's first instinct (okay, that's a lie, it was more like his sixth or seventh after telling the kid to learn ASL, practice it, clean his damn room, go for a walk, do the dishes, anything other than bothering him) was to start teaching him about the occult. Mostly so Bobby would have a hand in the research for the next hunter to call for a little help. Andy had a genuine interest in learning, so that worked out fairly well, but it still wasn't enough to keep the kid's attention all that long. He scoured books with a zeal that almost rivaled Sam's, but had so many questions that Bobby ended up with two jobs instead of less of the one he already had: juggling other fools who were too damn lazy to figure out what they were tackling before they charged in half-cocked, head first.

Not that Andy was a fool. The kid was incredibly smart. Just…still a kid, with the energy of a twelve year old about six root beers in.

'Just go…do something,' Bobby groused one afternoon, caught between a book about five centuries old and a laptop almost as ancient. Olivia Lowry had managed to stumble into a nasty sea witch off the coast of Maine. The cavalry was already on the way – she'd managed to filter just about every curse word in the book between explanations of how the bitch had nearly gotten her and this was definitely not a solo gig – but they'd need all the backup they could get when it came to killing the thing.

Witches. They really were the worst.

When Andy threw up his hands, one forming a very clear 'like what?' even as the images flashed through his brain, Bobby sighed. He rubbed at his forehead, bumping his cap off his head and the headache starting to form there.

'I don't know, kid. Go…explore!' Bobby turned back to his research, grumbling in addition, "There's enough stuff in this house to keep anyone busy. So just…don't touch anything that might kill you, and get."

The look Andy gave him required neither ASL nor psychic powers: 'How am I supposed to know what might kill me?!' But he took off regardless, and Bobby spent the next several hours trying to ignore the sound of a kid rummaging through his closets.

He was getting too damn old for this.

-o-o-o-

The object in the kid's hand wasn't what Bobby was expecting when he looked up from the desk in his den, still neck-deep in sea witch lore. The two hunters he'd sent as backup for Olivia had arrived, and the three were getting ready for a second attack. But something about the case wasn't sitting well with Bobby. He was missing something, and that usually meant trouble for the hunters on the other end.

The flash of a question mark searing itself across the inside of his eyelids for a second time in as many minutes brought Bobby back to Andy, standing in the doorway to the den, holding a thick, leather dog collar and an old, dusty tin bowl.

Considering his hands were full, Bobby would forgive the lack of Signing for the easier, headache-inducing telepathy. (To be honest, the kid was getting good enough – or Bobby was getting too used to – his new powers to even cause much of a headache anymore.)

'Rumsfeld,' Bobby signed, spelling his name out. 'My old dog.'

As silence settled like a weighted blanket in the wake of that statement, a third question mark (well, actually three question marks all together now) flashed through his brain once again. Bobby sighed, realizing he wasn't gonna get this research done for Olivia while Andy had questions apparently. Like, given the raised eyebrows and exaggerated nod to the disused items, the whole story.

'Demon,' the gruff hunter admitted with a single Sign. No point expanding, the end result was obvious without further detail. Bobby managed to hold back most of the emotion that welled inside at the thought of Rumsfeld, and kept his head buried in the book to hide whatever leaked out. He'd gone quick, at least, but Bobby had sure wished Dean had left something of that demon bitch for him to kill himself after what she'd done to his dog. He'd been a damn good boy and hadn't deserved an end like that. Dogs were meant to grow old, damnit.

He turned back to his research.

Andy audibly huffed, entering the den and setting the items on Bobby's cluttered desk. Loudly. Bobby knew he could chase the kid off with some not-unjustified anger at digging through his personal belongings, at bringing up some painful memories and then continuing to poke at that bear. But he'd been the one to tell the kid digging around was fine as long as it kept him busy.

Andy was gesturing to the collar, and forming the word for 'another' in Sign, eyebrows up to make it a question. Bobby did not want to be having this conversation, but considering the kid was using his hands and not his mind, he begrudgingly answered.

"Getting too old for training a new pup," Bobby muttered aloud, almost under his breath. Too old to lose another one, too, not that he'd ever admit that part out loud. Unfortunately, Andy was a perceptive twenty-something toddler. Bobby turned back to his books, gruff rising like hackles. "Got enough strays as it is, kid."

It was Andy's turn to look sad at that, but Bobby chose not to notice. It was a terrible mistake, in hindsight. If he'd been paying more attention, he might have seen that sadness turn into the furled brow of thought, which evolved into the wide eyed delight of an idea, followed ultimately by a dangerous amount of determination.

-o-o-o-

Andy was, indeed, determined. Bobby almost never answered him out loud, whether or not he signed or psychic'ed his questions. Bobby always signed back as long as his hands were free. Andy figured it was something between gruff poking and sincere encouragement, but whichever it was, Bobby was damn stubborn about it. Andy could count the times Bobby'd answered him out loud on, like, one hand. And in just one conversation he'd done it twice.

(The kid didn't actually know when Bobby had time to become an expert in ASL, but it seemed overnight. He'd only managed to stump the old man once, and they'd looked the Sign up together for that one. Andy was still pretty slow with it, himself. Like learning any new language, it took time to deconstruct what he wanted to say and rebuild the sentence in gestures, which he had to remember or spell out letter by letter if he couldn't. Bobby was patient, in a gruff way. He stood silent and expecting, but never pushed. He corrected Andy when he reversed hand positions or words, but was never discouraging. He was a great teacher. A great, scary, scary teacher.)

No, Bobby was clearly torn up about his old dog, and it was a snowball of sadness resulting in a lack of current dog. Well, Andy was going to fix it…somehow.

Which meant a trip into town.

-o-o-o-

The first time Sheriff Jody Mills met Andy Gallagher, she'd been on her way into McGregory Grant's hardware store. Bobby Singer - the town drunk - was on his way out, led by a scrawny little college-aged kid who'd held the door open for him with a flourish that screamed sarcasm, but well-intentioned. Jody had bit back a grin as the gruff old mechanic walked the door with half an eye roll and absolutely no comment.

Noticing the Sheriff on her way in, the kid continued holding the door open, adding a low, utterly exaggerated bow and gentleman's tip of his non-existent hat to the flourish this time. Jody dipped her head in his direction with a wink.

"Why thank you, sir," she'd said, with no shortage of well-intended sarcasm of her own. The kid straightened but didn't say a word in response. He just smiled and gave her a little two fingered salute. Which was when Jody noticed the bruises and cuts scattered across his face - old and starting to fade, but no less startling for their severity - and the bright white bandage wrapping most of his neck.

Startled by the injuries – clearly extensive – on a pretty young man who certainly gave off a charming first impression, Jody wasn't able to form another response before the kid bounded off after Bobby Singer, practically skipping to the man's truck. She watched from just inside the door of the hardware store as they pulled out of the parking lot and onto the road, headed in the direction of Singer's salvage yard.

Still a little shaken – that boy certainly hadn't looked the type to get himself into a fight, and definitely not one so bad it ended with him through the ringer – Jody headed directly for the counter rather than the aisles.

"Morning, Sheriff," Grant greeted with his deep voice and generally unshifting, weathered face. "What can I do for ya today?"

"Morning, McGregor. Was that Bobby Singer I saw heading out just now?" she asked, glancing over her shoulder at the front doors.

"Sure was."

Jody turned back, offering what was supposed to be a smile but felt a little tight. "And the kid with him? Ever seen him before?"

McGregory shrugged, which wasn't much more or less than the Sheriff had been expecting. Grant wasn't known as the gossiping sort. "Last week, but not before that."

"Any idea where he got those injuries?" Jody raised an eyebrow questioningly, but kept her tone as neutral as such a question could be.

The store owner just shook his head, eyes serious but face impassive behind his graying beard. "Far as I know, kid can't talk so I didn't ask. Bobby's a good customer and I don't take to prying."

Jody nodded, understanding that. Midwestern hospitality was a thing Sioux Falls residents took great pride in, but part of that hospitality included a knowing respect that some people's business was their own to keep private. It had been a long shot asking, but those bruises were enough to peak her curiosity as a law officer…and perhaps her concern as a mother. She thanked Grant, heading into the aisles for the road salt and buckets she'd come for.

That had been a week ago, and Jody Mills hadn't seen Singer or his new tagalong since. Not surprisingly, really. Bobby was known for being somewhat of a recluse, only coming into town for supplies as needed. He wasn't one to mingle or dally. No reason a new face hanging around would change that much. And between Mrs. Hutchins starting another row with her neighbor over dog excrement in her yard and Digger racking up yet another drunk and disorderly for his record right alongside a night in the drunk tank, Jody hadn't found much time for digging into the new kid.

Which was why it was somewhat of a surprise that he was hanging around the parking lot of the Sheriff's office, kicking off the wall he was leaning on when she came out the front. He jogged up to her without Jody even noticing the young man at first, tapping her on the shoulder just as she got to her car.

He was moving his hands in a series of gestures before she even got a word out, and Jody blinked at the rapid movement. She supposed that confirmed one theory, at least; the kid was mute.

"Oh, I'm sorry, sweetie. I don't know Sign," she offered with an apologetic smile, but turned fully to give him her attention. The man waved away her comment like it was no big deal, and instead mimed holding a pencil and scribbling through the air.

Oh, right, paper. She snapped her notepad off her belt, flipping the small thing open to the first blank page, and handed it over. The kid pulled the little attached pencil free from its fastening and started scribbling away. As he wrote, Jody took a moment to study him more closely.

The bruises across his jaw, cheek, and brow were faded significantly more, now a mere smattering of yellow-ish skin with very little swelling remaining. The cuts and scratches were a mix of fading red and healing scabs. A couple had the telling, white dotted scars of removed sutures, but looked decently cared for overall. The bandage around his neck was a mystery, hiding away whatever had happened there to take away the kid's voice.

Overall, hell had clearly happened to this young man, but he seemed well on the other side of it, and at least caring for the injuries properly.

"You're living with Bobby Singer, right? At the Salvage Yard?" Jody couldn't help but pry. It was her job, after all. When the kid looked up, pausing in his writing to give her a smile and a nod. She returned both gestures absently. "You a relative of his?"

He tipped his head to the side in a contemplative, sheepish, wishy-washy way before nodding again, with a grin that said close enough. Jody could understand that, chuckling lightly.

"Uh-huh. He treating you right?" At the puzzled look she got in return, Jody decided to be a little more direct. She eyed the bruises across his brow, down his cheek and jaw, to the bandaged around his neck and finally down at his hands, where healing cuts marred the fingers wrapped around her pen. He followed her gaze down. "Is he drinking too much?"

The kid's head snapped back up, mouth forming a perfectly readable, 'Oh' before scrunching up comically. It was clear from his expression of horror, shake of head, and then sheepish grin that Jody was barking up the wrong tree. He hastily shook the hand holding the pen back and forth in such a cartoonish symbol for no that Jody huffed, unable to help the smile.

"Alright, then." She decided to leave it at that. This kid could tell her in his own time about the wringer he'd been through, if he wanted to. Just so long as it hadn't been at the hands of anybody in her town.

Then he was holding the pad back out, and she took it with piqued interest.

Jody's eyebrows climbed into her bangs as she read his - Andy, as he'd introduced himself in the first line - request. When she glanced back up, Andy Gallagher was grinning widely.

-o-o-o-

When Bobby got back from an errand run later that week, Andy was lying stomach down on the rug in the den, feet swinging in the air behind him, occasionally tapping his shoes together while madly tapping away on his phone. He was surrounded by books, both open and stacked, that looked familiar enough Bobby figured they were from his own collection.

"That the boys?" Bobby asked aloud, if only because his hands were full of a brown paper bag of groceries and a six pack. Andy looked up at the question, eyebrows climbing for clarification. The old man gestured to the phone in the kid's hand with his chin, Andy's thumbs still going at it despite his attention now being on Bobby.

The kid glanced down at his phone, then back at the older hunter, shaking his head.

Bobby frowned, torn between the kitchen to put away his slowly melting tub of Bluebell Pecan Pralines 'N Cream and the curiosity lying on the ground right in front of him, texting an additional mystery. He huffed, surrendering to his curiosity. "Then who you talking to?"

Andy pulled a face, using one hand to gesture aimlessly in dramatized confusion. Bobby wasn't buying it for a second, but the kid set the phone down, freeing his other hand for proper Sign.

'I'm allowed to have friends.'

Bobby blinked once at the defensiveness of Andy's hands, then a second time at the juxtaposed expression of mischief written all over the kid's face. A bad feeling, entirely unlike that of a hunt gone south and much more what Bobby imaged parents of toddlers and teenagers alike felt all the time, settled in the pit of his stomach.

"Uh….never said you weren't…"

Bobby turned, paused, almost turned back, then just shook his head and resumed his way to the kitchen. He had ice cream to save, after all, and the combo of the kid surrounded by his occultbooks while texting 'friends' wasn't something Bobby planned on touching with a ten foot pole. Not till he had to, at least.

Several weeks later, he'd look back on that moment and realize it had been his second mistake.

-o-o-o-

It was midday when the van showed up. Andy was out back, leaning against the house, smoking a joint lazily in the sunshine. Bobby had told him on day two of living with the man that he could inhale whatever crap he wanted into his lungs, just so long as he didn't do it in the house. So Andy took to smoking outside, which didn't really bother him. It was chilly, what with it still being winter in South Dakota, but he'd bundle up with a knitted sweater Bobby had handed to him one night with a grumble and what Andy had obviously incorrectly identified as a rosy tint to his cheeks. Bobby Singer didn't blush, so obviously he'd been having a heart attack or asphyxiating after choking on his own spit or something. Anyway! The thing had been hand knitted (which led Andy to further incorrect suspicions that Bobby had a hobby on the side belonging to little old ladies, loving mothers, and adorable housewives). It was also at least two decades old, given the pattern and clear aging of the yarn (leading Andy to even more conjecture about Bobby's own mother, or possibly one of those adorable housewives, which meant the next time Andy went snooping around the house he had a new goal in mind). The kid had been expecting some itchy, threadbare monstrosity that provided a bit of warmth but not much else when he'd slid it over his head the first night, only to find its age had left the sweater properly worn in and downright snuggly.

When Bobby handed him the matching, hand knitted beanie without making eye contact, Andy's little trash-tv-obsessed heart just about lost it.

So there he was, smoking in the chilly sunshine in Bobby Singer's mysteriously loved sweater and cap, when he heard the noise coming 'round from the front. The Salvage Yard didn't get a whole lot of visitors. In the four weeks Andy had been there so far, there'd only been a handful of customers (muggle and magical alike, or so Andy Gallagher liked to think of them), and the Winchesters returning from that fake hunt in Indiana. So the commotion wasn't common. Andy clipped off the end of his joint, having only imbibed about a third of it, and pocketed what was left. He gave himself a light pat down – it would be no good running into a local townie smelling like weed and getting Bobby in trouble – before walking almost lazily around the house to the front.

He froze when he saw her. Gleaming in the sunlight, all gorgeous curves and aging paint, edges rusting and the rest an absolutely hideous burnt orange. Dented on one side, a side mirror hanging loose, swaying dangerously given all that was left of its attachment point was a single, precariously frayed wire.

She was perfect.

Bobby was talking with a rough and tumble gentleman unhooking the Dodge Tradesman from the tow truck he'd driven into the yard. Andy barely gave the guy a chance to shake Bobby's hand before he was between him and the hunter, signing furiously to Bobby.

'I want her.'

The old hunter blinked at him, then glanced at the trucker over Andy's shoulder who shrugged and, with raised hands, headed back for his rig. Bobby shook his head, raising his own hands to reply.

'She doesn't run,' he signed, before giving a wave to the guy climbing into his truck, which started with a heavy rumble. "Thanks, Joe."

'I want her!' Andy repeated, ignoring the grumbled, "Yeah, Bobby, see ya next time," that came from the so-called Joe as the truck's door slammed shut with a metallic creak. The kid was busy grinning hopefully as he glanced between his future lady and his current landlord. Bobby followed the gaze, eyebrows up. He was clearly torn between confusion and amusement.

'What for?' he asked. 'What do you need with a car that doesn't run?'

Andy's grin widened. Bobby worried the kid might hurt himself, smile that big. 'Live in it!'

The old man offered an unimpressed stare. 'My house not good enough for you?'

To the kid's credit, he had the decency to look horrified, which amused Bobby to no end. He, of all people, understood the need for space. He'd lived alone since Karen – with the exception of a pair of boys now and then, growing up through the years – but now he was playing permanent host to a twenty-something kid he had no idea what to do with. And he'd always liked his space being, well, his. Hell, Bobby could use some alone time himself, which meant he'd been totally fine from the start with the kid camping out in this piece of junk and making it his own if he wanted to. Not that he needed to let the boy off that easy, of course.

Andy was floundering, flailing his hands in messy sign after sign as he attempted to explain himself without insulting Bobby further. It was pretty adorable, not that the gruff old man would ever admit to such a thing aloud. He let the kid go on for another minute before finally cutting him loose.

'Stop,' he managed to sign, only barely keeping the smirk buried under his mostly manufactured grump. He had a reputation to keep, after all. 'I get it. She's all yours.'

It wasn't like there was much left of her to strip anyway. The only thing with much value would be bits and pieces of the engine, and if Andy didn't care whether or not she ran, then Bobby could clear it out for anything worth some money, or leave it for the next time he needed parts for a Tradesman.

'But!' He signed quickly before the kid could start celebrating. 'I expect some compensation.'

At the 'what' gesture Andy made, not quite signing but reading clear all the same, Bobby crossed his arms for the sake of intimidation and clearly stating who was – and would remain – the boss around here. Which, he realized a moment later, made Signing real damn difficult.

"Chores, kid. You gotta pay for her somehow." Even as he said it, he dug a hand into his pocket for the keys as a cover for why he hadn't signed back. Damn kid always gave him grief about communicating in a not-psychic manner, and Bobby wasn't one to back down about a point. Especially when he was right.

Andy, however, was giving him a look torn between indignation and suspicion, like he might be onto Bobby's game.

'But you got her for free!' Andy was pretty sure he had, anyway. He hadn't seen money exchange hands and…well…. He glanced over at his beauty, his life, his soon to be everything. The side mirror took that perfect opportunity to break fully free with a snap and fall to the ground.

Yeah, he wouldn't have paid anything for her either.

"Don't mean I give her away for free,"Bobby answered verbally, but also half-signing with his free hand. "Running a business here, kid."

Andy might have snorted at that if he wasn't trying to weasel a free van off the old man. This had been so much easier when he'd had his powers. But alas, such days were behind him. So he promised to do a gazillion chores, even spelling out the word one letter at a time (both because gazillion wasn't a real word and so didn't have a sign, and just to make the hunter happy that he was getting faster with hand spelling). The extra charm seemed to appease Bobby, who harrumphed but handed over the keys, more symbolically than for any purpose they actually served.

The kid fist-pumped the air and then turned and bodily hugged his new van. Bobby rolled his eyes and turned back to the house before anyone could catch him smiling.

-o-o-o-

Andy was in the den once more, spread out on his stomach in front of Bobby's desk, clicking his heels together like Dorothy trying to get home from Oz. It was something he'd taken to doing as a kid – working on homework on the floor rather than at a desk – and he'd never really shaken the comfort of that habit. It probably started with coloring books way back when and he just kept it going into school, surrounding himself with workbooks and textbooks instead of coloring pages and crayons. Even years later as a senior in high school, the carpet in his bedroom had always held more appeal than the desk his dad made sure he had. By the time he'd finished with school and decided there were other pursuits worth his time that didn't involve homework, that surface had never been used, buried under books about six deep, pencils and pens and whatnot, a beat up PlayStation on its last leg, and an old TV his dad had let him have in his room when they got a new one in the family room.

(Not that they'd ever been much of a family, or ever watched TV together. All the more reason to have one in his room, he supposed.)

It's probably what made living in a van after he left home so easy for Andy, bumming it however he wanted whatever way he wanted. Sitting at a desk all day, stuck in a cubicle or coming home to a white picket fence and a family dinner table had never been his style. Especially once he got his powers and didn't need an income to survive.

His new Lady wasn't quite ready for living in yet, though. And, to be honest, Andy figured it would be a part time thing at best anyway. More like a place to smoke freely, read and relax while having a little space to himself than an actual living arrangement. He and Bobby usually tag-teamed meals, anyway, so he'd have to be back in the house every morning and evening anyway (something so ridiculously domestic it never failed to leave Andy smirking, which usually led to nothing short of banter and bickering – moments Andy wouldn't trade, even for a van, since he walked away almost always the victor. Almost.)

Plus, it got friggin' cold in South Dakota, and his Baby didn't have a heat source. Yet.

Has the eagle landed?

Andy tapped his feet again, bumping the balls of his ankles together twice before dropping his legs back down, toes bouncing off the carpet as he waited for a reply to his text. Bobby was on the phone at his desk – talking to a hunter by the sound of the conversation – but Andy was only half listening to the case. He had his own mission underway.

I'm not using codewords, kid. Especially such cliche ones.

The psychic grinned as his phone buzzed in his hand and the return text came through. He chuckled silently to himself, thumbs already at work crafting his most excellent response.

But has it landed?

His phone buzzed almost immediately.

NO.

A few moments later a second text came in, which Andy had been anticipating. Some people had a pattern to their texting habits, and his new pen pal was shamelessly predictable in her lecturing.

I told you, these things take time. Give me a couple weeks.

Andy went back to tapping his feet together, grin wide across his face. It's been a couple weeks!

It's been ONE week.

Right, which is only one less than a couple!

P.A.T.I.E.N.C.E

Andy sighed dramatically, tilting his head back and lowering the phone to the ground. The Sheriff was such a mom.

"You saw what?" Bobby's voice grew in volume, a sure sign that he was as surprised as he was increasingly worried. Andy looked up, watching the older man's expression as Bobby rubbed at his forehead, pushing his hat almost off his head in the process. "Well that don't make a lick o' sense."

Andy's phone buzzed again, but he was focused on Bobby's case now, trying to recall what the man had been talking about just before. He knew he was talking to a pair of hunters and that they were investigating something in a forest somewhere cold, given the jokes about snow and 'freezing' one's 'balls off.' Andy frowned, something about that poking at his brain.

"I don't know what to tell ya, Isaac," Bobby sighed, resettling his baseball cap to its rightful place. "I'll keep digging for something that's got antlers, red eyes, and is also somehow invisible at the same time. Just…." Bobby let out a noise reminiscent of someone starting a fight they knew they weren't gonna win. "Don't go after again it till I get back to ya, alright?"

The kid stopped listening, those three things Bobby had said pinging off the inside of his skull like a pinball machine. He propped himself up to the point of looking like a seal, eyes wide. He must have read about it recently. That's why it sounded familiar! Andy's eyes fell to the dozen or so books surrounding him. They weren't the only ones he'd read in the last couple weeks of living at the Salvage Yard, but they were a good place to start. He jumped to his feet, staying in a crouch as he started shuffling through the various tombs, checking the titles and table of contents for a subject that made sense with creatures that took on animal forms, liked the cold, or lived in the woods. It had to be one of those things that he was triggering his memory.

When he found it – a lengthy read about Indigenous myths, creatures, and legends he'd started out of sheer boredom earlier in the week and actually found completely fascinating – Andy jumped to his feet in excitement, book raised high. Bobby's head lifted for a minute in surprise and confusion, giving the kid a hell of a look – before going back to his phone call. Which…okay, fair. Andy was pretty well used to getting that same look by now, and not without having earned it along the way.

But this was important! He knew what those hunters were facing.

He waved his arms in equal parts excitement and to get the older man's attention, but Bobby was now in a heated argument with someone else, some lady named Tamara. So Andy did the only thing he could without a voice.

Bobby jerked at the sudden flash of images – illustrations from a book, exclamation marks, and flashes of text that came and went too damn fast to ever have a hope of reading – and glared at the man standing in front of him pointing to a book.

"Damnit, kid, I'm busy here!"

Andy dropped his hands at that, momentarily taken aback at the biting delivery of Bobby's equally sharp words. It was the first time he'd ever raised his voice at the kid, and the gruff old man could already feel the guilt welling. Not that he had time for that right now. Damnit, he'd apologize later, once he made sure Isaac and Tamara didn't go get themselves killed hunting something they didn't even know the identity of yet.

But Andy was a trooper – a strong kid and a hell of a hunter, really – because he walked right up to Bobby's desk and dropped the book right in front of the man, tapping it twice with his finger pointedly.

'The last thing you said,' Andy signed determinedly, and Bobby watched his hands carefully, phone still pressed to his ear and Tamara hollering on the other end. 'About antlers and red eyes.'

The kid tapped the book again, and Bobby read the title, frown forming as he realized Andy had only been interrupting to help on the case.

"I'll call you back, Tamara. Do not go after it yet, ya here? We're figuring out what this is, just give us a second." With that, Bobby lowered the phone back to the desk, the tinny sound of her reply, "Who's, 'we?'" lost to the beep of Bobby hanging up on her.

The old hunter picked up the book, eyeing the cover for another moment before holding it out to Andy, gaze serious. "Show me."

So Andy did. The creature was called an Ijiraq. It was a pretty obscure creature, mostly lost to time and the lack of a written history over an oral one. Plus the fact that they lived almost exclusively in the arctic and only prayed on the kids of Inuit tribes way up north. Which kind of spoke to why no American hunter had so far encountered one. There was hardly an entire page dedicated to it in the book, but it was all in there. A shapeshifter that always had red eyes, no matter the shape they took on. But they often took on the image of caribou – hence the antlers – and could be spotted out of your peripheral, only to disappear whenever you looked straight on at one. Which had given validity to the local legend that they could turn invisible.

Bobby called Tamara back as soon as he was sure, but Andy had done good work. He relayed the information, including best known ways to kill one, and where to find the kids the thing had taken. Then he hung up and eyed his house ward, who'd gone back to lying on the carpet texting his pen pal.

"You…uh…" Bobby made a clucking sound with his tongue, knowing what he wanted to say but also knowing he owed the kid an apology. "Damn. I'm sorry I snapped at ya, kid."

Andy's hand reached up from the ground, just visible beyond the edge of the desk, and flapped back and forth forgivingly.

"So. You ever thought of helping out around here?"

The kid's head popped up over the edge of the desk next, a frown bordering on a pout firmly on his face. He waved around the room, then signed, 'What do you think that was?'

Bobby snorted. 'I meant on a regular basis.'

Andy's jaw dropped open in a moment of surprise, and his eyes blinked the 'oh...' he needn't bother signing. He settled back on his calves, having bounced up onto his knees to converse with Bobby. The hunter leaned forward on his desk, making a 'well?' gesture with one hand.

The kid seemed to be giving it serious thought before raising his hands. 'Like a job?'

Bobby developed a frown of his own. 'Yeah. Sort of.'

Andy's grin spelled trouble from a mile away. He raised one hand, rubbing his fingers against his thumb in a universal sign, no ASL needed. 'Money?'

This time the snort Bobby gave was about as clear an answer as that non-Sign gesture had been. He spread his arms out even as he climbed to his feet. "What do I look like, a bank?"

He headed to the kitchen for a beer, leaving Andy in the den. Bobby already knew he had the kid; Andy was too good a soul not to help out and, more than that, he could tell the kid was already hooked. He was too good a researcher. But, not one to give up on a good argument when he was most definitely winning, Bobby tossed over his shoulder, "It's called room and board, kid."

The hunter was sure of the laughter happening behind him, silent though it may be. It was confirmed when an image flashed through his brain of a certain Dodge Tradesman waiting out front. He harrumphed – something he did anytime he wanted to cover up the fact he was laughing – and shook his head in amusement as he opened the fridge.

"Yeah, yeah, alright. And yer van."

-o-o-o-

The box wasn't anything particularly special, not to Andy. Just another piece of so-'n-so yet to be discovered in Bobby's house. He'd gone snooping, just like he promised himself he would, next time the older man was out running an errand or, in this case, helping another hunter. Bobby had only done the latter twice now, and only after extensive persuading (more than Andy had anticipated) the first time. He'd been surprised how much assurance it took to convince the man that he was fine on his own for a single hunt. All grown up and ready to sit in an old, drafty house on his lonesome without supervision.

(The look Bobby had given him at that had not been a pleasant one, and probably added an extra twenty minutes of convincing to the already day-long streak he'd been swinging.)

So, Bobby was out helping a friend on something he promised would be quick – a day or two max – which left Andy ample time to start looking around for evidence of that loving mother or adoring housewife. He'd found what he'd been looking for on the evening of the second day; there was a picture tucked away behind some boxes in the closet of Cas's room (one of the last rooms Andy had left to explore. Something about poking about while an angel lay comatose ten feet away was…disconcerting.)

Whoever she'd been – Andy also found a tattered booklet from a memorial service long since passed and instantly felt like crap for digging – she was beautiful. And the smiling face of Bobby, arms wrapped around her, was almost foreign.

Andy had tucked the picture away just like he'd found it, and retreated.

Now he was snooping just for funsies. Hey, come on, he was bored and left without supervision. Bobby really should have known better. Which was how he found the box, shoved in the back of one of the desk drawers in the den. It wasn't much, just five pieces of wood seamlessly fit together and a sixth top piece painted with a blue, oblong, squished up star he'd never seen before.

Well-used to occult objects (and their dangers) randomly tucked in the nooks and crannies of Bobby's house, Andy did the cursory check for any traps or spells. Bobby had taught him the basics on day one, shortly after giving him the all clear to explore the house as he pleased and realizing what a terrible mistake that had been. He didn't see any telltale signs here, so, gingerly, he slid open the top.

Huh. There was nothing inside but an old, antique key.

Andy shrugged, a little bummed by the lack of something exciting, and was sliding the top of the box back on when the phone rang. He almost fumbled the box in surprise, head jerking to the kitchen where the row of landlines hung on the wall. Quickly, as if Bobby was on the other line and new exactly what he'd been up to while the hunter was gone, Andy shoved the lid back onto the box, the box back into the drawer, and the drawer shut as fast as he could. Then he hopped off the desk and bolted for the kitchen.

It was Bobby's main line – none of the duplicate ones meant for verifying some hunter's alibi or identity as a cop or whatnot – so Andy went ahead and picked it up. Given his recent communication… er, challenges, he wasn't supposed to answer any of those other phones, but since helping out on the Ijiraq case, Bobby had gone ahead and told some of those hunting buddies that he had a research 'colleague' (Bobby's words, not Andy's). He'd told 'em to spread the word, that the kid might be the one to pick up but he'd only be speaking in Morse.

So Andy put the phone to his ear, grabbed a pen off the kitchen table, and started tapping away for the hunter in need on the other end.

It was time to earn his new Lady!

-o-o-o-

Can't believe I'm saying this but….

At the vibration against his thigh that indicated a new text, Andy paused in his retro-fitting on said Lady – working an old twin mattress into the back for a cozier place to hang out – and pulled his phone out.

The eagle has landed.

Once he read the newest texts, Andy's grin grew until it couldn't possibly be any bigger. And it was only half because Sheriff Mills had finally caved to the use of codewords.

Even without magical powers that could people bend to his will, Andy still had it.

Roger that!

-o-o-o-

Andy waited excitedly for Bobby to return from the hunt. He'd told

Sheriff Mills to hold off, since the old man wasn't in town yet. He'd wanted to take the dog – Sarge, Jody said – in right away and just surprise Bobby when he got home, but the Sheriff assured him it didn't work that way. If it was going to be Bobby Singer's dog, Bobby had to be there for the drop-off.

So there Andy was, waiting excitedly for the tell-tale rumble of Bobby's truck. The hunter had phoned from the road a couple hours out, and that was a couple hours ago now. He was practically twitching with excitement, leg jiggling as he alternated between staring at his phone and looking out one of the front windows at the empty road. Bobby was taking his sweet-ass time, dangit.

The minute he heard it – the rumble of that old truck turning off the paved highway onto the dirt lot – rapid-fire thumbs sent a confirmation text to Sheriff Mills, giving her the all clear to come on over with Sarge.

Papa bird is back in the nest!

His phone buzzed almost immediately in reply.

Sigh.

He cackled noiselessly at the single word and tucked his phone into his pocket. His new pen pal had literally written out the word sigh. Oh yeah, he definitely still had it.

Bobby stomped through the front door looking tired and in need of a beer, which Andy presented to him on cue. The old hunter eyed the drink warily, definitely aware of a pot-sweetener when he saw one (even if he was unaware of the existence of a pot or what exactly was already in it), but took it all the same. He surveyed the house with the same amount of hesitant caution.

Andy raised his eyebrows.

"Just checking you didn't throw a wild rager or something," Bobby grumbled, but nodded approvingly at the state of his home. He popped the beer, taking a swig. Nothing much was out of place, if you took into account that a kid had been living there for the last couple days.

The look said kid gave him was a wounded one. Dramatically so.

'You don't trust me?' he signed, adding big puppy dog eyes and huge brows for emphasis. Bobby snorted. 'Besides, who would I invite?'

The hunter got to raise his own eyebrows in response to that one, pointedly dropping his gaze to the kid's cell, which was buzzing away on the kitchen table. No doubt the kid's new 'pen pal'. Andy just smiled, though it was far from innocent.

'Who, that?' he signed, the picture of incorruptibility but with an air that Bobby was missing out on a joke. The hunter wasn't buying it for a second. He hadn't been born yesterday, thank you very much. Still, Andy just kept on smiling. 'It would have been a really short rager.'

He even took the time to spell out the word, rather than use the easier sign for party. Specificity was important, here.

Bobby didn't know what to make of that, eyeing him. Which was right about the time the doorbell rang. The hunter's eyes narrowed in suspicion at the still idyllic grin on the kid's face before setting down his beer.

"Uh-huh," he muttered, turning and heading towards his front door. Andy skipped along behind him, doing a terrible job at concealing his excitement.

Opening his door and expecting…. Well, Bobby didn't know what he was expecting, but Sheriff Mills standing on his front step with a canine unit sure as hell wasn't it. The German Shephard was panting lightly, tongue lolling as he sat patiently by Jody's side, and the Sheriff gave a warm smile to the old hunter. Bobby wasn't buying that, either.

"You got a warrant, Sheriff?" was his first question, second only to 'what did I do now?' which he didn't bother voicing aloud. He eyed the dog warily. It had to be something big if she'd brought a search dog with her. At least he didn't currently have any bodies buried on the property. Thank God for that timing.

Jody's eyebrows went up. If he didn't know any better, she looked damned amused. "Do I need one?"

"If you're planning on bringing that mutt in here, then yeah, you'll be needing one." Bobby crossed his arms, not one to mince words with the local officers. Jody was a nice enough woman, but he couldn't say it was the first time she'd shown up on his property with one complaint or another. Stolen vehicles, public intoxication, that one brawl fight that led to a bogus assault charge, yada yada yada. He'd heard it all.

The Sheriff, much to Bobby's surprise, just chuckled. She shook her head with nothing short of a disappointed soccer mom expression intermingled with amusement and a dash of 'oh boy, I can't believe this. No, wait, I'm raising a toddler, I absolutely can believe it.'

"He didn't tell you," she said and Bobby immediately became a whole different type of suspicious. His first instinct was to turn back into the house and find that troublemaking stray who absolutely had to be the 'he' in this conversation, but the Sheriff was still talking. "Alrighty then, guess I'll just have to leave Sarge right here on the porch."

The look on Bobby's face made Jody absolutely wish she had a camera, a thought that only doubled down when Andy came barreling out onto the porch past the frazzled older man. The kid wrapped Jody in hug – the Sheriff letting out a startled explanation that turned genuine enough as she returned his embrace one-armed – before he knelt down on the increasingly crowded porch and gave Sarge a good scratch.

"What in hell's name is going on here?" Bobby tried to holler, but his frustration was outweighed largely by exasperation, especially as Andy immediately climbed back to his feet, taking the leash from Sheriff Mills and trotting inside. The dog followed obediently as Andy started signing – at first over his shoulder and then, realizing how not-well that was working, spun on his heel, slipped the leash over his wrist, and started signing with both hands while still walking, only to run into the first available piece of furniture with a loud thud and a cringe – about the dog's sit command.

Not that Jody Mills could understand what he was asking. But Bobby sure as hell did.

"Oh, no. No, no, no, no, no." Now that he was properly hollering, he added a shaking finger for extra emphasis. But before Bobby could follow the kid and their absolutely-not-staying canine guest, Jody pushed some papers into his chest, interrupting his path back inside. He grabbed at them distractedly, momentarily caught off guard until he glanced down and realized they were adoption papers.

He glared at the woman, mostly for daring to sit there smiling that smug little smile, like this was all somehow sweet, and instead went back to yelling at his kid. This time waving the papers around. "I told you I didn't want another dog!"

Andy perked up from inside, where he was crouched in front of a sitting Sarge trying to get him to shake. He immediately gave up that endeavor in order to reply. 'No, you said you didn't want to train another dog! Well, Sarge comes fully trained!'

"What'd he say?" Sheriff Mills asked, leaning in to see the kid past the doorway. Bobby huffed something unseemly, but also along the lines of what Andy had said. Jody straightened back up, puttering her hands on her hips with a simple smile and a nod. "That's right. Sarge is retired K-9 unit. Fully trained. There's a page in there on all his verbal commands and hand signals."

She pointed to one of papers Bobby was holding and out of politeness and absolutely nothing more, he flipped to it.

"His handler died in the line of duty. As is tradition when that kind of tragedy happens, Sarge was retired and put up for adoption. The family of the fallen gets first say, then other cops, then the general public." Jody smiled something a little more sad than sweet. "Andy said you were looking for a new dog, fully trained, already grown. Sarge is seven years old and sure could use a loving home. It hasn't been easy on him since his owner died, and he's got no one else.

Bobby Singer could spot a guilt trip well more than a mile away…but it didn't mean he was any less susceptible to it working on him, damnit.

The kid looked up at the absolute worst damn moment, too. The way his eyes lit up and that damn happy smile across his face – like a kid at Christmas who just gave the best damn gift instead of getting it himself – cemented it. No turning back now. But Bobby didn't have to be happy about it, damnit.

"You're taking care of him!" he hollered, for show if nothing more. Andy nodded far too enthusiastically. Bobby held out the pages he was holding, the one with Sarge's training right on top. The kid practically stumbled to his feet, grin never fading, to come grab the pages. "That means walks and exercise! And keeping up on his training."

Andy was still nodding, already back in front of Sarge, who'd stayed waiting, sitting patiently. Bobby tried to think of something grumpy to say, or more chores to demand from the kid. (Who wasn't even a friggin' kid, dangit, but a full grown man definitely acting like the five year old. But, well, a responsible five year old at least).

He was already practicing one of the hand signals with Sarge. The dog followed along perfectly obediently, lifting a paw to set it perfectly in Andy's hand. Jody Mills was still on his front step, grinning herself silly too.

So Bobby just sighed. Guess they had a new dog.

-o-o-o-

- Present -

Andy summed all of that up in like three images and eight hand gestures from within a new cloud of smoke that was once again so thick they could barely see the kid. Which made his signing about as clear as the story had been.

Not that Dean, at least, had been expecting much more.

"Cool van," he said in response, grin matching Andy's, both entirely too pleased with themselves.

Sam, meanwhile, was frowning, those big puppy dog eyes looking between Andy, Dean, and Bobby with clear confusion, like he was missing a piece of the puzzle everyone else seemed to have. "Who's Jody Mills?"

Then Ronald woke up, and they all knew the moment he did, because his screaming was clearly audible even out in the yard.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: When this chapter started, I was seriously worried about being able to fill the entire thing with just Andy's time at Bobby's. I was so worried I wouldn't have enough material that I started coming up with backup plans on what to fill the second half of the chapter with. For reals, 113 chapters in, three years, seven novels worth of words, you'd think I'd have, you know, PICKED UP on the fact that I'm VERBOSE AF. ALWAYS. But nope! I was legit worried I wouldn't be able to fill out this chapter. And then the Muse heard the name 'Andy Gallagher' and was all "hold my Chai Tea Latte."

[head thud]

Bobby Losing His Temper: Also, writing Bobby getting angry at the kid was hard. I had to quit that part and come back to it several times. It was just one line and everyone is allowed to lose their temper but gaaaaah, I did not like it.

Bunker Key: Also, Also. How'd you all like that reminder that the bunker key's still just hanging out in Bobby's desk, just waiting. Huh? Huh? Huh? [immediately ducks for cover, chortling in many a no good, dirty rotten way] I swear, I am teasing and taunting because I can, but it is coming. By the end of Season 2, cross my heart! (and we're finally, finally not that far away from that finale!)

(…which still means like…twenty chapters away because…you know, verbose af [head thud])

((because we're only got one episodic case left between us and the finale, but that'll be at least three chapters, probably four or five, and then there's setup for the finale, and that'll be at least three damnit, and then the actual finale and lord knows how long that'll actually be. Sweet jesus.))

(((but I swear, we're close. So close.)))

Sarge: Also, Also, Also. About Sarge. So waaaay back in Season 1, I allowed Rumsfeld to meet the same fate as he did on the show, but I couldn't bring myself to write or even acknowledge that I'd done it. I swore to myself many, many years ago that I'd never kill off a dog in my writing – it's something I can't really handle to be honest. I can beat Dean within an inch of his life and put Sammy through withdrawal, but hurt a dog? NOPE.

But then I ran headlong into this story without thinking, at all, about Rumsfeld and changing his fate, right up to the point where Meg had already shown up and I realized I had done nothing to change how that happened. So I had to stay committed to the canon story line because there was no reason it would change on its own and I'd messed up by not realizing I needed Rumsfeld mentioned, safe and inside, earlier. But rather than admit that, I just…ignored it. And then felt bad about it for years. Years, guys. Because it wasn't just sloppy of me, it's that I knew even then that I could do better and just…chose not to. I've been a bit ashamed of that ever since.

So! Sarge is my apology to myself, to all of you, and to Bobby for taking away his dog without even acknowledging that I'd done it. And while I will never promise the well-being of any other character in any of my writing (because I'm a no good, dirty rotten author), Sarge is safe. I will never kill another dog in my writing.

Alrighty, that's it from me! (Damn was I chatty today) See y'all in two weeks! :D

Cheers,
Silence

UPDATE 3/5/2022: Alright, once again total apologies for the radio silence for weeks! It's been a very busy month at work which hasn't left much free time + I'm exhausted when I do have the free time. Also, and this is the most devistating: I'M OUT OF WRITTEN CHAPTERS D: [insert image of me wailing here. No, no, that's not dramatic enough. Really amp it up. Yeah, there you go. That's me right now] I've got the next chapter half written but dangit...I should never have said aloud that I thought these next few chapters would write themselves. That damn Muse perked right up and said, "What? Sweet! VACAY!!" To which I cried out "No, wait, I meant that you're the one who's going to write them-aaaand she's gone." Then, of course, the cosmos chimed in to say "dun, dun, duuuuun" Really, it's been a very exciting couple weeks over here -.- I will keep writing as much as I can as often as I can, and get you a chapter soon as it's written. Until then, thank you so much for your patience, understanding, and pokes!

Chapter 114: Season 2: Chapter 80

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: I'm so sorry for the long delay again, everyone! I am still trying to establish a writing routine while working from home (aaaand struggling with the 'routine' bit of that). Luckily, I keep writing these beasts of chapters in the meantime, so you guys get nice long updates when they come.

Chapter Reference - Andy Losing his Powers: Quick reminder since it has been a long time now, Andy lost his powers when another psychic, Jonathon slashed his throat with a knife.

Chapter Reference - Dean Missing Chest Cas: Since Rivergrove, the warmth in his chest that was the sliver of Cas's grace has been missing. Castiel has confirmed it is still there, just weak and slowly growing in strength again, but Dean hasn't felt evidence of that yet.

Quality Warning: Man, I edited this thing so sporadically over so many days that I can't even tell you I got it all. I may have missed some sections. Please forgive any errors and, as always, apologies for any disturbance they cause to the story. I'm working on that beta thing (I...think)

Chapter Warnings: What started out as your favorite author writing five paragraphs about the boys calling it a night turned into five pages of Sam calling it a night and then Dean, the next morning, adding another five pages about him calling it a night the night before -_- But after we spend an ENTIRE CHAPTER'S LENGTH just saying goodnight to one another, we spend another chapter's length educating Ronald, eating pancakes, painting fences with blood, and playing fetch with Sarge. Yup. We got a lot to cover (and also...like, nothing at all?) so let's get to it.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 80

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

They decided to call it a night not long after. Ronald finally subsided in his panic (mostly), promised by the Winchesters several times over to have the rest of the supernatural world explained to them – specifically the teleporting bit – and the guarantee that the shifter in the bank had been taken care of. Well, that and the threat of being knocked unconscious by their resident…erm…. Actually, Dean had avoided telling the freaked out (if not normally entirely too enthusiastic) man the identity of their rescuer. He left it at, 'Yes, Ronald, she's not human. It's fine, she's with us.'

Dean couldn't exactly say he trust Ronald not to run his mouth to every single hunter he might meet from this day onward about the angel who'd rescued them from a shifter. Most hunters wouldn't believe him, which might be lucky for the Winchesters, but not so much for the future hunting career Ronald may or may not take up. Dean was more worried about the hunter that did believe him. All it would take was the wrong one and they'd have a whole new can of ugly to deal with.

Luckily, just Cas's presence in the same room as the panicking man made him…well, not any less panicky, but slightly more behaved.

With the promise of more information tomorrow, Ronald reluctantly agreed to let it be for the rest of the night. Bobby fetched a spare sheet and blanket, tossing both of them at the larger man then pointing at the couch in the den with the kind of eyebrow that begged to be argued with. With the boys upstairs and Andy camping out in his van for the evening, the couch was the last open bed in the house, minus Angela's hospital bed upstairs. Of course, Bobby wasn't fool enough to offer that up to anyone, both for the questions said person might have as to why there was an empty hospital bed in his guest bedroom, or the rage-storm it would surely stir up from Dean. Boy was damn sensitive about things he perceived as his angel's, and Bobby'd sure caught onto that quirk damn quick.

Ronald obediently set up his makeshift bed without a word (though not without at least some pouting, definitely some lingering confusion, and occasional wary glances towards the angel standing next to a yawning Dean in the kitchen).

Sam had to be dragged away from his laptop, which he'd immediately set up while everyone else in the house had been calming Ronald down. News coverage of the bank robbery was not looking particularly good for them on the internet. Dean told him to 'leave it' which got him a lecture from Sam and Bobby, before he reminded them both he was from the damn future, he knew what it friggin' meant for them, thank you very much.

(Which triggered an entirely new, second round of freaking out on Ronald's behalf until Cas, without prompting, did just knock him out again. He fell perfectly onto the couch he'd just finished making up, and they left it at that with the guarantee from the angel that he would not be waking until morning.)

Dean gave up trying to pull his brother away from the news hunt despite the wee hours of the morning they were creeping into. He needed sleep more than he needed Sam to get sleep, so he gave up with a toss of his arms in the air and headed for the stairs. Cas followed the older Winchester without a word, and Bobby pushed the laptop closed much to Sam's protests. The older hunter just pointed towards the stairs with a no-nonsense glare, and the younger Winchester retreated with a pout all his own.

-o-o-o-

When Sam walked into the room he shared with his brother, the hunter pulled up short at the sight of Cas sitting on the edge of Dean's bed. His brother was already passed out, snoring on his back with one arm thrown over his head. The angel, however, was perched on the very edge of the bed, somehow simultaneously looking solid as a rock and like she might fall off the sliver of mattress she'd taken for herself with the smallest of weight shifts.

The hunter did a second double take when he realized Bobby's new dog, Sarge, was laying at the angel's feet, watching him with dark eyes.

Sam didn't move from his spot at the door, feeling for just a moment like he was interrupting something private. Something weirdly intimate. Well, except for the dog. That was just plain weird.

The whole thing was weird. And silly, really, because Dean was asleep and Cas was…well…Cas. As far as Sam knew, she didn't do intimate. At least not in any form that she'd then be embarrassed of.

So instead the younger Winchester cleared his throat, gave the angel a nod, and headed for his own bed. Pajamas were for people significantly less dead on their feet than the Winchesters, so Sam just pulled off his boots and prepared to climb under the covers. He paused again, eyeing Cas out of his peripheral, but the angel hadn't so much as twitched a muscle, let alone move.

"Thank you," Sam blurted out suddenly, though the unintended comment was no less sincere for its abruptness.

Cas turned her head to meet Sam's eyes, a slight pinch in her brow and miniscule head tilt giving away her confusion. Sam cleared his throat again.

"For, uh…" Saving Dean's life? Coming for them? The rescue from the bank and a last second save from life in prison? What Sam settled on, with a dart of brown eyes to Dean's sleeping form, was, "for watching out for him."

Which was really what the angel was doing now, wasn't it? Watching over the older Winchester. Over all of them, really (though Sam couldn't help but note it wasn't him Cas had followed upstairs). Dean had said, on more than one occasion, with more than just a little grump, that Castiel had no sense of personal space. Liked to watch them while they slept, he'd said, but even back then Sam had been pretty sure 'us' was really a 'me.' And sure enough, that's what Cas seemed intent to do. Watch over Sam's brother.

Intimate or not, private or not, it made Sam feel a lot better. And that's what he was thanking the angel for, he supposed, even more than saving Dean's life. His brother was a moron and a martyr. If anyone needed an angel watching over him, it was Dean.

Cas opened her mouth to respond but then tilted her head further to the side, listening. Sam was sure it was Angela she was listening to, so he waited. After a moment, Castiel righted her head and just nodded at Sam, accepting his thanks without verbal reply.

The younger Winchester was too tired to contemplate the conversation he hadn't been privy to, or what Cas might have said without Angela's input. So instead he climbed onto the mattress, just barely holding back a groan as his body sunk into the springs and his eyes closed without conscious thought. Before he could reach for the light that sat on the nightstand between the two beds, it went off on its own. Another thing to thank the angel for, Sam supposed, but didn't bother vocalizing. Instead, he lay on his side, covers pulled up to his chin, and opened his eyes to the outline of brother and angel, visible in the faint moonlight filtering through the window.

"Cas?"

"Yes, Sam?"

The younger hunter wondered if Castiel could see him in the dark. Did angels have night vision? He worked on slowing his breathing, even though he knew sleep was far away that night. It wouldn't really do much good to have an angel know how on the brink he was. Even now, safe at Bobby's…at least for the moment.

And wasn't that just the whole thing? For the moment. For the moment was turning into the rest of his life, wasn't it? Just one more quiet moment between next storm, and the one after that, and the one after that.

Sam didn't know how he was supposed to keep doing this.

"How did you know?" The younger Winchester hesitated to say more. Unsure how to say more. But when Cas didn't respond, and Sam could basically picture her head tilt in the dark, he amended, "That Dean…." He cleared his throat, past the lump that had formed there hours ago and didn't seem ready to disappear anytime soon. "That we needed you?"

"The wound in Dean's shoulder," Cas replied after a moment. Her voice was deep as always, but she wasn't whispering despite the snores beside her. Dean kept right on sleeping, though. For some reason, that annoyed Sam instead of comforted him. "It was too close to the grace in Dean's chest. I felt the injury not unlike it was my own."

If Sam could see in the dark like Castiel indeed could, he might have noticed the pensive look that stole over the angel's face. It was a troubling fact, her ability to sense Dean's wound from so far away, whilst in the middle of a deep trance. A troubling fact she added to the list of other troubling things regarding that sliver of grace that Dean always immediately disregarded.

"I woke from the healing trance due to the irritation."

Sam had to cough to cover the snort. Of course an angel would feel a two inch, brass-coated, .300 caliber sniper round as a minor irritation. But that cough cleared quickly as the angel's statement sunk in. Sam propped himself up on an elbow, staring at the silhouette of Cas in the dark.

"Shit, are you- are you okay?"

It hadn't even occurred to him that Cas might still be injured. She'd appeared so perfectly fine he'd almost forgotten she was hurt to begin with. Another of the things Dean would gripe and grumble about during those stories: Cas's tendency to dismiss damn near mortal injuries like they were papercuts.

"Yes. My healing was near completion. I can finish recovering while fully cognizant from now on."

"Oh." Sam realized with that exhale of sound that he'd been holding his breath. He let the rest of it out as well, lowering himself back to the mattress with a squeak from an errant spring. "That's- uh, that's great."

"You should sleep, Sam," came Castiel's voice once more, no quieter but somehow…softer. Or maybe Sam was just imaging it.

"Yeah," he whispered, then cleared his throat and repeated the word louder. "Yeah, um, of course. Thanks. Again."

And so the household slept under the guard of an angel. Now known criminals on the run, hunted by the FBI, having narrowly escaping death or arrest. Dean slept like the dead. The same couldn't be said for Sam, who kept track of his brother's breathing well into the night.

At least until their angel stood up, walked over to his bedside, and placed two fingers to his forehead. The last thing he remembered was the mattress dipping as something dog-sized jumped onto the bed and curled up next to him.

-o-o-o-

The milk was almost bad.

It tasted alright, mostly, with just a hint of sour tinge on the tip of his tongue, but the smell was worse. Not bad enough not to drink. He'd already poured the cereal, after all, but he'd probably have to dump the rest of it when he was done. It wasn't going to last another day, and he didn't want it stinking up the fridge once it did go.

It was pretty full, too. What a waste.

Cole Trenton hunched over the cheap laminate countertop of his temporary accommodations and ate his breakfast standing. He wouldn't call this place home; it wasn't. It was just the place the military most often put him up in when he was stateside from his latest tour. A week here, a month there. They insisted he take the time off and 'recuperate.' Problem was, Cole wasn't the recuperating type.

He'd tinker with a couple side projects, dig into that old file he had on his father's cold case, which had turned over no new leads in more than a decade. Really, he'd just putz around, pretending he wasn't twitching to get back out there and onto the next deployment.

The TV flickered on the edge of his vision, and he glanced at the screen showing the outside of a bank, helicopter flying by and search lights illuminating the skyscraper. A newscaster was narrating over the footage, discussing an incident with armed robbers and a handful of hostages. One of the bank employees had been killed and the robbers were still at large.

Cole wasn't really paying the story much attention. He liked having the news on in the background whenever he cooked. Which, considering this was his usual breakfast routine, wasn't that often. But he was a damn good cook when he actually took the time.

He raised a spoon full of cheerios, dripping milk back into his bowl, when the TV flashed to three images the men who had robbed Milwaukee International Bank. Cole dropped the spoon, heedless of the splash of milk it created as he stared down the face of his father's murderer.

The man in the photo was older, as well he should be given the ten years that had passed since Cole had last seen him. But it was him. He'd never forget those eyes. Those cold, monstrous green eyes that had watched him, stared up at him, standing over his father's body, covered in blood that was still warm and dripping.

Cole set the cereal bowl down with a calm that only came from years of training and the kind of patience that let a man pursue his father's murderer without stop for more than a decade. He jabbed a finger against the television screen, right between the eyes of the man identified as Dean Winchester, wanted by the FBI.

"Got you."

The FBI would have to get in line. By the end of the week, Cole Trenton would be reported AWOL when he failed to show up for his next assignment.

-o-o-o-

When Dean woke up the next morning, Cas was gone. It was kind of a relief as much as it wasn't. When the angel had followed him into the bedroom the night before, it took Dean several moments to even realize she was there. Moments that he spent stripping off his flannel and grabbing the hem of his t-shirt before he noticed. Then he just stood there, arms crossed, shirt half raised, belly bare as the day he'd been born. And Cas just stared right back.

Dean had thought about it. He really had. But he also knew the answer. He'd lived through the answer multipletimes.

Do you mind?

And Cas would just tilt his – uh, her – head and say, 'No' or 'Mind what?'

So, with a near silent sigh (because seriously, where was Dragon Lady in moments like these, huh?), Dean lowered his shirt back down without a word. Guess sleeping in his clothes was one less step between him and bed, and he was too damn tired to have that conversation or the déjà vu that would come with it. But he was taking off his jeans. Jeans were damn uncomfortable to sleep in, exhausted or not, and it wasn't like angel or dragon had never seen a man in underwear before.

Once down to boxers and tee, Dean climbed under the blankets with a groan that was purposefully lecherous, just because he friggin' could. Let Dragon Lady explain that.

God, he was tired. It wasn't hours of grave-digging in the cold kind of exhausted. Not the burning muscles, numb fingers, and aching feet. Nor the sorta dog-tired you got after a beat down, drag-out fight filled with bruises and the adrenaline of life or death. Nah, the bank hadn't been any of that. Not like their usual cases. Just four hours of pure stress and tension that left him tight and twitchy.

Not to mention the bullet he took to the chest.

The hunter took a deep breath and tried to let go of all that tension as he let it out. It didn't work worth a damn, so he tried again. All that yoga shit, meditation, calming crap Sam had tried to teach him over the years. Not that any of it had taken.

With a frustrated sound, Dean gave up any pretense of sleeping and rubbed at his shoulder and the memory of that pain. He'd been damn tired years ago of near death experiences, and traveling back to a younger, fresher body hadn't changed that one bit. He was so damn tired of nearly dying.

"Is something wrong with your chest?"

The hunter practically jumped under the covers. Shit, he'd nearly forgotten Cas was in the room. Habit, he figured, from all those times when the angel had literally watched him while he slept and he'd eventually tuned the presence out. Only way he could sleep, knowing he was being watched.

Dean picked his head up, eyeing Cas who stood at the literal foot of the bed. With a much more reasonable groan, he dropped his head back to the pillow.

"Phantom pain," he muttered, keeping his eyes closed like that, alone, could put him to sleep. There was something else, though, and he knew it. Despite reassurances from Cas that her counterpart still existed in his chest, Dean hadn't felt him. Weeks – weeks – since Rivergrove and he hadn't felt that warmth in his chest, that physical guarantee that his friend was still there. That he wasn't alone.

Right now, all he felt was the phantom cold of death, spreading from his shoulder and into his soul.

He shivered violently, which just pissed him off all the more, and then Cas was next to him. Dean's eyes popped open, looking up at the angel staring down at him. She was silent, those piercing eyes waiting him out. It only took a second – either he was too used to losing to those eyes or too tired to play the game – before Dean sighed, closing his eyes.

"Is Cas- uh, chest Cas…is he alright?"

At the silence that didn't answer his question, Dean slid one eye back open. Cas was staring down at him, head tilted ever so slightly to the side like she was solving a particularly difficult puzzle. Dean cleared his throat self-consciously, already beating himself up for even asking in the first place.

"The, uh, the bullet didn't…you know…hurt him or something?"

God, it sounded stupid out loud. So stupid. Cas was an angel. Not even one with a body, just pure grace, however sliver-y and small, so of course a bullet wouldn't hurt him. But Dean couldn't shake it. Not being able to feel his friend's presence, after all this time with him as a roomie…. Call it some co-dependent shit, whatever. He needed to know. He needed to hear it, if he couldn't friggin' feel it for himself, damnit.

Cas stared at him for another second, eyes as unreadable as they always had been before the angel fell that first time. But she reached her hand out, splaying it across his chest. Dean managed not to suck in an expectant breath in anticipation of that flip-flop joy he knew he wouldn't feel. God, he only felt colder.

As he stared at the angel expectantly, waiting for her verdict (telling himself it was so stupid the entire time), he tried to ignore his brain. It was busy telling him he'd be warmer if there wasn't a couples layers of cloth between her hand and his chest.

He shut his eyes and pretended he hadn't just thought that. Pretended there wasn't something happening in the room with them. Between them.

Stupid female vessel. That's all this was, dangit.

"He is still there," Cas spoke quietly, hand splayed against his blanketed chest. Green eyes popped back open and the human took a shaky breath in. "He is unharmed, Dean. Just weak."

"Thanks."

She withdrew her hand, but remained like a statue beside him.

"You gonna stand there all night?"

That head tilt was unfairly cute on a female vessel. (Which was a total lie. It had been unfairly cute on a male vessel too, Dean just tried not to think about that. Cute like a baby in a trench coat was cute, of course.)

"Yes."

Dean snorted, but ultimately moved his legs to make space on the mattress for an angel's ass (and he was absolutely not putting adjective – cute or otherwise – in front of that one). "At least sit down, or something. You're gonna give yourself a cramp."

The angel seemed about to respond to that (and Dean could already hear the answer: Angels do not get cramps) but instead closed her mouth and settled, primly, on the very edge of the mattress. And he meant very edge. Dean doubted she even had one full cheek on that bed, but that was an argument he was so not ready to have. It's not like he'd win it anyway. He hadn't in the past, after all. Er. Future. Future past. No…past future? Whatever.

"Sleep, Dean," the angel ordered, voice deep and gravely as ever, but also soft. She leaned towards him, two fingers reaching for his forehead. He didn't fight what he knew was coming. Told himself he was too tired to, rather than admit how much he was craving that comforting touch or the oblivion it would bring. "You are thinking loudly again."

Dean didn't even finish the next snort before it turned into a snore.

Unbeknownst to the man riding high to snooze-town on an Angel-Ambien, Sam walked in only seconds later. Not that the Sasquatch was there now. The second bed was empty, though the tussled blankets at least reassured the older Winchester that Sam had gotten some level of sleep. Dean quickly changed out of yesterday's clothes, digging out a pair of jeans and a faded band shirt from the closet. He'd have to restock the spare threads they usually kept at Bobby's house. But hell, it was about time to do laundry anyway. Maybe they could stay a day or two, lay low, refuel a bit.

Although, with Henriksen on their tail (surely both desperate and pissed after this latest disappearing act…) they should probably stay on the move for a while. God, he hated being wanted by the feds. Life on the run was nowhere near as glamorous as Hollywood made it out to be.

Dean ventured downstairs biting back yawns and hoping someone had the grace (translation: intelligence) to make coffee. He could hear the TV – or what turned out to be Sam's computer playing a news broadcast – before he made it to the kitchen. Kid had apparently picked up the search right where he'd left it the night before.

At least there was coffee, he thought, making a beeline past Sam, Andy, and Castiel, all sitting at the kitchen table like some sort of obliviously effed up family breakfast time straight outta the twilight zone. Speaking of breakfast, Bobby was standing over the stove wearing an apron that said, 'kiss the cook' andan early-morning frown that said 'don't even think about it', while making honest to god pancakes. Not that the man hadn't cooked plenty a time for the boys as they stayed throughout the years, but never for a crowd, and never under such odd circumstances.

Okay, not true. Dean definitely remembered weirder 'family' breakfasts or dinners, usually right before they were gearing up to take on the end of the world. Last meal of sorts, when they had time to have 'em.

But there was nothing like that happening now. Unless Bobby thought making the FBI's most wanted list deserved a Last Supper.

Actually… knowing Bobby like he did, Dean really wouldn't put it past the man. As a statement of protest to the situation if nothing else. Not that Dean would listen to such a thing. He'd sure eat his weight in pancakes, regardless, though.

Bobby gave him the side-eye first and a raised brow second as Dean settled against the counter beside him, sipping at his mug of liquid gold. The hunter ignored him in favor of observing the little crowd gathered at the old man's rickety old kitchen table. Cas and Andy were speaking together. At first, Dean just stared at the angel fluently Signing with the kid before he remembered, oh, right, angel. Cas knew every language (not that Dean knew where he stored it all). Why wouldn't American Sign Language be included in that? Beside them, but not actively part of the conversation, Sam was glued to that damn computer once again. It didn't take much listening for Dean to figure what it was he was watching, too.

"One bank employee is confirmed dead, though we cannot release a name at this time. It is believed all three suspects are at still at large, two of which have been linked to previous crimes in California and Maryland. If you have seen any of these men, or have any information on their whereabouts, please contact your local authorities immediately or call the number appearing on your screen now to be connected to the FBI tip line."

Dean spared half a glance at the pictures now on display on Sam's laptop screen. There was a still image of himself, popping his head out of the bank while escorting the guard to the medics (he knew he should have stayed inside and just wished Mr. Okie Dokie the best with the panic attack, but it's not like this was much of a change over last time), a photo of Sam the authorities clearly got from Stanford at some point (probably after the Baltimore fiasco), and possibly the most awkward photo of Ronald, wide eyed, crazy-haired, with nothing but a white wall as a backdrop. An ID photo presumably taken by his last job.

Sheesh. No wonder he got let go.

The hunter turned away from the screen, using the opportunity to refill his already half-empty coffee cup before crossing to the table to oversee what Cas and Andy were up to. Whatever passionate discussion they were having, Dean wasn't privy to. Unlike Sam, who'd spent whatever free time they got – in the car, in the motels before calling it quits at night, or in the cafes and diners while waiting on food – learning ASL, Dean hadn't picked up much more than what Andy taught him in person.

He probably should have gotten Sam to give some lessons as well, come to think of it.

"Whatcha chatting about?" he asked conversationally, leaning against Cas's chair, hip brushing her shoulder. He could feel the muscles in her arm flex and extend as she Signed.

Andy smiled up at him, but gestured at Cas to speak in his stead.

"I offered to heal his injuries."

Dean was gobsmacked for a second time that morning, once again staring at the angel while his brain caught up. It didn't help that despite the clear miracle she was offering, the angel spoke so monotonously.

"Well, that's great!" Dean exclaimed before he'd really thought about it. Pretty much just blurted out the first thought that came to mind when that mind started functioning again.

Although, inevitably, that thought came.

If Cas had healed the kid, why were they still using Sign?

Andy was already shaking his head with quick little lurches side to side. He raised his hand, first to point at himself and then, so fluidly that Dean almost missed the first part, flattened it out, raising that hand to his nose and swiping down into his other palm in what was almost a passing clap. Dean frowned, completely unaware of what the kid had actually said, but a bad kinda feeling was forming in his gut from context alone.

"He declined," Cas translated, craning her neck to look at Dean.

"What?" the hunter blinked, then blinked again, gaze darting between the two like he was watching a tennis match. Or, since Dean Winchester would never attend a tennis match, two scantily clad strippers about to get in a cat fight. Although, in this case, he was way less excited about the outcome.

He settled incredulously on Andy. "Why?"

The kid just smiled at him, that kind of peaceful expression so full of both regret and acceptance it practically floored the hunter who'd seen – and done – just about everything. Dean kinda felt the need to sit down under the glow of that sad little smile. Andy shrugged, but the hunter didn't need ASL to understand him in that moment. Memories of his own sins and the payments he'd made in their name over the years – on Earth, in Heaven, and down below – flitted through his brain like a bad home video. Nothing but regret for the sins and acceptance of the costs.

Son of a bitch.

He got it. Even if it didn't make sense – shouldn't make sense – it made sense to him. Sometimes the talents you had put you in ugly places. Just like sometimes, the ugly places you got put in gave you talents you didn't always wish you had.

Hell, Dean would get rid of several talents of his own if he could. Or, in this case, might not ask for back if they had been taken away by, let's say, a psycho kid with a knife.

So he clasped Andy on the shoulder and squeezed. Yeah, he got it. The kid's hand settled briefly on his, Andy giving him an understanding nod, before Dean withdrew his hand. The silence stretched, one second ticking into the next, and then they were shuffling or shifting weight or mock-coughing to pass the awkwardness of the man-moment they'd just had.

Enough so that even Sam picked his head up from the laptop to glance at them, clearly wondering why no one was talking.

Dean cleared his throat, ready to say something to change the topic, when a plate plopped down on the table loudly enough to do it for him. It was stacked high with pancakes, and when Dean looked up, Bobby had his hands on his hips, apron hitched up, eyebrows raised. The the older man reached over Sam's shoulder a second time and closed his laptop for him, just in case the continued news obsession seemed like an open option.

Cackling, Dean pulled up a chair and sat on the corner between Andy and Cas, grabbing himself a pancake (which he passed between his hands like a game of hot potato before Bobby, muttering under his breath and yet very audibly, grabbed a stack of plates and set them on the table as well. Loudly). Sam rolled his eyes, but decided he would at least eat something before daring to open the computer again. As Andy dug in third, Dean gave the angel on his right a side-eyed glance. When it was clear she had no intention of indulging, he nudged her with an elbow.

"Come on, Cas. Grab a pancake." The 'you've earned it' was more than implied, not that Cas would hear it or understand even if she did.

The angel frowned at the diminishing pile of fluffy, lightly steaming discs sitting in the center of the table.

"I do not require sustenance."

And Dean was glad for that. An angel that required food was a hurting angel, and Dean didn't want to see Cas like that if he could help it. Shit, they'd just gotten Cas back from that. But this was pancakes they were talking about. That wasn't 'sustenance'. It was…well, come on. It was pancakes!

"Come on, man. This is what saving the world's all about."

Dean reached for a pancake, realizing too late that Bobby had only put three plates on the counter. Fair, since it's not like he'd ever seen the angel eat before. So Dean pushed his plate between himself and the angel, offering Cas his fork.

Across the table, Sam damn near choked on his own syrupy breakfast. In his life, outside of himself when he was a kid (and that had ended when he'd turned about thirteen) he had never seen Dean share food willingly. Even when Dean had offered up some of his meal for his kid brother, it was only ever after Sam pulled out the big puppy eyes. The dangerous ones that Jess had once told him were the equivalent of the nuclear option, and he ought to use those things more carefully.

But here Dean was. Going halfsies over breakfast with an angel.

Thank God it wasn't dinner with Bobby cooking pasta or they'd have a straight up Lady and the Tramp moment on their hands, Sam was sure of it.

(Given the waggling eyebrows and barely bit-back grin Andy was sending Sam's way, his thoughts were right along the same page.)

Castiel eyed the fork with clear wariness, but took it from Dean's hand. "I do not see how a mixture of flour, water, and egg, heated and covered in tree sap is a worthy cause to avert the Apocalypse."

The whole table blinked at the sass (even Bobby over at the stove, cooking up a second batch, glanced over his shoulder at that one). Andy wasn't even hiding how hard he was cracking up anymore. Dean looked at Sam, who had no idea how to respond, before grinning like an idiot.

"Well, now you're definitely having one." He pushed the plate a little closer as if to emphasize the statement. Diligently, Cas used the fork to cut a triangular shape in the top pancake, then gently stabbed it and placed the food in her mouth. She chewed slowly while the entire table watched, at least until Dean rolled his eyes and stole his fork back.

"It's world-saving," he affirmed, almost grumpily though the entire room knew it was for show at that point. He stabbed his own piece, far more violently, swirled it in syrup, and popped the ridiculously dripping mess into his mouth. Still chewing, he used the fork to jab in Cas's direction. "Totally worthy. You just don't know."

"Are you still feeling alright, Cas?" Sam asked, seemingly out of the blue for the others in the room. "No lapse in healing, or anything?"

Swallowing, Cas tilted her head as if the question didn't make much more sense to her. "Yes, Sam. You needn't worry. The healing trance-"

"Oh yeah," Dean interrupted through the same mouth full of food. "You were supposed to be sleeping. How'd you know we were in trouble anyway?"

Sam stared at his brother, wholly unimpressed. Dean pulled his head back at the look, even as Cas responded, "I heard your prayer and also felt-"

"I didn't pray to you." The older Winchester was staring at the angel, frowny face in full on frown mode.

The angel just raised her eyebrows. It was a look Dean had come to equate, on any vessel, as are you an idiot or just special? He was pretty sure he'd seen it on Anna first, and she must have taught Cas. Cuz it wasn't long after meeting her that his angel started using it plenty.

"You did."

Dean grumbled into his stack of pancakes that no, he didn't.

"I also felt the wound."

His fork slipped on the plate with a ceramic screech. "Sorry, what?"

"The injury was too close to your soul. The grace there alerted me." Dean blinked, exchanging worried looks with Bobby and Sam. It was news to Bobby, who sure as hell didn't look okay with it. Sam, on the other hand, was nonplussed. Castiel seemed to agree with the concern of the first two. "It is worrying. We should discuss options to remove the grace-"

"Yeah, yeah, we can talk about it later. You're okay, right?" The room shifted into a stunned, awkward silence as Dean changed the topic, pretty damn blatantly too. Not that his innocent, let's-move-on-it-doesn't-matter look gave it away. He was busy looking Cas up and down, like there might be residual physical damage from her injuries (not that there had been before). "Your healing got cut short and you said you, uh, felt the bullet. But, um, you're okay now, though… right?"

Cas nodded. "The trance was almost complete. I will be fine healing while awake."

"Hell yeah," the hunter beamed, digging back into his food. "Angel on board!"

"On board what?"

Dean didn't even let Cas's obliviousness bother him. He nudged the top pancake with his fork. "Just shut up and eat your breakfast."

Cas continued to glare – or the equivalent of a glare for the angel – but grabbed the fork from Dean's hand, much to his protest. Sam considered getting up and grabbing another fork, but why interrupt the happy couple?

"It takes like molecules," Cas practically muttered before stabbing another piece and diligently eating it.

"Molecules of deliciousness," Dean grumbled back before reclaiming his fork and plate, declaring her and her taste buds a lost cause.

Another plate clattered down on the table, loudly, causing all occupants but Andy to jump. Unlike the others, he'd seen Bobby coming with the newest plate-load of food. The benefits of taking the seat that faced the kitchen.

"You all wanna keep honeymooning, or shall we talk business?" the old man grumped. He was eyeing both hunter and angel, the former of who choked on his bite of pancake and blamed that for the reason he was blushing redder than a tomato. Cas just looked up at Bobby expectantly, not entirely sure what businessthere was to discuss and waiting on him to indicate a topic.

"Sure, Bobby." Sam, ever the mediator, took the opportunity (excuse) to open his laptop back up.

They took a few minutes in and among bites of pancake to talk about what being chased – really chased – by the FBI meant for all of them.

"Don't suppose you can fix that for us, huh?" Dean asked nonchalantly, casting the angel beside him a side-glance that was equally nonchalant. Perhaps a bit too much so. Cas was less beat-around-the-bush with her return look and the hunter shrugged. "Yeah, didn't think so."

Which meant they were going to need a whole new type of laying low. The topic turned to the how of it, which was when Dean remembered their lack of hex bags (geez, that felt like years ago now) and turned to Cas.

"We need more of those human toe mushrooms."

Andy choked on his tree-sap covered flour, water, and egg to the point where several at the table would have intervened, were it not for his flapping hand indicating he'd survive.

The unblinking stare the angel leveled Dean's way after that told him Cas had no idea what he was talking about more than any words she could have used would have. Dean opened his mouth to clarify (or make things worse, who knew) when Bobby harrumphed from where he was leaning against the counter. He lowered his fork, pancake hanging from the prongs, to give Cas a look that could only be described as kindergarten teacher.

"The idjit means they're outta the makings for those hex bags, and need more."

"Oh. Of course," Cas replied immediately once she understood what was being requested of her in a manner which made infinitely more sense. While she understood Bobby about as well as she understand any human (which was, admittedly, not particularly well), she did appreciate his tendency to be more straightforward than the older Winchester brother. "However, I believe the time for a more permanent solution to hide your whereabouts has come."

Dean pulled his head back for a third time that morning, frown forming between his eyes. "What do you mean more permanent- Gah!"

The hunter doubled forward with a gasp, Cas's hand pressing flat to his chest with little force but serious impact. There was a flash of pain – gone so fast he hardly registered it all – across his ribs. Then the angel was pulling back, leaving Dean sitting there, no worse for wear but certainly stunned. There was a vaguer sense of déjà vu than he was used to lately floating around the back of his eyeballs.

"What the hell," he breathed out, trying to remember how to do that normally. He rubbed at his chest, then poked at his ribs experimentally, suspicion forming pretty quickly as the surprise passed.

"Dean?" Sam asked cautiously, glancing between his brother and his brother's angel, computer momentarily forgotten. Behind him, Bobby had started forward, plate still in hand, that piece of pancake poised on his fork now forgotten about entirely. But Dean straightened up with a shake of his head to clear it and call them off. Both hunters settled back hesitantly.

"I'm alright," Dean confirmed, then glared at the angel who had surely just imprinted Enochian warding on his ribs for a second time in his life. "A little warning next time?"

Cas tilted her head, no doubt thinking about that little bell chime she'd used to announce her departure from the car last time Dean had a similar request. The human opened his mouth to tell her not to even dare when Sam interrupted. Unlike them, no one else in the room understood what had just happened.

"Uh, Cas?" he asked, drawing the angel's attention. "What…was all that?"

"I inscribed Enochian warding onto his ribs, as I will for the rest of you as well."

The physical step Bobby took back, bouncing right back off the kitchen counter, suggested that was going to be a big ole' no on his part. Sam looked slightly less apprehensive, but only slightly, as he glanced between brother and angel.

"It's fine," Dean grumbled, still rubbing at his chest. "Only hurts for a second and it's the damn definition of tamper proof. Trust me."

"I'll bet," Bobby huffed, still eyeing Dean up and down as well as Cas, like the angel might pounce on his rib cage if he turned his back for even a second. "Gotta be pretty damn hard to scrape that shit off."

Cas looked slightly perturbed by the imagery, but settled for a brisk, "Precisely. If I may?"

She held her hand out to Sam, whose reluctance was obvious in the way his gaze flickered to the appendage, then Dean. His older brother gave him nod, which was more reassuring than any single gesture really ought to be. So Sam nodded at the angel. She pressed her outspread hand to the larger man's chest and Sam took in a sharp breath, both surprised and pained, then surprised to no longer be in pain. Just like that, it was over and the angel retreated, turning to Andy. While Sam recovered his breathing, rubbing at his ribs just as Dean had, Andy stuck out his chest with absolutely no qualms whatsoever.

He let out the fist-equivalent of a "whoop!" followed by signing, 'What a rush!' once Castiel was done.

The angel turned to Bobby but the hunter raised his fork, pointing it at the woman before she could raise from her chair like he might beat her back with utensils alone. Dean didn't actually doubt he'd find a way to do it, too. This was Bobby, after all.

"Don't even think about it, Feathers. I'll pass."

"But-"

"I'm good," Bobby insisted sternly, eyeing Cas's hand like she planned to burn him rather than help hide him from prying eyes. "I'll stick to my own devices, thank you very much."

Castiel retreated back to her seat, glancing at Dean who just shook his head subtly. Confused but aware of her own shortcomings when it came to the intricacies of human nature, she relented, settling in the chair once more.

At least until their last houseguest came to, shooting himself right off the couch in the den, yelling to boot. Again.

-o-o-o-

Thinking it was best to get some distance between Ronald and the angel he kept eyeing warily all through their discussion of the events at the bank, the supernatural, and where they were and how they got there, Dean mentioned offhandedly that maybe Cas should go for a walk. When she stared uncomprehendingly at him, about to ask why she, an angel, would need to walk anywhere at this precise moment, Dean rolled his eyes, cleared his throat, and told her to go somewhere else for the next half hour, kay?

Picking up on what the hunter was getting at as he motioned not-so-subtly at the wary Ronald, Cas not-so-casually mentioned improving the warding around the Salvage Yard and promptly disappeared. Ronald leapt out of his seat at the sudden and visual proof of teleportation. At the same time, Bobby leaned backwards to holler out the nearest open window about how his house was perfectly damn safe as is, thank you very much.

Sarge picked his head up at the angel's departure, having been dozing on the rug in the middle of them all. Hardly caring about the human reaction to it all, which was far from quiet or calm, the Shepherd climbed to his feet and trotted out of the room, into the kitchen where they heard him push the screen door open. It closed behind him and Bobby shook his head, eyes raised heavenly, like he was praying for patience. He had no doubt the mutt would go walk the perimeter right alongside Cas. Sarge had formed some sort of natural affinity to the angel ever since she glared him into silence the night before. Never let her out of his sight, so much as he could help it.

Bobby was pretty sure the dog had gone upstairs with the angel last night. Which didn't have him grinding his teeth at all at the idea of his dog (technically Andy's dog, Bobby would insist (at least in any other argument but this one)), groveling after some angel just because she bossed him around with her mind, or whatever it was angels had that controlled their powers. Not at all.

Of course, Sarge was far from subservient in any definition of the term. The dog made for an intimidating figure even when he was dogging after Cas like she was the damn sunshine. He looked more like a personal bodyguard than a loyal companion.

Poor pup didn't seem to realize Cas needed little protecting. Not that the angel seemed to mind the company as the two disappeared among the cars that littered his property.

Angels.

Bobby snorted.

Dogs.

The departure of the angel left Dean and Bobby to finish explaining how things were to Ronald somewhat in peace. Sam might be in the same room, but he wasn't contributing to the conversation, instead focused on finding as much information as he could on Victor Henrisken and the FBI's file on them. His opinion of Ronald in general wasn't hard to figure out even if he hadn't put it into words since the bank. He wanted nothing to do with getting the chaotic, haphazard man into a life of hunting, believing the idiot would get himself killed the first time he went after something.

Dean figured the man was headed down that path no matter what anyone had to say about it, might as well prep him the best they could. Hopefully that would extend his lifespan further than Sam anticipated.

Andy was doing what Andy did best: sitting next to the man, occasionally commenting (to which Bobby had to translate), spooking the hell out of him with his telepathic imaging (to which Bobby still had to translate), messing with him after he was done freaking out, and just generally putting Ronald at ease in the most counter-productive, unlikely of ways. Like only Andy could in tense, unpredictable situations. It was clear within half an hour of the two men being in the same room that Andy was automatically Ronald's favorite, and the one he trusted most.

How Andy could do that every dang time, Dean would never really know.

By the end of the second hour mark, Ronald knew a little more about what was out there in the world, and how to fight it.

"But…if all that's real, how come nobody knows about it?" He glanced between Bobby and Dean, the spokespersons in this situation, even for Andy.

"Because it's just not that common," Bobby answered with his trademark harrumph. "Sure, hunters always got enough work between 'em, but there's what, three hundred million people in this country? Supernatural deaths don't account for more than one, maybe two hundred a year."

"Easier to write off the occasional unexplainable death than accept something you've been told your whole life isn't real," Dean added with a touch of bitterness. Ronald blinked at him, then lowered his gaze to his lap, where he was fiddling his fingers.

"And…her?" he glanced nervously out the window, in the same direction where Bobby had hollered at Cas. Dean followed his gaze, even though he couldn't see the angel out there. He could picture her, though, walking the perimeter, adding new sigils to the fence. Probably in her own blood.

"Cas is with us," Dean reiterated what he'd said last night, for all the good it did them. Ronald wasn't going to feel better about their mysterious savior until he knew who or what she was. And Dean wasn't telling him that. "You don't need to worry about her."

"But…she's….what is she?" he asked, not for the first time. "I mean… she's not…not human…right?"

"No, she's not," Bobby confirmed, earning himself a glare from Dean which he shot right back. He wasn't dumb enough to go talking about angels to a man he barely knew. Didn't his boy know that? "But Dean's right. She's on our side, and that's all you need to know."

Ronald didn't look satisfied, returning his gaze - significantly grumpier now – to his lap. Dean's gut twisted with a weird feeling he didn't like. "So…what now?"

"Now, we get you some wheels, set you up with a fake ID, and send you on your way." Dean put it pretty bluntly, leaving no room for an open ended invitation. They didn't need the mess that was Ronald Reznick added to the mess that was their own lives. But he could tell from Ronald's wide eyed look that getting him on his way wasn't going to be quite enough. He pointed at the man, waggling his finger until those big ole brown eyes focused solely on that digit. "You can't go home, Ronald."

"But-"

"You robbed a bank, you moron," Bobby grumbled, rolling his eyes. "Your old life is over. You can do whatever you want – hunt, don't hunt – but from now on you do it under the radar or off grid. You're wanted by the FBI for christ's sake."

"There's a bar," Dean interjected before Ronald could, "called the Roadhouse. Common hunter hangout. If you want to pursue this life, you can start there. Find someone to teach you the ropes, make sure you don't get yourself killed."

"Why can't you guys teach me the ropes?"

"Because we've got our own shit to deal with." It was Sam who answered, the first words he'd spoken in the conversation so far. He didn't even look up – kept his eyes on his laptop screen.

Dean cleared his throat. His brother wasn't wrong. "We're kinda busy with…something, Ronald. We don't have time for a trainee, alright?"

The larger man didn't look happy at that, but didn't argue either. Andy nudged him with an elbow and made a gesture that needed no translating. It would be okay. Amazingly, Ronald seemed to relax at that.

Both Dean and Bobby shook their heads. Andy, the friggin' mute Jedi.

-o-o-o-

When Dean found Cas, she was, indeed, painting Bobby's fence with her own blood. The hunter just shook his head at the sight – it was apparently a morning for headshakes – and walked up to her as she finished drawing the last sigil. They flashed with a bright, pure white light before fading out of existence entirely, soaked into the wood.

"Hello, Dean."

"Hey, Cas." He fell in step beside her as she moved to the next section of fence, arm still freely bleeding (which he tried not to think about). Sarge was a dozen feet back, sniffing at the pine needles and patches of dry grass smattered along the ground. Every so often he would freeze, duck his head real slow, and then pounce on the ground and start to dig.

Probably chasing mice, Dean figured, ignoring the amusement he felt. He didn't like dogs, damnit. Even if Sarge was a Shepherd like the Colonel, and the Colonel had maybe changed his mind, a little, about dogs.

Then again, he'd been using witchcraft that day, so who's to say the spell didn't mess with his mind. Because Dean Winchester didn't do dogs.

"Have you finished your conversation?"

He wasn't sure if that was an angel's way of asking if it was safe to return to the house. Close enough to it, probably. "Yeah. Ronald's gonna head out soon. Bobby's finding him some wheels."

The frown that formed on Cas's face, pinching her brow together between her eyes, was unfairly cute. Dean kept that to himself, wondering – not for the first time – what his brain's deal was lately. He could practically hear the angel asking what Ronald needed wheels for, but unlike the Cas from his time, this one had a dragon lady to explain.

That frown disappeared, and Dean told himself he was not disappointed. God, he needed to a drink. Or to get laid.

…That thought did not help anything, and Dean had to actively hold back a groan.

He cleared his throat awkwardly – not that Cas noticed – and decided to get to why he'd joined the angel out here in the first place. "I, uh, was thinking maybe you could…adjust his memory a bit."

Cas turned her head somewhat sharply in his direction from where she'd started painting on the last of the wood posts. She did not stop her sigil work, but her eyes were intense enough Dean wondered if he'd maybe just crossed a line. His Cas had done it before, not that the angel had been much happier about it that time, either.

The man from the future had to remind himself that were he came from, extreme measures weren't so out of place. Desperate times and all that. But they weren't in his time. At least not yet.

(Never, he promised himself fiercely).

Maybe he shouldn't have asked so cavalierly.

"I mean, erm…" Dean cleared his throat again, for entirely different reasons this time. "Ronald's gonna talk. Maybe not on purpose, but just look at the guy." He gestured offhandedly back towards the house, and Cas followed his arm like she might actually spot Ronald in that direction. "We didn't tell him what you were, but he's seen enough to cause trouble."

Not to mention that Dean was pretty sure he'd let slip a time-travel comment when he was bleeding out on the floor of the bank. He didn't really remember what – he'd been a little preoccupied at the time – but if Ronald got chatting with other hunters, it could come up.

They'd already had one near-fatal run-in with Gordon Walker. Dean really didn't want to find out what other hunters thought of the psychic, time-traveling Winchesters and their supernatural guard dog.

Dean had no illusions that Gordon had hunting buddies of his own. Some that might even visit him in prison. It was how he'd gotten out last time, Dean had been sure of it at the time. Which meant they were already going to have to keep an eye on that situation and the shit Gordon might spread. The Winchesters did not need one of those buddies running into a loud mouth Ronald Reznik.

"Is this something I did for you often in your timeline?"

The question wasn't necessarily unexpected, but it still hit Dean like a punch to the gut. He could tell from Cas's reserved tone that she disapproved of the request. Which meant she was now asking if this was something she was expected to do in her service of the Winchesters to save the world.

Something about that bugged the shit out of him, but Dean wasn't sure what. He was pretty sure it had to do with knowing his Cas had fought for them – with them – and Fallen because of his admiration – his love, really – for humans. For their free will, more than anything. A freedom that Dean was asking her – had asked him before – to violate, however minimally.

Or, you know, something like that. Probably.

"No," the hunter muttered somewhat hastily after catching his breath from that sucker punch. A sucker punch Cas didn't even know she'd delivered. "I, um…just once. And that time, it was…"

It was Lisa and Ben. They were…they were an exception. They'd been in danger, and he'd had to save them. He'd had to.

Now he was just sucker punching himself, damnit.

"I wouldn't ask if it wasn't important," he tried instead. Which, of course, made him immediately realize how much it wasn't. Not the way that really mattered. This wasn't like Ben and Lisa.

Ah, shit.

Dean rubbed a hand through his hair, scratching at his scalp in what should have been soothing but was, in fact, more punishing than anything.

"Forget it," he mumbled, dropping his hand.

Sarge, who was wondering up to them at that moment, startled at the sudden movement, then leaned in to sniff at Dean's fingers. He gave a quick, investigational lick, causing the hunter to let out a startled noise that sounded a lot like "Gyah!" The Shepherd tilted his head at the reaction, ears huge and sticking straight up. Dean, rubbing his hand on his jeans, stuck his tongue out him, but the dog's attention was suddenly elsewhere. His ear twitched, then turned towards the house. Sarge took off with a bark and ferociously wagging tale.

Probably a squirrel this time.

When Dean turned back to the angel, Cas was still watching him. She seemed to have forgotten that blinking was a thing. Dean cleared his throat for a third time, rubbing the back of his knuckles on his jacket absentmindedly. They still felt slimy.

"I, uh, I should probably take a page out of Sam's book on this one and just talk to him."

"Yes," Cas said with so little hesitation it was almost friggin' rude. Dean gave her some side-eye, not that she would notice. Dragon Lady would, though. Angela could explain it to her. "Communication does seem to be a less dramatic course of action."

The side-eye tripled in power. In fact, it turned into direct-eye by the time Dean was done whipping his head her way.

"Did Dragon Lady tell you to say that?" he asked, tone more than just a little suspicious.

Cas didn't answer, just stared with those piercing eyes. Dean was pretty sure he could see that dang devil lady behind those stupidly blue pools. The angel broke eye contact to heal her bleeding arm and pull down the sleeve of her coat.

Dean sighed, turning back towards the house with a resigned step. He could feel Cas at his back, following. Bobby and Ronald were out front, standing next to a roughly idling Camry, Sarge already with them. Guess Bobby had been the squirrel, then.

The dusty, sun-faded-gold sedan had clearly seen better days, but she was running and that was more than any hunter new to the game could really ask for. Ronald was eyeing it like the whole thing might fall apart at any minute. Dean knew he'd get over it by the time he realized how hard the life of a hunter actually was.

"Hey Ron, got a sec?" He walked up to the larger man, using his head to gesture away from the running vehicle and Bobby. The gruff old man reached through the driver's side window to turn the car back off even as Ronald, wide-eyed, followed Dean several paces away. "Look…about the bank, and how we got out of there…. You can't tell anyone."

The noobie hunter's eyes went wide, but Dean cut him off before he could interject.

"Other hunters, they don't know about Cas. And we gotta keep it that way." He tried to get Ronald to see the importance of this with the intensity of his gaze alone. He doubt it worked, but it did seem to scare the shit out of the man. Dean would take fear over understanding if it got him where he needed to be. "Cas is on our side, but some people aren't gonna see it that way. You get that?"

Ronald clearly didn't. He looked put out and confused – mostly the latter, but the guy pretty much had two types of expressions: ecstatic or pouting. Every emotion fell somewhere into those two. This version of the pout said he was torn between arguing and asking a thousand questions.

"I mean, we could just have Cas erase your memory," Dean continued, cheating a bit. Whatever got him where he needed to be, right? He could practically feel Cas's eyes snap onto his back, but he mentally told the angel to fuck off in case she was listening in. "I'm trying to give you a chance to do the right thing, here."

He might be compromising a bit, but a compromise was still communication. Dean was pretty damn proud of himself for this one, and he thought his angel should be too.

Ronald, on the other hand, made a sound suspiciously close to 'meep' and Dean sighed.

"Come on, man. She doesn't want to do that to you. She saved our skins back there," Dean exclaimed, gesturing vaguely back towards Bobby and the angel without actually turning to look at them. "Least we can do is make sure no one comes after her for it, right?"

Oddly enough, that seemed to click with the other man. He straightened up slightly, a glint of determination in his eye like a knight excepting a quest. Ronald nodded, his expression turning serious. Dean probably should have realized sooner that putting his request in terms of saving someone was going to get him where he needed to be with a lot less hassle. Ronald had the makings of a hunter, after all, and they all spoke a similar language: heroism or revenge. Or both.

Ronald gave another, more parting nod that wasn't awkward at all (no, not at all, Dean thought with a roll of his eyes), then turned and walked over to the angel. Cas, standing next to Ronald's new vehicle, all but milling about with Bobby (and what an odd sight that was), looked at the approaching man with a curious tilt of her head.

"I won't tell a soul," Ronald proclaimed, seemingly out of nowhere for the two who weren't a part of the conversation. Not that they couldn't figure out what had been said. Ronald raised one hand, folding his thumb and pinky together to leave three fingers raised. "Scout's honor."

Despite knowing that this version of Castiel had no idea what a scout was, Dean watched his angel nod back with all the same solemnity. A queen all but blessing her white knight. Dean resisted burying his head in his hand and wondered if he'd maybe taken a harder hit back at the bank (perhaps to his skull rather than his chest).

Maybe he was caught up in another one of Charlie's LARPing games. Or one of Gabriel's tricks. This had all the makings of a bunch of nerds. He was sure of it.

Bobby, who seemed to be on the same page as Dean, exaggeratedly cleared his throat, eyebrows near his hairline. "Well, now that that's out of the way…"

He gestured to the car in a less than gracious form of 'get in and get out of here already.'

Ronald made a little exclamation of "Oh, right!" and climbed in. It took a couple tries to get the engine going again, but then he was backing out of the salvage yard and flipping the Camry onto the main road. He turned left, heading towards state lines and the Roadhouse.

Dean exchanged a glance with Bobby, then gestured with his chin for Cas to follow them back inside. He wondered how long it would be before Ellen called, hollering at them for sending her such an unprepared mess.

-o-o-o-

It took four hours. Which was about six and a half minutes longer than it took to drive from Bobby's home to the Roadhouse.

Sam picked up the landline as it rang, immediately wincing and pulling away from the phone at the volume of whoever was on the other end of the line. He held the thing out for his brother with a scrunched up face. Dean took it with all the wariness of a member of the bomb squad.

"What do you think my bar is, a daycare?"

The older Winchester flinched at the tone even as he grinned. He couldn't help it. Ellen was a damn scary lady, but he didn't think he'd ever get tired of the tough mom routine.

"He's gotta learn from someone, Ellen, and all the best come through you."

The woman grumbled several things not fit for ears belonging to anyone but the dead or about to be, then the line clicked and he got a dial tone. Dean just laughed, tossing the phone back to his brother who hung it up.

They should probably make a point to swing by Nebraska sometime soon and drop off at least a case of beer and some info worth trading. Knowing Ellen, that would just be a start. She'd have them earning her forgiveness with months of the crappiest hunts.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: So, for reals, this chapter started out as five paragraphs about the boys calling it a night, Bobby forcing Sam to quit the computer, and then they slept, wanted men. AND THEN. I was like…oh, I should squeeze Sam chatting with Cas into that. That became FIVE PAGES. And then I took a break, and when I came back I was all, Oh, and some Dean and Cas! But…where…. And that turned into TEN PAGES which included a non-linear shift back in time to the night before [facepalm] Five paragraphs saying they went to friggin bed turned into TEN PAGES of just trying to go to bed. [insert staring at the ceiling here] Sweet Jesus, I am hopeless.

Not Healing Andy: For those of you who were asking me about Cas healing him, I hope this chapter explains it. Cas wasn't in any shape before now to do so, otherwise you know she'd try it as soon as she noticed. Hopefully it makes sense why Andy might refuse. Yes, part of it is pure author's motivation to keep him from becoming an overly-powerful character, but the majority of it is actually character-based. With the growth I gave him through this story, I think Andy might naturally come to an acceptance of his injury and his new place in the world due to it. I think Webber's power and the possibility of his own scares the shit out of him a lot more in this story than it ever did in the show. I hope I adequately showed how he woke up to that realization, and that he might be afraid to regain his voice and power for what he might do with it.

Update: Okay, I have awesome news and not so awesome news. The awesome news: GABRIEL IS UP NEXT!!!! FINALLY!!!! [insert me flailing here and calling it dancing] The not so awesome news: Iiiiiiiiiit's not written yet [insert me sobbing here] And what I do have written has, of course, spiraled into a tangent of Dean/Cas, Dean hugging Cas, a Sam-to-Dean heart-to-heart that is really more of a heart-to-an-oblivious-idiot-who-thinks-he-doesn't-deserve-to-be-loved and WE WERE SUPPOSED TO BE GETTING TO GABRIEL.

[headdesk]

[headdesk]

[aaand one more for good measure. HEAD DESK]

Sigh. So I will keep working on all...er...that, but I don't know when I'll be able to post it. Hopefully in two to three weeks (I'm on vacation this week, and it's the fun, chase-around-a-two-year-old-at-DisneyWorld type vacation, but also the no-time-or-energy-for-writing-after-all-day-at-the-park kinda vacation)

(...I just realized that wording makes it sound like I plan on chasing random two year olds around DisneyWorld. While...frankly hilarious, I actually meant my two year old niece XD)

So, I will get you all a chapter just as soon as I can, but it may be a stretch again. Thank you all so so so so so so SO much for your patience, understanding, and, always, your encouragement.

Cheers,

Silence

Additional Note 4/6/2022 - Cole: I forgot to add a note about Cole! Okay, so for anyone who hasn't read the deleted scenes connected to this story, I originaly thought about including Cole towards the end of Season 1. However, when I first got the idea I did the appropriate reasearch to make sure it would work and learned...it totally wouldn't [insert facepalm here] Cole was supposed to be 13 when Dean murdered his father in 2003, which would only make him 16 or 17 now. But I don't want teenage Cole. I want badass Marine Cole. To add insult to injury, the timelines don't line up on the show, either. If he was 13 in 2003, then he was 24 or 25 when we first meet him on the show. But he's done two tours and he's special ops (not something easy to get into with little experience), plus he has a kid who looks at least 8 (I think older, but I'm being generous here). While all of that is plausible it still seems unlikely to me. To rub salt into that insulted injury, the worst part of all is that Cole's actor looks far older than his twenties (and indeed was). Which makes MUCH MORE SENSE for a two time tour, father of an 8-12 year old, special opps marine. So anyway, long story short, I asked readers to vote on whether they were okay with me breaking already-broken-but-cannon-timelines to fit Cole into the story. The almost unanimous response was yes, and so here we are!

We're gonna have a lot of fun with him, I promise XD

For all you accuracy nerds out there (my people! ;P), the plan is to have Cole be in his early thirties when he first meets Dean in 2014, and still have his dad get killed when he's 13. Which means Dean stumbled onto that hunt the exact same way, just in 1995 instead of 2003, making Dean about 16. Which also makes more sense that a young, teenage Dean doing a solo hunt might mess up so badly as to murder a man in front of his kid. The only real break in the timeline you'll notice is that Cole doesn't have a wife or son yet.

Anyhoo, that's the plan! Hope you all are here for it :D

Chapter 115: Season 2: Chapter 81

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: OMG, it begins! IT FINALLY BEGINS! I have been waiting for this chapter for MONTHS. Years, really. I think most of you have too. What is 'it', you might be asking? Well, I wouldn't want to spoil the surprise. Read on, dear readers. Read on XD

Beta-Reader - I have exctiting news and a thank you to give! Vaesse is now helping me out as a Beta reader editing chapters prior to posting. She is muuuch better at catching all those mispellings and grammar bits than I am, so hopefully you will see a lot less errors :) She and I are also going to tackle all of the publisheed chapters as well. At some point I'll do a full update including an adjustment to the chapter numbers. But I'll definitely post an A/N when that happens to warn everyone of the shift. Until then, enjoy the beta'd chapters! So thank you Vaesse and also yay!

Chapter Reference – FBI Data Analyst David Attingwood: David is an FBI agent who's been helping Henriksen out on the Winchester case. The last we heard about him, Henriksen had him comparing phone records for the area around Sturgen Hospital, hoping to find a common link between phone numbers that might identify the Winchester's numbers or identify someone helping them. For a refresher, see the end of chapter 82

Chapter Warnings: Oh boy, what to say. Hmmm, Sam's packing like a girl, Angela's giving Cas all the good advice, Dean's the butt of all of Cas's newfound good advice, Victor's doing things he doesn't want to do, and the boys are off to their new case!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 81

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Two days passed without further word from Ellen. For once, no news was good news coming outta the Roadhouse. If Ronald hadn't made it, she'd have called. If he'd paired up with another hunter and headed out (likely to his death), she'd have called. And if he was such a mess she refused to help and turned him on his tail, she'd have definitely called to yell at them some more.

So yeah, no news was good news for now.

The Winchesters had decided to take the rare break to lay low at Bobby's. Between hunts, apocalypse chores, and being chased by the feds, they just didn't get that much downtime these days, so the boys would take what they could get. Dean slept for that whole first day. Sam didn't seem as at ease with their stolen break, but he did catch up on some sleep, at least at night.

The nerd of the family spent his time mostly conversing with Andy, improving his ASL with the kid as his teacher. Bobby would join on occasion if his hands were free, leaving Dean to feel like they were definitely talking about him (even if he knew they weren't). He spent the first two conversations grumbling and pouting about it, and finally sat down during the third to start taking some instruction from the other three.

Cas spent much of her time adding additional warding to Bobby's property, much to Bobby's begrudging respect. And constant pestering-slash-supervision so she didn't mess anything up, or so he insisted to the angel. Everyone else knew well enough the grump was a cover so he could learn as much as he could about advanced Enochian warding without seeming particularly interested in the subject or anything Cas had to teach him.

If the angel realized his legitimate interest, she never said a word.

By the seventh or eighth conversation with Andy where Dean was busy feeling like the dumb kid in class (all over again), Sam came up with the idea of having Cas create an Enochian dictionary of sorts. The angel perked up at the potential to be useful (Dean was going to have to keep an eye on that) and together with Bobby, the three started outlining what would be helpful for a hunter to know. Cas began translating at once. Which left Andy alone to keep talking-slash-teaching Dean ASL.

So, naturally, Dean walked away half an hour later with a repertoire of dirty words under his belt and not much else.

They couldn't hang around forever, of course. Bobby was likely a known associate of theirs in those ever-thickening FBI folders, and someone would be by asking questions sooner or later. Either way, they had to be long gone by the time that rolled around.

Dean was leaning against the hood of the Impala, well-rested for the first time in what felt like years (and well fed, despite all of Bobby's grumbling about getting eaten out of house and home and yada, yada, yada). He hollered towards the house for Sam to get moving, adding – helpfully – that his kid brother packed like a friggin' girl.

Cas was standing in front of him, immobile as a stone statue (as always), the hem of her coat flapping almost lazily in the light breeze. Her gaze, which had been locked on Dean since she came outside (when wasn't it locked on him, Dean complained internally), turned intense. It was the type of intensity that usually suggested the angel was contemplating something dangerous.

"How do girls and boys pack differently?"

Dean resisted the sigh and instead settled for a glare. "I'm not falling for that trap."

Cas's brow furled. Dean looked away, refusing to so much as acknowledge the fact it was cute.

"Trap?"

The hunter rolled his eyes, uncrossing his arms to shift his weight against his Baby. "Dragon Lady knows exactly what trap I'm talking about. Tell her nice try."

The angel, who looked thoroughly confused, narrowed her eyes. "Angela can hear fine. She does not need me as a messenger of your statements. You should know this by now."

Dean threw his hands up, not bothering to spare either woman the dramatics. "I can't win with either of you."

Cas tilted her head, hair shifting across her shoulder. Dean ignored it with a fiery passion. "I do not understand why…"

The hunter looked back at her, already trying to wrangle up the patience it would take to explain gender roles to a genderless angel, when Cas finished her statement.

"…But she is laughing again."

His glare could have melted sand to glass.

Castiel did not understand how a human eyeball could ever– but Angela insisted it absolutely could. It was a human thing, she reassured her. Castiel did not feel particularly reassured in her understanding of humans at all.

"So you're on board, right?"

The question, which did not make sense to her, brought the angel back to the conversation Dean had apparently steered in another direction while she was learning about human eyeball powers.

"I still do not understand that reference."

This time Dean did sigh. "You're coming with us."

Castiel did not immediately answer, weighing the best way in which to formulate her response so as not to anger the very easily angered human in front of her. Apparently, she took too long, and that angered him as well.

"Cas."

The way he said her name spoke volumes. Volumes she was still deciphering. Humans were…difficult.

'Men,' Angela corrected within their shared mental space. 'Men are difficult.'

Somehow, Cas did not believe that clarification to be entirely accurate, but kept her opinion to herself.

"I believe my time is better spent preparing for the Apocalypse to come."

Dean frowned, and Cas prepared for yelling. When he spoke though, his voice was only mildly irritated. "I thought you said the best way for us to do anything was to stick to the timeline. So…hunt."

He gestured to the car, like it was a symbol for that very activity. Castiel supposed it was, in many ways, at least for this hunter.

"Yes, for you and Sam that is the wisest course of action. Now that I have irreparably departed from my own timeline–" Dean looked away guiltily, but Cas's tone did nothing to hint at her own feelings on the matter– "there is nothing to follow. Therefore, I should go where I will be most useful. We will need supplies: safe houses that are properly warded, weapons, an ample storage of salt–"

"Medical supplies wouldn't be a bad idea either. And money," Sam added as he jogged down Bobby's front steps, duffle bag tossed over his shoulder. He chucked it into the Impala's trunk, closing her up before turning to Cas. "Not sure how you'll manage it, but…"

"I will find a way," Castiel promised with a solemn nod. Sam was correct; the humans would need money. The Apocalypse would not afford time for jobs or easy income, and any time she could save them by procuring money beforehand was more time they could dedicate to the cause. Locating and collecting money could not be that difficult. Not for an angel, she was sure.

She turned back to Dean, sensing his hesitation even if it was not the outright fight she had expected. "I can accompany you on hunts if you would prefer–"

"Nah, I get it," the man from the future interrupted, shaking his head. He might not like it – in fact he was pretty damn unhappy about it – but he also knew Cas had a point. Besides, there were plenty of times before he lost his wings when the Cas of his time was off in search of weapons, or God, or any other way to stop the Apocalypse. That probably was as close to sticking to her timeline as she could get now. So Dean would deal. For now. "Having all that stuff ready for when shit hits the fan… it's smart."

Next to him, Sam nudged the older Winchester with his elbow. "How much did that hurt to admit?"

Dean shoved him hard and, laughing, his kid brother climbed into the car. The older of the two pointed a finger Cas's way, daring her to defy the seriousness of such a gesture. Blue eyes locked on that finger. Dean resisted wiggling it just to see if Cas's eyes would follow.

"Keep your phone on and charged. You remember how to use it, yeah?"

"Your lessons were sufficient," she answered, then paused for a long moment, eyes drifting to the side along with her head. A telltale sign she was talking with Dragon Lady. "Angela says 'yes' would have been a more 'sufficient' answer."

Dean rolled his eyes for the second time that morning, ignored the air quotes the angel still insisted upon no matter how many times he begged her to stop, and went to climb in the car when the angel spoke again.

"She also says that hugs are a customary form of farewell."

The hunter froze, one foot already in the car, grip on her roof hard enough to leave dents. Sam was biting his lip, staring up at him from the passenger seat with eyebrows nearly hitting the damn roof and clearly trying so, so hard not to laugh. Dean's grip got tighter and Baby's metal friggin' squeaked.

When he still didn't move, Sam gave him a metaphysical nudge with a gesture of his head. "Aren't you going to hug her goodbye?"

Dean was back to glaring sand-melting daggers again, but his kid brother had long since become immune to those. So the hunter pulled away from the car, slamming the door shut in a way Baby absolutely didn't deserve but someone in this situation was going to feel his pain, damnit.

He stomped over to the completely un-expectant angel standing there with the same, unchanged expression. "You really want to hug it out, here, Cas?"

She tilted her head, not understanding the point of the question, as she had already implied the answer in her initial request. "Yes."

"You, Cas," Dean emphasized, gesturing to her with his chin. Castiel resisted the urge to look to either side, as if there was someone else to answer for her. She really didn't understand humans. "Not Dragon Lady. Speak for yourself, man."

The angel narrowed her eyes slightly at the haughty command, insulted at the insinuation. So she repeated herself, firmer. "Yes."

Well, Dean figured, he walked right into that one. Never challenge the nerd angels, man. So he went for a quick hug – not without an aggravated noise of resignation – and tried to pull away almost immediately after making contact. Only there was a set of immovable arms pressed around him.

"Uh, Cas? We hugged. You can let go now, buddy."

"Angela says that goodbye hugs are often long."

"Angela's a god damn liar," Dean muttered under his breath. Then louder, because he could hear Sam sniggering in the car, damnit, he added snarkily, "You gonna jump off a bridge if Angela tells you to?"

Internally, Angela translated Dean's meaning for the angel, as she was uncertain what jumping off a bridge had to do with hugs.

Castiel pulled away, releasing her embarrassed charge. She couldn't fully admit to understanding his embarrassment, but it was a pleasant feeling to be the one to have caused it. Especially since she so often seemed to cause far less satisfying emotions in the human.

"I do not do everything Angela says. For example, I do not compliment your 'fine ass' nearly as often as she suggests I do."

Both Dean and Sam choked simultaneously, one on his own spit, the other on his laughter, and both for very different reasons.

Thank god she hadn't given up the air quotes. Dean might not have survived Cas calling his ass fine without the benefit of visual – if not fully understood or vocalized – sarcasm.

"I also do not think she would instruct me to do anything that would harm myself, or her."

"Goodbye Cas," Dean said loudly, deciding this conversation was most definitely over, and so the hell was their goodbye. He headed back for the driver side door with something between a groan, a mortified whimper, and a sigh. If anyone asked, he walked back to Baby in perfect, manly, stoic silence, thank you very much.

"Goodbye, Dean. Sam."

Ignoring Sam as he waved at the angel, still chuckling, Dean climbed into the car and rolled the window down so he could get the last word.

"See you around, Cas."

And what a word it was. Jesus Christ he was going to have to work on his game. There was no way in hell Dean was losing to a friggin' Dragon Lady.

-o-o-o-

Victor took a moment to collect himself before entering the room. The file in his hand felt far too light for how thick it was. His tie seemed obnoxiously tight today, despite it being the same tie he wore yesterday, in the same knot he wore every day. He closed his eyes, tilting his head back to deal with this damn stupidity he'd all but volunteered himself for by making the call. But the job was more important than his ego.

He would just have to keep telling himself that.

The agent opened his eyes, determination steeled, and opened the door to the near-empty cafeteria space the prison had set up for this. He gave an acknowledging nod to the guard standing just inside, not that he thought the man was needed, and crossed to the one occupied table.

Gordon Walker stared up at him, expectant and smug, and Victor reminded himself again that his ego could take a backseat if it meant catching the damn Winchesters.

"Agent."

"Walker."

Victor settled at the table, placing the folder he'd brought with him onto the table, just to the right of himself. He took a moment to straighten it, bottom edge perfectly parallel to the table's. Gordon's eyes flickered to it, just as the agent wanted them to.

"You have something for me?" the prisoner asked, dark eyes betraying nothing. They remained locked on Henriksen now, even as he took his hand off the folder and leaned back in the chair, a picture of nonchalance.

"I might. Depends if you have something for me in return."

Gordon eyed him for a good long while, and Victor let him. After several minutes had passed in judging, weighed silence, the felon suddenly smiled. It was anything but friendly.

"You ain't got nothing for me, Agent." Gordon leaned back in his chair as well, mimicking Victor's posture but nailing the nonchalance a hell of a lot better. It helped that he wasn't forcing it. "Nothing that I want, anyway."

"What makes you say that?" Henriksen folded his hands over his chest, never taking his eyes off the dangerous man sitting across from him.

"Because I want out, and you're not ready to do that, yet."

"I'm never going to be ready to do that, Walker. You're a convicted felon, and as far as I'm concerned, you're a murderer, too."

The man's sharp smile was anything but innocent. "I'm in here on a weapons charge, Agent."

"We both know you're capable of a lot more than possessing illegal firearms. So why don't we stop dicking around, here."

Henriksen had to work not to hold his breath as Gordon sized him up, maintaining even, un-concerned breaths.

"Alright," the other man said after a moment, shrugging a single shoulder. The handcuffs wrapped securely around his wrists clinked with the movement. "What is it you want from me?"

Victor waited for a second, sizing Gordon up in return. He couldn't tell what the man's game was, yet, but he doubted Walker was ready to play ball so easily. Still. He'd come here for answers, and he wasn't going to get them just sitting there chatting up the criminal.

So he reached over to the folder, flipped it open and grabbed the top piece of paper. He slid it over to the convicted felon, who sat up to get a look at it.

Victor's gut tightened as Gordon's eyes lit up with recognition. A smirk took over his lips, but his eyes were so dark when he looked back up that, any doubts Victor might have had about this man's crimes, which were few and far between, were gone. Those were the eyes of a murderer.

"You know her, I take it?"

Gordon chuckled, the sound deep and foreboding. He pushed the photo back to Henriksen, the still from Milwaukee International's security footage glaring up at him tauntingly.

Dean Winchester was on the floor of the bank's lobby, bleeding from what could only be a fatal wound given the amount of liquid puddled on the tiles beneath him. His brother was at his side trying to stem the blood flow while a third man, identified as Ronald Reznik, crouched nearby, hiding from the searchlights. But it was the fourth person in the photo that Henriksen cared about right now, though.

It was the same woman from Baltimore, who'd apparently broken Dean out of an interrogation room in the middle of a damn police station, filled with officers who'd neither seen her come or them go.

Just like Milwaukee International. What Henriksen wasn't saying, though, was that the entire footage had revealed her appearing out of nowhere, and the group disappearing just as unexplainably. The footage had obviously been tampered with, but Victor wanted to know how because none of his tech guys could explain it. They swore it hadn't been edited, at least not by any technology or technique they knew. And they were the FBI. They knew it all.

"Let me guess," Gordon drawled, leaning back into his chair again with an irritatingly smug look. It was like he held all the cards, which infuriated Henriksen. He wasn't the one locked up and never getting out of there. He had the cards. "They disappeared. Vanished into thin air, and you don't know how they did it."

Henriksen stared at the man. Alright, so he held one card: he knew about the disappearing act. Knew what this woman was capable of, whatever that capability was. He must know how she did it, as well.

That, or he truly was insane, and the Winchesters had convinced him of their delusions.

"You gonna tell me how they managed that in front of an entire police department?"

"And the FBI," the criminal added, like he was genuinely reminding Henriksen that the Winchester's had pulled one over him too. He clenched his jaw, teeth grinding, but didn't say anything. "No. I'm not gonna tell you."

Victor repeated his mantra, and tightly controlled his reaction to hide the frustration. He wouldn't give this asshole the satisfaction of knowing he was annoying the agent. "And why is that?"

"You're not ready to hear it."

"What's that supposed to mean?" Victor snapped, reigning it in only seconds too late. He couldn't afford to let this man get under his skin. It didn't matter if it was what Gordon excelled at. Henriksen couldn't afford to get riled. He had a short temper as was, but he wasn't going to waste his one shot at the Winchester's just because Gordon Walker was a piece of work.

"It means you won't believe me even if I do tell you, so why bother wasting my breath." Gordon shrugged again, still leaning back like a king on his throne rather than a man sentenced to twenty years in this shit hole. Victor was getting tired of the superiority act.

"Oh, right, because you think this is all some sort of... supernatural thing. That it? Because you're a, what do you all call yourselves? Hunters?" Henriksen tapped the photo of the mystery woman, the missing puzzle piece, the pain in his ass. "What's that make her, hm? Some teleporting ghost?"

"Oh, she's no ghost. She's something a lot more dangerous."

"Right." Henriksen stood, grabbing the photo and tossing it back onto the open file, which he closed and scooped up. "Good luck with the next twenty years of your life, Walker."

"Wait." The command stopped the FBI agent as he turned away from the table. And that's absolutely what it was: a command. Not a plea, not begging, or anything else spoken out of desperation for Henriksen to deal. Gordon still thought he was completely in control of this exchange, this relationship of prisoner and law officer. And it rankled Victor to no end, because it felt like he was missing something. Something he could see, couldn't place yet. Something that was the key to all of this. To catching the Winchesters.

He looked over his shoulder, brow raised in question. That question being, why should I?

"You don't want to hear what I have to say. Not yet." Gordon spoke with every confidence, and that feeling in Victor's gut - the acknowledgement of that missing puzzle piece - twisted a little bit more. "But you will."

"Oh yeah?"

"Yeah." It was something in the way Walker spoke. Either he was a damn good liar - maybe the best Victor had ever seen - or he was crazy. A true psychopath with some serious delusions on top. "Until then, we'll take baby steps."

Henriksen turned fully around at that, his deadpan glare saying what his words didn't. He didn't have time or patience for this crap. "Baby steps."

"Baby steps," Gordon repeated, drawing his cuffed hands away from the table and toward the pocket of his orange jumpsuit. He pulled a folded piece of paper out and offered it to Henriksen, slotted between two fingers.

Victor reached over the table, not bothering to sit again. He was still of the option that this entire thing – coming down here, talking with a lunatic, shit, even thinking he could have panned out as a lead – was a massive waste of his time. He plucked the paper from Gordon's hands and the man settled back in his chair as the FBI agent unfolded it.

There was nothing but a phone number written inside. Done with the games, Henriksen held it up, ink facing his convict. "What is this?"

"Bobby Singer's number." The way he said it was suggestion enough as to what Victor held in his hand. "His personal, traceable number."

Singer was a suspected associate of the Winchester's, but they'd never had anything on him. He had some system set up that kept his phones from being tapped, he was a damn suspicious bastard who never left his house, and when he did the FBI had neither warrant nor reason to attain one so they couldn't get in to see what the hell he'd done to his landlines.

If what Gordon said was true and they could tap this phone, or at least trace the person on the other end, then they could wait until the Winchester's came calling. And, finally, Henriksen would have a solid lead again.

If the information was real.

"And what are you expecting in exchange for this?"

"Nothing." At the agent's don't-bullshit-me look, Gordon raised his hands. "Honest. Call it a show of good faith. My Intel is solid, and it will help you catch the Winchesters."

Henrisken narrowed his eyes at the man, but tucked the paper into his breast pocket and turned to leave.

"If you get me out of here, that is."

The agent froze once more. There is was. He scoffed, but didn't rise to the bait. Let Gordon think that deal stood a chance. As long as it kept getting Victor these crumbs, he'd continue using that avenue.

Henriksen pushed through the door, telling the guard he was finished with the prisoner. As the door closed behind him, shutting out Gordon's smug, confident, and stupidly patient expression, Victor dug his phone out of his pocket.

"David, it's Henrisken. I've got a number for you to compare those cell tower records to."

The responding, "Oh thank god" wasn't particularly surprising. Neither was Henriksen ignoring it.

-o-o-o-

They were headed south, just passing through Omaha when Dean finally snapped.

"Spit it out or choke on it Sam. One or the other."

His brother, who'd been eyeing him from the passenger side on and off for the last three hours shot him an innocent look so fake that Dean considered punching it right off his face.

"You're really going to make me say it?"

Dean tightened his grip on Baby's wheel until the leather creaked and kept strict, no-eye contact focus on the road. "Say what?"

His kid brother just shot him another look, and now Dean just wanted to punch anything. Sam included. When the younger Winchester held out, not saying a word, Dean finally shot him a warning glare.

"Seriously, Sam?"

"What?" Sam was back to sounding mostly innocent, except for the knowing look on his face. The one that said Dean was in so much trouble and Sam wasn't the perpetrator. "I mean… Dean, you shared your food with her. What else am I supposed to think?"

Dean very physically and not at all dramatically – threw out his hands in clear vexation. The car started to drift into the oncoming lane, and he quickly re-gripped the wheel and corrected before more than one car gave them a cursory honk. He glared at his brother, screw focusing on the road. "That's what you're on about? Seriously!"

But Sam, who knew he had the winning offensive in his argument, hands down, didn't budge. "Dude. You don't share food with anyone, Dean. Not even me, and I'm your brother."

The older Winchester pulled his head back, clearly affronted. He switched between glancing out the windshield and sending dubious looks Sam's way. "You don't think that's just a little bit of an exaggeration? We share food all the-"

"Last week," Sam interrupted, apparently prepared for this rebuttal. "That diner in Kentucky. You got the strawberry rhubarb pie – because you thought rhubarb was a type of chocolate-" Sam shook his head, eyes heavenward. Dean opened his mouth to argue, but the kid kept right on going, "-and told me I had to try some. So you ordered a second slice."

Dean gave him an honest-to-god-he-didn't-believe-in incredulous look. "What, I thought you'd want a whole slice!"

"Which you then ate," Sam continued without missing a beat, "when I didn't."

"Not my fault you don't like deliciousness."

"Because, as I told you before you ordered it, I don't like strawberry rhubarb pie."

Dean didn't have a comeback for that one, so instead he sat, brooding in the front seat, trying to think of a time when he had willingly shared food with his brother. Hell, even unwillingly.

He kept coming up blank.

"Dean."

It wasn't his fault he liked food, unlike his weird-ass, nerd brother. Maybe if he just ignored Sam, this whole conversation would go away.

"Dean."

"It's not a big deal, Sam!" Or maybe not. "It was Cas."

His brother just snorted, giving him a single raised brow before finally breaking the one-sided staring contest he was holding. "Yeah, Dean. That's kind of my whole point."

At first Dean just rolled his eyes, but then his mind went right on going, straight through a myriad of various emotions. They flew by too fast to really focus on just one – let alone start picking them apart, not that he wanted to do that – so he settled on anger. Anger was easy. Anger was familiar. "We're done talking about this. It isn't a thing, so drop it."

"Alright," came Sam's answer, way too easily. He leaned back against the seat, arm propped up on the door, the picture of moving on. Dean knew it couldn't possibly be that easy. "We don't have to talk about it. But if you ever want to-"

And there it was.

"Can it, Sammy. I'm serious."

"Come on, Dean," Sam sighed, but it was a resigned sound. The kind that came from a conversation he'd had a million times. Which made no sense, because they'd never had this conversation before. Dean was sure of it, cuz he would have shut it down immediately. "Haven't you ever wanted it?"

The man from the future frowned, not following. "Wanted what?"

"To be loved, man."

The silence that stretched between them could have been poked with a stick and it probably would have poked right back. Dean didn't even know how to start responding to that, so he didn't try.

"I'm serious. My whole life, Dean, I've never seen you let someone in. Not like that. Isn't it something that you want?"

Dean stubbornly stayed quiet, refusing to speak. He wasn't having this conversation with his brother.

Sam huffed out a breath, maybe annoyed at having a conversation with himself only but not letting it stop him. "Well, if it is… you shouldn't let something like that go. Shouldn't waste it."

There was something in his brother's voice, in the way it dropped in volume, like he was talking as much to himself as he was to Dean. He was clearly thinking about Jess, about what he'd lost. Maybe time he thought he'd wasted.

Some of Dean's anger eased as he glanced towards the kid. Maybe he was being too hard on his brother for diving headfirst into chick territory. Sam wasn't trying to poke the bear, he was just… looking out for him, he supposed, in his own way. Trying to keep him from passing up on something that Sam, at one time, might have sold his soul to keep.

"It's not like that," Dean said after a moment. He wrung his hands around Baby's wheel, fidgeting to distract himself from the fact that he was, more or less, resigned to having a touchy feely conversation for his brother's sake. And he hated touchy feely conversations, damnit. "It's not like, you know… you and Jess."

Or him and Lisa.

What he had with Cas was… well, it wasn't like what he'd had with… well, anyone.

Dean could only claim to have loved so many people in his life, and that number was nothing to write home about. There was Shawna Moore, the first person he'd ever… well, thought maybe he could be with for longer than a one night stand or a high school fling to pass the time in yet another town. It had been 1996, Arkansas, Fillmore high, the last trimester of junior year and he and Sammy had been in the town for almost all three months of it, for once. He'd met Shawna beneath the bleachers on the sports field, having snuck out there for a smoke. Apparently she'd had the same idea.

She'd been gorgeous, smart, a total badass. For a teenage girl and a civilian at least. Real rebel with a cause type and all that. Couldn't wait to get out of that town – that school, that life – and go do something big. Something real. Something that mattered.

She'd been one of the first kids his own age to just… get it. That there was more to life than textbooks, tests, and school dances. Or what college your rich daddy's gonna get you into. At seventeen, Dean was a friggin' hero. A hunter who saved people. Who did something that mattered, like Shawna talked about. Nothing any school teacher was gonna teach him would make him better than that. To hell with school, he didn't need it. And Shawna got that. She got all of it.

John had even let them stay the summer after the school year ended, getting a job as a mechanic to make some money while fielding hunts in the area from Bobby, just a state over. He and Shawna had spent those months smoking, drinking, sneaking into movie theatres, and talking about futures that didn't involve homework.

But the monsters eventually showed up elsewhere and Dad had called it. Didn't matter that Dean had a gig at the local movie theatre and the beginnings of some savings, or that Sam had what he would call friends (bunch of nerds and losers, is what Dean thought). They always moved on. Always went to the next hunt. Dean would pack up, have the inevitable argument with Sam before herding him into the Impala, by force if necessary, and they would leave.

No more Shawna Moore.

She'd asked him to stay in touch and he'd told her okay, but never bothered. Even his seventeen-year-old self had known hunting was no place for a relationship.

Then he'd met Cassie. And thought… he'd thought just maybe he could make it work. He could tell her the truth. Dad was off god-knows where, and Dean wasn't a child anymore. He could make his own decisions. Could make his own life. He'd go on hunting trips when they came calling and come back to a… well, maybe not a home, but a town he could call home when he wasn't on the road. With a girlfriend whose bed he could crash in and whose fridge he could raid. Who he could poke and pester all night while she stayed up studying and he watched infomercials on the couch, trying to talk her into buying half the things. Whose hand he occasionally held in public, no matter how much it made him sweat or look around like someone might start calling him out as a charlatan.

She'd even brought him home for dinner with her parents over Easter, and fuck had that been terrifying. And awkward. Dean didn't do parents. But she'd argued it was a holiday, and he couldn't spend it alone. And somehow, he'd let her talk him into it. He'd even enjoyed himself. At least a little.

On weekdays he'd wake to the smell of coffee that she'd bring him in bed before heading out to class. He figured out her washer and dryer and even folded their laundry, like some sort of… civilian. It freaked him out almost as much as he secretly enjoyed it. They grabbed burgers and shakes at the local diner on 'date night' and she'd bitch about her mom giving her another round of 'when am I getting grandchildren' speech. And Dean would laugh and ignore the weird twinge in his gut when he thought about a future just like that. Filled with diner date nights, family dinners, and friggin house chores.

He never managed to picture himself any more domestic than that. He'd done the dishes after they ordered takeout a night or two. Helped her fix the plumbing when it backed up once. She took him apartment hunting when she needed to move closer to campus and her part time journalism job. But he didn't let it go any further than that. Didn't let himself think about anything more. Not getting an apartment together or calling it home. Not hanging up his hunting shoes and picking up honest work. Not those kids Cassie's mom wanted so much, sure he'd make a crap dad even then. He didn't let himself dream. Not much, anyway.

And, honest, he hadn't wanted any more than that what he had with Cassie. Didn't need that home, the family or the white picket fence. He was good as is. But he didn't want what they had to end, either.

So he'd told her. The first person he'd ever told. The first person he'd ever allowed himself to love. Really love. Love enough to risk that truth.

And she'd broken his heart in return. Maybe not in the weeping romance way, but in the little ray of hope he'd been nurturing deep down inside, hidden away where John Winchester could never find it. A hope he kept so buried he forgot it existed himself most days. But that's what she'd broken. She'd shattered his hope.

Dean had known all along. Hunting and love had no place together. He'd just deluded himself into thinking maybe he'd been wrong. That maybe, if it was the right person, he could make it work. That he could have it all. That he could have someone and be a hunter. Because Dean didn't know how to live without hunting.

So he made the easy choice. And left.

Lisa had known the truth before he'd shown up on her doorstep, desperate and alone and broken. He didn't have to hide who he was, what he'd done, and how messed up he'd become because of it. But he didn't have to hunt anymore either. It had been… almost perfect. She had been perfect. And he had loved her. It hadn't been the romantic love he'd always thought it was supposed to be, the kind of love years of TV and movies had painted for him.

But it had been love, in a way. His way, maybe. It had been curling up on the couch and watching old movies after Ben went to bed. It had been taking the kid to the county fair, even when he said he was too 'old' for it, and picking him up from soccer practice when Lisa was working late at the studio. It was taking turns making meals, doing dishes – Lisa had a rule that whoever cooked didn't clean, and Dean wasn't dumb enough to question the lady. It was holding her close every night, breathing in the scent of her hair and knowing, for once, that he wasn't alone. That he was accepted as he was. Even if he didn't deserve it. Even when he told her he didn't deserve it and she kept right on doing it anyway.

But then his past had come calling. Hunting was in his blood, and he'd been a fool to think it would leave him alone. That he could leave it alone.

It was why he'd asked Cas to do what he'd done. To take away their memories. Even in danger, even with her son in danger, Lisa hadn't been able to let him go like she should have. Like he told her to. Told her that he was no good for her, for them. But she wouldn't listen. Insisted that even if they didn't stay together, if he didn't live with them, that she'd still be there for him.

Just like Jess had promised Sam.

And so he'd made the choice for her. Because he wasn't worth that and never would be. And he needed her safe, like Sam needed Jess safe.

What he had with Cas… shit. It wasn't like any of that. It wasn't romance, or housework, date nights or time spent together. I mean, sure, there'd been moments once the angel had gone fully human, and all the bumps along the power road after.

Cas sitting at the kitchen table while Dean cooked breakfast in the bunker. Dean, nursing a beer and keeping the ex-angel company while he did dishes after dinner. Dean never minded Cas's presence, be it in the bunker with them, in the car on the way to a hunt or a night in a hotel on the road. He'd never thought about it in terms of enjoying the angels company, per say, but Cas was his friend. So, yeah, of course he enjoyed hanging out with him.

But what they had… it wasn't love. Cas didn't stay because he loved Dean. Not like that, at least. Cas stayed because he was a soldier, a hunter, and it was suicide to fight alone. He stayed because they were friends. A team. Those things didn't have anything to do with the kind of love Sam was talking about. The only kind of love Dean had gotten close to having for himself.

"It's not like that with me and Cas," Dean repeated, clearing his throat briefly and, in doing so, clearing his mind of the memories.

Sam tried to catch his brother's gaze, but Dean's eyes were glued to the road. The younger Winchester eventually turned back to the front, watching the road pass by the windshield. "You know… it's not like Jess and I became a thing overnight."

Dean didn't have anything to say to that, because he and Cas weren't like that. And they weren't gonna be like that. No matter how his horny-as-hell, twenty-something body thought of Cas's temporary body. Dean would get over that in time – he was certain – and it wasn't gonna change anything.

Sam didn't push any further. His thoughts were years away, back in Stanford, falling in love with a woman he had never seen coming. Love never ended up being like you thought it would be as a kid. It wasn't a fairytale feeling that came for free, that made the hard work not hard. It was…a connection. One you wanted badly enough to work for. To do the hard work that relationships required. Love didn't make the hard work any less hard, it just made it worth it.

But Sam wasn't sure how to even broach that conversation with his brother. Wasn't sure how to put it into words that Dean would even listen to, let alone put into the context of his and Castiel's relationship.

The miles passed, the tape deck hit the end of the track and spat the tape back out. Dean reached into the box between them without a word and popped a new one in. He cranked the volume – his way of saying this conversation was over – and Sam let it be. He'd said his piece. Whether his older brother chose to hear… well, you could lead a horse to water, and all that.

"Where we going, anyway?" he asked once another ten miles had passed, Omaha well behind them.

"Some college town in Ohio. Bobby said there's been some strange sightings around town." Dean didn't sound all that interested – or invested – but then again, it was only a maybe-case that didn't involve strippers, bars, or girls-gone-wild-style college girls.

"No deaths?" Sam's brow was furled. They didn't usually go off on a hunt unless there was a little more to go on. Maybe Bobby had just been finding them something to keep busy. It wasn't like they could stay at his place indefinitely. Not with the FBI on their tail.

"Not yet."

"Right." Sam shrugged, slouching in the seat and closing his eyes. "Wake me when it's my turn to drive."

Dean sent his brother an unimpressed look. Not that Sam saw it. "It's never your turn to drive, bitch."

The responding, "Jerk," soon enough turned into rhythmic breathing and soft snores. Dean popped a new tape into the tape deck and drove on.

-o-o-o

"Well that was a total bust," Dean muttered as they came out of the last place to have a 'weird sighting'. "A unicorn, Sammy. A friggin' unicorn." The older Winchester stalked around Baby with a growl. He stopped at the driver's side, keys in hand, and leaned his arm against the roof. "There's no such things as unicorns!"

Sam looked inches away from rolling his eyes, but stuck to just an eyebrow raise. He opened the passenger door. "Yeah, Dean. I'm aware."

Dean growled again, opening his own door and climbing in. "What is everyone in this town on?"

Unicorns showing up at the local coffee shop for a scone (according to the rainbow-haired barista closing up that night). Which it apparently got, stabbing the pastrywith its horn before trotting off.

Then there was the giant squid in the library. A local librarian – who was old enough to have crawled out of a crypt herself and wore eye glasses closer to damn goggles with how thick they were – swore up and down that one night, just before closing, she heard a book fall from one of the shelves. When she went to check and found a book lying open, alone, in the middle of an aisle, with water bubbling up out of it and tentacles.

Sam had elbowed his brother for snorting in the middle of the librarian's story.

Turned out, once the old broad had gone screaming out of the building and returned with some disbelieving cops, there was nothing but an old copy of 20,000 Leagues Under the Sea, abandoned in the middle of an empty aisle.

By the time they got to the seven year old boy who swore he'd seen the actual Easter Bunny – six feet tall, big feet, bigger ears, biggest basket of big, big eggs (kid had all the best adjectives) – hopping through his backyard, after eating the family bunny (irony), did Dean call it quits. He was fed up with the whole lot of 'em and whatever this screwy case was.

"It's February, Sam. Easter is in, like, May."

As his brother started driving away from the their latest witness's house – long past the kid's bedtime – Sam gave his brother a casual look that was really far more amused than Dean currently was.

"April, usually."

Dean spared him one hell of a glare. "Doesn't matter, because you know what it currently isn't?"

"April?"

"Damn straight." The older Winchester turned his annoyed, irritated, fed up glare back to the road and turned them towards the motel. He shook his head. "I'm telling you. People in this town are on drugs."

"Really?" Sam cast him a look, the amusement growing. "Even the Librarian?"

"Especially the librarian!"

Despite the oddity of the case that even Sam could admit was baffling, the younger Winchester laughed. "Dean… she's like, eighty."

His brother didn't even blink, casting him a knowing look. "It's the old ones that are the craziest."

Sam shook his head, still chuckling when the car suddenly lurched to a stop. The younger hunter glanced to Dean, confused, but found his brother's gaze locked over his right shoulder. Frowning, Sam followed his gaze out the passenger window.

There was nothing there, just some buildings and what might be a park, pleasantly lit up with landscaping lights.

"Uh…" Sam looked back at his brother, but Dean's eyes were locked on one of those buildings. "Dean?"

The engine rumbled pleasantly as Dean stepped on the gas, turning the wheel towards those buildings. Sam glanced between them and his brother once more. He knew something was up, he just didn't know what. "Dean? Is this, a, uh, timey sense thing?"

"Yeah, think so."

They pulled into a parking lot sparsely scattered with cars. Dean put the Impala into park, climbing out. He was still looking around the place that was so hauntingly familiar, he just couldn't figure out why.

Sam followed, no less confused but along for the Timey Senses ride.

When Dean's déjà vu perked up like this, it was best just to follow along until he figured it out. They walked from the parking lot to a path through what was more of a courtyard than the park Sam had originally thought it was. Dean was on a mission through the courtyard to one of the taller buildings. It was aesthetically quite pleasing, a towering structure of white stone capped in fancy green roofing. A set of steps led up to it, and Sam realized why the whole place – the steps, the buildings, the courtyard – seemed familiar.

This was a college campus.

They were halfway up those steps, Sam following after Dean who had his mind set on something, when the older Winchester suddenly stopped dead. Sam would have crashed into him if he'd been any closer.

"Oh shit."

Sam peered around his brother to see green eyes wide and a stunned look on his face. "Dean?"

"Nope." Dean suddenly spun around, Sam almost losing his balance on the step just behind him. Dean was already trucking it down the steps and Sam hurried to follow as his brother muttered, "Nope, nope, nope."

Sam opened his mouth – because, really, what the hell? – but before he could get anything out something large, dark, and flailing fell from the sky and landed on the steps in front of them with a horrifying crunch and a bodily thud.

That was because, upon closer inspection, it was a body.

Sam almost fell over trying to back up mid-stair. "Oh my God!"

Dean, too stunned to move from his stiff, drawn back position, tilted his head back. Far above them on the upper floors of that tower was a broken window. He dropped his gaze back down to the very dead professor on the steps in front of them.

Sam startled as Dean struck at the air repeatedly with clenched fists, all but stomping his feet in what could only be called a silent temper tantrum.

"Son of a bitch!"

-o-o-o-

By the time the cops were done with their questioning – what were you doing on campus at eleven o'clock at night, what are your names, what are you doing in Ohio, blah blah blah – it was well past midnight and Dean was all but dragging Sam back to the car.

"Dean, someone just died." Sam was making half-hearted attempts to turn them around. Half-hearted not because he didn't believe in his cause – that they shouldn't be running away from whatever case they'd just stumbled onto – but because he knew there was no reasoning with Dean when he got like this. "You don't think that's something we should, I don't know, maybe look into?"

"Nope."

"Dude, what the hell?" Sam muttered as his brother all but dragged him back off campus towards the Impala. The younger Winchester glanced over his shoulder at the retreating school buildings, one of which was now lit with the blue and red lights of police.

There was a zipped up body bag on the ground and an un-needed ambulance parked in the courtyard.

"Not this one, Sammy," Dean muttered, keeping his voice low as he looked around like someone might be watching them. Sam frowned, looking around as well. They had just witnessed a death – probably a murder – after all. Maybe the perpetrator was still in the area. But the campus was largely deserted given the hour, and anyone who had been out was drawn by the cops and commotion. They weren't paying attention to the two brother's making their way off campus.

The younger Winchester pulled his arm free of his brother, dragging them both to a stop. Dean looked irritated, but Sam didn't let that deter him. "You said no more running."

"No," the man from the future countered immediately, finger already out and pointing. "I said we'd pick our battles. Well, I'm not picking this one."

"There are people dying here, Dean!" Sam tried for the honor-and-duty angle that usually was enough to win his brother over, or at least make him pause. Not this time, apparently.

"One guy. Just one guy, and he's a douchebag who had it comin'," the older Winchester harped back almost immediately. The unicorn, the tentacles. It was all making sense now. "That's what the trickster does, alright? And trust me, we don't want to get involved."

"A trickster?" Sam's voice rose in surprise. They'd never run into a trickster before. They were old and powerful, usually pagan gods or demi-gods. Through no fault of his own, the younger Winchester was intrigued. Dean could tell, given his deadpan return glare. Sam cleared his throat, trying to look a little less curious. He failed. "What, uh, what happened last time?"

His brother grabbed his arm again, once more hauling ass for the Impala. "Let's just say Taco Tuesday was permanently ruined for you, for like…ever. And I never got to listen to Asia again. So, yeah, we're leaving."

Sam was still trying to argue his case (in and among attempts to get more out of Dean than that jumble which had made absolutely no sense) when the Winchester boys rounded the corner of the building closest to the school parking lot and went out of sight. From a darkened alcove of that building, a short-statured man dressed in a janitor's uniform stepped into the light of the courtyard lamps, eyes narrowed and lollipop clacking against his teeth.

Gabriel pulled the sweet from his mouth with a pop, eyes still locked on where the Winchesters had disappeared. He'd been all prepped to be the one to 'discover' Professor Pervert's body and casually mention all the young ladies he'd taken up to his office to the responding police. Really stir the water cooler talk on campus.

At least until the Winchesters came trotting around the corner like men on a mission. Well, one man on a mission and one following along confused and worried and all frowny-faced.

Professor Pervert's fall had timed perfectly with the hunter's arrival. Gabe was kind of surprised about that, actually. Usually hunters showed up after someone died, not before. And they also didn't normally solve the Supernatural Who-Dun-It before doing any actual, well… hunting. They were totally throwing off his timing, and Gabriel prided himself on his comedic timing. It was kind of his whole thing.

So. That was kinda weird.

Gabriel popped the lollipop back into his mouth with an obscene smack. It was a good thing a trickster such as him liked weird. The archangel-turned-Loki tucked his hands in his pockets and followed after the pair of hunters.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: So, in short, Dean doesn't have a clue what love is, and western media & entertainment's portrayal of romantic love is dumb, and shallow, and 2-Dimensional, and Gabe's on scene! drops mike and exits stage left

Cas: Don't worry, Cas will be making appearances far more often now that she's out of Heaven. I'm not trying to get rid of her again (the poor under-utilized logical part of my brain – a part that clearly doesn't get enough use in RL and so HAS to jump in, loudly, while I'm writing FICTION – nicely informed me that gathering weapons is more important than riding around in the Impala with the boys and a strategic angel like Cas would realize it. Thanks, Brain. Watching my back as always -_-)

Unicorns, Tentacles, Easter Bunnies, oh My! Okay, so why didn't all those things happen/appear in the original episode if they happened in this timeline? What changed to make them happen? Er….nothing. My reasoning to get the boys to that campus without alerting Dean as to the familiar case immediately couldn't be the professor, since he hadn't died yet, so I thought… you know what? I bet Gabe messes with people wherever he goes. The boys (in a different place last time and not at Bobby's) wouldn't have heard about Unicorns and Tentacles because crazy stories like that with single witnesses don't make the news. But a professor falling to his death does. That's my reasoning and I'm sticking to it :P Also because I legitimately enjoy the idea of Gabe just roaming from town to town leaving a trail of low-key chaos in his wake before stumbling on a truly deserving douchebag.

Happy Easter, Ramadan, and Passover to all who celebrate or observe!

Cheers,
Silence

UPDATE 7/30/2022 - Great news, everyone!
I am back in the swing of things. My depression/identity crisis (real fun combo, yaaaaay) is lately behind me and I'm clawing my way back to normalcy. Which means I am writing again! I have a chapter for you all, but I'm actually at my favorite, internet-less lake for the weekend. So I won't be able to post it on Sunday. I will get you all a chapter - a doooozy or a chapter :D - next weekend!!! Much love to you all until then, thanks so much for your patience, your encouragement, and your support, always <3

Chapter 116: Season 2: Chapter 82

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: I am so sorry for the long delay! I had a troublesome couple of months filled with depression. I'm on the other side of it now, working my way back up that hill. Thanks everyone for hanging with me, and for those who reached out: JustinB, faux_strider, P. Por, and Masamune X23. Even if I didn't get back to you, I really, really appreciated the pokes, the support, the patience and encouragement. As well as a big, big thank you to everyone who reviewed or commented, letting me know how much my work is appreciated and loved, and especially missed. And, as always, welcome to our newest readers! I'm so glad y'all are joining us on this little beastie.

Special Thanks to Vaesse and Forestpelt for their help reading this chapter a little early, beta-ing, helping pick the right spot to end it, and encouragement that the whole thing made sense and I wasn't crazy thinking I was onto something.

Now, onward!

Chapter Warnings: It is a doozy of a chapter this time, in both events and length. I'd like to believe it makes up for the wait, but you'll have to tell me what you think :D

Actual Chapter Warnings: Well, we got some delicious double fudge rocky road ice cream coming up, wacky shop names in a small town, little bit of Foreigner for you rock n' roll fans, some eight year old's craft supplies turned to wall-weeping slime, psychedelic nostalgia from the sixties, and bird feeders!

Yeah, all that!

Oh, and also one hell of a cliffhanger. But really, we ought to expect those from me my now ;) ENJOY!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 82

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Dean woke with a jolt – the peaceful quiet of a lakeside dock, lapping water, and wind in the trees suddenly replaced with Foreigner on max volume. He sat bolt-upright in momentary alarm before realizing it was just the motel radio clock, set to go off at seven thirty. With a groan, he rolled over and hit the thing with a closed fist until it stopped making so much noise at such an early hour.

The hunter flopped onto his back with another moan, arm falling over his eyes to block out the light coming from the already-opened, cheap-ass motel curtains.

His brother was an asshole.

"Morning, Sunshine," Sam joked from what sounded like the next bed over. Dean lolled his head to the side, peaking one eye out from under his forearm. His brother was indeed on the other mattress, fully dressed and pulling on his shoes. He looked far too amused for the early hour.

"Bitch," Deam grumbled almost incoherently before forcing himself upright with another noise of protest, rubbing at the grogginess that was his face. Sam had clearly been up for a while, which meant he could have switched that damn alarm off at any point. The older Winchester had a feeling he'd turned the volume all the way up, instead.

Sam just smirked, standing from the bed and heading into the bathroom.

Yeah, alright, Dean probably deserved that for all the times he'd less-than-pleasantly woken his kid brother up. With as loud and disgruntled a groan as he could make, he hauled his body off the mattress and headed into the bathroom as well, where Sam was already brushing his teeth.

Dean grumbled something that might have been English, possibly, as he shouldered his brother out of the way of the sink so he could splash some water on his face. The Sasquatch, still brushing away, raised an eyebrow.

"Coffee?" Sam asked through a mouth full of bristles and toothpaste, so it really sounded more like cooffeef? In response to the peace offering, Dean just moaned – this time as obnoxiously as possible – and, dripping water all over the place, turned to his brother with a suggestive wink.

"Love it when you talk dirty to me, Sammy."

The younger Winchester rolled his eyes, huffed his huffiest little brother huff (which ended up with him almost choking on minty foam) and spat into the sink. Dean grabbed his own toothbrush with an equally obnoxious smirk.

-o-o-o-

There was a diner around the corner from their motel, and Dean sucked in the smell of grease, butter, and coffee fumes like a drowning man who'd finally found land. He slid into a booth with the relief of salvation and signaled over the harried waitress in her god-awful pink uniform. Without missing a beat she grabbed the coffee pot and headed their way.

Sam eyed him as he settled – at a much more reasonable pace – into the booth across from his brother. Physically, Dean looked fine. And he'd only rubbed at his chest like, twice that morning. Which was pretty good for the man currently housing an angel in his torso.

Still. Sam knew his brother hadn't been sleeping well for a while now. Not since Rivergrove.

"Rough night?"

Dean immediately dropped his hand from his chest, not even realizing he was rubbing at it, it was such a subconscious habit now. Instead, the man from the future scoffed, about to hassle nosy Samantha right back about sleep schedules and vitamin intake when he actually paused to think about. Had his night been rough? He couldn't remember any dreams, but he sure felt like crap. The kind of crap that usually came after a bad night. But that could just be chalked up to another crap bed in a crap motel in a crap town they'd pulled into way too late the previous night.

His shoulders were tight, like he'd slept tense. His chest was achy, but not in the demon-just-around-the-corner way. More like the slept-bad, probably-had-nightmares-full-of-anxiety-and-dread kinda achy. Or… maybe something in between the two. Whatever all that was, it sure had him feeling groggy this morning.

Dean glanced to the right where a clock was hanging over the service window of the diner's kitchen. Seven fifty-seven. Sure, Dean wasn't quite the rise and shine type like Sammy, but he could usually shake the cobwebs after twenty or so minutes. Maybe he'd had a rough night after all.

Nothing a good cup of Joe couldn't fix, though.

Godsend that she absolutely must be, the waitress arrived not a moment later, hand on her hip and coffee pot already pouring. It was enough to distract Dean from thoughts of bad nights on lumpy mattresses. He greedily sucked down the life-giving black sludge as their waitress – her nametag reading Darla – poured Sam a cup as well. They both stared at the older man as he chugged down the entire mug of hot liquid. Good old Darla was staring so much that she went and overflowed Sam's mug, spilling coffee onto the table top.

"Oh shoot!" she swore, pulling back on the pot and grabbing a towel from her apron. Luckily it had only spilled enough to flood the tabletop around the mug, rather than cover Sam's lap in scalding hot coffee. "Sorry 'bout that."

"No problem," the younger Winchester offered with a weak smile, switching between nodding understandingly at the waitress and eyeing his brother with confused concern.

Darla scurried off to get them a couple waters and another towel, promising to be back to take their order shortly. Sam continued eyeing Dean as he finished the last of the coffee with a loud, overly announced, 'Ah!' and set the mug down with a clink.

The eyebrow raise was approaching Ultimate. "You sure you're feeling alright?"

"Yeah." Dean shrugged off the concern with one shoulder, already looking for Darla and a refill. Sam was still giving him the stink eye – something between open concern and abhorrent regret that he was related to the man sitting across from him. Dean cleared his throat. He wasn't that bad, was he? "It's like you said. Rough night."

Sam didn't seem fully convinced, but let it go as Darla came back over with a clean cloth, wiping away the last of the spill. She also refilled Dean's coffee while she was at it, though not without a little side eye.

With a hand on her hip and an almost empty coffee pot in the other, she asked, "What'll you boys be having this morning?"

"I'll have the California Omelet with a side salad, please." Sam handed over his menu while Dean pulled a face at the crisis that was his kid brother.

"It's eight o'clock in the friggin' morning, Sammy," he grumbled, only somewhat slack-jawed and horrified. "Salads are not a breakfast food. They're barely a food at all, unless you're a rabbit."

Sam just rolled his eyes, like his brother with his one-burger-shy-from-a-heart-attack diet had any room to judge. Dean turned to their waitress with a charming smile that absolutely wasn't returned.

"I'll take the special," he announced proudly, handing over his menu as well. Darla took it, less than impressed, and headed back behind the counter. Dean turned back to Sammy, who looked equally unimpressed. "Two eggs, two sausage links, two pieces of bacon, two pancakes, two slices of toast, and one piece of ham. Now that's a real breakfast."

Sam continued to stare, still unimpressed but now with a slightly green tinge around the corners. "Yeah, a real glutton's breakfast."

Dean pshaw'd, then stubbornly insisted, "Real man's breakfast."

The younger Winchester didn't deign such a comeback with one of his own, instead just rolling his eyes and shaking his head like one might when faced with such infallible logic. Or at least that's what Dean told himself as the bell above the Diner's door rang with new customers. Darla called out a half-hearted greeting as a kid – no more than four or five – came barreling down the aisle between the counter barstools and the booths. Even as the kid's dad called out for him not to run, the little tyke tripped right at Sam and Dean's table, face planting onto the linoleum beside them.

"Great," Dean muttered as he stared at the now screaming child, who looked entirely unharmed to the hunter. "Walk it off, buddy."

Sam grimaced at the volume of the tantrum happening just to his left, but turned it into somewhat of a smile as the father of the child made it to the scene of the wipeout.

"Sorry," the man said – loudly so as to be heard over his screaming child – as he picked the kid up and set him back on his feet.

"It's what kids do," Sam replied with a little more smile than grimace, though it definitely twitched halfway through as the boy let out a truly impressive wail. Dean continued to eye the child with a look far less understanding.

The family moved past, son still crying and father attempting to calm him down. They settled for the last booth in the back, which was not nearly far enough away to lessen the meltdown still happening.

"Awesome," Dean muttered, already feeling the headache coming on. Sam gave him a knowing-yet-still-somehow-admonishing look. Kids were kids, after all. Screaming was just one of the many things they did.

Darla arrived a few moments later with their breakfast, a kid's coloring menu and set of crayons tucked under Dean's plate just waiting to save the day. As she scurried off to deliver what would hopefully bring them all some peace and quiet, Dean eyed his brother's friggin' breakfast salad with as much distaste as he'd spared the wailing kid.

He stabbed his fork into the single slice of ham on his plate and draped it over Sam's salad before the beanstalk could stop him. "There. Now it's breakfast."

Sam's glare received a beaming smile in return even as he less than delicately picked the piece of ham up with his fingers and set it on a side plate.

"So," Dean began with a mouth full of food that earned him a second bitchface for the morning (#6, a general plea to the universe to explain how they could possibly be related), "Tell me about this case."

Sam's 'Really?' bitchface (more of a seven, which often came after six) remained petulantly in place. "Dude, I told you about it last night. In the car?"

Dean frowned, trying to recall that conversation. Ultimately, he shrugged. "Sue me, Sam, I'd been driving for like, eight hours."

"It was five," Sam countered mockingly, though with little heat. He'd taken over the driving and started telling his brother about the possible case in a small town outside of Urbana, Ohio. Which had pretty much put the older Winchester right to sleep, apparently. "And why am I always the one looking for cases, huh? When did that become my job?"

Dean pulled his head back. "Hey, I look for plenty of cases-"

At Sam's raised eyebrow and clear-as-day lawyer look falling into place, Dean changed tactics.

"I do the driving, you do the searching," he offered instead, shrugging like it had always been that way. "Besides, we gotta follow the timeline, right?"

"Yeah, we do. Which would be easier if you're the one looking for cases," his brother argued right back. "You're going to find the ones we did in your timeline a lot faster than me relaying all this to you, waiting for memory to strike. You just want an out for the work."

"Hey, not true!"

It was absolutely true, but Dean wasn't about to admit it. Especially since he did have a valid point too. Well. Sort of. Like half a point.

"If I'm looking, it wouldn't be random. To really follow the timeline, we gotta find our next stop based on what we think is a case, not what we know!"

Sammy lowered his fork, lettuce still on the tip of the utensil, to stare. "Dude. That makes no sense."

The man from the future just shrugged and went with his backup argument. "I did all the legwork first time around-" also not true, but lawyer Sammy had no way of arguing against it- "so this time it's your turn."

The look his kid brother gave him said, 'yeah right,' but to his credit Sam just shook his head and let it drop. "There's been sightings of a mysterious goo-"

"Mysterious goo?" Dean echoed with a raised eyebrow. Didn't sound familiar.

"Yeah, that's what the news article said."

Dean's eyes narrowed, because what self-respecting newspaper would print a story about mystery goo? "Which news?"

Sam's unimpressed look was back, and the older Winchester knew he was about two more comments away from being told to find a case himself if he didn't like Sam's. "Weekly World News."

Dean hummed in response, weighing his head back and forth as he shoved another forkful of breakfast into his mouth. They'd used that trashy tabloid more than a few times to find themselves a case. "So. Mystery goo. Go on."

Sam took a deep, calming breath – much to Dean's delight – before letting it out (no doubt counting to ten as he did so). "There's been sightings of this mystery goo in several buildings in town. All commercial, always when the employee was alone in the building."

"Sounds more like a freaky contamination issue," Dean reasoned. "Has the CDC been called in, or something?"

His brother could only shrug. "Not yet because the goo, or whatever it is, is always gone by the time any sort of authority shows up. Cops think drugs may be playing a role, but the, uh, witnesses come from all different backgrounds, and only one of them has any history of drug use."

Dean pursed his lips. "You thinking something in the water?"

"Sure, could be." Sam pulled some folded up papers out of his back pocket, no doubt the news articles he'd printed in the last town. Dean, meanwhile, was eyeing the glass of water Darla had dropped off on her first greeting more than a little warily now. He pushed it another couple inches further away from him. Sam unfolded the papers, trying to flatten them out. "Or it could be some sort of group prank or something."

"If it's a prank, what's the joke?"

"You got me." Sam shrugged again, head of brown hair shaking back and forth. "I never said it was a good one, if that's what it is."

Dean snorted in response. "So what's the goo do?"

Sam blinked at the question. "Uh…nothing, far as I can tell."

The older Winchester frowned. "Nothing?"

"It just…oozes down the walls. Freaks out the employee, who usually bolts. By the time someone comes back with them, it's gone."

Hence the theory of drugs, Sam thought. He would doubt the mystery goo, or whatever it was, was real too if he was a normal civilian. Probably a hallucination. Not that he or his brother were normal.

Dean, though, was still frowning. "So a bunch of scaredy cats, possibly drugged to their gills, go running from their lives thinking Night of the Living Dead-"

"Or Ghostbusters."

"-Or Ghostbusters," Dean amended without batting an eye because Sam had an excellent point, "and we're… what? Going to somehow… investigate that?"

Sam just shrugged for the fourth, maybe fifth time that conversation. "You can always pick the cases, Dean. I'd be happy to do the driving if you want to-"

"No, no. Mysterious goo. Definitely a case, totally not a waste of time," Dean answered way too quickly with way too wide a smile. Sam stuck with the unimpressed staring. "So, what's our theory? Ectoplasm? One strong-as-hell-but-conveniently-absent ghost?"

"That's the thing, if it's real, I don't think it's ectoplasm," Sam responded, spinning one of those papers around and pushing it towards Dean, pointing at a section.

As Dean began to scan, his previous frown returned. And then got deeper. "What the hell?"

"All the witnesses said the same thing." Sam met Dean's eyes as his brother's gaze glanced up from the papers spelling out something neither of them had ever even heard of before. "The goo they saw was yellow."

Dean's frown went near comical levels, and for the first time that morning he actually seemed intrigued by the possible case. "You sure it's not drugs?"

-o-o-o-

First on the list of things to do when investigating mysterious yellow goo? Interview the alleged witnesses. The first person to report it was twenty-six year old Dale Harris, who worked at – and Dean would shit you not, here – Winners One, otherwise known as the local liquor store. Cops probably dismissed his goo ramblings as sampling a little too much of the merchandise.

The second, only two days later but on the other side of town, was a middle-aged mother of four who worked at Three Guys and An Ox furniture store. Whoever named things in this town was just asking for mystery goo to start showing up on their doorstep. Seriously.

For sighting number three, they visited the home of one Holly Brine, of the Heritage Country Store. 'Just past Little Darby Creek,' or so the gas station attendant told them. When the yellow ooze started coming out of the birdfeeders, that's when she bolted.

Seriously. This town.

Sam and Dean went in as CDC under the ruse that perhaps the goo was a contaminant of some kind. Hey, if they weren't there already, hunters might as well do the job for 'em, right? Unfortunately for said hunters, they weren't getting a lot of useful information. While each witness had a different enough story to not feel rehearsed or raise any flags – eliminating the possibility of them being in on the prank, if it was one – their tales weren't different enough to provide the brothers anything useful.

Each of them had been alone in their respective stores at the time, heard some sort of strange bubbling, liquid noise, and then noticed a thick ooze seeping out of the walls, refrigerators, sofas, and, in Mrs. Brine's case, birdfeeders. And it wasn't just a little bit of ooze, apparently. We're talking entire walls, gallons puddling on the cushions, bye-bye birdie. Which was about when they all took off running.

"And you didn't come in contact with it?" Sam would ask each of them. "Interact with it at all?"

They all shook their heads.

"No way."

"Touch that stuff? Nuh-uh."

"Honesty, I thought I was hallucinating. My first thought was to get home where I could lock the door and ride out the trip."

That was, surprisingly, the sixty-eight year old Holly Brine, sitting on her floral-print sofa in the 'sun room' of her downright quaint little cottage home. Both Winchesters took a moment to stare, blink, clear their throats, and then stare some more.

"So, um, Mrs. Brine…" Dean made a face that said he could not believe he was asking this (or maybe that was just the multiple cat-themed wall decorations surrounding them). "Are you a, uh, frequent user of… erm…hallucinogens-"

"Oh!" Mrs. Brine laughed. It was something of a nervous-but-hinting-at-a-far-wilder-side chuckle. "No, I don't do drugs. I mean, I lived through the sixties, so I know what a bad trip is like."

She let out another light laugh, this one far more nostalgic. Dean exchanged amused glances with Sam, waggling his eyebrows. Sam gave him the look that wasn't quite a bitchface but definitely said, 'focus, Dean.'

"But I don't do those sorts of things anymore," Mrs. Brine continued with a wistful sigh. "I just thought…must have gotten slipped into my food or drink at some point. Because it was a badtrip. I mean, it was yellow. And…glittery."

Sam snorted into the tea she'd poured them. "G-glittery?"

"Yes. Reminded me of my granddaughter's craft glue. They come in all the rainbow colors, and are quite sparkly. She just loves them." Holly was shaking her head like it was the darndest thing in the world as she picked up her own teacup and saucer. "Like I said. It was a bad trip."

"Uh-huh," Dean responded almost in rote, both fascinated by this insane senior who apparently didn't think much of her granddaughter's glitter glue leaking out of the walls – or someone slipping her some LSD offhand – and yet also horrified by this insane senior who clearly did too many drugs in the sixties and didn't think much of glitter glue oozing out of the walls! Seriously. "I think we have all we need. Thank you for your time."

As they left Mrs. Brine's house, screen door closing behind them with the woman still waving them off, Sam and Dean exchanged knowing looks.

"Okay, so probably not drugs," Sam began.

"Not any recent ones, anyway." Dean snorted, smile still on his face from one Holly Brine. Man, life goals if he ever lived that long. "But seriously, what the hell?"

"I don't know."

"Glitter goo, Sam? Glitter goo!"

Sam was still shaking his head as they climbed into the Impala. "You got me. But if they're not all mass hallucinating on some…drugs-in-the-water-supply trip, then what?"

"Not a clue," Dean answered immediately, starting up his Baby and pulling back onto the main road. They had one more witness to interview. The most recent goo sighting had been at a mom 'n pop ice cream shop just a couple blocks away from Holly's house. "Guess we gotta check one of these places ourselves."

Might as well start with the last sighting.

The ice cream shop was pretty darn empty, aside from the owner and a moody, pre-tween boy sitting at one of the tables, headphones on and ignoring the two men in suits who just walked in. The Pop part of the mom 'n pop shop looked rather disappointed they weren't customers. Guess having a sighting of yellow goo at any shop where the merch was digestible was bad for business.

When Sam inquired about the kid's presence, the owner shrugged. "My son. Usually I pick him up from school and take him home, but with Sally, uh, recovering, I'm pulling multiple shifts," the man explained, looking less than enthused about that fact.

"Should we speak in, uh, private, maybe?" the Samsquatch continued, keeping his tone official-CDC-business. It made the owner nervous, clearly, but the man ultimately cast a half-heated glance his son's way and shook his head.

"He can't hear us. Music on those things is turned up so loud he can't hear himself think. Not that he does much of that these days. He's twelve, you know?"

Dean nodded understandingly – because he did know, actually – and Sam gave him a funny look. He cleared his throat, returning a, 'focus, Sam' glance of his own. "We're here concerning what your employee-" Dean glanced down at his notebook- "Sally Fairway saw two days ago?"

"Yes," the man – a Doug Evans – nodded, looking more put out than concerned about the CDC present in his ice cream shop. He, apparently, was onboard the prank or drugs theory. "I told the local authorities already, I don't know what she saw but I've cleaned this place top to bottom and haven't found a thing out of place. No 'yellow goo.' This shop is clean as a whistle, and up to code."

"We believe you, Mr. Evans," Sam jumped in before the increasingly-defensive man could get any more worked up and therefore less cooperative than he already was. "This is just a precautionary evaluation. Standard procedure when we hear multiple reports of an unknown substance."

"Yeah," Dean added on, tapping his notebook on the counter. "We're sure it's nothing, but we need to take a look around. That way we can write up our report, let the town know there's nothing to worry about, and officially declare your ice cream good and safe."

The mention of returning customers, reassured and ready to pay, perked the man right up. He was nodding well before Dean had finished speaking. "Of course, of course. Sally was in the back when she said it happened. Let me show you."

Mr. Evans escorted them to the back, which was really just an empty hallway that led to an employee restroom, a storage room, and a walk-in freezer. The two hunters poked around while Mr. Evans stood in the hallway, arms crossed and keeping half an eye on them, half an eye on his moody tween. There wasn't much the Winchesters could do under the eye of the owner, but they searched what they could for hex bags, symbols, artifacts – pretty much anything that would explain goo appearing and disappearing without reason.

They came up with nothing.

"Alright, so… break in after hours?" Dean muttered under his breath as he and Sam came back together. Mr. Evans' attention was currently on his son. "There's gotta be something causing this 'goo' to show up out of the blue."

Maybe if they tore the place apart without Pop watching over them, they'd find something. Sam didn't have any better ideas, so he agreed, and, with the shop owner, headed back to the front of the shop. They thanked him for his time, assured him their report would be out soon, and started for the door when Mr. Evans cleared his throat.

The two brothers turned back only to find the man was looking at them expectantly.

"Aren't you going to get some ice cream?"

Dean and Sam exchanged looks, Sam coughing to hide his guilty-slashdo-we-really-have-to expression while Dean slapped a wide smile on his face.

"Uh… of course!"

They left the shop several minutes later, Dean chowing down on a double scoop while Sam stared between his own single-scoop sugar cone and his brother disbelievingly.

"What?"

"Dude." As they rounded the corner of the building, headed for the car, the younger Winchester tossed his cone in the nearest trash can, untouched. "Yellow goo."

Dean p'shawed, looking at his brother than the ice cream. "What? It's not like it's got goo on it now!"

"You're disgusting," Sam said with a shake of his head, but he was half laughing as he slid into the passenger side of the Impala.

"And this double fudge rocky road is delicious," Dean countered. "You don't waste delicious, Sammy."

Even as he said it, his stomach made quite the noise of disagreement, which kind of gargled out of his gut, then up his throat and out the mouth in, what Dean would call, an eleven on the Burp scale. Given Sam's truly offended face, it might have even been a twelve.

Dean finished off his ice cream, licking the fingers of one hand while rubbing at his chest with the other. It still wasn't a Chest-Cas feeling burning in there. More like acid reflux, really, so he blamed it on that real man's breakfast. And maybe a little on the double fudge rocky road, much as it pained him to.

"Alright, let's go waste a couple hours until break-in time." With that, Dean put Baby into drive and started searching for the local dive bar. Every town had one, no matter how small, and every town had drunk locals just lining up to be sharked.

-o-o-o-

They broke into the ice cream shop a hundred and forty dollars richer and one black eye later (but as with any fight – bar scuffle or hunt – Dean gave as good as he got. You should have seen the other guy). As they had earlier that day, the boys found a goo-less, standard hallway, storage space and walk-in freezer. The two brothers decided to divide and conquer, with Sam taking the storage room and Dean the freezer after he lost at Rock, Paper, Scissors. Dean blamed the loss (and the chilly night he now had to look forward to) on only being able to mostly see out of one eye. Sam reminded him that his eye wasn't even that swollen.

And that sight had nothing to do with winning Rock, Paper, Scissors, unless you were cheating.

Dean turned and walked into the freezer with a grunt, which the younger Winchester (correctly) translated into, 'fuck off, Sammy.' Sam may not have a list of bitchfaces numbered in his brother's honor (because he wasn't a child), but he was fully versed in the fragile egos of over-compensating Winchester men (a.k.a. sore losers).

Sam had explored about half of the store room – flashlight in hand, opening boxes to search for hex bags or cursed objects – when he first heard it. There was a faint bubbling noise, like the cheesy TV sound effect of a witch's cauldron on Saturday morning cartoons. Sam turned towards where he thought the noise was coming from, flashlight trained on walls and storage shelves, but didn't see anything. No yellow goo.

He strained in the silence of the empty shop, hoping to catch more of the bubbling, but there was nothing. Sam waited another moment before turning back to the box he'd been rummaging through, wondering if he'd imagined the noise.

It was another thirty seconds, maybe even a full minute, before he heard it again. It was coming from the same wall, this time Sam was sure of it. The circle of light from his torch landed on the splotched concrete surface behind an industrial storage shelf. No yellow goo, but the wall did have a slight shimmer to it. Like maybe it was damp. Or glittery.

Sam propped his light between a can of paint and an old, beat up box filled with paintbrushes and rollers, then got to work moving the shelf. The thing was decently heavy, the length of four feet adding to the awkwardness of attempting to move it on his own. He ended up dragging just his end, inch by inch across the floor, the whole thing scraping loudly with each pull. Once he had enough clearance to get a better view of the section he thought he'd seen the shimmer on, Sam turned to grab his flashlight.

"Alright, I got bust," Dean suddenly announced loudly from just a few feet away, having left the freezer and entered the storage room without Sam's notice.

The younger Winchester jumped at the sudden interruption, fumbling with the flashlight and knocking a can of paint off the shelf in his efforts to catch it. The lid popped off as it hit the hard concrete below. Light purple paint – the same color of the walls in the front of the shop – splashed over the washed-out grey of the floor.

"Smooth move, ExLax," Dean snorted, though he was staring at his brother like the beanstalk might have somehow forgotten they were in here sneaking around.

"Jeez, Dean," Sam blurted out, flashlight and accompanying hand pressed to his chest as his heart raced. He sent a look Dean's way. "You scared the crap out of me!"

His brother's eyebrows went up unapologetically, and he tossed his arms out. "Dude, I wasn't being quiet."

Sam bit back the obvious response to that and instead focused his torch on the wall, turning to look for any shimmer. But the concrete was clear and dry. No glitter, no goo, no dampness in sight. He pressed his hand to it, hoping for… he didn't even know. Maybe some residual wetness? Something to prove he wasn't just seeing things?

"Uh…you alright there, Sammy?" Dean asked, having moved far enough into the room to look between his brother and the wall he was, er, caressing.

Sam gave him an annoyed look, catching the tone, before pulling his hand off the concrete surface. "Yeah, just… thought I saw something."

"Goo? An eight year old's leftover craft supplies?" Dean shouldered up next to him, as much as he could between the partially shifted storage shelf and the stacked boxes to the other side. He craned his neck past Sammy's shoulder to squint at the wall. "Looks like a normal wall to me."

"Yeah, thanks, Dean. I can see that for myself." Sam turned and pushed past his brother, shaking his head. "Probably just a trick of the light. You done?"

Dean spun on his heel as well, tracing his flashlight from the wall along the floor until it landed on the spilled paint. Sam ignored it and him. "Yup, nothing 'cept ice cream in there. Tasty, tasty ice cream."

"Dude," the younger Winchester immediately chided, giving his brother a wide-eyed look, stabbing at his face with his light. Dean squinted through the beam. "That's so unsanitary."

"Eh, what they don't know won't hurt them," Dean grumbled back, raising a hand to block the obnoxious light. "Besides, doesn't cold, like, kill bacteria and shit?"

"Some of it, sure," Sam answered reasonably, though the expression on his face as he lowered the beam was anything but reasonable. Really, had his brother listened at all in school? "But some bacteria and viruses live in sub-zero temperatures, you moron."

Dean pulled his head back. "What viruses?"

"E-coli, for one!" Sam wanted to shake his head and stare at the heavens, but instead he got back to looking through the last of the boxes he'd yet to search.

"Ew, dude, I do not have E-coli."

"Salmonella for another."

"And I'm not raw chicken, either, thank you very much."

Sam did pause to look over his shoulder at his idiotic brother. Dean was just milling about in the center of the room, a half-hearted expression of offense on his face. "Don't you have something better to be doing? Like helping me search?"

"Dude, I searched my room," the older Winchester immediately defended, raising his hands, flashlight loosely gripped in one. "And I got the sucky one."

"Which I'm sure has nothing to do with why you're done faster," Sam muttered, almost-but-not-quite under his breath.

"Not my fault you were communing with a blank wall while I actually did my job," Dean snarked back, smirk on his face.

"I was not commun-" Sam cut himself off with a sigh, realizing exactly what his brother was dragging him headfirst into and refusing to follow. He was the adult in the room, regardless of age, and he would act like it. "Can you go check out back?"

Dean gave off what he probably thought was a stern frown, but all Sam saw was the pout of a put-upon child. "There's nothing back there."

He wasn't wrong. The back of the shop was nothing more than a dumpster and three employee parking spots squeezed into the small space in the alley behind the building. Still, it would get him out of Sam's hair and let him finish his search in peace.

"A dumpster is a great place to hide a hex bag," Sam offered with a far-too-nonchalant shrug as he finished one box and opened another. There'd been nothing in them but marketing materials, some tools and cleaning supplies, and an outdated set of menus (at least according to the selection they'd chosen from earlier that day). Nothing suspicious, but now Sam was determined to finish the job and do it right.

"Yeah, yeah." Grumbling under his breath about how hex bags outside the building wouldn't affect the person inside, Dean trudged out of the storage room. Sam heard the emergency exit door open and close a few seconds later.

He didn't even have time to return a good-natured grumble of his own before the bubbling was back. It was louder this time, and accompanied by the drip-plop-drip of something thick but aqueous. Sam spun back to the wall, flashlight trained beyond the shelf. It was shimmering once more with a dampness not unlike a Weeping Wall.

"Right," Sam breathed out as realization came to him. "Every witness was alone when they saw it."

He glanced towards the door where Dean had left not a full minute ago. When he looked back at the wall, it had a viscous shine to it now, like the surface had become slimy. As Sam drew closer, the texture thickened, becoming more of a goo-like substance that started to slide down the wall.

With his flashlight illuminating the slime, Sam could admit the yellowy, transparent stuff did have something of a glittery look.

"Dean!" he hollered, though he didn't take his eyes off the wall. He didn't know if it would disappear once his brother came in, and Sam realized belatedly they should get a sample. The hunter spun in a circle, flashlight landing on the boxes to one side and the cluttered shelves to the other. He'd seen some plastic sample spoons in one of those boxes while searching through them. That would work.

It took him several seconds of rummaging, tossing packages of napkins and some marketing materials aside until he came up with the bag of several hundred colored, plastic spoons. He ripped into it, spilling them all over the place as he grabbed one.

Sam heard the back door open and knew Dean would be back any moment. Just in case the goo magically disappeared with another person present – and in a case this weird, Sam really wouldn't count against it – the younger Winchester turned back to the wall. With flashlight in one hand, spoon in the other, he carefully scraped some of the viscous, goopy substance onto the tip of the blue plastic.

Dean came jogging into the room as Sam stepped away from the wall, flashlight on the blob of what now looked like green goop.

"Huh," Sam said as Dean drew up short, eying the spoon. The older Winchester glanced at the wall behind Sam, expecting to see slime dripping down the walls, but it was barren and dry. Sam leaned his head closer to the gunk, taking a small whiff.

He immediately sneezed so strongly he sent the yellow stuff flinging across the room via his mini-blue-catapult. Dean ducked out of the way.

"Dude," he complained at almost getting a face-full of Nickelodeon-Gone-Wrong.

Sam made a noise of equal complaint (and yet somehow also apologetic in that way only a puppy dog could ever truly manage) as he sneezed again. When he spoke, his voice was wet and gunky. Dean made another face.

"Sulfur," the moose of a Winchester managed to spit out, rubbing at his nose with his free hand, wiggling his facial features as much as possible to cure the awful itch and leftover smell.

Dean looked equally disgusted, but with an extra dose of surprise. "Demon goo?"

A wave of white caught Sam's attention and he looked up to see Dean flapping a napkin his way, having snagged one from the discarded package on the floor. Sam took it gratefully and spent the next several seconds trying to clear out what was at least a minor allergic reaction.

Great. The boy with the demon blood, allergic to sulfur goo. You'd think being cursed with such a God-awful destiny would at least come with benefits. Silver linings at a bare minimum.

With another cough and two more napkins, Sam was finally able to breath without sneezing. "Gross. What kind of demon creates, uh… demonic ectoplasm?"

"A…demon ghost?" Dean hazarded. "God I hope not, that sounds like a pain in the ass."

Sam took a closer look at the spoon in his hand. Most of the glob of yellow he'd scraped off the wall was now somewhere on the other side of the room. But the blue plastic was still tipped with wetness. Sam didn't dare breathe in again anywhere near it, and instead started looking for something to put the contaminated spoon in.

Dean held out an ice cream cup he dug out of another box and Sam, grateful once again, dropped the spoon into the small paper container. Then he sneezed, again, letting out an irritated whine. The younger Winchester hated allergies. And head colds.

And the look on his brother's face in that moment.

"You're such a baby," Dean sniggered, wrapping another napkin around the top of the cup. Not exactly a sterile or secure method of transporting evidence but, then again, hunters made do with what they had.

"Shut up," Sam muttered through another round of gunk-face, voice clogged with mucus. So gross. He wanted to remind his brother what a baby he was when sick, but was too busy going through another handful of napkins.

The two brothers froze – Sam mid-blow – at the sound of a car driving by, probably through the alley out back. The headlines lit the hallway just outside the door. The Winchesters exchanged cautious glances.

"We should probably get out of here." Dean, still smirking, handed his brother the carefully wrapped cup with their only clue so far. "Hold this. And don't snort it again."

Sam's responding glower was something between a pout and fratricide.

-o-o-o-

Sam kept clearing his throat.

By the third or fourth time in twice as many minutes, Dean glanced over to the passenger side, where his brother's face was screwed up in a way that said he was trying not to clear his throat a fifth time.

"Dude. You swallow a fly or something over there?"

Sam didn't even glare, just cleared his throat again, this time rubbing at his throat as he did. When he spoke, his voice was thick. "I'm fine. Just..."

Dean waited for the rest of that sentence, focus split between the road and his brother. Concern flickered on the backburner, but the man from the future fought it off. Sam was fine, just had something in his system. He'd clear it out in a minute.

Still. Sam hadn't answered, and there he was, trying to clear his throat again.

"Just what?" Dean glanced at Sam again, this time actually slowing the Impala so he could pay more attention to his brother. "Sam?"

The younger Winchester's throat-clearing turned into a cough, which then didn't stop. Dean's eyes widened, concern no longer in the back of his mind.

"Sam!"

Sam was pulling at the collar of his t-shirt now, doubled over as the cough got rougher. "D-Dean."

"Shit, hang on!" Dean pulled the car over as quickly as he could without sending Sam flying into the windshield. The cough abated enough for Sam to take a deep, gasping breath, but it didn't sound right. For such a deep inhalation, it was far too shallow.

"S-something's wrong," Sam managed to get out before he was coughing again, weaker this time.

Dean was out of the car and around to the passenger side in record time, throwing the door open. Sam managed to tilt himself out of the car with his brother's help, legs on the rough asphalt, desperately trying to breathe through a closing throat and crackling lungs. Dean tried to guide him through deep breaths, but nothing was working.

"Damnit, Sammy, breathe!"

Sam wanted to snap at him that he was trying. But he didn't need to. His fingertips were starting to tinge blue. He could only imagine what his face and lips looked like.

"Shit," Dean swore. "Hospital. I'm taking you to the hospital."

Dean shoved his brother's cricket legs back into the footwell of the passenger seat and closed the door as fast as he could. As soon as he was back in the driver's seat, he gunned it, hoping that whatever the hell Sam had inhaled in that glitter goo, it was curable by normal, modern medicine.

-o-o-o-

The nearest hospital was a fifteen minute drive. Dean made it in nine. He didn't bother parking Baby so much as screeching her tires to an abrupt halt outside the E.R., where he threw the door open and was by Sam's side before the first medical staff came running. His brother was still struggling to breathe, taking shallow, gasping inhales. His lips were a terrifying blue.

An EMT, probably back on his way to an ambulance, was the first to assess the younger Winchester as Dean helped Sam out of the car. He was bent over, hand to his chest, shaking with a desperate need for oxygen as they stumbled step-by-step towards the hospital doors. Dean fumbled through the rapid fire questions directed at him by the EMT – what happened, had he taken anything, anything at all, was he exposed to anything – the best he could.

Can't breathe. No, no drugs. Nothing! There wasn't anything that caused this shit. He just started coughing, then not breathing! Maybe…there was this yellow goo, and he maybe sniffed it?

The man started hollering words to the pair of nurses that hurried their way from inside. Words like asphyxiation and hypoxia. Words, for the most part, that meant nothing but bad to Dean. It was clear from the calm but urgent way the man spoke to the two others that Sam was in serious trouble. They took him from Dean's arms before the hunter even knew the transfer had happened, but he let it. Despite every bone in his body that said 'back off!', the hunter knew he was out of his depth.

They hurried Sam inside, meeting a stretcher at the door that was on its way out to them. As Dean tried to follow them into the building, Sam sagging as he was hoisted onto the bed, the EMT grabbed his shoulder.

"You need to move your car, man. They've got your friend." At the dumbfounded-yet-fierce glare Dean sent his way, the EMT returned the look with one that said he understood, but wasn't budging. "There's nothing more you can do for him now, alright? You got him here. Now go park your car and head to the front desk. They'll need you to fill out paperwork, get them information, alright? That's what you can do to help your friend."

"Brother," Dean corrected forcefully, eyes darting between the hospital doors where Sam was now being wheeled in, and the EMT. He was clearly seconds away from bolting after the disappearing younger Winchester. "He's my brother."

The guy's eyes closed for a second before, with a sigh, he held out his empty hand, curling his fingers expectantly. "Give me your keys."

The hunter balked immediately. "Excuse me?"

"Keys," he repeated. "I'll park your car. Go in after your brother and talk to the nurses at the front desk. And be nice. They're just doing their jobs, man."

Dean spared him a look – something between angry and grateful, quite the odd combo but hardly the first time the man had seen such an expression aimed his way – before he threw the EMT his keys and headed in after Sam. Choosing between his brother and his Baby – letting someone, some stranger, drive her – was easier than he'd ever imagined it would be. But, he supposed, that really shouldn't have been surprising, given Sammy was definitely in trouble and Dean had no idea what was causing it. Which meant he had no idea how to fix it.

He could always bodily murder some random EMT for dinging up his Baby after Sammy pulled through.

The E.R. was unfairly calm and quiet. Maybe that was normal on a Sunday night, but Dean thought there should be yelling, running around, you know, urgency. Something to match what was going on internally for him, at least.

There were a dozen or so people in the waiting area, coughing, sniffling, or clutching minor injuries as they waited to be seen. Dean marched passed all of them, straight up to the Admissions desk. Familiar with the process, he had the paperwork filled out with nearly entirely fake information in less than ten minutes. Then he started demanding information on his brother, all the while keeping his eyes locked on the Emergency Room doors.

It wasn't long. Dean's brain said, 'That's a good thing' while his gut clenched in the complete opposite. A doctor, flanked by a nurse, came through those double days, holding a clipboard and spotting Dean right away. The hunter steeled himself for whatever news they had to deliver and met them half way.

Sam was fine. Whatever had happened was fixable, and they'd fixed him. Easy as that.

Because this wasn't where Sam died and Dean knew that. Knew that with a hundred percent confidence.

"Mr. Winchester," the doctor greeted with a solemn nod and a look on his face that did nothing for Dean's gut. His brain wasn't listening to it, though.

"How's my brother?"

"I'm… I'm sorry, Mr. Winchester. Your brother didn't make it."

"Right." Dean nodded, eyes darting over the man's shoulder to the doors behind him. Where Sam was. "When can I see him?"

The doctor and nurse exchanged a look Dean hardly saw, let alone wasted time interpreting. The doctor cleared his throat. "Um, I don't think you're understanding me, Mr. Winchester."

"What's there to understand?" Dean asked more forcefully this time, locking fierce, demanding eyes on the man for a moment before looking at those doors again. "I want to see him."

"Mr. Winchester…" It was the nurse this time, going for that soft, victim-voice that Dean did not like. He didn't like it when it was aimed at genuine victims – too much pitying, not enough helping in his opinion – let alone aimed at him. "Your brother passed away. We weren't able to save him."

Dean frowned at the words that made absolutely no sense. Why was she saying that? It's clearly not what had happened. Sam was fine. Maybe dinged up, probably doped to the gills to fix whatever had happened, but he was fine. He was in some room just passed those doors.

"Mr. Winchester, your brother is dead."

The hunter turned that bemused stare to the doctor, then started shaking his head. "No, he's not. He had, like, an allergic reaction or something. That's fixable."

"We don't know what happened," the doctor admitted with a frown of his own, though his was far more neutral and restrained than Dean's. "But even an allergic reaction, if severe enough, can be fatal."

"Yeah, but this one wasn't," Dean insisted, still not understanding what they were playing at. Sam wasn't dead, because this wasn't where he died. It was as simple as that. The man from the future had no illusions that time was coming (and he'd fight tooth and nail to keep it from happening), but it wasn't now. It wasn't here.

Azazel wasn't even back topside, far as they knew. And Dean was sure, once that happened, they'd know. That yellow-eyed son of a bitch would make sure they knew.

"I want to see my brother," he insisted, raising his voice now. Dean didn't know what was going on – maybe it was some sort of conspiracy, or trick. Demons, angels, or something else. But Sammy was back there, and he wasn't dead.

So Dean did what he always did when it came to Sammy. He stopped listening and took action.

"Hey, wait!" the nurse yelled as Dean bodily pushed through the two medical professionals and headed for those double doors. He heard them following him, shouting at him to stop, but he wasn't gonna do that until he got to the bottom of whatever sick joke this was.

"Sammy!" He hollered through the hall, checking the first room on the right, which was locked, and the next on the left, which opened to an operating room.

"What the hell?" one of the nurses, dressed head to toe in blue, mask over face, could be heard even as Dean moved on.

He opened the next door and froze. There were three people in there, two cleaning up what had clearly been a surgery and one draping a sheet over the third. Sam. Lying on the table in the middle of the room, unmoving. His eyes were closed, his hair was messy and way too long, just like always. And he wasn't moving.

"Sam…" Dean started forward, faltering when the two others in the room froze, unsure what to do. The doctor and the nurse that had followed him down the hall stopped in the doorway behind him.

"Let's give him a moment," the doctor murmured softly, and the other staff set down what they were doing. They all headed for the door, giving Dean a wide berth as they moved around that the hunter saw any of them. His eyes were locked on his brother, on a truth he refused to see, lying cold and still in the center of the room.

"I'm so sorry," one of them said as they passed, hand on his shoulder. "We did everything we could."

As Dean reached his brother's bedside, still confused but in a numb sort of way, the doctor saw the last of his staff out of the room. He quietly shut the door, remaining in the room with the distraught hunter.

"Sammy?" Dean spoke, voice cracking as he reached out and grabbed his brother's shoulder, giving it a shake. This didn't make any sense. This wasn't where Sam died. Or how or when. It just wasn't.

"They really did do all they could," the doctor spoke from behind, voice taking on a different tone. Less quiet. Less understanding. "They couldn't save him."

This didn't make any sense. It was the only thing going through Dean's brain. The only thought he seemed capable of thinking. Something was wrong. Something was off. He didn't know what, but this wasn't right.

"But I can."

Dean picked his head up, away from his brother's lifeless face. Something about that voice. He turned his head towards the doctor. "What did you say?"

"I said I can save him, Dean. For the right price."

The man from the future turned, hunter's gut tightening to the point of pain, to take in the doctor standing by the door. A man he didn't recognize, had never seen before, but somehow still knew.

At least, he knew those pale, yellow eyes.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: Whaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaat? Dun Dun Duuuuuuun! Told ya it was a heck of a chapter :D Oh, do we have good things in store! Did I say good? I think I meant no good, dirty rotten ;)

"Smooth move, Exlax" is a phrase sarcastically referencing a common laxative, ExLax. It was popular in the 80's and 90's, far as I can tell.

Chapter Fun Fact #1: All the store names are real stores in Mechanicsburg, Ohio. I pulled open google maps and got-a searching, then couldn't believe when I just kept finding more and more of the most fabulously named stores. Sometimes, it's the real world shit you can sneak in that's the best XD

Chapter Fun Fact #2: Half of this chapter was edited while in lines for various roller coasters at Six Flags today. I'm a queen of multi-tasking :D

Update: I apologize for such a long delay to get you this chapter. Good news is I have the next two chapters already written, yaaaaay! I'll do my best to post the next chapter in a week, but if I can't then I promise it'll be up in two weeks! (My August is getting very busy between extreme OT at work and social events next weekend, but I'll do my best!)

I have missed you all these last few months, love you very much, and hope you are well. See you in one (or two, at the most) week(s)!

Cheers,

Silence

Chapter 117: Season 2: Chapter 83

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Okay, time for the real fun to begin. Y'all ready?

Review Replies: Thank you all so much for the encouragement in your comments! You all are super sweet, and I appreciate each and every one of you. I may be struggling, but I'll make it through!

Chapter Warnings: Tee-hee-hee! [insert no good dirty rotten smile here]

Actual Chapter Warnings: Attempted suicide is mentioned repeatedly in this chapter in graphic detail. Please proceed with caution.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 83

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

"You," Dean hissed, immediately putting himself between Azazel and his brother. Didn't matter if the body behind him was breathing or not. This demon wasn't laying another hand on Sammy. Not while Dean still lived.

"Me." The doctor – Azazel – smiled widely, eyes sliding back to their human brown.

"Bring him back!" Dean all but shouted, reaching for the gun tucked against his back. It wouldn't do any good against a demon, but Dean didn't care. He'd empty the entire clip into the bastard anyway.

"Oh, right away, kiddo," the demon agreed, raising his hands in placation as if Dean needn't shout. "Just as soon as you give me the juice."

The blood in his veins froze to ice. It sent a shiver through his whole body, crawling down his spine and rippling through his skin.

Shit. Shit! This wasn't… this wasn't how it was supposed to go down. Not now. Not in some hospital in Podunk Ohio, not during some mundane case with friggin' goo of all things.

Yellow goo. A stupid, pale yellow goo that smelled like sulfur.

Dean sucked in a breath, realization flooring him and taking every single organ with it. His jaw dropped with them, lips parting in stunned, horrified understanding. Azazel never needed a battle royale to kick off the Apocalypse. He just needed Sam dead, and Dean should have been prepared for that.

But he wasn't. He absolutely wasn't, and now he had no time to think.

'Cas.' The hunter slammed his eyes shut, fingers curling into fists as he put his all – every inch of soul – into that desperate prayer. 'Cas, I need you. We need you! Right fucking now!'

A breeze, barely discernible as wind and more like a presence, passed through the room. No, not the room – his head. Like a brush across his senses. A feeling. Dean's ears popped and he opened his eyes, expecting to see the angel in all her trench-coated, butt-kicking, life-saving glory. But Cas wasn't there. The room was empty save for him, Azazel, and the corpse of his brother.

The hunter hissed, hand reaching up to his chest as it ached so sharply he wanted to double over. But he dropped his hand, quick as he caught it rising, and kept his spine straight against the sudden pain. He wanted to rub at his sternum, to tell Chest Cas, 'yeah, no shit there's a demon nearby. Kinda noticed for myself, thanks, buddy.' But he resisted. The last thing he wanted to do was call attention to the angel in his chest. Not in front of a demon. Not in front of this demon.

As the silence stretched, Azazel waiting patiently, a smug little victory smirk all over his stupid Harvard Medical face, and no angel swooped in for a rescue, Dean started to worry.

'Cas? Uh… Castiel? Buddy? You got your ears on, right? Please tell me you have your ears on!'

Cas was awake, now. She should be able to hear him.
She'd promised, even before the healing trance, to keep her ears on. To be ready for something just like this.

Azazel took a step forward, body language definitely screaming it wasn't going to be just one, and Dean staggered back to match it. The hard edge of the O.R. table pressed against him and, on instinct, he reached back to put a hand on Sammy. Yellow Eyes wasn't getting him. Not without going through Dean.

Which, shit, right, that was kind of the whole point, wasn't it? Despite his worry for Cas, who either couldn't hear his prayer for some reason or was being blocked from getting in (and shit, shit, shit, why hadn't Dean thought of that? Of course Azazel would take steps to ward this place against angels. He'd planned it all; he knew this was the closest hospital, knew Dean would have to take Sammy here. Shit, shit, shit!), Dean had to shelve his concern. He had more immediate problems at the moment.

Azazel took another step. "Still waiting, Dean-o. All you've got to say are the magic words, and poof –" he waved his hand, mimicking the motion of a wand – "Sammy's back. Good as new."

God, he was so screwed and he knew it. Because Dean didn't know how to not make this deal. He'd had two years. Two years to come up with an alternative, an out, anything to stop this from happening, and he'd failed.

Cas had been his plan B. He hadn't come up with a plan C.

"You promise me. Right now."

The hunter's gaze drifted from Azazel to the not-so distant past of Bobby's salvage yard. To a dented and beat up Impala and a crowbar in his brother's hands.

"If I die, at any time, you let me stay dead."

He'd promised him. He'd promised Sammy that he'd do nothing, and now there was nothing he could do. Because he'd promised he wouldn't do it. Only…. Even now, with Sam behind him, beneath his hand, still and unmoving (and god damnit, how many times was he going to have to go through this in one life?), Dean wasn't sure how to keep that promise. He didn't know how to live without his brother. Ten extra years. Months, days, and minutes of borrowed time. A dead man's time. And he still hadn't learned.

"If eating a bullet…"

His gaze shifted to the gun in his hand. The weight was so familiar, like an extension of his arm itself. The metal was comfortably warm from the heat of his palm, a little slick with sweat but ever sure in his grip. It was his favorite. The twin to Sammy's. One of the very few gestures his dad had ever made that meant something to him, even now.

Slowly, like a man lost to time, unaware as it moved around him, Dean clicked off the safety and raised the firearm.

"…keeps you from bringing me back…"

He lifted that gun and fired every round but one into Azazel. The demon took each bullet with hardly the blink of an eye. As silence settled heavy in the room once the deafening bursts of gunfire finished echoing off metal tables and paneled walls, Azazel dusted off the hole-spattered, white coat. He spared the hunter a truly pitying glance.

Dean gritted his teeth. He wanted to kill this son of a bitch so, so badly.

"You can take your anger out on me all you want, kiddo," Azazel said calmly, as if he'd expected the futile rage. Dean's blood boiled beneath his skin. "It's not going to bring him back. Only one thing can."

The hunter's hand shook around the hilt of his gun, shook against his brother's arm. He'd promised. That day they fixed up the Impala, that day he spilled his guts – spilled five years of the worst memories of his life – he had promised his brother that no matter what, he'd let Sammy stay dead.

"I'd rather you be in Heaven with me, than both of us here, starting the end of the world."

"Yeah," Dean finally spoke, head bowed and voice full of grit. The words tasted like sulfur on his tongue and burned like hellfire. "I remember."

The man from the future lifted his gaze, eyes blazing with the kind of ferocity demons in Hell had learned to fear. He stared Azazel down, that bastard who had killed his mother. His father. And now his brother.

Dean lifted his favorite gun, barrel digging into his chin. He closed his eyes and pulled the trigger.

-o-o-o-

He came to with a gasp, sitting upright in a bed he didn't remember going to sleep in, in a motel room he didn't remember paying for. The radio beside him was blaring music – Foreigner – at a truly annoying volume, and Dean kind of wanted to throw it across the room.

"It feels like the first time."

What the hell.

"Feels like the very first time."

What the hell.

"Morning, Sunshine," Sam's voice came from what sounded like the next bed over and something caught in Dean's throat. Lodged there with the kind of intensity that almost made him throw up.

The older Winchester's gaze snapped to his brother so fast his neck popped. There was Sam, on the other mattress, fully dressed and pulling on his shoes. He looked too amused to be a corpse.

"Sammy?" Dean muttered almost hollowly. No, it… it couldn't be. Sam was….

"It feels like the first time. Feels like the very first time."

The hunter glanced at his surroundings. Ugly wallpaper, flimsy furniture, god-awful sense of interior decorating. Yup, standard motel room. He glanced down at the bed he was sitting in, covers still draped over him.

Huh. That… that had been one hell of a dream, Dean thought, still a little shaken.

"And it must be the woman in you, that brings out the man in me-"

He turned and jammed his finger against every button on the alarm clock until it stopped crooning Lou Gramm at obnoxious levels.

"You alright?" Sam asked, this time the amusement in his voice replaced with the stirrings of concern. He dropped his foot, laces fully done up, and watched his brother with a wary eye.

"Y-Yeah," Dean managed to spit out, kind of stumbling over it on the first attempt. He cleared his throat then shook his head to clear it, too. "Yeah, fine. Weird dream."

Sam let out a huff of a laugh and, with amusement full back in control, asked, "Clowns or midgets?"

Dean glared at him. "Har har. Bitch."

"Hey, it's your material. Jerk." Sam stood from the bed, still smirking as he walked into the bathroom.

And yeah, alright, Dean probably deserved that. Not that he'd ever admit it. The older Winchester was slow to climb out of bed and paused once he had. He stared at the mattress: the ugly brown comforter that had been more itchy than warm, the tussled sheets that suggested a night of rough dreams, and the pillow, still indented from the weight of his head.

Man. What a weird dream.

-o-o-o-

As they entered the diner around the corner, Dean started to wonder if he'd lost it. Just flat out gone crazy. Or maybe had one of those Bermuda Triangle moments. You know, the ones where people swore they dreamed about a conversation that happened the exact same way the next day, but didn't have a psychic bone in their body? Creepy, one-off shit like that. Maybe he'd wandered through a hotspot or something.

Darla was wearing the exact same pink uniform (not that surprising, really. She probably had to wear it every day), and greeted them in the exact same manner, coffee pot in hand and already pouring. Dean's chest ached at the sight and he rubbed his sternum with a grimace that definitely caught Sam's attention. The waitress left and Dean nudged his full-to-the-brim cup a little further away from him, stomach churning.

"You feeling alright?" Sammy asked, and both Dean's head and gut did an unpleasant spin of déjà vu. He dropped his hand from his chest, despite the fierce ache.

"Yeah. Rough night." The older Winchester glanced around the diner, checking every pair of eyes he could see. All human. No yellow in sight. He rubbed at his chest again, internally muttering to Cas to knock it the hell off already. It was just a dream.

A fucked up dream, maybe, but just a dream.

"What'll you boys be having?" Darla asked as she swung back by, coffee pot no longer in hand, but hand on her hip. Dean frowned at the disconcerting weirdness that was this morning. Definitely a psychic hotspot or something.

"I'll have the California Omelet with a side salad, please."

Sam handed over his menu with a warm smile. The waitress turned to Dean to take his order, but he was staring at Sam, wide-eyed and in a way that left the younger Winchester suspecting he'd miraculously grown a second head.

(Because, Sam was sure, he'd ordered a salad for breakfast and his brother was a child.)

He pulled a face. "Dude, what?"

Dean blinked at the accusation (not even a question, really) and just shook his head. Psychic hotspot. Had to be, he thought, as he muttered that salad was not a breakfast food (because he couldn't help himself), before turning to Darla. "I'm, uh, I'm good. Nothing for me."

It was Sam's turn to frown, but Dean ignored it. The way his stomach was flip-flopping in confusion, trepidation, and general what-the-fuckery, meant breakfast – no matter how greasy, fluffy, or caffeinated it might be – was right out for him.

"You sure you're alright?"

This time, Dean shook his head. Because no, he wasn't. "Something's weird."

Sam straightened. "Weird how?"

'Like, weird, Sam!"

That earned him Bitchface #6 ('Why me?')

"You're going to have to give me more to go on than that, Dean. Weird is kind of our Tuesday."

Dean pulled his head back, caught off guard. "Wait, it's Tuesday?"

"What?" Sam was definitely staring at him now, confusion overcoming any earlier concern. "No, it's Sunday. Dude, are you sure you're alright?"

The bell above the diner's door rang with new customers. Darla called out a half-hearted greeting, and Dean got a weird feeling in his gut. Well, a weird*er* feeling, anyway.

A kid – no more than four or five – came barreling down the aisle between the counter barstools and the booths. Even as the child's dad called out for him not to run (Dean's stomach now curling inward from the déjà vu), the little tyke tripped.

Dean shot out an arm, more on instinct than anything actually thought through, and managed to snag the back of the kid's shirt just as he went down right next to their table. The boy made a little 'grk' of a sound as Dean kept him from falling by clothing alone. The hunter stared at both the kid and his grip on him, eyes wide, just as surprised as anyone.

"Whoa, uh… nice catch!" the father of the boy said as he caught up. The kid got his feet back under him and Dean, still somewhat stunned and also confused as hell, released the boy's shirt. The dad put a hand on his son's back, both comforting the child and smoothing out his scrunched up clothing. "What do you say?"

"Thank you," the boy mumbled, pulling at his tee which had, admittedly, rucked up around his neck on the grab. He cast a quick, fleeting glance Dean's way, cheeks already red from the exertion, excitement, and nearly-averted tantrum. "Sorry."

"It's, uh, it's alright, kid," Dean found himself saying, voice a little hollow. He cleared his throat, trying to shake that dream (which was now starting to feel less like a dream) and the fog it brought into his head. "Just, uh, slow down next time, yeah? Wouldn't want you to get hurt."

The father gave a grateful smile and nod to the Winchesters as he nudged his son forward. The family went on their way to the last booth in the row and tucked into the table fairly quietly. Dean stared at them way longer than was probably appropriate. He only snapped out of it when Sam gave a little cough to clear the awkward silence.

"Nice reflexes," the younger Winchester offered with a half-smile, but he couldn't quite mask the concern. He knew something was off with his brother, he just didn't know what.

'That makes two of us,' Dean thought as he stared at Sammy, going too long without blinking and knowing it.

Because it hadn't been reflexes. It had been…. He'd…. The hunter shook his head, because knowing it was going to happen due to a psychic dream was impossible. At least for him. He didn't have premonitions – awake or asleep – no matter the lies he'd told so he could hide out in this timeline. But it clearly hadn't been a normal dream, either.

Which meant it was something else.

Panic flooded Dean, his heart picking up a notch or two after skipping a nice, long beat. If it wasn't a dream, then what happened next…. The man from the future swallowed what felt like a throat full of glass. He glanced around the diner once again, meeting every pair of eyes he could and checking for yellow. Expecting yellow.

If that dream hadn't been a dream, then Azazel was here, in this town, watching them. He'd laid a trap, Sam died, and Dean killed himself to avoid making a deal. So Yellow Eyes must have brought him back, to make Dean live it all again and this time make that deal. The demonic bastard was just fucking with him.

Yeah, well, two could play at that game and Dean Winchester was nobody's bitch.

He stood from the table abruptly. Sam leaned back, surprised by the sudden movement, and raised a questioning eyebrow as Dean dug out his wallet.

"Let's get out of here."

"Uh…" Sam glanced around the restaurant, looking for whatever had spooked his brother.

Dean, misreading that look as a 'but we just ordered…?' form of concern, threw some bills down on the table. He wouldn't be dissuaded, already heading for the door. "Come on, I'll buy you breakfast on the road. It can even be healthy, you freak."

The younger Winchester scrambled to follow. "On the road?"

"Yeah. Goo's not all that important." That little bell above the door rang again as Dean stepped outside. "There are better cases out there. Let's find one of those."

Sam missed a step as he followed, but caught himself pretty quickly. The look on his face was a mixture of surprise and absolute bafflement. Tone matching the expression, he admitted, "I didn't think you were awake last night when I told you about this case."

"What? No, this morning–" Dean cut himself off, realizing that they hadn't discussed the case this morning. At least, not this morning. "Uh… no, right, last night. Sure. In the car."

The older Winchester gave a cursory glance to the left and right – not even looking or really seeing the road he was about to cross – before stepping into the street. Behind him, Sam was actually struggling to keep up. Not because of his long legs, but more his sheer confusion as to why Dean was booking it, double time.

But what Sam didn't know was that they were getting out of this town and they were doing it immediately. Dean could and would explain the whole mess to his brother once they were safely a mile or two (or a hundred) away from that hospital, that ice cream shop, and any sulfuric yellow goo that might be hiding in this fucked up town.

"Dean, what the hell!" Sam's complaint came from behind him as he stepped into the road. "Will you slow down and talk to me?"

The sound of tires screeching caused Dean to flinch and spin all at once, heart squeezing in panic. But no amount of speed, reflex, or terror could save Sam from the car that barreled into him, speeding through the stop sign it should have obeyed.

"Sammy!"

The younger Winchester hit the ground hard and Dean flinched a second time at the sound of a head cracking against pavement. Sam rolled several times before coming to limp stop of dead weight and broken bones. The car lurched to a halt just feet in front of the downed Winchester.

Dean's knees hit the asphalt next to Sam with punishing desperation. His hands shook over the bleeding body below him, hesitating for fear of causing more damage. The worry only lasted a moment before he was scooping his baby brother into his arms, best he could.

"Sam! Sammy, open your eyes. Come on, don't do this, damnit. You're fine. You're gonna be just fine." Dean's voice cracked, frantic brain and clenched gut refusing to believe the words coming out of his own mouth. He knew they were lies. He shook Sam regardless, wary of the broken bones and bleeding cuts, but trying to get his brother to wake back up. "You can't die on me, you bastard. You can't."

The creak of a car door and footsteps – too slow and too calm for the situation – drew Dean's attention. His gaze locked on the approaching man. A man he didn't recognize, had never seen before, but instantly hated. A man with eyes that shifted yellow as he lowered a pair of sunglasses from his face.

Dean's chest lit with an inner fire that ached and burned and begged to be rubbed at.

"Well, well, well," Azazel tsked, looking down at the bleeding, broken Winchester and the brother holding him close. He gave a little shake of his head, tucking those obnoxious sunglasses into the breast pocket of his polo. "What a shame."

Dean pulled out his gun in the span of a blink and managed to get one round off before the demon was on him. Azazel grabbed his wrist with one hand, splintering the bones with a simple twist. The hunter cried out in pain even as his weapon was plucked from his lax grip and tossed to the side, where it clattered against the curb.

"I don't think so, Tiger." The demon gave Dean an admonishing look, like a parent scolding a mildly misbehaving child. He even waggled a finger in the hunter's face before releasing his wrist. "Not this time."

"Go to hell," Dean spat out through a clenched, shaking jaw. He curled his shattered forearm to his chest, the other hand still clutching his brother to him.

"Would love to! Why don't you come with?" Azazel grinned, showing off yellowing teeth. He held one hand out, as if the hunter might actually take it. "You could follow in, say, a year or so?"

Dean's jaw clenched even tighter, teeth squeaking in protest. "Go. To. Hell."

Yellow Eyes sighed dramatically, putting that hand on his hip like a disappointed soccer mom. "Ah, well, I'm sure you'll change your mind eventually. It's a lonely world out there, Dean. How long do you think you'll make it without your brother?"

Trembling limb still clutched to his chest, Dean folded over Sam, as if to somehow put himself between the younger Winchester and this demonic bastard. Azazel didn't seem phased. Instead, he fished what looked like a business card out of his other breast pocket, dusted it off – the damn thing had a bullet hole in it from Dean's one, errant shot – and leaned over the two men. Dean tried to draw back, to take Sam with him, but he had little leverage to do so.

Azazel tucked the card into the front pocket of Sam's bloody flannel. He patted it twice and Dean wanted to strangle him until those yellow eyes turned red with petechial hemorrhaging.

His chest was burning, like he was having a god damn heart attack. And yeah, Cas, he got it. He knew there was a fucking demon nearby. No effing shit, man.

Sam was bleeding out in his arms, again. Azazel was just waiting for him to make that deal – condemn his soul and the whole damn planet – again. And he still had no recourse. No plan. No options. And so very little control.

'If eating a bullet…'

Dean wanted to kill this son of a bitch, this murdering demon who dared touch his brother. Who dared kill him, again. Who dared try to dictate Dean's future. His fate. He knew he couldn't kill him, though. Not with what he had on hand. He could punch him, of course. Wanted to, so bad he was shaking with it. But he knew all that would do was break his other hand, and he couldn't afford that. He needed that hand.

'…keeps you from bringing me back…'

The man from the future used his one good arm to reach under Sammy's body, wrapping fingers around the gun tucked in the waistline of his jeans. Before Azazel could react – those pale eyes already tracking the movement and the shift in Sam's limp body – Dean drew the firearm and tucked it right under his chin.

"I'd rather you be in Heaven with me, than both of us here, starting the end of the world."

This time he didn't look away. Didn't close his eyes. He watched those yellow pupils dilate. Watched those eyes widen in surprise.

And then, with a trademark Winchester grin and a wink, pulled the trigger.

-o-o-o-

He was dreaming.

The lake was calm, the breeze gentle and refreshingly cool, leaves drifted across the surface, and rippling reflections of fall colors created a scene of pure serenity. His line was cast, bobber bobbing, fish just waiting to be caught and reeled in.

Dean turned to the space next to him, expecting his angel to appear, but Cas was already there and too close. A hand landed on his arm, the grip urgent. The hunter's eyes fell to it in surprise.

"Dean."

Green met blue. Cas was staring at him, eyes wide, face close. Dean couldn't look away.

"It's not–"

The fish tugged on the line.

-o-o-o-

He came to with a gasp, sitting upright in a bed he didn't remember going to sleep in. Dean rubbed at his chest, a residual burn there from a dream he couldn't remember having. The radio beside him was blaring Foreigner, just as loudly as the morning before, and this time Dean did throw it across the room.

"It feels like the first time. Feels like the very first time."

The cord snapped free from the outlet, the device shattering against the opposite wall. Lou Gramm's voice cut out with a burst of static and the clatter of broken plastic.

"Uh… okay." Sam's voice drew Dean's attention to him, dragging out the word with confusion and hesitation. "Rough night?"

Dean just stared. Stared at his brother who was alive once more. His bones weren't shattered, his skin wasn't broken. His eyes were full of life, concerned and off-kilter as they currently were.

"Um… Dean?" Sam stood from the bed, one shoe only half-tied. "You alright?"

The older Winchester clambered off the mattress and pulled his brother into a too-tight hug, gripping his back with alarming desperation.

"Dean?" Sam's voice was more than just a little disturbed now, but he raised his arms in return, awkwardly comforting his brother back. "Uh… you're starting to scare me, here."

Dean pulled away, but kept one hand on Sam's bicep, the other curled into a single raised finger, which he pointed at his brother. His eyes were too wide and his smile too tight. "You are not leaving this room. We are staying right here until it's tomorrow."

Azazel might think he was fucking with him, but Dean wasn't wasting this. Whatever this was. That yellow-eyed bastard probably thought he was forcing the older Winchester into making a deal or reliving Sam's death over and over again. But what he didn't realize was that every time he brought Sam back, he was giving Dean another chance. Another chance to save his brother, to keep him alive.

At least until he came up with Plan C or Cas finally found them.

"Um… okay." Sam's eyes darted between Dean's finger, waggling inches away from his eyes, and the slightly-unstable expression beyond it. "But, uh, what's so special about tomorrow?"

Dean finally pulled back. "What day is it today?"

"Sunday…."

"Then tomorrow is Monday, and Monday isn't Sunday. That makes it special."

Sam was staring at him like he was crazy and, well, he wasn't wrong to. Dean probably had lost it, considering he'd watched his brother die twice now and yet the sasquatch was currently upright and breathing. And also staring.

"Right… so… uh, coffee, then?" The younger Winchester stepped back, still eyeing Dean warily. He glanced at the door, like the answer to why they couldn't go outside might lay just beyond it. His gaze returned to his brother, eyebrow rising in question. "If we're not getting breakfast?"

"Coffee sounds great," Dean agreed with a relieved smile, still a little too crazed. He glanced around the hotel room, already mapping out the extreme warding they'd need to make sure Azazel couldn't reach them inside.

Sam, meanwhile, was already headed for the little kitchenette that came with the room. There was a small coffee pot and brewer they hadn't bothered using before, in part because it was practically a guarantee the grounds would be awful, but mostly because they always grabbed breakfast at the nearest diner or cafe anyway.

The younger Winchester grabbed the machine's plug and reached for the outlet.

Dean spun around – hand reaching for a gun that wasn't on his boxer-clad hip – as the lights above flickered, the air sizzled with electricity, and his brother made a noise no healthy, not-dying human being should ever make.

Sam hit the ground seconds later, body still twitching from the electrocution that had stopped his heart.

A knock – cheerful and playfully patterned – sounded on the motel room door and Dean didn't even bother opening it. He just retreated the three steps he'd made it away from the bed, reached under his pillow, and pulled out his gun.

-o-o-o-

The lake breeze was cool against his face. The water was calm beneath the dock. Cas's grip was tight around his arm.

Those blue eyes were so close, voice deep and panicked.

"Dean–!"

-o-o-o-

He came to with a gasp, sitting upright.

"It feels like the first time."

Dean ripped the cord of the alarm clock clean out of the wall from his spot on the mattress, covers still wrapped over his legs. Then he got up and stomped over to the kitchenette. Grabbing the coffee maker, Dean raised it over his head and slammed it into the ground, smashing it into a dozen pieces. Just for good measure, he gave the thing several hard stomps.

"Um…"

The older Winchester turned around to face his not-dead brother, alive and well, one foot still propped up on his own mattress, shoelaces in hand.

"So… we're going out for coffee, I take it?"

-o-o-o-

Darla was still in her pink uniform, coffee pot in hand. The bell above the diner door still chimed and the kid still came running. Dean caught him, the father chided him, and Sam just stared.

"Nice reflexes-"

"It wasn't reflex," Dean bit out, anger levels leaving him practically vibrating in the booth across from Sam. "I knew it was going to happen."

The younger Winchester frowned, giving his brother a once over. "What do you mean? Like, your timey senses?" His eyes lit up in contemplation and he shifted in the booth, leaning forward a little. "Have we done this before?"

"No," Dean shook his head, then hesitated, "I mean, not no. Yes, but not– it's not a future thing– we didn't do this, but we've done this before."

Sam just stared.

"Look, we've done this before, right?" Dean practically growled, his frustration and inability to communicate going hand-in-hand. He gestured agitatedly around them. "Like, all of this. Foreigner, the diner, the kid. We've done it all before."

Sam's voice was slow and measured, his tone uncomprehending. "Like… you've lived through it already."

"Yes!" Dean let out a too-relieved noise that registered more on the hysterical side of the scale, glad his brother was finally getting it.

"Okay…. How is that not your timey senses?"

The older Winchester growled, low and irritated, in the back of his throat as he threw his hands up. "I didn't live through this in the future, okay! But we lived through it yesterday."

Several other patrons of the diner glanced their way awkwardly, the restaurant now significantly quieter at Dean's unusual – and loud – outburst. Sam cleared his throat, ducking his head and shoulders slightly in an effort to draw less attention as he avoided catching any of those stares.

"Alright, so, uh…" The younger hunter gestured with his hands just barely raised off the table, hoping to calm his brother down even if he had no idea what Dean was currently talking about. Or upset by. "You're… re-living the same day?"

"Yes!" Dean hissed, both relieved Sam was finally on the same page yet annoyed with how long it had taken. "Three times now I've woken up and it's Sunday. Three times now we've gone through the day, looking for fucking yellow goo-"

Sam opened his mouth.

"And no, I wasn't awake last night when you told me about the case." Dean didn't miss a beat, and Sam's mouth snapped shut. "But you've told me about it today. Three damn times. And three damn times you've-"

He abruptly cut himself off, looking away from his brother as all three deaths flashed before his eyes. It wasn't something he ever wanted to see again. And yet, Dean was starting to worry there'd be more of it to come.

"I've what?" Sam asked, straightening. It wasn't hard to pick up on the sudden tension in his brother's frame.

"Died, okay?" Dean looked back up, gaze sharp and angry but also haunted. "Three times, you've died. And then Azazel shows up."

The blood drained from Sam's face in the span of about two heartbeats. He didn't move for several long seconds, frozen to the spot. "What?"

The man from the future couldn't hold his brother's gaze, eyes darting away again.

"Did you…?"

"No," Dean bit out harshly, head snapping back. "Jesus, no. I shot myself. Every damn time, Sam. I shot myself, like I promised."

"But then how-" It was Sam's turn to cut himself off, relief at Dean keeping his promise somewhat short-lived as realization straightened his spine and widened his eyes. "Azazel's been bringing you back."

The younger hunter quickly hunched back down, gaze darting from diner patron to staff, looking for yellow eyes. Dean didn't bother telling him not to. He already knew Azazel wasn't in this building, but that wasn't going to be any consolation to Sam. It hadn't been any consolation to Dean.

"What do we do?" Sam whispered, dragging his gaze back to his brother.

"I don't have a clue," Dean muttered, shoulders sagging. The muscles under his skin were all buzzing with angry, volatile energy, but his bones felt heavy with something too close to defeat. The hunter rubbed at his chest, the skin there tight with residual ache. "I've tried keeping you alive, but we don't even have to leave the motel for…"

He trailed off and this time Sam didn't push. He could guess the outcome well enough.

"What about Cas?" The desperation with which Sam asked it – the fear and worry not for himself, but for his brother – made Dean want to have better news on that front. Cas hadn't just been his backup plan. She'd been Sam's too.

"I've tried." Dean shook his head. "Either she doesn't have her ears on or Azazel's keeping her away somehow."

The hunter didn't want to consider a third option, that Azazel had captured or even killed the angel. Dean was sure he'd know if that had happened. The Cas sitting behind his sternum might be aching pretty much non-stop at this point, but it was the familiar ache of something wrong, not something dead. Not something missing because it was gone. Cas might be in trouble, wherever she was, but she was alive. Dean was sure of it.

She just… couldn't get to them right now. Which meant they were on their own.

"So, you wake up after I die?" Sam asked, bringing Dean's thoughts back to their current problem. The question was asked tentatively enough to be sensitive of the situation, but the curiosity in his tone meant that big brain of his was already at work on the problem.

"After I shoot myself," Dean corrected, just a little bitterly.

His brother gave him a look that was part sympathy, part apology, and part 'man up'. Dean wanted to glare, but honestly didn't have the energy.

"So, try not shooting yourself this time."

The older Winchester blinked. Then baulked. Then got a little pissy that Sam was just accepting that he was going to die by the end of the day. And then, after all that, Dean actually thought about what Sam was asking him to do, and started looking a little green around the gills.

His brother was asking him to let him die and just… live with it.

Dean's stomach churned at the thought, because that was everything he'd been trying so desperately to avoid. For two years now.

(More like two decades.)

"I mean, obviously don't bring me back," Sam was quick to say, probably misreading the wide range of facial expressions Dean was currently going through like a playlist set to shuffle. "But if the day resets when you kill yourself, then… don't do that."

"But you'll be dead." He said it like it was the most obvious thing in the world. A big part of the very simple equation that Sam and his big ole brain were somehow missing.

The look his brother gave him in return made it perfectly clear he hadn't missed anything.

"Yeah, Dean, I know."

"But, Sam–"

"What other choice do you have?" the younger Winchester countered immediately, still pinning him with that look.

Dean just shook his head, because no. No. That wasn't a plan, it was… it was…. Okay, Dean didn't have a word for what it was, other than impossible.

Which wasn't quite right, now was it? He'd managed it once, for a year. A hellish year, for the most part, but Dean had sort of made it through. He could maybe do it again. And just viciously push down any and all thoughts about how fucking miserable he had been for that year and how he never, ever, wanted to live through that pain and grief and self-loathing again.

"It won't work," Dean said instead, still adamant that letting his brother just… rot wasn't a viable choice. "They'll just pile on. Hell will keep coming and they'll start adding bodies, Sam. I can't… you can't ask me to make it through that."

For his part, Sam did look damn apologetic about having to ask for just that. "If you have another idea, I'm all ears, Dean. It's not like I want to die. But you can't keep repeating the same day over and over again. Something has to change."

The older Winchester didn't have an answer to that, much as it killed him. Angered him. Made his blood fucking boil and his gut sink like lead and his chest burn. Because the only other option was to end the world, and Dean couldn't bear that responsibility twice.
Not knowing he was doing it this time.

But he also had no idea how to willingly do what Sam was asking, either. How to just… keep going.

"Okay," he muttered. Dean shrugged his shoulders helplessly, hating every part of this so-called 'plan', but Sammy was right. What choice was there?

"Dean, I'm not…" Sam sighed, shoulders hunched around his ears in his own brand of defeat. "I'm not asking you to give up, okay? Find Cas, figure out a plan and… I don't know, bring me back later if you can. But if you can't…. It's okay, Dean. Really. It's okay."

The man from the future hated that voice. That sympathetic, understanding, knowing tone that Sam took with anyone in pain. In mourning. He hated it. He hated everything about it, about this, but he didn't have any better ideas.

So he grumpily agreed to at least give it a shot.

-o-o-o-

Sam died six hours later in a hospital OR from an allergic reaction to mystery goo. The doctor's eyes slid yellow and Dean didn't shoot himself.

-o-o-o-

He made it four weeks.

They had a hunter's funeral, attended by Bobby and Andy, Ellen and Jo. Cas never showed back up and Dean couldn't find her, no matter all the tricks and knowledge he'd dragged with him from the future. Even Crowley didn't have a lead. The angel was just gone, and Dean started to worry that maybe Azazel had gotten to her somehow.

The small wake they held at Bobby's after the funeral was fitting. What Sam would have wanted, the old hunter said. There was booze aplenty and memories shared, some somber and others filled with the life Sam no longer had. Dean hated every second of it.

He didn't call Jess. He couldn't be the one to tell her that Sam– That he had failed. Failed his brother and failed her. So he just didn't call. He also figured if she ever found out, she'd probably hunt him down and skin him alive for leaving her in the dark but… maybe it was better that way. That was what Sam would have wanted: Jess, away and safe and out.

Dean spent the first few days after at the Salvage Yard, but it didn't last. Everyone was too quiet. Too cautious around him. Too… pitying. He couldn't handle Andy's sad looks or Bobby's lack of gruff. And he didn't even like the dog, who also seemed intent to console him.

So he left.

Azazel showed up at least once a day – on hunts, in diners, one time as a fucking cop who pulled him over – and every day, Dean said no. And every day, Dean didn't shoot himself. He found hunts and he killed with excess and he drank and he didn't sleep.

And then he'd rinse and repeat.

About the time Dean realized he was still killing himself, just slowly, he got it into his head that he might as well speed up the process if that's where it was headed. It had taken four weeks to get drunk enough to think about it and four weeks to be wretched enough to follow through with it. To reason out that putting a bullet in his brain meant getting a second chance at saving Sam.

A fifth chance. Whatever.

And if it didn't work – if he didn't wake back up on that Sunday morning four weeks ago – well, then it would be over either way and no real loss there, right?

Dean didn't even have to get up from the kitchenette table. He'd kept a gun on him twenty-four seven since Sam's death. Probably not a healthy idea, but it wasn't like a hunter was ever all that far from one, anyway.

He tucked it under his chin, the spot familiar even weeks later, and pulled the trigger.

-o-o-o-

"It feels like the first time."

Dean now hated Foreigner, which was a real damn shame. Another notch in Azazel's belt, he supposed. But Sam was alive and tying his shoes on the other bed and Dean thought, 'maybe this time.'

-o-o-o-

"So… you're re-living the same day?"

"Yes," Dean answered without even looking at his brother, instead watching Darla serve a customer at the counter. His name was Andre, he owned the mechanic's shop just down the street. It was a death trap. Literally.

"And… it's not a timey sense thing?"

At this point, Dean didn't even know why he was explaining it.

"No."

So long as they went to the diner, Sam didn't die in the morning. So long as they interviewed witnesses about yellow goo, Sam didn't die in the afternoon. But it didn't matter what they did in the evening. If they warded a motel room top to bottom with every inch of supernatural knowledge Dean had, or cleared outta dodge in the Impala at ninety miles an hour (or at a very safe twenty, or really at any speed in between), or investigated the damn glitter goo without getting close enough to inhale. It didn't matter. Sam died before it ever became Monday. Dean could never save him.

And he never made it long without him, either. Not when a second chance – an opportunity to make it right, to save his brother – rested in a single bullet.

Or whatever weapon was on hand, really. Azazel started getting creative after the first few attempts, taking any and all weapons out of the equation at every opportunity. But Dean had enough experience with Djinns to know the drill. There were a lot of readily available things you could use to off yourself.

Explaining it all just made everything harder, really. If Dean didn't say anything, Sam let the day carry on and he lived longer. Which gave Dean more time to come up with another plan that would inevitably fail. Explaining it took time, energy, meant Sam generally fought him at every turn (well-meaningly, of course, but Dean knew all the possible outcomes here, so what was the point?), and all-in-all got him nowhere.

Yet there he was. Explaining it to his brother once more.

"Yesterday was Sunday, today is Sunday, and, most likely, tomorrow will be Sunday too."

Dean didn't bother mentioning Azazel. He knew where that conversation went – every time – and this time he'd rather skip to the end. Skip seeing the fear in his brother's eyes as he said Azazel's name. To be asked, again, if he'd sold his soul. And (to his ever increasing annoyance) see the pure relief in Sammy's eyes when he told him no, he'd put a bullet in his brain instead.

The kid could at least show a little horror at the number of times Dean had committed suicide for him. They were broaching real Romeo and Juliet levels of commitment here, and Dean didn't do chick flick moments, damnit..

But instead of the reaction Dean was expecting – a hushed and worried discussion about what they could do next, because that's what had happened every single time – Sam surprised him.

"Like Groundhog Day," the younger Winchester supplied, almost offhandedly. A frown formed between his big brows. "Or, well, a dark, twisted version of it."

Sam was still trying to wrap his head around what Dean was explaining to him. Because it sounded… well, not unbelievable, because he was sitting across from his time traveling brother, but still pretty unbelievable. Except Dean was also clearly freaked out. And pissed. And also trying to hide how freaked out he was.

So, this – whatever this was – was really happening. Sam had an easier time accepting that than he might have two years ago, even if wrapping his head around it wasn't the easiest. The question now was, who (or what) had the power to stick his brother in some sort of demented time loop.

"What?"

It was Dean's turn to stare at Sam for the first time in… well, a long time.

The beanstalk of a man shrugged self-consciously, unsettled by the intensity of that stare. He raised an eyebrow, perhaps a little defensive considering the movie they were talking about and the fact that Dean could quote it beginning to end, and had. All the time. For years.

"You know, Groundhog Day, where Bill Murray has to repeat the same day over and over again because he's stuck in a-"

"Time loop."

Dean's breath left his lungs like someone had just sucker punched him.

"Yeah, I know the movie, Sam. But living the same day over and over again…."

His tone was definitely dismissive (fed by several weeks of Sundays at this point), which furthered Sam's frown. But Dean had trailed off, leaving the younger Winchester to just stare, both expectant and completely confused.

"Yeah…?"

Dean's gaze snapped up, locking on his with an urgency that left Sam's heart pounding and body flooded with adrenaline. That was the look his brother got before they usually had to run – or fight – for their lives.

"What day is it?"

The adrenaline came crashing down in a wave of pure bafflement. Sam frowned at the question, asked with the kind of seriousness one didn't usually use with the days of the week. Not to mention, Dean had just gotten done telling him exactly what day it had been yesterday, was today, and would apparently be tomorrow.

"Sunday."

"Not Tuesday." It wasn't a question. It wasn't really a statement either. It wasn't even aimed at him, Sam realized, as Dean's gaze drifted back off to the distance. When he continued on, there was a disbelieving scoff to his words. "A hundred Tuesdays. And I never got to listen to Asia again."

Well, now Dean could add Foreigner to that list.

"Son of a bitch!"

Sam just stared, but Dean was elated. Pissed the hell off, but elated. He had finally found his plan C.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: I am so ready for the barrage of yelled "I KNEW IT. I TOLD YOU I KNEW IT, SILENCE!" Bring it on ;)

I hope you all enjoyed reading this chapter as much as I did writing it. I seriously think it's been my favorite one to tackle so far. At first I was a little worried about having to re-write the same thing over and over again (how do you keep that from getting repetitive?) but it ended up a really fun challenge!

Fun Fact #101: Dean was only going to spend, like, five Sundays in the loop before he caught on because that Future knowledge should really come in handy SOMETIMES. But as I wrote it and he got so desperately ingrained in the Azazel red herring, it just went off on it's own. Suddenly it was many, many Sundays and also several weeks of not Sundays (which might line up with the original timeline but definitely wasn't in my blueprints!) But that boy is dense when revenge gets involved. And, also, five Sundays would have been entirely not-verbose, so really, who here is surprised? eyes the Muse I blame her.

Gabriel: I know some of you will have questions (like, why? And how? And also WTF, Silence!) and we'll get to all those thoughts in the coming chapters. Where this story is going for Gabriel's character arc meant that Mystery Spot couldn't happen in Season 3 or in the way that it went down in the original timeline, but I couldn't just let it go either. It had to make an appearance in this story, there was no question about that. So I took Mystery Spot Gabriel's mindset and threw him into this timeline's moment, then asked "whatcha gonna do, hmm?"

Then let him and the muse have at. Which... saying it out loud now, was probably a terrible idea XD

Reviews: I am so, so, so, so excited to share this chapter with you and it will kinda break my heart not to hear from you all about what you thought (does not have to be positive, btw!) Please take a moment to drop a comment!

Up Next: The next chapter is written, though I have some friends coming to town next weekend so it'll be posted in two weeks!

Cheers,

Silence

Update - 09/14/22: My undying, unending, depthless apologies for the unexpected delay in getting you all your next chapter!!! I ended up with some serious OT time to finish the latest movie, which left me exhausted and stressed. Then I jetted off to the east coast literally the same day I ended on the show, to spend time with my neices! Who are both sick. So now I'm sick too 🤒🤒. I haven't been doing much but sleeping and entertaining toddlers. It's been a lot, and there has been noooo writing in the middle of all that.

Once I've recovered, I will try to get back on track! Thanks for hanging with me everyone, and continued apologies for this COVID/post-COVID lack of routine updating. I miss the days of routine writing and posting sooo much 🤒

Cheers,
Silence

Chapter 118: Season 2: Chapter 84

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: I am so sorry for the delay! I thought I'd have plenty of time to write while I'm vacation after my show ended and the OT was finally done, but boy was I wrong! I got sick immediately TT.TT I'm pretty much recovered now, finally home, edited the chapter in an airport (like the good old days!) but didn't have time to post before my flight. My new goal is to try and figure out (and stick to) a writing schedule again (like the good old days!) I am really tired of this sporadic writing and posting. I miss regular updates, and this story was never intended to be read with such big gaps between chapters. It's really bothering me!

Chapter Warnings: Well, we're mostly done killing ourselves at this point, and instead we're confronting tricksters (almost as suicidal, but not quite as suicidal as confronting archangels). Oh boy, things are really picking up now! Dean is pissed, Sam is confused (and suffering all the consequences), Gabe's not so amused (which is a big buzz kill, cuz amused is kinda his thing), and our favorite angel finally finds the boys.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 84

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

“Alright, you bastard! We give up!”

Dean stood from the table and stepped into the aisle between booth and counter. He had his arms thrown up and out, and he was staring at the ceiling as he shouted, accusing it of, erm, something.

Sam just stared.

“You hear me? I said we give up!”

“Um… Dean?” Sam started to rise up from his seat as well, hand half raised towards his brother who was calling rather a lot of attention to himself. Other patrons and staff alike were now all staring their way, tasks paused. Behind the counter, Darla was glancing between them and the register, where a phone sat on the counter, clearly in sight.

The older Winchester, however, didn't seem to care.

"Quit hiding, you son of a bitch, and get your ass down here!" Dean spun in a circle, arms still out, but nothing happened in response. Well, except for Sam awkwardly grabbing at his arm to try and get him to sit back down. He shook that off easily, though.

"Dean!" Sam was practically hissing at him now. He was eying the diner entrance, contemplating next steps if Dean didn't calm down soon. "What the hell are you doing?"

"Screw this," his brother growled, dropping his arms to pull out his phone. Gabriel might have blocked angel radio in this pocket dimension, but he doubted the douchebag had considered an angel with a cell phone. He hit speed dial three and put the phone to his ear, waiting impatiently for it to pick up.

When it did, he wasted no time, even if his lungs all but deflated from the relief of it.

"Mixin' and Fixin's Country Diner, Mechanicsburg, Ohio. We need you-"

No sooner were the words out of his mouth than the pulse of wingbeats broke the stillness of the restaurant. Dean was spinning around, heart skipping a beat with both hope that it would be Cas standing right behind him – that it hadn't been Yellow Eyes warding the hospital, keeping Cas locked out or even a prisoner (or worse) – and fear that it would be Gabriel instead. But the body that had materialized in the country diner had slim hips, an athletic build, the most fuckable hair Dean had still ever laid eyes on, and familiar, brilliant blue irises.

Castiel stumbled at the abrupt arrival, cute frown in place on her serious face as she lost her balance.

"Cas!" The hunter reached out instinctively, clasping the angel on either bicep to steady her. His grip may have been a little desperate around that beautiful damn trenchcoat.

"That was much harder than it should have been," she said, eyes struggling to focus. Dean's grip tightened around her arms.

"Cas, listen–"

“What are you doing here?” the angel interrupted as those blue eyes cleared, glancing between the two Winchesters with unnaturally wide eyes. “You’ve been missing for days.”

Days? Dean floundered, mind racing with what he could say in just the few seconds he had. He had to assume Gabriel was listening, even if he hadn’t responded to Dean calling him out. How the hell did he warn Cas what could be coming without letting the friggin’ archangel know Dean knew more than he should?

“You gotta get us outta here. It’s a pocket-”

The bell over the diner door chimed with the entrance of a new customer, cutting Dean’s desperate explanation off before he could get started. In hindsight, he might have spent too long thinking. The three Winchesters turned as one to the door, an eerie stillness taking over the restaurant. Dean already knew who they would see walking towards them with calm, measured steps.

At the appearance of yellow eyes – locked on them and only them – Sam took a step back, breath as staggered as his feet. Castiel immediately placed herself between her charges and the approaching demon. Dean’s hand, which had been curled around her bicep, slid to her wrist. Fingers dug in and tugged on the fabric there, trying to tell her something.

“Cas, it’s not-”

“Hello, kiddos!” Azazel wore the face of the doctor from the hospital, some middle-aged white dude with a balding head and way-too-white teeth. Probably had a wife and five kids with a mistress on the side. It wasn’t just those sickly yellow eyes that stank of privilege and entitlement; a perfect fit for the scumbag wearing him.

Dean’s chest burned for the nth Sunday in a row, but now he finally knew why. It had nothing to do with any demon, a fact he cursed himself for not realizing sooner. Cas had been trying to warn him, but Dean had been so convinced – so distracted – by the damn ‘destined’ timeline that he hadn’t understood. Hadn’t even thought to listen.

In front of him, Castiel’s blade dropped into her hand.

"Now, now,” Azazel tsked. Or, at least, what Dean assumed was a certain 'trickster' in an Azazel disguise. And god he hoped he was right about that. "There's no need for violence."

"Like hell there isn't," Sam breathed out from behind, probably going for defensive anger but fear kept his voice quieter than he'd intended.

Dean wished he had more time. More time to prep the kid for what was coming. Assure him that the construct in front of them wasn't actually Yellow Eyes. That, for all intent and purposes, Sam was safe. This, after all, wasn't where he died.

Not for real, at least.

But not telling Sam about Azazel's role in the restarts had been what finally got Dean past Yellow Eyes. To the realization that it wasn't a demon fucking with them.

The exact opposite, actually.

There was no time now, though. Dean had to figure out how the hell to tell his brother and their angel the truth without Gabriel overhearing it, and he had to do it on the fly. The older Winchester didn't want to know what the angel-turned-trickster might think up next if he learned Dean was from the future – that they'd thrown Destiny out the window – and had no intention of starting the Apocalypse. If that happened, Dean knew it would get ugly fast. This wasn't the Gabriel that was willing to listen to them. To consider picking a side. Not yet, at least.

Until it was, Dean needed some precautions in place. A backup plan at the very least. He probably should have thought one up before calling in an angelic assist. Granted, he'd been a little too pissed to think clearly.

'Nothing knew there,' Dean thought with no shortness of self-deprecation. To be a little fair, though, he had kinda been hoping Cas would flap them outta there before Gabe had time to react.

But when had his unplanned hopes ever panned out?

"You will not touch them," Cas was threatening before Dean could get much further in his planning than 'Shit, shit, shit, what do I do, I need a plan!'

In response to the angel's threat, Azazel let out the disappointed kind of sigh Dean had spent most of his adolescence hearing from teachers asking simple questions and getting nothing but difficulty and sass in return.

"Oh, sweetheart–" and Dean's blood boiled at the look Azazel (Castiel's friggin' brother, pretending to be that son of a bitch, and how messed up was that?) sent the angel's way– "I don't have to touch them."

He raised his fingers and Dean braced. Castiel mirrored the movement with her blade, prepared to defend, but there was little defense against an archangel's tricks.

Sam doubled over with a grunt of pain before a mouthful of blood came pouring from his lips. His arms curled tight around his stomach, his legs wobbled like jello, and he stumbled into the side of the booth they'd been sitting in mere moments ago.

Gabriel was a friggin' dick.

"Sam!" Dean's reaction was instinctual. Even knowing it wasn't 'real' (and fuck that, because it was real. It was completely real, it just wasn't permanent), he couldn't help but grab onto his brother's shoulders, holding him upright until he could maneuver his larger frame into the seat beside him. "Shit, just hold on, Sammy. It's going to be okay."

"It's really not."

At the demon's falsely sympathetic moue, Castiel charged. Azazel raised his other hand, fingers spread wide, and the angel went flying back with more momentum that she'd moved forward with. Cas flew down the aisle, blade slicing through the tops of booths until she crashed, hard, into the back wall of the diner and stayed there, pinned to the aluminum paneling.

The family that had taken that last booth in the diner – the one with the future track star for a son – were cowering in the booth. The kids had been ushered under the table while the adults stayed as low as they could, heads popping above the seats in trepidation while they kept their children safe below. Other patrons had gone running as soon as the archangel had cleared the door. Darla was hiding in the kitchen, watching from the service window.

Dean didn't care about any of them. They weren't real, and he should have realized what this was so much sooner.

“Let her go!” he yelled, turning from the pinned angel back to the ‘demon’. He was all anger and no fear. Yeah, Gabriel might be able to fuck them up good – really put them through hell – but he was too much of a coward to ever do anything truly dangerous. And Dean had never been afraid of cowards, no matter their strength or power.

“Alright,” the yellow-eyed lie agreed readily, though Castiel remained pinned to the wall, struggling against her invisible binds. “I can add that as a condition of the deal easily enough. Just say the magic words.”

“Dean, no–”

Sam threw up another mouthful of blood that splattered across the table. His skin was getting dangerously pale, and Dean knew he didn’t have much time to end this if he wanted to spare his brother yet another gruesome death.

“Oh, I’m not making any deals with you,” the older Winchester replied, voice deadly calm.

Those yellow eyes rolled in such a classic Gabriel move that Dean really didn’t know how he hadn’t spotted it before. “Let me guess. You’re just gonna kill yourself to get out of it?”

Dean’s hands curled into fists, but he didn’t go for his gun. Not this time.

“Then I’ll just bring you back, and we’ll do this dance all over again.” Azazel waved his hand around the diner like a composer leading a Waltz. “Until eventually you take my deal because you realize there isn’t another option. I mean, aren’t you getting a little tired of this, kiddo?”

“Beats ending the world.”

That comment, thrown so casually and carelessly from the stony hunter, threw the archangel for a loop. Gabriel blinked yellow eyes in a moment of surprise before remembering to pull the mask back on.

Dean Winchester from 2007 shouldn’t know what selling his soul would result in, after all.

Falsely yellow eyes slid, both cautious and curious, to the pinned angel behind the hunter, wondering if someone had gone blabbing her big mouth. Still in the role of a Prince of Hell, however, the demon scoffed, trying to cover the fact that Dean wasn't following the right script but Gabriel didn't have any additional pages to source.

Luckily, an angel-turned-trickster such as him was an expert at winging it.

"That's a mighty big ego you've got," he said with another derisive look. "Thinking the world literally revolves around you."

"Oh, I don't think. I know. And it's not happening. Not in your little craptastic classroom, and not out in the real world, either."

"Real world?" Dean could see Gabe behind that borrowed face perfectly clearly now, and the archangel was as irritated as he was confused. Not fun when the tricks got turned on you, was it? "This is as real as it gets, Dean."

"Why don't you cut the act?" The hunter spread his arms out, gesturing to the diner and its terrified patrons, fake as the day was long. "You're not fooling anyone. Not anymore. We've dealt with your kind before."

"And what kind is that?"

Those pale, dead eyes regarded the hunter with a glint of danger in them that hadn't been there before. Dean knew he was treading a thin line, approaching a dangerous edge where the archangel got good and angry, for real. If Dean called him out now, it wasn't going to end in anything but pain for them, and the man from the future couldn't afford to have a pissed off archangel on his back. Especially not one who wanted the Apocalypse to start just as badly as the rest of his dick brothers.

A pissed off trickster, though? That Dean could handle, pain in the ass though it may be. At least until he came up with that backup plan for getting Gabe on their side a hell of a lot earlier this time around.

"You sure as shit ain't Azazel," Dean responded with the kind of derision he knew would raise Gabe's hackles. But he needed to. He needed to cross that line, to tip that scale. Get the trickster in him pissed off enough that he didn't want to keep up the charade. Annoyed enough that he felt the need to defend his title as a proper little demi-god. Dean had spent enough time dealing with Gabriel's games to know the archangel's buttons well enough to push them now. "You think a Prince of Hell would waste his time – or ours – with childish tricks?"

"Childish?" That middle-aged face pulled into something frustrated, but more than that, downright insulted. Dean decided to add insult to injury and scoffed.

"What else would you call dropping a piano on Sam?" He waved an arm at his brother, who was still spitting up mouthfuls of blood and weakly calling Dean's name. But the older Winchester valiantly – if not very, very painstakingly – ignored him. Sam might not know what antagonizing a demon could do other than end in more pain for him, but Dean didn't have time to explain it. His brother was just going to have to hold on and trust him. In that order. "Running him over with a car? Killing him with glitter goo."

"I call it hilarious."

Gabriel. Was. Such. A. Dick.

"Yeah," Dean growled, trying his best to resist strangling the archangel. Not like he'd be particularly successful if he tried. "A trickster would."

The being in front of him just loved his dumb tricks and stupid games. Loved getting to play a role in them. Well, two could play at that one and, thanks to this particular trickster, Dean had plenty of practice. So he didn't give much time for those false yellow eyes to narrow or the angel to contemplate his next move in this sudden turn-of-the-tables.

"So which one are you?"

The parody of last time's events, of Dean asking this same angel that same question in a not-that-different context, wasn't lost on the man from the future.

Some things, Dean figured with no shortage of sarcasm and bitterness, just had to stay the same.

The diner fell unnaturally silent. Sam stopped choking. Dean resisted glancing his way – to see his brother wipe the remaining red dribble off his chin with the back of his sleeve or heave a relieved, clear breath. The first in many minutes. He resisted looking around at the patrons of the diner as they went back to their lives, like a showdown wasn't happening in front of them. Like it was just another day. Customers stood from various hiring places and retook their seats. Resumed their meals. Darla came out of the kitchen with a plate of waffles and a coffee pot, as if she hadn't been cowering moments before. She had not a hair out of place. The family beside the still-pinned Castiel climbed back into their booth, chattering away like a happy family.

The trapped angel and youngest Winchester watched them all with wariness and confusion. Dean's fierce eyes never left the 'demon' in front of him.

“Loki,” Gabriel admitted after a long, long pause. Slowly, Azazel’s balding doctor visage and yellow eyes bled away to reveal the shorter, curly-haired vessel Dean knew too well. He looked extremely put out. A very Gabriel-esque expression Dean also knew well. “They call me Loki.”

Behind the Winchesters, Castiel watched the gradual transformation of demon into… something else. Something that was, she was very quick to realize, capable of overwhelming her. Tricksters were not to be taken lightly, but an angel of her class and caliber should have been fairly evenly matched to one. Yet, this ‘Loki’ had overpowered her easily.

He was far more powerful than any trickster should be. If he even was a trickster.

Castiel’s eyes went wide at the thought. A dangerous, errant thought that she prayed wasn’t correct. But the similarities were simply too great, and the timing….

“Dean!” she called out, turning her gaze to her charge. “That’s not-!”

The rest of her words were muffled by the abrupt appearance of tape across her mouth, sealing her voice inside. She tossed her head angrily, but had little ability to remove the limitation.

“Hey!” Dean shouted angrily, head whipping around to the captured angel then back to the Trickster. “Let her go!”

“Yeah,” Loki drawled with a scathing eyebrow raise, “I don’t think so, bucko. She’s staying right where she is until she learns some manners. The adults are talking.”

Next to the glaring older Winchester, Sam climbed shakily to his feet. He left behind a table smeared and splattered in terrifying red, but he had recovered almost instantly back to full health. His skin was flushed pink and, except for a few traces of dried blood in the corners of his mouth, he looked surprisingly alright. His legs, on the other hand, remained shaky. Not that anyone could blame him for that.

Sam stared at the newly revealed trickster with wide eyes. He glanced between his brother and the demi-god with a mix of stunned disbelief and wariness. The quiet chatter of patrons going about their meals, the ding of the service bell at the kitchen window, and the occasional clatter of silverware all weighed heavily in the back of Sam's awareness. Everything around them – every one around them – was being controlled, or possibly even created, by this unassuming man standing scant feet in front of him. The sheer power he yielded was… intimidating, if Sam was being honest.

He remembered Dean mentioning a trickster mere days ago, but he hadn't gone into details beyond the fact that the guy was bad news, liked to play games that were closer to nightmares for his victims, and was all for the Apocalypse steamrolling right on ahead. Which was why they were avoiding him at all costs. Sam had gotten the feeling there was a lot more to it than that, given just how short Dean had been on the details, but he hadn't pushed at the time. He'd thought he would have plenty of time to get to it in the future. Sam regretted his shortsightedness immensely.

"So," Loki drawled, hands on his hips and a little smirk seemingly at home in the corner of his mouth. Sam wondered how this creature, clearly so smug and playful, had ever played Azazel convincingly. But he had, and that was all the more terrifying. "What gave me away, boys?"

"I told you, we've dealt with your kind before."

Gabe raised a single, scathing eyebrow. "You sure about that, Dean-O? Sammy doesn't exactly look onboard the trickster parade, there."

Whatever level of caution this creature was instilling in the younger Winchester, a significant portion of it disappeared at the nickname. Only his brother got to call him that, and even then reluctantly so. Sam's forehead smoothed out into a glare of his own.

"You got a better explanation?" Dean challenged back, but immediately stiffened when Gabe's eyes slid over the hunter's shoulder. Castiel was still pinned to the wall behind them, fighting her invisible restraints and grunting into the tape secure across her mouth.

"Oh, I don't know. Maybe a mouthy baby bird spewing her guts? Metaphorically, of course."

The way in which the older Winchester's glare went from annoyed to deadly at one measly little threat to the angel gave Gabe another pause. He hadn't spent that much time following the Winchesters the past few years. Sure, he'd heard their names start to pop up on angel radio the last three decades or so. Had even done some poking around now and then throughout the years. But everything he'd picked up from his divine frequency or light spying had indicated Dean Winchester wasn't exactly one to pal around with anything not human, let alone get protective over one.

The amount of ferocity he was leveling Gabe's way suggested a lot more than obligation to an ally. It suggested loyalty. And, Gabe thought as he glanced between the two again, possibly something a lot more confusing and a lot less likely. Something that looked a hell of a lot like possessiveness.

Huh. Imagine that. Well, Dean Winchester was known as quite the ladies man, so….

Sam, meanwhile, spared a quick glance back at Castiel, who was leveling nothing short of a fuming glare at the trickster. Again, the younger Winchester felt a flicker of apprehension at a deity that could contain an angel with so little exertion. Nothing got the drop on Cas like that. Except maybe Azazel. And that was not a comforting comparison. Not even remotely.

Those ethereal blue eyes slid to Sam's for only a moment, and the hunter could easily read the 'Run' that was there. Not that they had much option to, but Sam both appreciated and regretted the angel's readiness to be abandoned for the sake of their escape.

"So. Boys." Loki spread out his arms as if in invitation. "Since we're all on the same page now, let's talk End Times."

Dean was quick with his retort of, "Let's not."

"Why…" Sam cleared his throat, which was still gunky with the last vestiges of his stomach trying to eat itself inside out. Not to mention he was still catching up on a situation Dean and Cas seemed far more familiar with, which worried him. "Why would you want it to happen?"

Loki spared him a glance that wasn't so much scathing as it was pitying. "I don't want anything, boys. I don't have a stake in this."

Bullshit, Dean thought, but didn't dare voice it aloud at that moment.

“But it’s happening, whether you want it to or not,” Gabe continued, dropping his arms with a shrug that was probably meant to be nonchalant but Dean could read the defeat in it. It was easier to spot this time around, knowing who he was and what his deal was. Gabe had given up centuries ago, and now he just wanted it to end. The Winchester that came from ten years in the future could almost relate. But it didn’t make Gabriel any less of a coward in his book. At least Dean had always kept fighting, no matter how tired or fucking miserable he got. That's just what you were supposed to do.

“Says who?” the hunter snapped back, angrier now at the reminder of everything he and his family had gone through. Would to through again, now. Things Gabriel could have helped them prevent if he'd just grown a pair so much sooner.

Dean could still recall that nightmare of a night spent among other Pagans. Gods who were furious that the Christian-Judo God thought he had the right to end it all. If nothing else, Gabe was buddy-buddy with those guys. With Kali, who had laid pretty damn clear claim to those end times that night. Gabe was tripping up pretty big if Loki was suddenly siding with the Christians, and Dean could use that.

“You gonna tell me you, the pagan god, subscribes to Christianity being the one who got it right?”

Gabe leveled a glare his way that was far harsher than the look he’d spared Sam. Granted, the older Winchester knew which buttons to push. Poor Sam was just stumbling around in the dark because Dean had, once again, been stupid enough to think he’d have time to tell his brother everything.

If it wasn’t so damn painful to drudge up, Dean might commit himself to telling Sammy all of it – everything that could possibly pertain to the Apocalypse – when they got out of this mess. Just to keep this shit from happening again.

(Yeah, he already knew that was never happening. Dean might be willing to face the damn Apocalypse without so much as a blink, but he was a coward in his own right when it came to owning up to his kid brother.)

“You think they– we can stop it?” Gabe asked, barely catching his slip up in time as he looked between the brothers. His eyes hesitated on Castiel for only a nanosecond, but it was a nanosecond too long. His sister may not know who he was, but Gabriel knew she was starting to suspect he wasn't a Trickster. He needed to stop giving her more fuel for that doubt, hard as it was to ignore her.

It had been a very long time since he'd been in the presence of any of his family. It was more difficult than he was ready to admit.

So he focused his attention back on Dean, an easy target for his frustrations. "You think the Pagans can stand against Heaven? Or Hell? This is a knock-down, drag-out brawl, boys. The prize fight between this world's heavyweights. The rest of us don't stand a chance."

"So you just give up?" The words left Sam with a breathlessness that drew Loki's attention, but the younger Winchester was well on his way to anger too. "Instead of even trying to fight, you lay down and die? All of you?"

Dean almost took a step towards his brother, almost put himself between Sam and the darkening glower of the archangel. But he knew, even with all the crap Gabriel might throw their way, Sam wasn't in any real danger and the younger Winchester wouldn't appreciate his big brother stepping in like he needed the protection. Neither of them were at any real risk here. Gabe was too busy blindly toeing the family line to ever do anything to jeopardize the two True Vessels.

Didn't make him any less of a dick, of course.

"You're a coward," Sam blurted out, part surprised by the revelation, part disgusted. A being with that much power, that much sway, too scared of losing to bother fighting?

Dean did move when Gabriel leapt forward to grab Sam, almost too fast to track the movement, and slam him into the side of the booth he'd been spewing blood in not so long ago. The older Winchester drew his gun, wishing he had the Colt – or Uriel's damn angel blade – while knowing there wasn't much he could do against the angel without them.

Pinned to the wall, Cas started throwing a fit. Small, blue sparks fired along her wrists, drawing Dean's attention. But those blue eyes were locked on the trickster and the younger Winchester. A flicker of worry warred with pride as Dean watched his angel fight an archangel's power hard enough to manifest grace.

"Don't you ever, ever presume to know what I am," Gabriel hissed in Sam's face, and the younger Winchester had the intelligence – or at least the primal instinct – to look afraid. Angry, of course (because he was a Winchester), but also afraid.

"Let him go," Dean demanded in his scary voice, barrel of his gun pressing right up against Gabriel's skull. He knew, if Gabe didn't listen, he could always pull out his trump card. But Dean honestly hoped it wouldn't come to that. Threatening to pray to some angels who might be interested in a certain Trickster's whereabouts might sound incredibly tempting – like righteous retribution – but Dean also didn't need Michael joining this little party of theirs. Ever. "Right now, Loki."

The trickster turned his head enough to eye the hunter over his shoulder, eyes darting to the gun that couldn't hurt him, but the expression on Dean's face that swore he'd find a way, regardless. Gabe didn't know why, but something about that look told him to approach with perhaps a smidge more caution than he was known for. Just a smidge, though.

With a dramatic sigh and a matching eye roll, Gabe released the beanstalk of a Winchester, raising his arms in mock truce as he backed off. Sam let out a shaky breath. He righted himself quickly and stepped to the side, putting a little more space between himself and the Trickster. Despite that, he donned his own scary look, even if it lacked some of the confidence of his brother's.

"Come on, you guys," Loki said suddenly, bright and cheerful like he hadn't just been bodily threatening one of them. He dragged out the first word with a whine, like this was just a minor inconvenience, really, and turned to face the other Winchester. "This was supposed to be fun, and it stopped being fun months ago."

"Months?" Sam asked in shock, the horror evident on his face as he glanced between his brother and the Trickster. Dean didn't return the look, his gun still trained on Loki.

"Cry me a river," was the older Winchester's snappy reply.

"Don't you get it, Dean?" Gabe let out another dramatized sigh, dropping his arms from an over dramatic gesture at the diner around them. His little make-believe set. "There's a lesson in all this."

"Let me guess," Dean sneered. "Make a deal."

"Well," Gabe drawled, clucking his tongue. He held up a finger, waggling it. The hunters didn't seem particularly amused. The trickster leveled that finger at the older Winchester. "That, and your brother is gonna be the death of you."

Dean lowered the gun, releasing the hammer. "Except none of this is real."

"Oh, but it could be." Gabe raised his hand and snapped his fingers. Dean didn't even have time to tense before the cable holding the light fixture above the booth lengthened, looping itself around Sam's neck several times. It pulled taught, hauling Sam onto his tiptoes. The younger Winchester grabbed at the wire with a cut-off gasp, struggling to breathe. "It will be, Dean. That's kinda the whole point!"

Against the wall, Castiel made enough commotion fighting Gabriel's binds to draw the attention of both human and archangel. Sparks were flying, sizzling against the skin of her wrists, burning the flesh there. She was grunting against the strain and injury, voice blocked by the tape still securely in place.

Dean's worry started outpacing his pride. Gabriel stared in stunned surprise at the struggle.

The archangel frowned at the ferocity of his sister's escape attempts. She was risking real damage to her grace if she continued, but he could sense no decline in intention. With a glare her way – part wary, part warning to knock it off – the angel-turned-trickster turned back to the very stubborn human in front of him.

"What are you gonna do then, huh? When it is real, Dean-O."

Sam was still struggling to breathe, clawing at his throat. He couldn't get his fingers under the cord and his vision was starting to darken around the edges.

"Fucking kill you," Dean snarled, but his gun remained at his side.

Loki sighed. "You've got a thick skull, so I'll help with this." He waved his hand and a construct manifested between them. It was woman in a slim, form-fitting black dress with bright, unnaturally red eyes. Against the wall, Castiel yelled into her gag. "You find yourself a crossroads and you make. A. Deal."

Dean stepped right into the trickster's personal space, tearing a page out of his angel's book on this one. He towered over the significantly shorter man. "Not. Going. To happen."

Over his shoulder, Sam's face was turning blue and his eyes were starting to roll back in his head.

"You're going to let your brother rot?" Gabe let out a laugh, side stepping away from the human to give the mule of a man a better view of Sam, who was on the verge of passing out.

Dean's eyes flickered that way and there might have been just a moment of doubt there, but it was quickly replaced with deadly rage. Gabe tried to ignore how the older Winchester wouldn't stick to a script written a millenium ago in dad-damn stone (all of which made no sense), and instead decided a little more pushing was in order.

Sam's feet left the ground as the cable tugged him a few more inches up. The back of his knees bumped the edge of the table limply. Those lanky arms fell to his side as he lost consciousness.

"Remind me how well that went the last, oh, dozen times you tried it?" Gabe let out a falsely thoughtful hum. "I believe eight weeks was your record, no? And that was a long eight weeks, Dean-O."

The Winchester's hands curled into fists, gun shaking in the right one. His eyes stubbornly stayed away from his brother's lax face and the crossroads bitch standing beside him, running her fake, red nails up his arm in a tantilizing way. Dean wanted to shove her away, but resisted the urge to interact in any way. She wasn't real.

"You think Hell isn't patient? You think Hell won't be as persistent as I was?" Gabe tilted his head back with an exaggerated laugh. "Ha! They'll come down a hundred times harder than I did. You don't stand a chance. That's the lesson, bucko."

"Then we fight," Dean replied through clenched teeth. He was counting backwards in his head. Each second that passed was one less to revive his brother. If he hit zero, he was putting another bullet in his brain. Gabriel's so-called lesson could go screw itself. "We find another way. Even if it sucks. Even if it means Sam and I stay dead and rotting in the ground for the rest of eternity."

"Oh my gawd," Loki complained, tilting his head back like he was praying to dad for the patience he'd never possessed. Not that he'd ever do that. "It's like talking to a brick wall!"

A dozen feet away, Cas made another noise of angry protest. Her wrists were red and raw from pulling against Gabriel's grace and her eyes were practically glowing blue with the fight. The trickster spared her a look, frown falling back in place.

"You know what?" Loki broke into a rough smile, too tightly controlled to be anything good for the Winchesters or their angel. He backed off, throwing his shoulders up in a loose, carefree shrug. "Maybe I bit off more than you Winchesters can chew, here. Maybe we need to start smaller."

He raised a hand before Dean could stop him – not that the hunter didn't try, surging forward to grab at that wrist – and snapped his fingers. The sparks and struggles and muffled cries of Castiel fell abruptly silent as the angel disappeared.

Dean whirled to the now empty wall, mouth dropping open in protest but no sound came out. He spun back to Gabriel with a look that, were the archangel lesser than such, might have actually been intimidating. Dean's hand tightened on the trickster's still-raised arm, fingernails digging into borrowed flesh. "Bring. Her. Back!"

"Uh, no." Gabe all but chuckled at the absurd request. "She's not even supposed to be here, bucko, and she sure as hell can't save you from what's coming. That would be cheating."

There was something in the Trickster's tone – the gleam in his eyes, the way he waggled his eyebrows, the very same smirk he'd had every time they'd cornered him in TV Land only to get thrown into another handful of Hollywood horrors – that made Dean's gut clench with dread.

Without hesitating, the man from the future lifted his gun and tucked it under his chin. A last ditch attempt to end this his way, to take the choice out of Gabe's nightmarish hands.

Bright red, manicured fingers ripped the gun away from him even as he squeezed the trigger. The bullet missed, tearing into the ceiling above him as Dean tried to pull his arm free of the conjured crossroad demon. The hunter had all but forgotten she was there, his mantra that she wasn't real actually working pretty well. But her grip sure was real. Real friggin' strong. She pulled the gun out of his hand with a punishing strength that damn near ripped his fingers off with it, before handing the firearm to Loki like the obedient little construct she was.

"I think it's time for a different lesson," the trickster said with a smile that sent Dean's nervous system into a near panic. Gabe lifted the ivory-inlaid gun between his two hands, the hunter's eyes tracking the movement, before snapping the weapon in two. Dean watched in horror – and no small amount of pain that he pushed deep, deep down inside – as the gun his father had bought him on his eighteenth birthday hit the ground in multiple pieces.

“Time for you to learn that there are rules, Dean.”

Gabe lifted his free hand and, before the hunter could make even an aborted grab for that one too (not that it would do him any good) the trickster snapped his fingers.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: Gabes a dick, but he’s our favorite dick XD

Did I forget to mention that there's simply no way I could write Gabe into this story without including Changing Channels as well? Oops, silly me! ;P

Up Next: I know that is an absolutely unfair tease of a thing to say when it isn't the direct next chapter, but next up is actually Bobby, Andy, one Jody Mills, and one determined FBI agent. We can't forget about the rest of the Winchester Family after all!

Thanks everyone for hanging with me through these uncertain updating schedule! I really appreciate your patience, support, and hearing from you.

Cheers,
Silence

Chapter 119: Season 2: Chapter 85

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Aaaaaalright, so it's been a while. [Insert sheepish back-of-head-rubbing here] I'm so sorry guys! It's really bugging me, these huge gaps in time without writing or updates. I've actually been thinking on that, why I'm struggling to write so much, and realized I've locked myself in a vicious cycle. For the years I kep this story updating regularly (or mostly regularly), your flood of reviews, feedback, and encouragement is what kept me writing it. It's my motivation, pure and simple. I love planning the story, that never goes far from my mind, but the actual writing of it is woooork. And the charge I get from you guys loving my ideas is what keeps me writing them, so I can share them with you.

Which is pretty fanastic, in my opinion, buuuut it does leave one small problem. In my current life, which has changed drastically since Covid (for better and worse in many ways!), I don't have the dedicated, carved out writing time like I used to. While I'm working to reclaim that time with structure and routine (oof, two words I may desperately need but also completey suck at self-enforcing XD), I haven't been writing regularly, which means updates can go months in between. After the high of that first week of comments, I...totally lose focus and my brain and hobbies drift elsewhere. And then it takes me time to realize I've drifted, and time to get back into the story. And then the cycle repeats

Ugh, it sucks, because I LOVE this story. I have so, so, so many amazing things planned that I can't wait to share with you all! Like Gabriel, and Adam. Guys, I haven't forgotten ADAM. And I have such great things planned for that poor, underused boy. You're gonna love his story as much as you've all loved Andy's! So I gotta get us there! But, to do that, I've realized I need to peace out for a couple more months. I have GOT to get a stockpile of chapters going so that we can return to weekly or biweekly updates. That was the key to me writing and being able to update this beastie of a story so regularly for so long. It's you guys; you're my special ingredient (quoting Kung Fu Panda here for anyone who just tilted their head like Cas and thought, 'I don't understand that referece')

So, this is the last chapter I'm going to post for a while. I have NOT given up this story and have no plans to, but I won't be posting until I have a stockpile of work. I'm hoping to get myself to the season finale before I start up again. Though knowing me, that'll be a good 30 chapters away (not the, like, 10 I have planned) so I'll give up after I manage to write, hmmmm, let's say 8 of them or so, and start posting again.

What can I say. I'm Verbose and Impatient as F

But, also, here's a chapter becaue I couldn't just post a note. That would be awful, and even I'm not that evil.

Chapter Warnings: We're back to Andy and Bobby, which means somewhat of a filler chapter, but also with a pretty important plot piece? Like, two important plot pieces, that is.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 85

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Jody Mills – Sioux Falls Sheriff for four years running, loving wife, mother of the world's best toddler, and drip coffee aficionado – was attempting to finish up some pesky paperwork on a beautiful Sunday afternoon. A gorgeous, sunny day so picturesque they'd be writing poems about it, no doubt. A day she could have spent at the park with her husband and son. Sadly, for one, Sheriff Mills, her Sunday would be spent indoors, on duty, for several hours yet, whether or not she finished her paperwork.

Such was the life of a small-town sheriff.

As much as she wanted to be pushing Owen on the swings or laughing at his antics as he climbed up the slide rather than down, her family daydreams weren't what kept her from the relatively easy work of custody forms, incident reports, and Digger's latest release papers after a night in the drunk tank. No, that would be her cell, buzzing away with the fifth incoming text in as many minutes.

Jody attempted to ignore it, as she'd (sort of) managed for the last four of those minutes. But, as a sixth and seventh message came in with its loud, accompanying buzzing, she gave up the good fight. Paperwork was boring anyway. Besides, she was the Sheriff, it was her job to help people. And if the amount of texts coming in rapid fire order was suggesting anything, it was that someone clearly needed help.

Even if that help was just a lecture about how real adults had jobs and lives, and shouldn't be bothered incessantly.

A lecture that went over about as well as Jody had been expecting, given just who her latest pen pal was (if it could be called that in this day and age – and she just knew said 'pen pal' would make fun of her for such an old fashioned term. Squirrelly little kid). The latest round of Andy's antics included a photo of Sarge covered head to tail in mud, tongue lolling in a huge grin, paired with a question of how, exactly, to make a muddy dog stay in a tub. That one had been followed about three minutes later by another picture, this one of an absolutely wrecked bathroom, muddy paw prints disappearing out the door, no dog in sight. Jody wished the kid the best of luck for when his grumpy landlord came back home to that (which got her several dozen crying emojis in response, much to her amusement).

She was still chuckling to herself, phone in hand, when the door to the small Sheriff's office opened and a stranger strolled in.

"Howdy," Jody greeted with a share of Midwestern friendliness at the unfamiliar face. The suit, sans a blazer, rolled up sleeves of a pristine dress shirt, and solid, neutral colored tie all said important. The multiple files tucked under his arm, a photograph paper-clipped to the outside of one of them, said Fed. Not something they saw a lot of in Souix Falls, South Dakota.

"I'm not interrupting, am I?" the man asked congenially enough, though there was something dark in his eyes that immediately set Jody on edge. Nothing aimed at her, per say, but it was obvious this man was here on a mission.

"Nah, 'course not," she replied in an equally light tone, tucking her phone back into her hip holster. "Just helping a wayward kid handle his first dog. What can I do for you, Mr...?"

"Henriksen." The man offered his hand, which the Sheriff shook. "Agent Victor Henriksen, FBI. I'm looking for a couple of fugitives, and word is there's a man in your town who knows 'em."

The agent set his files – three of them, it turned out – onto the counter, and the smile slid right off Jody's face at the picture attached to the top one. The spitting image of Bobby Singer's 'nephew,' new to town as of two months ago. The young man who'd bumped into her outside the grocery store weeks back with a favor to ask. The goofy, tragically mute kid who was, in fact, the very same 'pen pal' she'd been texting thirty seconds before regarding taking proper care of that damn favor.

"Don't suppose you know a resident by the name of Robert Singer, Sheriff?"

Jody raised her eyes back up to the federal agent. She let out a huff of air and forced the corner of her mouth into a smile. She doubted it was convincing. "You mean the town drunk?"

-o-o-o-

It was not a closely guarded secret that Victor Henrisken didn't think much of local law enforcement. Don't get him wrong, it wasn't that he found them incompetent; most of them did their jobs just fine. It was that their job wasn't his job, and they were grossly incompetent when it came to doing his job. Which, for the most part, made them largely useless to him and more often an obstacle than an assist.

Henriksen could be a real asshole sometimes, and he knew it. It wasn't his default state all of the time, but then he didn't have the time or luxury of playing nice on the job, either. Law enforcement officers were grown-ass professionals who could – or at least should be able to – handle having their feelings hurt and toes stepped on. If they couldn't, well that wasn't really Victor's concern either, was it?

Which was why he didn't bother explaining himself to the local Sheriff of this backwater town he'd found himself in outside of Sioux Falls, South Dakota. Sheriff Mills seemed competent enough for a small town sheriff, but Henriksen didn't really care beyond that. He didn't need her to do his job here, so he didn't need to involve her beyond the common courtesy of alerting her to his presence.

His job – thisparticular job – wasn't a collaborative one.

Sheriff Mills didn't seem too pleased with that. Nor particularly impressed by him, either. Not that it mattered to Victor.

"He in some sort of trouble?" she asked, referring to Robert Singer, the man he was in town to see. A man he was sure was, or at least had been at some point, harboring and providing aid to the Winchesters.

Perhaps he didn't know they were criminals and wanted men. Either way, Victor planned on making the situation – and Mr. Singer's position in any future, illegal involvement – crystal clear.

"No."

Sheriff Mill's raised a further unimpressed eyebrow, hand going to her hip. "The FBI going door to door for the next census, then? Seems a waste of man power, you ask me."

"I didn't." He drummed his fingers atop the files he'd brought with him. "What can you tell me about him?"

The sheriff's eyes dropped to that stack of papers, Andy Gallagher's face staring up from the photograph paper clipped to the outside. Her gaze transferred back to the FBI agent. "About Bobby Singer?"

Victor just stared, starting to question her competency after all. It had been a simple question.

When no confirmation or response at all came from Henriksen, the small town Sheriff visibly bristled, her annoyance with him clearly growing. Her expression leveled out some, however, remaining professional as she straightened up. "He's gotten into trouble a couple of times, mostly public drunkenness. Doesn't know when to go home from the bar, and then insists on driving himself because he's a stubborn old fool. Nothing too serious, though. He's pretty harmless, especially since all the local dive bars know to take his keys off him on a bad night."

"Any idea what he's drinking himself into an early grave for?"

Sheriff Mills eyed him before answering. Maybe just sizing him up. Or sizing up his right to know. "He lost his wife. Badly. Home invasion gone wrong, longer back then I've been on the job. She didn't make it, he did. They never caught the guy."

Victor hummed non-committedly. He knew some people got that tangled up in others, fell that hard in love that they never got over the loss. But it wasn't his speed. Victor had never known an emotion like that, capable of overwhelming all else. Probably why he had multiple ex-wives.

The sheriff didn't seem all that pleased by his lack of empathy, but Victor disregarded it. He hadn't been harsh, merely neutral. Besides, Robert Singer didn't need his sympathy. He'd sure need a hell of a lot more if it turned out he was knowingly harboring the Winchesters.

Victor tapped his finger on the counter with a tight smile. "Thanks for the info, Sheriff."

Before he could turn to leave, Sheriff Mills was already rounding the office counter she'd been standing behind. "I'll join you on your interview," she said with a tone that left no room for disagreement. "Since he's not in any trouble, the least I can do is show you the way to the property."

Henriksen held back his grimace. Held back the groan too, as he shared an even tighter smile with the woman who seemed to know exactly what he was doing. Maybe she was more than competent for a small town sheriff. He stood by his behavior, but it was possible he could have caught more flies with honey than vinegar this go around. Oh well, you couldn't win them all.

"Not necessary, Ma'am. That's what GPS is for."

Her return smile mirrored his own almost down to a tee; Sheriff Mills knew exactly how unwanted she was on this trip, and now Agent Henriksen knew exactly how swayed she was by that information. Which was to say, not at all.

"My town, my town drunk. After you, Agent."

Victor ground his teeth, but didn't fight. She did, technically, have jurisdiction and he couldn't fault her nerve, cheeky though it may be. For now, at least. They headed out of the station together, Victor climbing into his rental and Sheriff Mills into her jeep. She pulled out of the parking lot first, the FBI agent following begrudgingly behind.

-o-o-o-

Andy came barreling down the stairs, two at a time with Sarge hot on his heels, when Bobby trudged through the front door. The old hunter was tired and in need of a shower and his own damn bed after two days on a hunt in North Dakota that had gotten him home way too damn early in the morning. He shoulda just forked over the cash to spend another night at that crap motel.

Damn Wendigoes. He was getting too old for flamethrowers, super speed, and ancient mattresses that more closely resembled stone than anything soft.

"Alright, alright, I see you," Bobby grumbled and grumped to both kid and dog, each vying for his attention. Andy was waving something in his face, hands moving a mile a minute with the old hunter only catching half of what he was saying. Sarge was sniffing up and down his pant leg for all the post-hunt smells he was sure to be carrying. Bobby jostled his leg when that long snout went a little too high and a lot too inward for the comfort of any man. "Let me set my damn bag down first."

Both strays followed him into the den, where he dumped his duffles, one full dirt-smeared, sweat-soaked clothes, the other clanking with empty gas canisters from his now-spent, homemade flamethrowers. Finally, with the deep breath of a parent who knows better than to expect a quiet house or restful afternoon, the old man turned to kid and dog.

Bobby sank onto the couch, arms already open to receive the long snout and wiggly body that filled his hands. At the same time, he met Andy's barely-patient gaze and nodded for the kid – vibrating with energy trying to keep in whatever it was he had to say – to begin.

'Okay, so get this…' is how it started, before Andy dug a hand into his hoodie's pocket, fisting whatever was in there and then holding it out towards Bobby. At the same time, the kid switched from ASL to speaking straight into the man's head, pictogram edition.

The old hunter, who had no clue where this was going as the images frankly made as much sense as some of the kid's pre-mute ramblings, held out his hand. The ancient coin, hand-pressed metal warmed from Andy's palm, fell heavy into Bobby's own. The images assaulting his brain finally stopped.

It took him a moment, transferring raised brows from the coin to the kid, before he realized Andy was grinning. He gestured at the coin, like Bobby was supposed to be understanding something he clearly wasn't. When the old hunter kept on staring, Andy sighed dramatically and darted forward to scoop the Persian sleep coin out of Bobby's hand.

The kid's brain images immediately started up again, so suddenly that Bobby actually winced, something he hadn't done since the early days of Andy's gift.

"What the-"

The assault ended as abruptly as it began once the weight of old coin fell into his palm again.

Bobby stared down at the charmed chunk of metal, realization settling in his abused brain. He looked back up at Andy, who was grinning widely now, nodding along with Bobby's assumption. He held two thumbs up, his equivalent of 'Cool, right?'

"Huh. I'll be damned." The hunter looked down at the coin again, flipping it in his palm to briefly inspect it. "How'd you figure that one out?"

The silence – in hand language, mind language, and even friggin' body language – tipped Bobby off to the answer of that question long before Andy came up with a good lie.

"You didn't," Bobby growled, eyes narrowing on the already guilty looking kid, who most definitely had. The only way to find out you had a magical telepathy-blocking coin – and Andy sure as shit had been more than confident in that theory, enough so that it wasn't a theory anymore – was to test it on someone.

The brat had gone to town while Bobby was off on a hunt and tested his theory. Which was- it was-

"Of all the hair-brained, idiotic, stupid things you could risk!" Bobby hollered, chasing the kid out of the den as Andy took off running like a friggin cartoon. Sarge went barking after them, agreeing that yes, it was a good time for a game of chase. "Of all the idjits I deal with on a daily basis, you have got to be the biggest, most-"

A knock on the front door – firm and demanding enough to break through the chaos – halted all two legged participants. Sarge crashed into Bobby, who 'oof!'ed into Andy, before the German Shepherd was bounding over to the door instead with insistent, alerting barks. To let the humans know someone was there. Obviously.

"Alright, alright, enough," Bobby grumbled towards the dog, who immediately silenced. Sarge obediently settled on his haunches, staring intently up at the doorknob with just enough head tilt to be unfairly adorable (in the opinion of all two legged participants). He sat, steadily awaiting the moment his human would open the door and reveal their newest (soon-to-be-licked-and-smelled-intently) house guest. "Move, you dingus."

Sarge shuffled a foot and a half to the side, never completely leaving his sat position, so Bobby could open the door. Andy was walking up on his right, running-for-his-life temporarily forgotten, when the old hunter turned the knob. Lucky for both of them – or perhaps it was some sort of exceedingly helpful divine intervention – Andy was blocked from sight by the width of the wood swinging back as Bobby Singer opened his front door to reveal one Agent Victor Henriksen, standing on his front step, Sheriff Mills just behind him.

Bobby kept the door tucked tight to his frame, hand gesturing frantically at Andy to get the hell back, further out of sight, while his face betrayed nothing. "Sheriff. Mr…?"

"Agent," Victor corrected with a bland smile that was anything but friendly. He flashed his badge. "Henriksen, with the FBI."

Behind the door, Andy backed himself right up to the wall, eyes impossibly wide. He hadn't really been with-it enough to see or hear the FBI agent that had chased them out of that Sturgis hospital three months ago, but he sure as shit recognized that name.

They were so, so screwed.

"Can I help you with something, Agent?" Bobby asked, tone not particularly welcoming but not outright defensive either. Just a grumpy man annoyed to be bothered at his home.

"I think you probably can," Henriksen answered, and though the words themselves might have been innocuous enough, Bobby could hear the threat behind them. "I'm looking for the Winchesters, Mr. Singer."

"John Winchester?" the old hunter replied, raising his eyebrows. "Haven't heard from him in years."

"And his sons?"

Bobby stared at the agent, letting the silence stretch between them. Let the FBI agent draw his own conclusions about what that silence meant. Andy, on the other hand, was pretty sure he was going to have a heart attack tucked behind the door. There was no way Agent Henriksen would miss the sound of his heart beating itself straight through his ribs like a battering ram.

"What's this about, Agent?" Bobby finally asked, words drawn with caution. Henrisken just smiled. It was not a comforting gesture. Not that it was intended to be.

"I'm sure you're aware that Dean and Sam Winchester are wanted fugitives."

It wasn't a question. Bobby raised his eyebrows.

"Hadn't heard."

"No?" The FBI agent was absolutely faking surprise. Even Andy, tucked behind a door and struggling to hear the conversation over his own panic, could tell.

The old home owner harrumphed. "We ain't exactly pen pals, Agent."

"What are you, then?" Henriksen countered without missing a beat. "What exactly is your relationship with the Winchesters, Mr. Singer?"

Behind the FBI agent, Sheriff Mills was watching Bobby with a neutral expression. He resisted glancing her way. The two were hardly on good terms. Jody put up with a lot of the crap that came with having a hunter in her town and not knowing it. For the most part, she assumed Bobby Singer was a harmless low-grade pain in her ass that could be largely left to his own devices. An assumption which had been working just fine for the old hunter over the last half decade Jody had been in charge. He was not looking forward to a shift in that arrangement, damnit.

"They're clients," he answered with a one-shoulder shrug, his other side pressed against the door. He'd kept his hand on the inside knob, in case he needed to signal Andy, and was using his body to more or less block Agent Henriksen's view into his house. Not that there was anything to see but Sarge sitting to his left. At this point, though, Bobby wasn't taking any chances.

"Of your automotive business?" The skepticism in Henriksen's tone was so thick it was insulting. Bobby didn't hide what he thought about that.

"Yeah, when they're passing through and need it. But I got a side business, selling occult shit," he growled. Sheriff Mill's eyebrows rose, but she otherwise stayed a quiet bystander. "Their daddy used to come to me for books and the occasional trinket. Guess he passed the word onto his boys."

"Hm," the agent hummed and there wasn't a single person witness to that conversation that thought he believed the old man. "And I'm sure these trinkets are all legal?"

Bobby rolled his eyes for show, but he didn't have to summon up much acting for the performance. "It's antiques and herbs, Agent. You can get half of it on the internet these days. Hell, most of the plants you can get at a damn nursery, so long as you're willing to dry 'em yourself. Not that I tell any of my clients that."

Behind the door, Andy spared a moment – in between bouts of pure panic, mind you – to applaud Bobby for how damn good an actor he was. Though, really, he hadn't done much lying at all. Easiest lie to sell was one closest to the truth, he supposed.

"Mind showing us some of this 'occult' side business of yours?"

Andy stiffened. Henriksen was vying to get into the house. Shit! He glanced around, trying to figure out if he could bolt for the panic room without being seen. His eyes caught on Sarge, sitting just to Bobby's left, waiting patiently to greet the visitors. Son of a bitch, even if Andy could get away, Sarge would just follow him, probably alerting their guests to his presence in the house.

Shit, shit, shit!

"Sure do," Bobby countered immediately, gruff turned up to eleven. He kept his body language surprisingly at ease, however, careful not to pull the door any tighter to his side. They'd be royally screwed if he gave Henriksen even a hint that there was something in that house worth hiding. Let alone that it was hiding less than a foot from the door. "Unless you got a warrant."

Agent Henriksen chuckled. "You have something to hide, Mr. Singer?"

"Sure do," he repeated with no less gruff this time, but a heck of a lot more sarcasm. "And I'm going to keep hiding it right behind this door and my civil rights. You want the tour, show me a warrant. Now, you want something else or can I get back to watching Oprah?"

Andy actually had to slap a hand over his mouth to avoid the burst of laughter that unexpectedly bubbled up. Not that any noise would have come out (surprise silver lining to being mute? Makes you great at hiding. Andy was a true ninja these days. At least in his mind), but it was more of a gut reaction to Bobby sassing the FBI.

The huff of a not-laugh that Henriksen let out was somehow still terrifying. "Nah, that'll be all for today. I'm sure now that you've been informed the Winchesters are fugitives, you won't be entertaining them as 'clients' again?"

"Taking a phone callain't harboring or abetting, Agent Henriksen," Bobby responded with narrowed eyes. "Unless the laws changed lately?"

The smile the FBI agent returned was all teeth. "Just be sure to call when they plan their next shopping trip." He handed over a crisp, white business card that Bobby snatched with little patience. "Not reporting the location of a known fugitive is accessory after the fact and I will haul your ass to jail. Have a good day, Mr. Singer."

Bobby shut the door on the FBI agent's retreating figure and an unhappy looking Jody Mills. He didn't move from the doorway, just looked to his right to share a wide-eyed, relieved breath with Andy, who'd been trapped behind the door for the entire length of conversation. Every awkward, hair-raising minute of it.

'Holy shit,' Andy signed immediately. 'Holy shit!'

"Well, balls," the old hunter muttered alongside one hell of a sigh. "We better let the boys know."

The words were not five seconds past his lips – Andy already pulling his cell out of his hoodie pocket – when Sarge started barking. Both hunters jumped at the loud, unexpected noise, before another knock, sharper and more demanding, sounded on the front door once more.

-o-o-o-

Jody had turned away from Robert Singer's closed door and followed after the FBI agent. Henriksen was already to his car, pulling open the driver's side door. The sheriff realized his business here was concluded and he didn't plan on sticking around past that. On to the next town's residents to harass, she supposed. But what did she know, she was just a small town sheriff, not someone the FBI had time for.

With a hand on her hip and Henriksen just about to climb into his car, Jody asked, "You got enough for a warrant?"

Translation: Should I expect my town to be graced by your sunny disposition anytime soon?

The Agent paused, putting his hand on top of the door and regarding her across from it. Jody wondered if he'd forgotten she was even there. After a moment, Henriksen shook his head. "Nah, nothing a judge would buy off on. This was more about shaking branches and hoping something worthwhile fell out."

Jody was surprised by the honesty. She debated for half a second before opting to push her luck. "You think Bobby Singer could be harboring a fugitive?"

The sheriff couldn't help the glance over her shoulder back at Singer's house. Harmless, that's what she'd called him. Not because he was incapable of violence – no, she knew he had at least two firearms on property (legally registered, of course) and a mean right hook according to several bar fights over the years. But he'd never been disrespectful toward her or her people in any of their interactions, never violent or volatile when brought in, even after a nasty altercation with another drunk or loud mouth. Bobby Singer was harmless in her book because every time she talked to him, gruff as he might be, Jody only saw a broken, hurting man who was lonely.

Having the kid around had been good for him, she'd thought. Hoped. No, she'd known having Andy around would be good for the old man.

Except for the part where said kid was apparently a wanted man running around with a pair that was even worse. Jody bit back the sigh at how complicated things had just gotten in her town.

"Don't know," Henriksen answered her question with a shrug, as if it didn't really matter one way or another. It probably didn't, Jody suspected. This FBI Agent didn't seem the type to be discouraged by a lead not panning out. He'd catch the Winchesters one way or another, whether Bobby Singer was involved or not.

"It's possible he doesn't know who they really are. The Winchesters charm a lot of people, Sheriff. Hell, half their victims claim they're good people. Heroes, even." Henriksen snorted, shaking his head at the gall of some criminals. "I don't think it's a crime to fall for that. Doesn't make Singer a bad man. But it does make him a thorn in my side."

With that, the FBI agent sank into the front seat. Knowing their conversation was over, Jody didn't bother with any more questions about his case. Instead, she came to stand by the still open door. "You need a guide back into town?"

Henriksen declined, as she figured he would, and shut his door. He reversed away from the main house before turning his rental car around and heading for the gate of Singer Salvage. Jody watched him leave, brow slowly furling as she thought about everything she'd learned in the last hour about her supposed town drunk.

With a frown, she turned to Bobby Singer's house and stalked back up those steps.

-o-o-o-

Bobby shoved the kid away from the front door at the same time Andy scrambled back into his protective corner, making for somewhat of a scramble between the two. As he silenced Sarge's barking with a single hand motion, the old hunter leveled one hell of a warning look Andy's way before wrapping his hand around the doorknob.

Like Andy needed the reminder to stay hidden. Him, the wanted felon.

"Alright, Bobby," Sheriff Mills said loudly as he swung the door open. She had one hand on hip and a tone that sounded about ten seconds away from murdering them both. "Where's the kid and what the hell is going on?"

Bobby settled on the most neutral expression he could muster as his brain raced through possible answers. He could tell her the kid had moved on, or wasn't here at the moment, or play especially dumb and ask what kid (that was, admittedly, more of a Dean move and not one Bobby thought he could pull off, let alone get away with). He'd just settled on stalling – the kid's not here at the moment – when Andy friggin' stepped out from behind the door.

So much for staying hidden.

To add insult to injury, the kid gave Sheriff Mills a sheepish wave. Bobby very seriously considered shoving him back behind the door. It wouldn't get them out of the monumental shitstorm he'd just stepped them into, but it would be cathartic. Bobby settled for a glare that could make even monsters turn tail and run instead.

The damn Jedi was, of course, immune to such a stare.

"Get in here, Sheriff, before Henriksen decides to come back for round two," Bobby practically growled, for lack of anything better to say.

It wasn't like he could defend himself or Andy in this situation. Jody surely knew the kid wasn't just an urchin in need of a place to stay anymore. No doubt by her tone, she now knew he was a wanted fugitive – despite Henriksen conveniently leaving him out of their friendly little chat – and she would now be obligated to report his location. They were already screwed, might as well be inside and warm while they were at it.

The raised eyebrows were not particularly amused, but Sheriff Mills did step inside the house and allow Bobby to close the door behind her. The hands remained on her hips, though, and even Andy winced at the clear tension in the small foyer.

"Do you have any idea how much trouble you're in?" she asked, gaze aimed at Bobby first before turning to Andy. "And you, you're wanted by the FBI? Why?"

The kid exchanged a hesitant glance with Bobby before the hands started up in a flurry of motion. In her spare time – mostly at the office between paperwork and field calls – Jody had been trying her hand (no pun intended) at a little ASL. But she wasn't all that far along yet and Andy was moving much too quickly for her to keep track of any of it.

"Andy, slow down-" She was already shaking her head when he dropped his hands, looking particularly despondent. It didn't matter how angry she was, the kid just tugged at that certain, mom-based heartstring within her. Jody sighed, reaching for the pad and pen at her hip, when Andy raised a hand, curled in a fist with his pointer finger straight out, and dragged it across his neck.

Jody stared. She blinked. She stared some more. "You… you killed someone?"

That couldn't be right. Not this kid. This kid who had first held open a store door for her with a flourish of a bow. Who was a total goofball and texted with the cheesiest code words he could come up with. Who'd gotten a lonely old man a dog because his last had passed away.

This kid was a sweetheart. And Jody prided herself on being a pretty darn good judge of character. No way he was a murderer.

"Does Andy look like a killer to you, Sheriff?" Bobby interrupted, his voice low with something Jody might have called a warning, except she wasn't getting any threatening vibe off him. Just a protective one, she realized.

The kid, however, looked away and Jody knew guilt when she saw it. Jody sighed, having more questions now than when she'd first stepped into the house. She pulled the pad and pen off her hip fully this time. "Andy, what happened? The truth."

Bobby went to answer the question, but she immediately held up a hand. "In his words, Singer."

"The boy can't talk, Sheriff-"

Andy accepted the pad and pen readily. Bobby watched the item exchange hands like it was a ticking time bomb. And it very well could be. He couldn't tell Andy what to write – not to incriminate himself – and he was worried the kid didn't understand how much trouble they were in. The Sheriff had to report them. She didn't have any other choice, and there was nothing they could do or say to talk her out of that responsibility. The more Andy confessed, the deeper the hole he dug, no matter his good intention.

But keeping Andy from being honest and open was like asking water not to be wet.

He ripped off the top three pages and handed them to the Sheriff. Bobby stretched his neck trying to read it in transit, not that it got him much, before Jody started going through them, line after line of brutal honesty. Andy hadn't held back anything. He'd explained the situation in Guthry, how his long lost twin brother had shown up, integrated himself into Andy's life, killed their birth mother, father, and the delivery doctor. Then he'd set his sights on Tracy. Andy had tried to stop him, and when he'd failed, he'd killed Weber in a blind rage. Then he'd ran, knowing how it would look to the cops. The Winchesters and Bobby had taken him in, knowing he wasn't the murderer the police said he was. At least…not the cold-blooded one.

Jody looked up, staring into those wide, honest eyes and trying to ignore the light sheen across them. Andy wasn't playing her, she knew just from his open expression. He was upset, and who could blame him. What the sheriff held in her hands was a horror story.

"Was it self-defense?" she finally asked, voice quiet. She was giving Andy a chance, an out. The kid, God love him, hesitated and then shrugged. This boy was physically incapable of not being honest.

He put the pen back to the pad in his hand, then held up the page when he was done.

'He needed to be stopped.'

Bobby closed his eyes briefly, knowing what the kid was trying to say, even if he knew Andy shouldn't say it aloud. Not to a cop. Weber hadn't been attacking him at the time, so Andy couldn't say the kill hadn't been about revenge. About anger and hurt. But it had also been fear, certainly. Fear of what Webber would do next.

Jody let out a breath of air, but just nodded. It was unclear what her own take away was. Not that Bobby could do anything about it either way. No, he could only hope and pray that Andy wasn't confessing away every last ounce of freedom he had left.

"And the Winchesters?"

The kid went back to writing furiously, and Bobby frowned. He already knew Andy would defend those boys so much more than he'd ever defend himself. Andy's last name might not legally be Winchester, but damn if he didn't fit right in with those brothers.

He handed a single page over, flapping it impatiently as if every second delayed was a second Jody thought the Winchesters murderous monsters, and Andy couldn't stand for that.

"'They're good,'" Jody read aloud, eyebrows betraying the skepticism she mostly kept out of her tone. "'I know what the FBI says about them, but it's not true.'"

The sheriff shifted her doubting gaze over to Bobby, and the old hunter just harrumphed.

"What did you come back here for, Sheriff?" he growled, gesturing to Andy. "Why ask the boy if you're not gonna give what he's got to say a chance?"

Jody didn't have an answer for that, the disbelief in her expression replaced by a frown. What had she come into the house for, if not answers?

Andy was gesturing for their attention, and he scribbled something down quickly before holding it up.

'I can prove it.'

It was Bobby's brows that climbed this time. What the hell did that mean? The kid couldn't possibly mean-

Images assaulted his brain before he could finish thinking the unthinkable, let alone tell the idiot behind that unthinkable thought not to even think about doing what he was thinking about doing. Beside him, Jody gasped in surprise and probably pain, hand shooting to her head as a headache blossomed among images of vampires, ghosts, and a crossroad demon in a devil's trap.

That stupid, suicidal, psychic idjit!

Bobby slapped the Persian Sleep Coin that he hadn't given back to the kid yet right into Jody Mills' hand and, before she could fully register what was going on (or why her head was suddenly perfectly clear when she'd sworn there'd been pain and weird, misplaced thoughts a second ago), hauled Andy several feet away.

"Are you insane?" Bobby hissed, though he might as well be hollering given his tone. Andy actually tried to take a step back from the vitriol, but the old hunter kept a tight grip on his arm. "We don't tell civilians the truth!"

Images crossed through his mind, the equivalent of which was, 'She deserves to know.'

"No, kid, she don't. No one deserves that burden!" Bobby shook his head at the same time he shook Andy by the bicep. "Don't you get it? It ain't a truth, it's hell, and knowing about it just ruins people's lives."

The hurt in Andy's eyes was the first clue that Bobby had said too much. He released the kid, looking away and awkwardly clearing his throat – and the emotion there – away. Problem was, he wasn't wrong. Nothing good ever came from learning about the things that went bump in the night. Not for him, not for the Winchesters, not for Andy. Their lives were hell, and they spent every day just muddling through.

Bobby wouldn't wish that on anyone. Not Jody Mills, not Victor Henriksen. Not anybody. Let them be ignorant, but that much happier. That much less afraid.

"You fix it," the old hunter growled, aware that Sheriff Mills was trying to interject – it's not like she couldn't hear them, after all, they were only half a dozen feet away from her – but he ignored her attempts. "You make her forget all this. Forget that she was ever here, that you're wanted by the FBI. Make her forget it, kid."

If he'd hurt Andy before, Bobby knew what he'd just told the kid to do would hurt a hell of a lot worse. The pain, betrayal, and anger that flitted through Andy's eyes sure hurt like hell for Bobby, but he wouldn't take the request back.

'You mean control her,' Andy signed, the rage making his hands shake and the signs sloppy.

Bobby winced. He'd known the request wasn't a kind one, wasn't one Andy would view favorably, but he hadn't meant for it to be… to be like what the kid's brother had done. This wasn't the same…right?

"Kid, she has to report you to the authorities. It's her job!"

"Hey, 'she' is right here, gentlemen!"

Both men ignored the Sheriff, Bobby hoping he could get through to the kid and Andy almost shaking with rage. It was a mistake, it turned out, as neither man saw her angrily place the coin (which had, for some reason she wasn't particularly aware of, appeared in her hand at some point) onto the entryway table and storm towards them. Which was right when Andy all but exploded.

"You mean control her!" he signed again but, more than that, he yelled. Bobby winced, shutting one eye as he pressed a hand to his temple. The words – spoken clear as day, no picture edition this time – echoed through his skull painfully.

Jody drew up short, holding onto her head, sure, but more than anything stunned. The kid was supposed to be mute, but he'd definitely just opened his mouth and sound had come out. Loudly. Only, that wasn't quite right, and something in Jody instinctively knew it. For starters, the kid hadn't opened his mouth. And Jody knew the difference between hearing something and…whatever it was that had just happened.

"What…" she stood there, still stunned, and stared at the two men. But neither one was paying any attention to her. Andy was still shaking, furious. And then he didn't open his mouth, didn't move his lips, but his voice – or someone's voice – kept right on going.

"That isn't my choice to make!" he shouted, gesturing with hands that were still signing, though just barely, in his anger and distraction. There was a sheen to his eyes that threatened tears, and that damn near broke Bobby's heart. "I'm not Weber! Don't ever ask me to do something he'd do!"

"Kid-" The old hunter's voice was resigned, hand still pressed against his pounding head, but Andy wasn't hearing him.

"She deserves to know the truth. The truth about me,' Andy pressed a hand to his chest, 'and the truth about Sam and Dean!"

"What the hell is going on?" Jody finally snapped, yelling loudly to interrupt the- the- whatever the hell was happening in front of her. And in her head. Or. Something. She really wasn't ready to think about that part yet. "What truth?"

Both men froze at her loud, demanding interruption. Slowly, they turned towards her, Andy blinking in surprise before his expression became nothing short of stricken. As if he'd only just realized what he'd been doing. What he'd been…shouting. Bobby, on the other hand, zeroed in on the coin, sitting useless on the table several feet behind the Sheriff.

"Damnit," he muttered, that same defeat in his tone, only this time tilting towards anger. So much for keeping her out of it, he supposed. Andy had forced their hand with that fit, and there was no backing out now.

Not unless he wanted to bully the poor kid into breaking his moral code. Something Andy clearly felt a lot stronger about than even Bobby had known. It had been stupid of him to ask the kid to do it. No, not stupid. Desperate.

Bobby dropped his arms. Well, shit.

Andy sniffed, raising a hand to wipe his sleeve under his nose and dab at his eyes as fast as he could. Then he started scribbling in the Sheriff's pad again. When he held it up, there were just two words written there.

'I'm psychic.'

Sheriff Mills just stared at it. Bobby sighed, pulled his cap off his head to run a hand through his thinning hair, then resettled the cap.

"Balls," he muttered under his breath before taking a deeper one and launching into the explanation that would take Andy far too long to write down. And Lord knew they did not need a repeat performance of whatever had allowed the boy to speak directly in their minds, sans surrogate images. "The kid used to be able to control people with just his voice. Until someone took that away."

Andy cupped a self-conscious hand over his ever-bandaged throat. The doctors had done a fairly good job patching up his neck, but the damage Scott Carey had done while trying to save his life was not easily hidden. It wasn't like he had the money or luxury of going back for skin grafts to cover up the mangled, burned flesh he'd walked away with. So Andy kept the area covered with a couple layers of gauze at all times. If nothing else, to avoid having to answer questions about the horrific injury. And maybe to make it a little easier to see himself in a mirror in the morning.

Jody was watching him carefully, that caring mother currently at war with the competent law enforcement officer. "Is…. Does that have to do with why you're wanted by the FBI?"

Andy just shrugged and the weight that had been not-so-slowly forming in Jody's gut over the last ten minutes got a lot heavier. He sent Bobby a quick side glance. Permission to take over any time, the hunter figured with a huff.

"Got nothing to do with the warrant. Though his asshat of a brother could do what Andy can. And it's how he got the kid's girl to kill herself." Andy's head dropped at that, avoiding everyone's eyes. "What got him on the FBI's radar was his association with the boys."

"The Winchesters," Jody clarified almost immediately, and Bobby nodded.

Andy was shaking his head and waving his hands immediately, though, and started writing again. He held the pad up.

'They're not the bad guys.'

Bobby let out a huff of air, having no real idea how to explain this situation to the Sheriff. He knew how he'd explain it to a civilian, but they had a whole lot less responsibility when it came to the law than Jody Mills did.

"Sam and Dean ain't what the FBI says they are," he started, rubbing at the back of his neck and looking for the world like he wished he had a time machine to get him out of this conversation.

'You can come help anytime now, Feathers' he thought, mostly sarcastically. It wasn't like they could ask their resident angel to just hop back a couple minutes in time to avoid a bad conversation. That would probably be a major waste of resources. And he'd have to deal with Dean's pissy face and lecture afterward.

Bobby didn't do lectures unless he was the one giving them.

"There's a lot of shit out there that goes bump in the night. With psychics falling at about a one on the scary and dangerous scale, Sheriff."

Jody Mills just stared. Bobby wasn't sure if she was believing any of it. Though Andy had given her quite the demonstration of proof, whether he'd meant to or not.

"Those boys, they help people. They save 'em." At an enthusiastic gesture of agreement from Andy, Bobby added, "They saved Andy. We can explain it all, if you want-"

The sheriff stopped him before he could get started with one raised hand. "I, uh, think psychics and telepathy is about as much as I can handle for one day."

Another huff of air passed Bobby's lips, but at least she wasn't outright arresting them both. That had to be something. Andy, on the other hand, immediately donned a pout and Bobby wanted to grab him by the arms again to give him another good shake. Jody, however, just sighed when she caught sight of it. The mom was winning out over the officer of the law, and she just knew it was going to mean a mountain of paperwork for her.

Jody gestured to the pad still gripped in his hand with a resigned sort of look that guaranteed she'd regret this. Andy wasted no time.

'Monsters are real. We hunt them.'

At least until someone took him out of the game, which Andy added on with a shrug and a gesture at his neck. Had taken away his psychic powers, Jody realized, putting two and two together in a way that she hadn't previously in this conversation. Someone had tried to take away his…telepathy. Or whatever it was.

'Not very successfully,' she thought to herself, still remembering that spike of pain through her head as she heard Andy's…well, not his voice but, er, him. Caught up in the weirdness that was finding a noun for a telepathic voice, Jody flinched when her brain caught up to the critical thought she'd just had, realizing how cruel it had actually been.

She remembered when Andy first arrived in town. She'd seen the faded bruises, the cuts and stitches and bandages. He had been a wreck, and she remembered thinking that someone put that kid through Hell. They'd been plenty successful at hurting him, regardless of how he – or his, um, powers – had adapted.

'Jesus,' Jody thought, glancing down at the pages she still held in her hands. He hadn't just been through hell with one person, this kid had been attacked by someone who was supposed to be a brother, who'd killed his girlfriend in front of him, all but framed him for the murder and ruined his life. That was well before anyone had taken his voice away.

This was all too much. It was too much to take in, too much to process in such a short amount of time. Psychics and monsters and murderers who were actually heroes? And she hadn't even approached the part where she was a damn Sheriff of the law standing in front of a known fugitive. This was too much all at once.

"We can probably prove it if you need us to," Bobby was saying, and Jody looked over at him with wide eyes. She wasn't sure how long he'd been talking, but he was serious. About proving to her that… monsters existed.

The images that had popped into her brain earlier – strange memories, almost, that definitely weren't hers and nothing she could recall seeing before from a movie or anything – came back now. Monsters. A thing with inhuman, pointed teeth, a woman with blood red eyes who'd thrown up black smoke.

They were talking about monsters. Vampires and ghosts and demons.

'Jesus', Jody repeated to herself, eyes only getting wider. She could feel her heart rate picking up, the blood in her veins starting to pulse with an edge of panic. Jody tried to shove it down, the freak-out building along the peripheral.

"I…this is too much," she admitted, raising her hands as if to stop them from adding any more onto it. "I-I need…"

She didn't even know what she needed.

Jody sucked in a deep breath, commanding herself to get a grip. Calm down. Process. After several deep breaths, she managed to look at both men once more. They were staring back with a mix of trepidation and anticipation. She put a hand on her belt, the other asking for her pad and pen back. Andy dutifully tucked the pen back into the little holder attached to the pad and handed it to her.

"I am going to leave," she announced firmly, and Bobby gave her an unimpressed look. Like they might have dared keep her there. "And I am going to…think over everything that…happened here."

"And Andy?" Bobby pressed, earning himself an admonishing glare for his lack of patience. Or tact.

"I don't know, Bobby," Jody snapped back, losing a bit of that calm she'd managed to pull over her internal freak out. "I'm obligated to take him in if he's standing right in front of me. Which is why I'm leaving and I will figure this all out…somewhere else."

Because it was all too much, and she needed space to think. The way Andy's shoulders sagged but he immediately nodded with understanding, sympathetic eyes was not helping.

"I will be back," she promised, though it was more of a threat. Whether she meant it to be or not…even she didn't know. "Tomorrow. Until then, you better both stay right here, in this house, and not even think about leaving town."

The 'or so help me' might not have been put into words, but it was heard loud and clear by both men. And probably even the dog, still sitting patiently to Bobby's left, ears perked up and listening. Andy nodded and actually drew a cross over his heart, dear lord. Bobby just rolled his eyes, which Jody decided she didn't see because she didn't have the bandwidth to smack that man upside the head at the moment.

Or deal with the paperwork that would come from unnecessary rough handling of a citizen. Even if that citizen was a suspect. Instigator. Associate. Whatever.

And then Jody Mills turned and walked out the door, down the steps, and climbed back into her jeep without a backwards glance. As if she hadn't just had her brain attacked by a psychic, learned that monsters were apparently real, or that two certifiably insane people lived in her town and they were both wanted by the FBI for one reason or another.

Jody put the car into drive and pulled out of Singer Salvage.

-o-o-o-

Bobby closed the door, caught between a thoughtful frown and an angry frown. Or so Andy thought of the old man's grumpy facial expression (also known as a frown) when he turned to him.

"That was a reckless move," Bobby immediately chastised, grump getting grumpier.

Andy didn't let it get to him. He could be angry at himself plenty for what had happened with Jody. He'd never meant to…. He'd told himself when he started playing with his new mental ability that he'd never let the telepathy form into words. Words could control people, images left room for interpretation.

And yet.

'What's done is done,' he signed to Bobby, feeling a lot less confident and calm than his hands portrayed.

"Ya damn idjit," Bobby muttered as he pulled out his phone and hit Dean's speed dial. He walked away from Andy, headed for the den as the phone rang and rang. Sarge, who'd left the foyer shortly after the last of their visitors had left without showering him in pets or treats, picked his head up from his spot on the couch. Bobby gave the dog a passing pet, frowning at his phone as it went to voicemail. He hung up and called Sam, only to get the same result. "When you'd last hear from them, kid?"

Andy, who'd followed after him at a slower pace, shrugged from the open doorway. He leaned against the frame, pulling his phone out as well. With one hand, he signed that the last text was from two days ago.

"Well shit," Bobby mumbled, trying Dean again. They hadn't been on anything noteworthy that the old hunter could recall. Nothing those boys couldn't handle alone.

The ringing switched to voicemail once more. That wasn't good.

'Time to call Cas?' Andy's signing caught Bobby's attention, and the old hunter's frown deepened. Even the kid looked worried now, and he'd just faced down both an FBI Agent and the implosion of his current life situation.

Still, their angelic trump card felt drastic. The boys could be interviewing a witness or actively on the hunt. They might not be able to answer their phones at all. Hell, this could all be a carefully constructed trap by Henriksen to get them to call the Winchesters. Not that Bobby was really buying any of that. Those brothers were a magnet for trouble. And pretty good about answering their phones, especially after repeat calls that usually suggested urgency.

Balls.

Bobby turned back to his phone, holding down his third speed dial.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: Alrighty! Two important plot pieces indeed (well, one is what Henriksen will do from here on out, but I couldn't actually fit his post Harrassing-Bobby actions into this chapter. Just know, it's an important plot piece :D) But more 8importantly! Jody is IN THE KNOW. Red alert, Jody Mills just got THE TALK and it is not gonna go well, because when does the talk ever go well? At least her son isn't a zombie yet...right? Right? Anybody? Are those silver-lined crickets I hear in the background?

Update Warning: For anyone who skipped the opening notes, I am going to take a break from posting for a couple months. I know, I know, what on earth has the past couple months been, Silence? The important difference here is that while the last months have been me wallowing away in a writing rut (hey, it's my writing rut and I can cry if I want to), this break is going to have purpose! Or...so I'm planning, at least. I'm going to start stockpiling chapters again, rather than post as I write them. The encouragement and feedback I get from you all enjoying a chapter is what spurs me on to write the next one with some scary relentlessness, actually. Without me posting regularly, I'm not getting that encouragement high regularly, and it's taken me this long to realize omg, guys, without it I just don't write. [insert facepalm here] I mean, I know I've said it a dozen times before, but I also...I dunno, kind of hoped it was just the covid and the quarantine and the change in the world and my different/new routine causing it? SIGH.

Anyway, I'm gonna take that break so that when I do start posting again it will be with regularity. Which I'm super excited about, no matter how long it takes me to get there. As mentioned in the starting A/Ns, my goal is to get all of season 2 finished up before you hear from me again. In my head, that's only 10 chapters from now!

UPDATE 09/01/23 - Hi everybody! I'm alive!! (And also haven't given up on this story!). I owe you guys a heck of a story considering I fell off the face of the earth for six months. Two weeks after I posted the last chapter and said I needed to take a break to write, my landlord served me an eviction notice 😑. He wanted to move his daughter into my unit. He did have to pay me a very nice relocation fee to do that, but ugh. Renter shopping always sucks, but add to it LA and a 60 day deadline? FML, April and May sucked.

Aaanyhoo, I did find myself a new place, but moving was hell! Fun fact: all of my moves leading up to this one have been from a college mindset (I am broke and own nothing) to a expat mindset (I will eventually leave this country and return home, so only buy what you're willing to move). When I moved to LA, both of those mindsets ended. And it was COVID, and retail therapy is a thing for me . Which means, between those two realizations, I became a friggin hoarder, y'all! This move was SO PAINFUL. I was used to not-really-an-adult-yet moving. I LIED to myself and thought, "how much more stuff can it possibly be?"

Anyway! I finally, in the last month, got my house feeling livable. In the meantime, work imploded, I lost all my routines (which kept the depression at bay) aaaaand I fell into a depression without actually realizing that was what was happening.

Good news? I am starting to pull out of it! Guys, guys, guys, I'm WRITING. LIKE, A LOT. I'm only three chapters in, but they're friggin long ass chapters (because of course they are -_-) and all I wanna do is write right now. I make no promises of 'being back' but it's totally what it feels like!!

No formal commitment to when I will start posting. I would like to get a couple more chapters written. I am on a road trip with my mother for the next two weeks (which will either go fabulously or we'll murder each other) in which I'm hoping to get some writing done...but it's a bit hard to say

Hopefully I'll get some progress over the next month and feel good enough to start posting come fall. Either way, thought, please be reassured that despite the lengthy wait, I do have new chapters in the works and this story will resume!

Cheers,
Silence

Chapter 120: Season 2: Chapter 86

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Welcome back everyone!! WE'RE BACK!!! Okay, well, I'm hoping we're back. I've got some serious fingers crossed that we're back. Am I still exceedingly nervous that the Muse is gonna wander off again for months at a time? Omg, hell yes, I am. But I am doing my best to keep that from happening. And, I hope, a return to regular posting will assist! Regular posting means regular feedback from readers, and she does so love to hear from readers. Needy little thing, my Muse.

Story Overview: Since it has been suuuuuuch a long time since we posted (and longer yet since we posted consistently) I highly encourage everyone to go back and read at least the last several chapters. I recommend starting at Chapter 115: Season 2 Chapter 81.

If you need a full refresher of the entire story, but do not have time to reread 800,000 words please read through A Shortcut to the Road So Far which can be found on my profile or linked to this story.

For those of you that have no time for either, here is a quick summary!

Last Time on The Road so Far (This Time Around): Dean and Sam went to check out a college town in Ohio where some weird things were happening. They ended up on the college campus, where Dean realized just who it was waiting for them there. They left, but not before Gabriel overheard their conversation, and decided to follow after. He stuck Dean in a timeloop, reliving the same day over and over again where Sam was killed and Yellow Eyes showed up to offer a deal. Remembering his promise to Sam, Dean killed himself rather than make the deal, and woke up at the start of the timeloop. He eventually figured out it was Gabriel, calling the Trickster out and finally getting a message to Cas, who showed up. When Dean still refused to learn the Trickster's lesson, Gabriel decided, perhaps they needed a different one. He zapped Cas out of the picture, and sent Dean and Sam somewhere new…

Meanwhile, Victor Henriksen paid Bobby a visit, with Jody Mills tagging along. Victor left after dispatching a warning, and Jody returned to the Salvage yard to ask why, exactly, Andy was wanted by the FBI. Andy revealed that he is a psychic, that the Winchesters are the good guys, and that monsters exist. Jody decided to take some time to process. Bobby tries to call the boys to warn them about Henriksen, but they don't pick up. He and Andy decide it's time for angelic reinforcements.

Chapter Warnings: Jody's got some serious thinking to do, but luckily she's got the support of her family around her. Andy and Bobby dodge a bullet, Cas is on the case until she's very much not, and her and a long lost sibling have a little chat.

Now, without further ado… Let's get this party started!!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 86

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

-Three Days Earlier-

Jody Mills stared down at her three-year-old son, who'd finally fallen asleep after three bedtime stories, two lullabies, and the insistence from the only adult in the room that no, he really did not need another glass of water.

It was somewhat of a special night for them both; Jody was rarely the one to tuck Owen in, being the parent that worked later and longer hours. But for once she'd been home, having called it quits very shortly after having her entire world view turned upside down, and asked – well, more like demanded – that she be the one to put him to bed. She'd all but kicked Sean out with a strongly-implied hint that she'd like to do it alone. The toddler had taken full advantage of the situation: wrapping Jody around his little pinky with request after request that she didn't have the heart to turn down.

When she finally returned to the dining room, Jody found her husband sitting in the dining room, a can of beer growing warm in front of him. When he spotted her coming down the hall, he took a drink just for appearances, giving her a tired smile as she slid into the seat next to him.

“Sorry,” she offered with an apologetic look, swiping the can for a sip.

“He helps,” Sean answered easily. “On bad days. I get it.”

Jody reached across the table, folding her hand over his. Their marriage hadn’t been without its hardships (what marriage wasn’t?), but he’d been her rock through them all. A decent man, a loving husband, and a damn good father. She didn’t know what she’d do without his support. She certainly couldn’t have the job she did without him there, taking on the primary role of parenting Owen. And he was so very good at it.

“What’s bothering you, hon?”

She squeezed his hand, giving him another smile that felt more forced. Jody was sure it looked it, too. “Am I that obvious?”

“No. I’m just that clever.” At her snort, Sean gave her a raised eyebrow. “I married you, didn’t I?”

“Ha!” Jody tilted her head back with an exaggerated laugh, but she couldn’t deny that he had her there. “Can’t argue against that logic. It’s nothing. Just some work stuff.”

Which was the understatement of the century, but Jody wasn’t sure she wanted to get into it. Wasn’t sure her husband would appreciate sharing this burden. Of course, Sean would tell her that was part of the whole husband role.

“Stuff you want to talk about?”

Jody couldn’t help the smile that crept over her face. He was so predictable (that, or she knew him too well, too).

“I probably should,” she admitted, even though it was the last thing she actually felt like doing. And she definitely couldn’t tell him everything she’d seen today. Good Lord, no. She’d spare him the 180-degree world view flip if she could. She hadn’t even wanted to know that monsters existed. She’d just spent the last ten minutes convincing her three-year-old son there wasn’t something in his closet. And Jody had checked – for real – three times to prove it to herself as much as him.

Jesus, her world had just gotten so much more terrifying. And she was a cop, to start with! The world had always been that much scarier when you faced the bad in it every day.

Still, she could share some of the burden with him. Sean had always been her counsel. He had always been able to see through the things that weighed her down and provide the clarity she needed. There he was, waiting patiently for her to begin, nursing a beer he clearly wasn't that interested in, not rushing her once. He did get up to fetch a second beer, though. A bottle this time. They shared many things, but a taste in beer wasn't one of them.

Once he'd settled it in front of her and she'd taken a swig or two, Jody finally found a good place to start. "Have you ever had your sense of right and wrong tested?"

Sean gave her a curious look. "What do you mean?"

Jody sighed, rubbing the back of her neck. On bad days, her body liked to store all its tension in those two muscles at the base of her skull, stretching down into her back with a tightness that always threatened a headache. And today had been a doozy.

How to explain without explaining.

"There's a… situation at work," she began, rolling the beer bottle between her palms. "I got into law enforcement because I believe in right and wrong. But sometimes… the gray area is hard to see through."

Sean reached out and placed his hand over hers, stilling her stressed energy and replacing it with encouragement to keep going. She smiled at him and took another sip with her free hand.

"There's a kid. He's gotten himself into a world of trouble." Another understatement of the century, but she was rather playing a game of pin-the-tail-on-the-donkey trying to tell this story without really telling it. "By all rights, I should bring him in. I have to bring him in."

Sean raised his eyebrows a touch – nothing judgmental, but perhaps surprised that she hadn't followed through with her legal obligations. There wasn't much that could cause Jody Mills to turn her back on the law. No wonder she'd gone for a solo tuck-in tonight. "So why haven't you?"

Jody groaned, hanging her head for a moment. "I don't know. It just doesn't feel right."

Sean let the moment of silence after her statement grow as he thought over what she'd offered up. It hadn't been much, but this didn't seem to be a matter of legality so much as, well, morality. He presented her with a serious look. "Do you know why I married you?"

Jody lifted her head, eyebrows raised in amusement at the sudden non-sequitor.

"Well… one of the reasons," he amended, and she chuckled.

"Is it…" Jody rested her cheek on her hand, elbow braced on the table as she smiled idly at her husband. "…because I'm armed and own a pair of handcuffs?"

Sean choked on his beer, which she'd conveniently waited for him to lift to his lips before speaking. He wiped his mouth on the back of his sleeve, laughing. "Alright, that might be one of those reasons, but it's not the one I'm thinking of now."

Her grin, which was near ear-to-ear, faded to something softer. "Alright, why'd you marry me?"

"I married you – I love you –" He squeezed her hand in his, "because you're more than your job, Jo."

Jody couldn't help the smile, sweet and sappy and just as in love as the day he'd asked her to marry him.

"What feels right?" he continued, withdrawing his hand to grab a sip from his beer – which was at an unappetizing room temperature – and leaned back in his chair. "What's your gut telling you?"

His wife sighed, pulling her hands off the table to curl them in her lap, tucking one leg up onto the chair. Jody tilted her head back, staring at the dining room ceiling. They'd need to re-paint soon. Maybe she'd convince Sean to go for another color. Light blue, perhaps. She'd always loved that color with white trim. There was a cobweb in one corner, too. It was obviously time for a deep clean. The type where you dug out the extendable duster.

"He's a good kid," she finally said, still staring at the ceiling. "What he's gotten himself wrapped up in… I don't think it's his fault. And I don't see how throwing him in jail is going to fix anything."

“Then do what you think is right,” Sean said immediately, probably having already known where her gut was leading her. Maybe she’d just needed to hear him say it was okay. “Not what your job demands.”

Jody sighed, knowing he was right, even if what she was about to do went against the very law she swore to uphold. The law she usually believed in. But that was more the problem she had with all of this than Andy Gallagher ever had been. This was something of an identity crisis: realizing something you wanted to believe in whole-heartedly wasn’t always right. Now she just had to figure out where she stood on her own.

Ugh, what a mess.

Jody smiled at her husband, leaning over to kiss him chastely before settling her head on his shoulder. “When did you get so smart?”

His shoulder lifted and fell beneath her cheek with his soft chuckle. “Sometime after I married you, I reckon.”

She laughed softly – lovingly – into his neck, her decision made.

-o-o-o-

The next day found Sheriff Mills knocking on Bobby Singer’s front door once more. When it swung open, the kid was nowhere to be found. Jody immediately wondered if he’d taken off, then dismissed it. She might not have spent a huge amount of time with Andy Gallagher over the last couple months he’d been in town, but she was a good judge of character. He was too damn good a kid – far too honest – to run. So he was probably hiding two feet away, behind the front door like she was fairly certain he’d been when the FBI agent came calling.

“Where is he?” she asked, tone brisk. Bobby eyed her from beneath his ballcap, clearly sizing her up. She didn’t have much of a relationship with the man outside of the several small-time arrests she’d made and the visits to his property regarding rumors and anonymous calls to the department. Nothing that had really panned out, but just enough to be a thorn in her side.

“You arresting him, Sheriff?”

Jody let her glare fall into the Officer-Of-The-Law range of serious. “Don’t make me ask again, Bobby.”

Andy stepped out from behind the door before she had to, offering a small wave and a nervous smile. Jody looked him up and down for a moment before nodding in return.

"Alright. Here's the deal." She dropped her hands from her hips, but kept her expression grim and deathly serious. "You're lucky Agent Henriksen didn't ask after you specifically. Because he didn't, I'm going to overlook what I know."

As the kid's expression lightened to the point of practically glowing, she leveled a warning finger his way. "I won't lie for you. If he comes back and asks, I'm obligated to answer."

Andy nodded excessively, and Jody's eyes dropped to the bandages still wrapped around his neck. She'd never asked him what had happened (and now she really didn't want to know. Didn't even want to imagine.) Jody had spent a fair amount of energy and guilt wondering if her hesitancy about turning him in had been pity. She was confident now it wasn't – Andy Gallagher was a good kid, and she believed him when he said he hadn't killed his girlfriend – but it didn't make staring at the evidence of his suffering any easier. It might make it worse, actually.

Some days being a mother and a sheriff was a burden she didn't entirely know how to juggle.

"The first thing you do to bring the law down on your head," Jody continued, reminding herself she was here to deliver a stern warning as that Sheriff, "and I will be the one putting you in handcuffs. Understand?"

The kid all but launched himself at her, barreling into her torso with a tight, all-encompassing hug. He was nodding against her shoulder again, and all Jody could think was, 'Oh good Lord, what have I just gotten myself into? '

When Andy pulled away, Signing several things at rapid speeds – the ' thank you' being the only one she really caught – Jody leveled a less severe, but no-less serious glare that quieted him quickly.

"Don't thank me," she emphasized with a stern shake of her head. "This isn't a favor. It's a judgment call. Don't prove me wrong."

When the kid beamed at her, despite how much Jody still dreaded this decision as one that would come back to bite her in the ass, she knew it hadn't been the wrong choice.

She turned to Bobby, bringing back the more dangerous warning glare. "Do not think this extends to the Winchesters, Bobby Singer. If I see those boys in my town, I will arrest them and contact Agent Henriksen immediately."

Andy Gallagher she'd met. Gotten to know. Exchanged frantic texts about what kind of dog food a German Shepherd needed, how to keep one in a bath long enough to actually get him clean, and the best dog toys to get him. Andy Gallagher was a good kid, and Jody Mills knew it. But the Winchesters? She didn't know them from Jack, and she wasn't about to put her career on the line for a couple of strangers the town-drunk and his fugitive 'nephew' vouched for. Especially not strangers wanted by the FBI.

Bobby Singer nodded, his expression grim enough that Sheriff Mills was inclined to believe he'd taken her threat seriously. The man, for all his faults and tendency to go looking for the bottom of a bottle, was smart enough to know the bullet they'd just dodged.

As for the rest of it….

"I don't need to know more," Jody laid down the statement like a fact. "I don't want to know more. So we leave it at that. Agreed?"

The two men in front of her exchanged quick glances before both nodded in absolute agreement. So Jody left it at that.

-o-o-o-

Bobby closed the door on Sheriff Mills retreating back, sharing an equally disbelieving, relieved look with Andy. The kid looked like he could hardly believe their luck. Bobby wasn't entirely sure they should. But at the moment, it wasn't like they had much choice. He could get Andy out of town, set him up somewhere else – maybe one of those safehouses Castiel mentioned setting up – but he wasn't sure it was the right move. For starters, he doubted Sheriff Mills would appreciate the disappearing act. Not that she could do much about it. But there was also the matter of the Yellow Eyed demon. Dean was adamant that he would return for Andy at some point. The kid was safest right where he was. At least from the supernatural.

"Better see if Feathers has found the boys," the old hunter told Andy. The Winchesters hadn't been picking up for two days now. Neither Bobby nor Andy had waited much longer than a handful of hours to call in the reinforcements. Castiel had left shortly after their explanation, intent on searching for them.

No sooner had the words left his mouth than wingbeats sounded from the den, announcing the arrival of the angel in question. Andy took off immediately, the older hunter following behind. By the time he entered the room, the kid was already rapid-fire Signing. Castiel's fiercely blue eyes were locked on his hands and body language. They shifted to Bobby as he stepped into the den.

"No, I have not found them," she answered what presumably was Andy's question, her gaze shifting back to the younger of the two humans. "If they are on Earth, their presence is being hidden."

Well, balls.

"That can't be good."

"No, it cannot be," Cas answered unnecessarily, eyes still on Bobby. "Were they investigating a case when they went missing?"

Andy and Bobby exchanged looks. The kid shrugged. Andy didn't generally ask for specifics when contacting the Winchesters. It was more banter than anything else. Bobby reached up, tugging at his cap.

"Can't say for sure. I sent 'em to a college town in Ohio – Springfield, think it was – for some minor stuff. Last text either of us got from the boys said it was a bust. Bunch of nonsense." Bobby shrugged his shoulders, though the tension in his shoulders betrayed his attempt at nonchalance. "They could have moved on, but if they did, we don't know where."

"Then I will start in Springfield." Castiel gave a sharp nod, and the decision was made. She was gone before either man could comment, let alone provide any additional information.

Bobby looked at Andy. Andy shrugged and Bobby sighed.

"Balls."

What neither hunter knew – and maybe if they had, they would have gone about things differently – was that would be the last time they would see the angel for months.

-o-o-o-

-Present-

“Honey, I’m home!”

Gabriel kicked the apartment door closed behind him as he strolled into his current residence. Well, one of them. Jack was barking up a storm, tail wagging so hard his butt was leading the charge more than the rest of him as the little terrier came waddling up to the archangel. Gabe scooped him up with one arm, nestling him in the crook of his elbow.

“Who’s a good boy, huh? Who’s a good boy?” the archangel cooed as he gave the dog a big smooch, frantic licks raining down on his chin and cheek. “Did you miss your daddy? Yes, you did. Was our house guest not very good company?”

Gabriel raised his brows questioningly towards Castiel, the angel currently duct-taped to a chair in the middle of his living room. She leveled a glare their way like an angry statue, blue eyes fierce and defiant, but the tape across her mouth hindered any response. Gabe went back to giving Jack little smooches before setting him down. The small dog immediately bounded over to the captive angel, yapping at her shins as if they had personally offended him.

“You know, he’d warm up to you if you scratched his belly,” Gabe offered offhand, wandering over to the kitchen to grab a soda from the fridge. The unamused look Castiel offered was priceless, as was the very pointed look that followed, aimed at her bound hands, each wrist taped to an arm of the chair. Gabriel just shrugged. He very much doubted Castiel would have paid any attention to Jackie even if her arms had been free.

Angels. They just didn’t get it. And wasn’t that the point of the millennia?

He plopped himself down on the Lazy Boy set up next to her chair, both seats facing the ridiculously large TV, and popped his soda. “So how was your day, honey?”

Whatever Castiel’s response, it wasn’t comprehensible through the tape. Though Gabe could make some rough guesses based on tone.

“That good, huh?” The archangel stuck a loopty-loop straw into the can and took a long draw. “Mine was excellent. Want some?”

When Gabe tilted the soda Castiel’s way, straw bobbing and swinging in a lazy circle, the other angel just glared. Seemed to be a thing with her.

“Oh, right. Here ya go.” With no ceremony, Gabriel reached over and ripped the duct tape from Cassie’s mouth. To her credit, she didn’t so much as wince. Spoil sport.

He gestured with the soda again, straw dangerously close to poking the angel in the face.

“Where are the Winchesters?” Castiel’s stare could have cowered lesser beings. Gabriel just snorted and took his soda back. “What have you done with them?”

“Relax, they’re fine,” Gabriel dragged out the last word, accompanied by an equally drawn out eye roll. He went back to sipping his soda, enjoying the liquid running through the loop of the straw. “Mostly.”

Castiel actually struggled against her bindings, tipping her chair back and forth in her effort. Which was just adorable. And ridiculous. What was it with this angel and the Winchesters? She wasn’t even supposed to be on earth, let alone mucking around with the True Vessels. And by the look of things, the mucking might have gotten literal.

“If you’ve hurt them, Gabriel-”

“Oh, so you did figure it out. I wondered.” Gabe dug into the cushions on either side of him, switching his soda from hand to hand as he searched for the remote. Silly thing always ended up in the cushions. When he found it, he pulled it out with a flourish and exclamation of triumph. “I figured you knew I was an angel. Kinda hard to hide the existence of grace when you’re wrapped in it.”

Gabriel gestured with a head tilt and eyebrows alone to the tape thoroughly binding Castiel to the chair.

“But jumping to dead archangel is a hell of a leap, even for you.” The archangel’s brow furled as he took his sibling. A Power at most, given her level of grace. Warrior class, clearly. Gabriel wasn’t personally familiar with Castiel, but he knew the type. Dedicated to the cause, sword of God, yada yada yada. Not usually the ones to make creative leaps and big assumptions. “Especially for you.”

Gabriel took another long drag from the straw, turning it into a slurping, noisy affair as the soda ran low in the can.

Castiel’s lips pursed tight as she considered her response. The truth was, she may not have immediately jumped to the dead archangel, as Gabriel said. He had been clever: careful to limit the amount of grace and the level of power contained in it. She might have assumed him a Seraph of Zachariah's rank and level, perhaps, had she not had other suspicions.

There had been something about his actions, his choices when confronting the Winchesters…. Castiel had only ever known of one angel that liked to play tricks . One angel that had gone missing, presumed dead but never confirmed. The coincidence had been too great to ignore.

It was something she did not feel safe admitting to the archangel, however. Castiel was unsure why, but the thought of continuing the current conversation caused her heart to beat in an irregular manner. Which drew her attention to the perfect change of topic: her vessel.

"What have you done with Angela Garrett?" Castiel asked instead. The human was not an active presence in her mind, as Castiel had grown used to. The angel could still feel the soul safe within the vessel, which brought great relief. But bound as she was, Castiel could not determine Angela's current state.

Her brother blinked, brow furling almost comically. "Who?"

"This vessel. What have you done with her? I cannot sense her."

Gabriel stared at her with a look that questioned her sanity. At the very least, it said 'uh… wut?'

"I put her to sleep, like you should have ."

The scolding tone coming from an archangel was difficult to ignore, but Castiel managed not to straighten up or fall in line at the reprimand. It was equally difficult to continue speaking against what felt very much like orders. Still, she'd made a promise to her charge, and she intended to keep it.

"Angela Garrett expressed discomfort in the isolation her subconscious presents to her. She requested to remain awake, whenever possible. However, during times of… difficulty, I have locked her consciousness in a loop of favored memories."

The archangel's brows rose up close to his hairline. "Like a pseudo heaven?"

"Yes. She was in a car accident, rendered brain dead when she agreed to serve as my vessel." Castiel maintained a steady gaze on her much more powerful brother. She had little negotiating power in this other than sincerity in her duty to this vessel. "Until she can be reunited with her family in Heaven, I do this to ease her wait."

Gabe let out a whistle. "Huh. You sure know how to pick 'em."

Castiel's sincere gaze turned briefly annoyed, but she glanced away to hide it. She would conveniently leave out the part where such rigid requirements were entirely Dean Winchester's, decently sure that would not aid in her argument. Instead, she focused on the problem at hand.

"Allow me to place her in the loop, for her sake."

Gabriel stared. Which, for an angel, was tantamount to believing Castiel actually had lost her sanity. The Power shifted, uncomfortable under the scrutiny and judgment, but maintained eye contact.

"As my charge, her wellbeing is my responsibility," she continued, though she was well aware further attempts at explaining herself only sounded more pathetic, even to her ears. Comfort and wellbeing were two different things. Especially to a warrior. Especially to a warrior angel.

Still. Castiel flexed her grace absently, wondering if she could put the human into the memory loop herself if Gabriel refused her request. She'd made a promise, and she intended to keep it best she could.

"You're a weird little angel, aren't you?" Gabriel finally announced, and this time Castiel could not hide the flinch. "I'm not untying you." As the Power opened her mouth to argue, the archangel gave her a look that very clearly said 'stop talking', and continued in a pointed tone, " So … I'll do it. It'll be more convincing coming from me anyway. Good enough for you?"

Despite the question being both sarcastic and rhetorical – it was not like his sister had any true choice in the matter to begin with – Castiel nodded, solemn and serious.

"Those terms are acceptable."

Gabriel wanted to roll his eyes. So he absolutely did, raising two fingers as he reached out to the other angel.

Castiel did her best not to pull away from her brother's hand as he touched her forehead, but she largely failed. Angels rarely engaged in physical touch, with the exception of healers. And given how her last bout of healing had gone, Castiel was unsurprised to find herself wary of another angel's touch.

She felt no difference as Gabriel pulled away, but that was not particularly surprising. Bound as she was, she would unlikely be able to sense the altered existence of Angela's soul. Castiel would have to trust that Gabriel had done what he said he would.

She really had no idea the odds of that.

"You'd probably crack her poor mind in two if you tried," Gabriel continued as he resettled in his seat, sipping on the straw once more. No liquid came forth, and the draw of air through the small opening was an obnoxious sound the archangel delighted in. "What with your grace in the state it is. What did you do? Take on a Wooly Mammoth for funsies and lose? Also for funsies?"

"Wooly Mammoths are extinct," Castiel replied on instinct, not understanding why the archangel would suggest such a battle in the first place, nor what 'funsies' were.

"Wow. Can't get anything past you," Gabriel replied with what Castiel was fairly certain was sarcasm. The look he gave her certainly was. Human expressions were easier to read than tones, though Castiel was getting better at both. "Seriously, kiddo. What the hell did you do to yourself? I've seen fifteen car pile-ups in better shape than your grace."

And he would know; he'd caused his fair share through the last half century. Learning to drive while going ninety on a freeway was great fun, it turned out.

Surprisingly, the angel went pensively silent, lips sealed tight in a less than subtle physical cue she didn't want to answer. Even if, as Gabe suspected, she didn't realize it.

Huh. Well, that didn't bode well.

Gabe flicked his wrist, soda can and all, before putting the straw back in his mouth. His refilled drink slurped up through the loopty-loop with ease. "Sooooo, something to do with the Winchesters, then."

It wasn't a question; it wasn't intended to be. His sister managed not to wince, but it was a close thing, making it about as much of a giveaway as an actual wince would have been.

“How’d you get involved with those two mooks anyway?” Gabe kept his question casual, covering his own inner turmoil with nonchalance. It had been a long time since he’d interacted with any of his siblings, and he was finding it more of a challenge to remain neutral than he’d anticipated. The state Castiel was in was not helping. Gabe had always hated to see any of his siblings in pain, and Castiel’s grace was wrecked . It had more spider web cracks running through it than an actual spider web, for Dad’s sake.

If this was a result of the Winchesters, Gabe had been right to separate his sister from them.

“They… summoned me.” The hesitation with which Castiel answered immediately peaked Gabriel’s curiosity. Possibly more than the actual answer, which was surprising as well.

“Summoned? Like… by name ?” Gabe leaned forward, soda temporarily forgotten and straw spinning idly with the directional change. The way Castiel was avoiding his eyes was a dead giveaway that he’d hit the nail on the head. He whistled, leaning back in his Lazy Boy again with a squeak of springs. “Well shit. How the hell did they get that?”

“I am the angel of Thursday,” Cassie hedged, still not looking at him and instead staring straight ahead. The attempt at subterfuge (coming from an angel who clearly had none) was adorable. “Information such as my name is available on the internet.”

Gabe took a long, drawn-out sip of soda, enjoying how Castiel squirmed without squirming. “Huh. I mean, I guess . But if two humans were looking for angelic assistance, you’d think they’d go for bigger fry then the littlest angel of Thursday.”

It hadn’t entirely meant to be a dig – well, obviously it had been a dig, but the dig hadn’t been the point – though Castiel finally looked his way with a glare worthy of a Warrior of God, be it a Thursday or not. Her gaze shifted back straight ahead. She was squirming-without-squirming again. Gabe wondered if any of the humans she now apparently associated with had explained to her what a ‘tell’ was.

“Perhaps they did not want to draw attention to themselves with bigger fry .”

It was equally adorable how offended she was trying not to be. Gabe chewed on the end of his straw, though the hard plastic made it more of a gnawing. She was a terrible liar, but the archangel would drop it for now. He had the time to get the truth out of her, and eventually would.

“Do you like games?”

Castiel stiffened further – and how that was possible, Gabe wasn’t entirely sure (he’d forgotten how far up that heavenly stick went in most angels) – at the sudden non-sequitur, as well as the bright and cheerful tone he used to announce it. No doubt she was thinking of the many games a Trickster liked to play.

“Cuz I love ‘em,” Gabe continued, playing dopily oblivious to his sister’s discomfort. She was too easy, really. He swiped the remote off the arm of his chair and pointed it at the TV. “Humans have come up with some really interesting stuff in the last decade, let me tell you. They’ve gone digital!”

The electronic device came to life with a click and a hum, and Gabriel stifled his excited giggle. Given the look of dread in Cassie’s eye, he hadn’t stifled it well at all.

“This one’s called an ‘RPG,’” Gabriel intoned slowly, with an over-emphasized pronunciation, like he was explaining the concept to a child. The TV came alive with a main menu, pixelated castle and golden fields in the background. The room filled with the upbeat theme music of an awaiting adventure. He waggled his eyebrows at his sister. “Nerds, am I right?”

Castiel was frowning at the screen, glancing between it and the archangel warily. She said nothing, and Gabe’s grin only grew.

The archangel dug a second remote out of the cushions of his lazy boy, this one connected to the gaming console that hadn’t been sitting beneath the TV a moment ago but now blinked steadily with a green light. Castiel eyed it more warily than anything yet, and Gabriel cackled.

“Let’s play.”

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: We’re back!!! Okay, not the most interesting chapter to come back to, but oh man, I promise it’s about to get good. Some pretty packed (and verbose AF □) chapters ahead of us!

Reviews: Thank you everyone for your patience and endurance these last few months, your support and encouragement, your comments as you went through re-reads, and your sharing of this story. I know someone somewhere is talking about it 🤐 As soon as I started mentioning new updates coming soon, there was a surge of new readers ♥ So thank you ♥
There's some routine house cleaning we need to cover, so here we go!

Permissions: Several people have reached out over the years asking for permission to print this story out in book form, translate it, etc. I wanted to address those questions for everyone, since the number has started to grow.

I am instigating blanket permission to print, share, or translate this story, so long as you credit me as the author and do not alter the story in any way. For translating, please let me know so that I can add a link to your translation in this story. I would love this little beast to become more accessible to fans around the world.

Fanfiction/Fanart: I would be absolutely thrilled to see other fanfics or fanart pop up for this universe! The idea that my story could inspire others is a beautiful thought, so please feel free to contribute to this AU. Please credit or link TRSF(TTA) in your story or artwork, but otherwise have at! Feel free to send me a link and I will create a collection attached to TRSF(TTA) on AO3.

Tumblr: I have started a Tumblr account for this story in hopes that I can hold myself a tad more accountable to regular updating. I miss the pre-covid days, so I'm looking for more ways to inspire myself, and the best way to do that for me has always been interacting with others. Feel free to join my journey, poke and pester me, at www.tumblr.com/blog/8yearsofsilence

Discord Server: Along the same lines, I've been thinking of creating a Discord server just for this story. Someplace we can all chat, hang out, discuss the story or the show. Get inspired! I've really missed being a part of a fandom. When I first joined the fanfiction community, I very easily found others to chat with. But when I joined this time around, I've had a much harder time connecting with other readers. I'd like to change that! I miss surrounding myself with fellow fans. And I love talking stories! Mine or others. I really, really miss that. I wasn't particularly successful when I went in search, but I also haven't been a part of social media or the internet since college. I'm so old and out of it

I don't even know how to connect anymore So I figured I could setup my own space for it, if others are interested.

Update: The server is now live.
https://discord.gg/sDB7ZAwMAS

Request for Artwork: I now have an office/craft room/writing room in my new apartment, and I am absolutely covering it floor-to-ceiling in artwork. Nerd artwork, to be specific: Star Trek, Star Wars, LOTR, Marvel, DC - pretty much an homage to every show/movie/book that inspired me. So, naturally, Supernatural needs its own space! I have a couple items already, but what I would really love is a poster designed for this story. Fun fact: I did go to art school and I am a painter, but I loathe painting people. I'm more of a landscape gal. And, sadly, I'm total crap with photoshop despite more than one college course utilizing it. No patience for it, I'm afraid So! I would love to put out a request/competition/commission of sorts. Please let me know if there is any interest out there and I will follow up with details!
Update Schedule: I am going to start off a little slow until I'm certain the Muse is back for good and cooperative. I'm going to post every two weeks on Sundays (or Saturday nights, really, because I'm usually impatient) If we get back into the swing of things and I feel good about it, I'll resume weekly posts!

Alright, I'm done, I'm done. Thank you all for tuning back in!! I'm so happy to be back, and I hope you're happy to be back too!

Cheers,
Silence

Chapter 121: Season 2: Chapter 87

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Apologies this chapter is being posted later than usual. I spent the weekend in Las Vegas celebrating my birthday. It was a whirlwind, I may be a little hungover, I am definitely a lot exhausted, haha, but here we are!

Chapter Warnings: It's a lengthy one this time, withSam and Dean discovering where Gabe's thrown them. Dean's pissed, Sam's exasperated, there are spiders and trolls and goblins, Oh My! Gabe is cackling, Castiel is glaring, and the Authoress spent entirely too long chirping, 'Hey Listen!' Really, it's a party all around.

Actual Chapter Warnings: Temporary character death. Lots and lots and lots of it XD

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 87

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The transition from life-threatening situation in a busy morning diner to melodic, peaceful meadow under an afternoon sun was disconcerting to say the least. Dean blinked at the bright, shining ball of light in the sky that seemed… off somehow, but he couldn't quite place what it was. Actually, everything seemed a little off, and not just because he'd been magically transported to the middle of the Sound of Music, apparently, with the birds singing and bugs buzzing, and what Dean swore to god was elevator music coming and going with the wind.

Where the hell had Gabriel sent them?

Dean spun, immediately searching for his brother's beanstalk frame, and was surprised when the motion made him dizzy. Not fall-over-on-your-drunk-ass dizzy but more like vertigo; you can feel the earth beneath your feet, only it's definitely not moving. It's just your brain that's convinced otherwise. Or was it the other way around? The thought made his stomach clench and initiated a whole second bout of dizziness.

When his head and gut had both cleared, Dean took a stabilizing breath and lowered his arms, uncertain of when he'd raised them. Like a gymnast on a balance beam, only he was on solid ground that definitely wasn't moving, in a goddamn field, feeling ridiculous.

Cautiously, uncertain what had triggered the reaction the first time, Dean tried turning again, slower this time. His vision remained perfectly clear, but his mind swore the world blurred and Dean found himself tilting to the left as the vertigo swelled once more. It wasn't nearly as bad as the first time now that Dean was prepared for it. He righted himself, staring way too hard for way too long at the long grass surrounding him.

He stretched his neck to the left. Then the right. Then abruptly slid his body a foot to the left.

The grass was moving with him. Sort of. No matter how he turned or moved, he couldn't move around the grass. The same side of the blade kept facing him, no matter what he did to see the other side of it. And trying made him dizzy as all get out. Because every blade was turning with him. Like those trick pictures in the mall, or those portraits where the eyes followed you no matter where you stood. Ugh, his stomach felt like sloshed soup.

"What the hell," he muttered, staring at the grass like it was the one that had definitely lost its mind, and not Dean. Definitely not Dean.

"Dean!"

The older Winchester spun towards Sammy's voice, coming from a distance. His giant of a brother was making his way through the field towards him, stopping every few feet to rub at his eyes. Apparently Dean wasn't the only one struggling with whatever the hell was wrong with this place.

The older Winchester took off at a jog only to very, very quickly realize running in this place was a bad idea. He had to stop and recover his inner balance as the edges of everything went fuzzy and shifted. Soon as he could stand up straight again, he started towards Sam at the same damn pace his brother had adopted. A cautious walk interspersed with frequent stops to give his eyes and brain a break from the freaky shifting of everything around them.

"Dude, what the hell," Dean growled as soon as the two brothers had met in the middle.

"I don't know," Sam replied with a wince, eyes wide and trying not to focus on the tall grass surrounding them, swaying in the soft breeze. Although now that they'd stopped moving, the edges had solidified and the whole field almost looked normal. Slightly off, but almost there.

'Like bad special effects,' Dean thought offhandedly. It reminded him of movies where the big bad was CGI and you could really tell. The edges stood out, the lighting didn't quite match. You knew what you were seeing wasn't real.

"No, seriously, what the hell!"

"I don't know," Sam repeated with the same level of distress in his voice as Dean. "What are you wearing?"

"Me?" Dean immediately baulked, comeback forming before he even glanced down at himself. "What about you, Legolas?"

The brothers glanced down at their respective clothing about the same time, Dean pulling at his red and gold tunic, leather belt tied in a knot – sword, sheath and all, attached – and, uh, well, he supposed breaches was as close a term as he could get to whatever the hell covered his legs.

Sam, on the other hand, had a fancy-carved bow and quiver strapped to his back, full of what Dean could only assume were actual arrows. The rest of him looked like he'd walked out of a monastery retreat in the woods. He was wearing so much green in the form of leggings and a shin-length tunic that really qualified more as a robe. Or a night shirt. It was tied around his waist with gold rope, which matched the gold embroidery along every hem. The younger Winchester pulled at the silky fabric with the kind of caution a member of the bomb squad usually reserves for work. And his hair (while already too long in Dean's opinion but still nothing compared to 2016 Sam) seemed longer here. It was also pulled back into a half ponytail. Dean might have found the whole thing knee-slapping levels of hilarious if he wasn't also pissed and confused.

"Are- are my ears pointed?!" Sam suddenly exclaimed with no shortage of horror. Dean couldn't help but snigger when the kid tucked his significantly lengthened brown hair behind a very real, very elvish ear that he kept tugging on.

"Well. It does suit you."

And it was so very Gabe. Which definitely soured how funny it was, unfortunately.

The glare his younger brother sent his way was positively murderous. Dean almost smirked again, just because. "Have- has the trickster- I mean… have we done this before?"

Dean spared his brother a look, smirk dying before it truly got started. If they'd done this before, he wouldn't be asking 'what the hell', now would he? "No. I mean, he did throw us in TV land once-"

"He what?" Sam cut him off, blinking widely at his brother. "Like… with sets and actors and-"

"No, like actual TV land. If they were actors, they didn't know they were acting. You starred in a Herpes commercial." Actually, that part had been pretty funny. None of the rest of it, though. Given the face Sam pulled at that – something between perplexed confusion at what Dean was saying and blanched, abject horror at the possibility he was about to relive it – he didn't find it very funny, either.

Most of Gabe's jokes ended up not being particularly funny. Go figure.

"But this isn't that," Dean continued before Sam could put words together to question any (or all) of it. "That was… real. I mean, it wasn't real, but the world around us was- I mean- it wasn't this. It looked-"

"Real," Sam finished, more or less understanding what his brother was trying to say. They'd been thrown into TV shows (and apparently commercials) as if they were real. Real people, real places. Whatever this was, it didn't feel real. Sam was on the same page. Well, except for the damn ears. Those weren't fake. They weren't coming off.

Sam dropped his hand, trying to focus on anything but his now very-not-human ears. Like why Dean didn't have pointy ears. Or how the tall grass around him bent under his hand, but a fraction of a second too early. Not to mention that Sam couldn't feel the grass under his fingers. Like there was a force field around his hand, and that was what grass reacted to.

Even as it bent, it seemed… flat. Not…. Sam didn't know the right words to describe it. Like a flat plane with the image of grass printed on it. Not real, three-dimensional grass.

"It's like the graphics in a video game," he muttered, not really meaning to speak aloud. But he was real. His hands held dimensionality, he could pull at the ridiculous(ly soft) clothing he was now apparently wearing. Dean looked normal too (wardrobe malfunction aside). It was just the environment around them that wasn't.

"What?" Dean asked with a frown, distracted. He didn't catch what Sam mumbled almost under his breath, instead focused on the gentle breeze sifting through the meadow. "Do you hear, like, dramatic music? I swear it was snooze tunes a minute ago, but now-"

Suddenly the ground shook. One shallow jostle that had both Winchesters bracing themselves against the jolt. A second later, it happened again, this time accompanied by a heavy thud and low rumbling.

"What the hell." Dean held his hands out for balance as a third quake shook the earth beneath their feet. Earth that, now that he was looking at it, didn't look real either. Like he was standing on a photograph of dirt. He shifted his foot, and he heard the sound of a boot dragging through packed earth, but the vibration of it – the feeling of it – was absent. Not a single grain of dirt shifted beneath his foot. It was… trippy. "What the hell."

The earth shook again, deeper and louder this time. Dean was reminded of Godzilla movies. Not the awful American ones (though he enjoyed those for entirely different reasons), but the old Japanese ones.

"Dean." Sam's voice, filled with growing horror and disbelief, resulted in an immediate, almost Pavlovian response. Dean's head snapped up to Sam's face, then whirled to follow the younger Winchester's wide-eyed, incredulous gaze. Dean's jaw dropped, and if it had been a cartoon Gabe threw them into and not a- a- whatever this was, he had no doubt it would have hit the floor.

There was a… a….

Dean didn't have any other word for it: Troll. There was a full-blown, ugly grey, warts-and-all, straight-out-of-Harry-Potter, twelve-foot-tall troll ambling toward them with giant, thudding steps that shook the very ground. It was dragging a crudely carved club that was at least as tall as Sammy and twice as wide.

"Oh my god."

Dean couldn't even process what he was seeing. Beside him, Sam numbly nodded right along.

"What the hell!" Dean all but yelled it. Where the fuck had Gabe sent them?

Unfortunately, his shout drew the- the- troll's attention, and red-ringed, droopy eyes shifted to lock right on the brothers. Sam took a step back out of sheer, instinctual wrongness.

"Um…" He took another shaky step back, now reaching out to grab the back of Dean's red and gold tunic, pulling him back a step as well. "What- what do we do, here, Dean?"

"Hell if I know!" Dean shouted, allowing his brother to walk him back as the troll ambled right towards them at a slightly faster pace. The earth shook more consistently now. The thing bellowed, spittle flying from rotting teeth, and both Winchesters flinched back. "Run! Definitely run!"

The brothers took off at as fast a speed they could manage, given the blurred, ever-rotating blades of grass around them. Sam tried to keep his eyes on the tree line they were booking it for – the objects in the distance didn't change with their movement, so those were less dizzying. Still, it was like running with coke bottles strapped on for glasses. The heavy thudding of a troll chasing after them, accented by another knee-quaking roar (and Dean's knees could attest to that descriptor), and the increasingly climatic music they could definitely hear now, were all great motivators, though. They made it to the tree line with their foe trailing fifteen feet behind. Neither man managed a straight line worth a damn – both lost their balance occasionally, listing dangerously to one side before over correcting and stumbling in the other – but they made it to the safety of the trees with feet to spare.

Dean kept going a good twenty more feet before daring to turn and see if the troll could navigate between the trunks. Lucky for them, it was a pretty dense forest. The beast raged and howled and slammed its giant club into several tree trunks, causing the foliage around them to tremble. Leaves rained down from above. After another couple swings, with both Winchesters braced and eying the branches above them as they quivered and quaked, the troll finally lowered his weapon with a resigned, heavy thud. He turned and trudged away, dragging the weapon behind him like an upset toddler.

"Yeah, you better run!" Dean hollered after it, though the threat was as shaky as his legs. Once he felt safe, the older Winchester doubled over, grabbing his knees as he gasped for air after that run, the accompanying nausea, and holy shit, they'd just been chased by a troll.

"Holy shit," Sam breathed out, echoing Dean's inner monologue.

"I know," Dean concurred between heaves. He straightened, sword sheath bumping into his leg and causing him to spin, looking for whatever had touched him. Sam chuckled beside him, earning himself a glare as Dean grabbed clumsily at the hilt and slid the whole thing a little further back on his hip. "Shaddup. Useless weapon, a friggin' sword. I want my gun back, you son of a bitch!"

Sam huffed as Dean shouted and shook a fist at the heavens. Or, presumably, the trickster. When that didn't get him anywhere, the older Winchester sent a pointed look Sam's way, instead.

"Why didn't you, you know, shoot that thing?"

He was gesturing to the bow strapped across Sam's back. The moose of a Winchester glanced over his shoulder at it, while plucking absentmindedly at the string tight across his chest.

"Like I know how to shoot a bow and arrow, Dean," Sam countered, irritated-little-brother tone in full swing. In reality, he probably could manage if he had to. He'd had one or two P.E. classes through his school years that involved archery. He'd always taken to it better than the other students, although he'd assumed it was because he had extracurricular activities those same students could only have nightmares about.

So it was more like what the hell was a little arrow going to do against whatever the hell that had been?

Sam didn't bother bringing that up, however, uninterested as he was in a verbal spat with his brother. No matter how badly Dean wanted to start one. "We need to figure out where we are."

As he said it – looking around at the forest but really meaning the entire place as a whole – a large scroll appeared in his hand, already unfurled and sort of… hovering above his palm. Sam yelped, trying to drop the thing, but it followed him even as he took several half-panicked steps away.

"What the hell!" he waved his arm a little too frantically, trying to get the magic-appearing paper, which followed along with his flailing arm, to detach or disappear or something.

As he thought it, the scroll blinked out of existence and Sam was left standing in the woods holding his arm straight out like it might end up exploding on him.

"Hey, how'd you do that?" Dean asked, having watched the whole thing first with confusion, then a touch too much amusement, and now definite curiosity. "That looked like a map. Maybe it can tell us how to get the hell out of here. Do it again."

"No," Sam responded, maybe a little too quickly.

His brother scoffed with that particular judgmental look all older brothers inherently had. "Chicken."

Sam speared him with the return look that all younger brothers learn real quickly. "You do it if you want a map so badly."

"I don't know what you did, or I would!" Dean argued, throwing his hands up. "Just do it again."

"I don't know what I did, either!"

"Well, figure it out!"

At this point, they were two grown men dressed like dorks standing in a fake forest yelling and flailing their arms at each other. Really, if Dean weren't the one living it, the situation might be hilarious. If Gabe was watching them, he had no doubt the stupid archangel was enjoying this way too much.

Sam forced himself to take a deep breath, even if that breath was released through gritted teeth, and raised his arm. He gestured to his forearm where the map had sort of appeared. "I just wanted to know where we were and-"

The scroll reappeared, hovering over his arm and causing the younger Winchester to stifle a yelp. He managed not to flail his arm this time, but it was a close call.

Across from him, Dean stared wide-eyed at the parchment – lines of a map, with a coastline and several cities nestled in neatly drawn mountains – before closing his eyes and holding out his hands. "I want a million dollars."

Even with his eyes closed, he could hear Sam's eye roll. "Can we focus, please?"

"Pfft, it was worth a shot." Dean opened his eyes and dropped his arms. "So, where are we?"

"Uh…" Sam turned to the map, squinting at the land it depicted. "Some forest called the Elder Woods."

"Well…that doesn't sound so bad," Dean half muttered, glancing around at the less than welcoming trees around them. Moss hung from the branches in ominous clumps, and the canopy overhead was dense enough to block a significant amount of sunlight. It didn't exactly scream 'Bambi'.

"There's a town nearby, called Rocknesse. It's, uh… it's blinking, actually."

Dean frowned at his brother, who was leaning so close to the scroll at this point, arm raised up to his face, that the older Winchester half expected that map to have a dent the size of his kid brother's nose in it.

"Whatdya mean, blinking?" he asked loudly as he tromped over. He grabbed Sam's arm, forcing him to lower the map so he could lean in as well. "Lemme see."

Sam had actually been pretty damn accurate in his choice of words. There was a small town depicted – a wooden wall surrounding a couple dozen neatly drawn houses and larger buildings – with a handwritten, cursive name of Rocknesse above it. And there was a yellow dot in the city that kept fading in and out of existence. Essentially blinking.

There was both a green and a blue dot of similar size located to the southeast, atop a drawing of a forest. The forest was labeled 'The Elder Woods', those dots weren't blinking, and Dean realized he was staring at the equivalent of a "you are here" marker.

"Huh. Well, you don't see that every day," he said far too casually and with a one-shouldered shrug.

"So… do we go to Rocknesse? I think the blinking dot is trying to tell us where to go," Sam reasoned aloud, still staring at the map but occasionally glancing at his brother. Dean had dealt with the trickster before, so he was more likely to know the best course of action for what the demigod wanted with them.

"Hell no," Dean announced way too loudly as he finally let go of Sam's arm, already shaking his head. "No way we do what some blinking, magical-summoned map wants us to do. It wants us to go to town, well we're going deeper into the fucking forest then."

"Uh… I don't think that's-"

"We're not going to some town to get some quest, or go on a duck hunt, or rescue a friggin' princess from a friggin' castle in this freaky, fake-ass world." Dean put his hands on his hips and turned to regard the rest of the woods around them, deciding on his path forward. "Priority number one is to get the hell out of this place."

With that, he picked a direction at (what certainly felt like) random (in Sam's opinion, at least) and started traipsing through the woods. Sam glanced at the map once more and the little blinking dot that seemed like a pretty good indicator of where they should be going, before he dropped his hand and followed after his brother.

-o-o-o-

"Did you have a plan for 'getting the hell out of this place' beyond just picking a random direction to walk?" Sam eventually asked some five minutes later, when going deeper into the forest had not proven particularly easy or fruitful.

Dean had drawn his 'useless' sword several minutes back to chop at the branches, vines, and thorny bushes that grew thicker and more difficult to navigate the deeper they went, Indiana Jones style. It was pretty obvious to Sam at this point that this was not the direction they were supposed to go. Which was exactly why they were going, according to his hard-headed brother.

It had not helped Dean's argument that the music – always in the background, coming and going with the wind – was growing lower and, in Sam's opinion, more ominous.

"You think this is some sort of, like, video game, right?" Dean had picked up enough of the comments on bad graphics and the general vibe of the place – like the map – to put two and two together. It wasn't even off-brand, really. Last time Gabe had thrown them into TV Land. Why not Game Land for round two, huh?

Dean hadn't decided yet, but he was pretty sure he preferred TV Land.

"Well," he continued when Sam didn't bother answering him, "then someone built this world, and that means it's gotta end at some point. We're gonna find that end."

Sam opened his mouth to respond, then closed it and had to let the… not quite stupidity of that comment sink in. He had never been thrown into a video game before, so who was to say that Dean's theory was faulty. But Sam had played a fair share, between childhood friends with Gameboys and early consoles, then later during college where it turned out quite a few games, like Mario Kart, made for very entertaining drinking parties.

In all that time, he'd never found the edge of a video game map. He'd never gone looking for one, either, but usually you were stopped by something before you found the edge of the map. Or just plain killed, starting over somewhere your character was actually supposed to be.

"Even if we do find it," Sam reasoned, trying to ignore that last thought which sent an unwelcome shiver down his spine, "how is finding the edge of a world going to get us out of it?"

"I dunno," Dean answered, raising his sword to swipe at a particularly thick section of bush and vine blocking their way. He figured it would be like the ending of The Truman Show. They were gonna find a sky-painted wall with a staircase and, like, a door they could walk through or something. That would sound dumb out loud though, so instead he said, "Maybe we just walk right out of here. Who knows."

Sam was quiet for a moment as Dean kept hacking away. "That sounds too easy, if you ask me-"

Dean managed to slice at the last group of moss-laden, vine-wrapped, thorny branch and bush that stood in their way. The whole thing dropped as one single mass, falling to the ground with a heavy, sunken thud. Beyond was a dark, hooded clearing. It was more of a cave than anything that belonged in a forest, and the edges of where Dean had cut through were covered in a stringy, white substance that looked a lot like spider webs to Sam.

The music was no longer soft, and there was no question about the mood of it now.

'Danger, Will Robinson!' Sam had a second to think before dozens of glowing red eyes appeared within the webbed clearing. All of them were aimed their way.

"What the fuck-"

Sam's scream matched Dean's, decibel for decibel, as a massive spider – half the size of Dean, at least, and covered in spiny, gray and black hair – launched itself through the opening and took the older Winchester to the ground.

-o-o-o-

Dean sat up in the middle of a golden meadow, still screaming. He launched himself into the bright, sunny air, flailing at the giant-ass, furry, eight-legged freak that had been on him just a moment earlier. He punched and swung and spun for several seconds before realizing there was nothing attacking him. In fact, he wasn't even in the forest anymore. Patting himself down, still rather frantically, Dean spun in two quick circles, only getting a little dizzy at the tall grass that turned with him.

He was back in the meadow. There was a hint of a flute and harp on the wind, birds chirping distantly, and the buzz of insects all around.

"What the-"

Sam's screaming abruptly cut the air, and Dean spun. Two dozen feet away, in the same place he'd last seen Sam in this meadow, the younger Winchester sprung upright through the grass. He was doing a fantastic reenactment of the same spider dance Dean had done several minutes ago (not that he'd ever admit it to the beanstalk).

"Sam! Sammy!" Dean waved at the flailing man, even as he started in his brother's direction. Sam was still patting himself down, eyes wide and frantic, as he finally saw Dean.

"Did-" he gasped as Dean caught up, "did we just… respawn?"

"Re-what?"

"Spawn. When you die in a video game, you respawn back at the last checkpoint." Sam looked around, his eyes still a little too wide. "This meadow must be a checkpoint."

Dean opened his mouth to voice just how much of a nerd his brother was, when a shove to his shoulder sent him reeling back a good foot and a half. Sam had squared his shoulders, the look on his face a shade shy of murderous. Given the handful of times he'd seen that expression, Dean realized he was probably lucky his arm had been the target instead of his jaw.

"What was that for?" he still growled, rubbing at his shoulder. Sam had not pulled that hit at all, and Dean hadn't done anything to deserve the younger Winchester's ire. Not recently, at least.

"For getting us killed by giant, freaking, spiders, Dean!" Sam was still running his hands over his torso, chasing away the memory. "I told you that wasn't the right direction!"

"Like you know what the right direction is!"

Which wasn't his finest comeback, Dean could admit, but like hell Sam knew what to do in this situation any more than him. He was the one who'd dealt with the trickster before, not his kid brother.

"You're right, I don't," Sam admitted, first throwing his arms out to the side then dropping them. "But at least I'm trying to listen to what this place is telling us!"

Dean immediately scoffed, rolling his eyes. "This place isn't real, Sam!"

"Well, we're stuck in it, Dean, and that is real."

Sam crossed his arms, defiant and stubborn, and Dean frowned because… well, just because. Maybe because that sounded all too irrefutable, and Dean didn't want Sam to be right about that. Just like he hadn't friggin' wanted Sam to be right about TV Land, and what getting stuck there had meant, either.

'Play your roles, boys.'

"Fuck that," Dean growled out, probably way more aggressively than Sam's comment deserved, but the man from the future's mind was currently stuck in the past. A past he had not enjoyed, and refused to repeat at the whim of a brat archangel who needed to grow the fuck up. "I'm not letting some fake game world tell me what I can and can't do."

With that, Dean turned and marched back towards the forest, this time at a different angle. He wouldn't run into those spiders again (and that was not a chill running down his spine at the thought of repeating that experience), but he would find the edge of this world and break the hell out. One way or another.

-o-o-o-

Sam gave up following his brother after the third respawn. He'd had enough of getting shot in the chest by poisonous arrows (apparently a tribe of some sort of very ugly, very aggressive little goblins lived in the forest), or stomped on by a troll (who was not pleased by anyone who tried to cross through the meadow to the other side, away from the town Sam knew they were supposed to be going to). It didn't matter if the deaths weren't real, the pain and fear and damn memory of it was, and Sam could do with less of all of those things, thank you very much. He would wait right here until Dean ran his thick skull into that stubborn wall enough times to finally have some sense beaten into him.

So Sam stood in the meadow, hands on his hips, as his idiot brother stubbornly stomped off in various directions, only to reappear some ten minutes later, throw a temper tantrum, and launch into a new direction all over again.

-o-o-o-

"Are you done, yet?" the younger Winchester asked after what had to be the ninth or tenth respawn. Dean had come back into existence screaming and flailing, which had happened a handful of times. Sam didn't ask and Dean didn't offer the information on what exactly had offed him this time.

The older Winchester, still panting, crossed his arms and Sam swore he'd knock that sense into his brother himself if he didn't relent soon. But Dean finally dropped his arms, defeat in the line of his shoulders that spoke to exhaustion. That weariness outweighed the irritation painted clearly across his face.

"Friggin' fine," the man from the future conceded with a pissed off mutter. He'd tried every direction except the one that led to that damn town he knew they were supposed to go to, and every way had ended in a truly gruesome death. He didn't like quitting, and he liked admitting he was wrong even less, but he had to call it quits. Gabriel wasn't letting them out of this place any way but his way.

Fucking dick.

"Lead the way, Legolas," Dean grumbled, gesturing with his hand for his elven brother to take the lead in the only direction left they hadn't tried.

Sam huffed at the nickname but gathered up his robes (at least in Dean's mind), and started towards the town.

-o-o-o-

Gabriel let out a low whistle as the pixelated meadow and two characters that looked very much like Dean and Sam were replaced by the main menu screen for the game. He tossed the remote to the side, not worrying where it landed. "That has got to be a record of some sort. Thickest skull of any human, ever. Call Guinness."

Castiel was not amused, if her renewed struggles were any indication. The littlest angel had gone absolutely apeshit the first time the Winchesters died in the game, only marginally calming down when Gabe finally got through to her that they were fine. It was a game.

Her struggles had not been quite as ferocious after that, but they were no less present at every onscreen death and respawn, until Gabe had genuinely started to worry about her. He could see those spiderweb cracks microscopically expanding, yet she showed no signs of calming down. Just like back in the diner, Castiel was risking herself actual harm if she kept at it, and she didn't seem to care.

Call Guinness for a second record breaker: most stubborn, moronic little angel that could.

"Will you calm the fuck down?" Gabe finally snapped. This was supposed to be fun, but just like Dean had ruined his game back in the diner, Castiel was putting a hell of a rainy cloud over his fun parade now. He wasn't actually causing anyone harm. Not permanently, anyway. Cassie, in the meantime, sure as shit was, and Gabe would be the one forced to clean up the mess.

He might not know this angel, but the state she was in genuinely bothered him. Grace wasn't supposed to look like that, and it was clear those stupid humans she'd been hanging with had very nearly gotten her killed. While she was fine now, Gabe didn't want to see those scars open back up and, loathe as he was to admit it, he really didn't want to be the cause. Which meant if she kept this up and it got worse, Gabriel would be the one helping her to heal.

He scoffed at the thought, looking away with a grumpy pout. Raphy had been the healer, not him.

Castiel was growling something, but it wasn't making much of an impact given the tape once more across her mouth. Gabriel had resorted to re-duct-taping the angel's mouth shortly after the first respawn. With an eye roll, he snapped his fingers and the tape disappeared.

"Release them." The demand was growled so lowly, Gabriel felt a small spark of pride for this littlest angel. He'd almost gotten a shiver from the threat promised in that demand. Littlest angel that could, indeed.

"Uh… no." Gabriel shook his head at his sister's obstinance. Demanding anything of an archangel was laughable. The kid had spunk, though. He could happily admit that much. "They've got a lesson to learn, Cassie."

The lesser angel bristled at the name. Well, actually, she probably bristled at Gabriel refusing to return her two favorite humans, but he liked to think it was the nickname. She really shouldn't be surprised her request was denied, after all.

"Then release me," she demanded instead, attempting to gain control of the situation with one hell of a fierce stare. It was an A for Effort attempt. Really. "Unless you intend to teach me a lesson as well?"

Oh, the sass on this one. Gabe leaned back in his chair, smirking at the littlest angel. There was something about this particular sibling that was quickly growing on him. For every ounce of annoyance she caused, she dished out an equal amount of potential. But potential for what? Mischief? Maybe, if Gabe could tilt those morality scales a bit more in his direction. Destruction? Oh, most definitely. There was a fire in Castiel, that much was for sure.

It was oddly… refreshing.

Gabriel might even claim that hanging around humans was doing the angel some good… were it not for the state of her grace.

"Don't know yet," the archangel answered honestly, shrugging his shoulders and slurping up more soda. "I'm betting there's plenty of lessons for you, Cassie-" and would you look at that, it was the nickname- "anything you're itching to learn in particular, little sis?"

"Where the Winchesters are and what it will take for you to free them."

Well. He'd walked right into that one, hadn't he?

Gabriel sighed and grabbed the game controller once more. He slouched down in his comfy chair with an overly loud, disappointed sigh and a pout that he hoped made the littlest angel the littlest bit guilty.

When it very clearly didn't – Castiel's eyes laser-focused on the tv screen, waiting for the menu to disappear and the game to resume so she could see the state of her precious humans – Gabriel rolled his eyes, but hit the start button.

"You're such a bore, Cassie."

-o-o-o-

The town was really nothing more than two dozen shabby buildings under thick-thatched roofs, all of which were surrounded by an eight-foot log fence with sharpened points at the top. There was one road leading straight up to the gate, which was conveniently the two-wheel dirt tracks the Winchesters were currently trekking. The meadow had been conveniently cut through by a road going the exact direction they needed it to go. And it had led right to the fucking town.

They were a bunch of puppets in this place, and it rankled Dean to no end.

On their way to the gate, a stopped wagon blocked their path, one wooden wheel clearly broken. The very colorful driver waved them down with a way too wide smile on his face. And what a face. It, like the rest of the environment around them, was just off. Like a living geometric breakdown of a face. So many planes. Just wrong.

Also, there was an exclamation mark floating over his head. But at this point, that was hardly the weirdest thing about this place.

"Hello, travelers!" the driver called, voice overly loud and as cheerful as the rest of him. "Have you come for the festival?"

"Um…" Sam exchanged an uncertain glance with his brother.

"It's too bad about this broken wheel," he continued, despite a lack of answer. "Now I can't sell my wares at the festival."

"Er.."

The silence stretched between the three, with Sam continuously glancing at Dean, and Dean looking at him like 'what the hell do you want me to do about this?' The cart owner just kept staring right at them, smiling idly, like he was waiting for a programmed response.

Which… he probably was.

"Well, good luck with that." Dean turned and headed off the path to make his way around the downed cart.

"Dean!"

"Perhaps you could sell my wares at the festival!" the driver announced with sudden brilliance, and Sam was kind of surprised that exclamation mark still hovering over his head hadn't turned into a lightbulb.

Whoever wrote this game had spent one too many nights fueled by energy drinks. Next they'd be expected to throw chickens or play a musical instrument or something else equally inane.

"Um…"

"Yeah, we're not doing that." Dean had made it to the other side of the cart and was hoofing his way to the front gate of the city, hand on sword and goal clenched tightly between pinched shoulder blades.

Sam sighed and chased after him, grabbing him by the arm when calling his name wasn't enough to halt him. "Dean, come on."

"No!" The shout was more of a surprise than his brother whirling on him. Sam gave him the obligatory step back he certainly didn't owe the man, but he knew Dean too well. "No, I'm not coming on! This is stupid, Sam!"

"Agreed." The agreement came too readily, too calm and too genuine. Sam watched his brother deflate, that obstinate goal of making it to the damn city (if for nothing else than to say he'd done the thing) finally releasing from those tense shoulders. Sam continued, "This is beyond stupid, and I don't want to be here. But we are, so we're going to have to play along."

"Play along," Dean muttered viciously, his feelings on being forced to do anything very clear from the snarl on his face. "How the fuck are we supposed to know what to do, anyway?"

Sam knew his brother was griping more than asking a real question. The answer was as obvious as this entire scenario was stupid. Still, he couldn't help but rib the man that darn near never stopped ribbing him. He gestured to the cart, which was literally blocking the way to their goal. "Have you never played a video game before? Sheesh."

"No, Sam, I haven't. I've been hunting and saving people, not wasting my time at college playing games!"

And wow, that had been an absolutely perfect rendition of 2007 Dean. The man from the future hadn't been aiming for 2007 Dean – he hadn't needed to since Sam figured it out and thank fuck for that, because now he could just be himself – but, yeah, trying or not, he'd nailed that one. Especially if the hurt bitchface coming off his brother was his scale of judgment.

Ugh. Fine.

Dean gave a growl that was as much a sigh of defeat as it was a declaration of war and tromped back to the cart and the driver, who was still just standing there, stupid idle smile on his stupid idle face.

"Hello, travelers!"

"Just give us the damn 'wares,'" Dean demanded, hand held out and stormy expression on his face. Coming around the side of the cart, Sam was trying – and failing – not to grin. Not that this situation was remotely funny, of course.

"Certainly!" The cart owner's face never changed. Dean's eye started twitching. "If you sell all my wares and bring me back the coin, I will give you a rare treasure as a reward!"

"Of course you will," Dean muttered as Sam thanked the driver for his generosity. Nothing happened, and the older Winchester gestured with his hand impatiently. "Well?"

"Good luck!"

The two brothers just stared at the driver, who stared back. Sam glanced at Dean, then held out his own arms out, palms up. "Um… wares?"

Bolts of fabric blinked into existence in his arms, and Sam staggered slightly under the sudden weight of unexpected material. Dean's eye started twitching worse.

"I hate this place."

With that he turned on his heel and trudged back off the path, around the cart, and towards the city. Sam followed diligently, managed to disappear the 'wares' as suddenly as he'd summoned them.

-o-o-o-

"I would be happy to buy your wares."

They were in a shop about two blocks in from the city gate. Sam had followed Dean down a main, cobblestoned street lined with colorful tents, people milling about and sellers hawking their goods. None of the people had had exclamation marks over their heads, which Sam quickly confirmed meant they couldn't be engaged with. Not that Dean had given him much chance to find out. The younger Winchester had paused only once to see what this festival was about before being grabbed, forcefully, by the shirt-sleeve (robe sleeve, Dean had corrected with snark) and pulled along to the nearest place they were likely to ditch the bolts of fabric and end this.

Which, of course, had been marked by a wooden sign with a sewing needle and thread carved in relief. Because of course it had.

"Great, good, do that and let's go."

Sam resisted comment – and there were oh so many he could pick from, but all would get him in more trouble than it was worth – and held out his arms. The wares that appeared with a single thought. He could admit, disturbing as that was, it was also kind of cool.

Dean was pulling him out of the store the minute the sound of clinking coins coming out of nowhere signaled they'd been paid. He only had to pull his brother past the stalls two more times on their way out.

-o-o-o-

They made it back to the cart owner, who thanked them with the same amount of fanfare as before – an annoying amount – and gave them… a key. An old, rusty key.

Some freaking treasure.

"Well that was totally worth it," Dean grouched with no lack of sarcasm, dripping and venomous. Sam steered clear. "Now what, nerd genius?"

The taller man rolled his eyes, knowing his brother's irritation was born from frustration and feeling less than competent in this environment. Heaven forbid the younger Winchester be more capable at something than his big brother. Dean had a lot of triggers, but that particular one was damn near numero uno on Sam's list.

(Which Sam knew wasn't completely fair. Dean was fine with him excelling at plenty of things: research, books, spells, general knowledge, magic, anything that required study, and so on. Pretty much anything that didn't involve action. Unfortunately for the older Winchester, that was all there was to do in this world – boring as said action might be for the most part – and Dean didn't like failing at action. Action was supposed to be his one skill.)

((Which was also not fair. Sam knew Dean had plenty of skills beyond his abilities in a fight. It was Dean that didn't seem to know that.))

"We clearly have to find the door it goes to."

Dean stared incredulously at him. Then glanced at the walls of the town. Then Sam again. He gestured to the place with a wide, agitated arm. "In a freakin' city?"

Sam rolled his eyes again, grabbing the key from his brother and making his way back to where they'd just come from. "It's a town, Dean, not a city. There can't be more than twenty buildings to search."

"And it's such a good thing that every building only has one door," the older Winchester replied grumpily, knowing that was definitely not how their luck was going. "Not like emergency exits are a priority in a friggin game."

Sam didn't deign to comment, and instead re-entered the city. Lucky for his brother, he had a more interesting task at hand than the stalls this time, and no pulling-along was required.

-o-o-o-

Fifty-seven. Fifty-seven doors before they found the right one. Dean hated this place with the fiery, burning passions of hell. And he was going to unleash every one of those talents he'd learned in Hell itself upon the archangel when he got out of here.

The door swung open, the first to relent to the turn of the key in the lock, and the room was flooded with blinding, impossible light. It was so bright they couldn't see what was past the door, and Dean hated this place just that much more.

"After you, Legolas," Dean said just to be a punk because, even as he gave the door a grand sweeping gesture, he entered before his brother could. Dean knew the kind of games Gabriel played, and as much as he didn't want to take a Japanese game punch to the nuts, he sure as shit wasn't letting Sammy take it first.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: One game down! This world is not meant to reflect a real game, and is instead very loosely inspired by games like Skyrim and Zelda: Ocarina of Time.

This chapter got away from me when I wrote it. I went back and forth on how the world would look – I really wanted it to feel like being inside a video game, but knew that would be a very visually–heavy decision, which is not always easy to translate in writing. I almost didn't commit to it, because I knew it was going to be very description-heavy, and wonky description at that. Eventually I committed, though I'm still concerned I didn't successfully pull it off. I work in the VFX industry, so I drew off that – trying to describe how those graphics would look from a 3-dimensional perspective, but I'm not actually sure how well it will translate for everyone. You all let me know if that was a misstep.

References: The Truman Show is a 1998 film staring Jim Carrey as Truman, a man raised on a TV set, though he doesn't know it. Danger Will Robinson is a line from Lost in Space and has colloquially become a general warning of "shit's about to go down!" :P

Next Up: Time for Game Two! What could Gabriel have in store for the boys next? Do they make games for Herpes?

Cheers,

Silence

Chapter 122: Season 2: Chapter 88

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Okay, it's way later than I meant this post to be, and I have to get to bed, so author notes will be brief this time!

Chapter Warnings: More shenanigans! (See, so brief XD)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road so Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 88

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

When their vision finally cleared from the Magical Door of Blinding Light, Sam and Dean found themselves in an entirely new space. Gone were the bad graphics of the video game village, replaced by a long hallway of roughly hewn stone and wooden cross beams, all of which looked real enough. Torches provided the only light, dim and flickering as it was, hanging from the walls at twenty-foot intervals. While parts of the hallway were almost dark from lack of sufficient light, the stone directly beneath the flames was lit well enough to reveal chipped and faded paint. The walls had once been yellow and white, in a large checkerboard pattern.

"Oookay," Dean muttered, turning away from frankly regrettable interior design decisions. The door they had just come through no longer existed, replaced instead with more endless hallway, stretching into darkness for hundreds of feet behind them as well. Awesome.

Wherever they were, Dean instantly disliked it. And not just because Gabe had thrown them into it (but also, yes, absolutely because Gabe had thrown them into it). This was the kind of booby-trapped place someone like Indiana Jones wound up in. And as much as Dean was a fan of whip-wielding adventurers on the silver screen, their companions usually ended up dead by poisonous blow dart or covered in all manner of nightmarish bugs in these kinds of places.

Given that killing them off was something of a fucked-up hobby for the trickster, Dean was not optimistic about the new, horrifically creative demises a setting like this promised.

"So, uh…"

At Sam's voice, he turned back to his younger brother, standing beside him with an expression of dread that matched just how Dean felt. At least they were back in their normal clothes, the ones they'd been wearing in the diner before Gabriel had zapped them into discount Narnia costumes. Jeans, t-shirt, flannel. Sam's ears were back to normal too, as was his hair. Dean momentarily mourned the loss of good teasing material. Not that Sam really needed help in that department.

"Left? Or right?"

Dean matched Sam's gaze as it turned one way, then the other. The hallway stretched endlessly in both directions, with no differentiating detail that might suggest which way was better.

"Uh…." The older Winchester's brain was about as helpful as his mouth. He shrugged and pointed the way they'd come in from the door-that-no-longer-was. "That way?"

"Works for me," Sam agreed with a corresponding shrug. "Any clue where we are this time?"

"Why would I know?" Dean countered as they started walking down the dark path. "You're the video game boy."

He could feel Sam's eye roll more than see it. "You're the future boy."

Touché. Not that Dean had ever dealt with something like this. Though… there was some key information about the so-called Trickster he'd been keeping from his brother. The man from the future glanced warily at Sam, knowing if the kid caught the glance he'd immediately call it guilty.

"So… uh… about that. There's something I need to tell you," Dean hedged, bobbing his head side to side as he considered how likely it was Gabe was watching them. Too likely. They needed to find somewhere safe they could ward up. Then they could talk. "But I don't think I should say it here."

Sam sent him one hell of a suspicious side-eye, but there was, to Dean's surprise, more trust than anger there. He was used to his kid brother being more annoyed over future knowledge he wasn't privy to.

Or, more accurately, that Dean had kept from him.

Not that he'd done this one on purpose. Or, er, consciously. He didn't know Gabe was gonna show up after they left that college campus. Of course, he should have told Sam as soon as they were back in the car…

…Which he couldn't remember getting into, now. Or leaving the campus. Or anything before waking up in a friggin' motel room to goddamn Foreigner. Son of a bitch, Gabe had been on that campus and thrown them into a pocket dimension then and there. Son of a bitch.

Well, it really wasn't his fault then. Dean gave himself a rewarding, firm nod. Sam's eyebrows went up, having watched that novella play out across his brother's face without much of a guide to the translation.

"About the Trickster?" Sam hazarded, and Dean shot him a surprised look. It was a little ridiculous how often he forgot how smart his brother was. "Cas had a lot more trouble with him than I, uh, thought she would."

"Mm-hmm," Dean confirmed with a little nod. "Stronger than he should have been, yeah?"

"Yeah." Sam sent him another look, one that conveyed he understood they were likely being watched. "You think… maybe he wasn't a Trickster?"

"Maybe. There was, uh… there was one, once, that we- uh, I mean, I fought. While you were off at college." Smooth recovery, Dean. Very smooth. "Turned out he wasn't a Trickster at all."

Thank god for Sam's intelligence. He didn't bother asking what he had been. "Got any idea how to stop this one?"

"A few. Maybe." Dean was already cycling through their options. They'd have to get Gabe to show up in one of these worlds. He'd shown up plenty in TV land, though Dean and Sam hadn't seen him every time. It was possible he hadn't shown his face yet here, either. Or he had, and unlike Doctor Sexy with his completely unsuitable, dumb sneakers, he'd blended in better this time.

Dean had his money on that damn, overly-cheerful, fucking cart owner.

"Nothing we can do yet," he continued, glancing behind them as the hallway they'd so far traversed stretched endlessly. They hadn't found any intersections, turns, or anything so far. Just an endless hallway stretching in one, long-ass, straight line. They needed supplies – something to draw with for warding, holy oil if they could be lucky enough to land in a game with the Impala.

"Wait, games." Dean blinked as something clicked that had been hovering on the back burner, trying to sort itself out.

"What?" Sam stopped once he realized Dean had, at first glancing warily behind them, then in front. Nothing had changed in the hallway though. "What is it?"

"Games," Dean repeated. "The last place was a video game, yeah?"

"Yeah," Sam confirmed with no hesitation. That place, whatever it had been, had definitely been some sort of video game.

"Games have rules," Dean continued, emphasis on words that suggested he was definitely onto something and had left Sam behind. "Ga- he- uh, the Trickster said we were cheating, that calling Cas was against the rules."

"Okay…" The younger Winchester glanced around again, still not sure what his brother was getting at.

"We're in another game, not-" Not TV land. Where they were expected to play their roles. Maybe that's what they had done in the last game, but there was no role to play here, in an endless hallway. "This is a game, and games are all about rules. His lessons are always- I mean- son of-!"

Dean took a deep breath, frustrated and tongue-tied. He was glaring at Sammy like he needed the kid to read his mind before he let the cat out of the bag in the form of verbal word vomit.

"He's trying to teach us a lesson," Sam covered for him with a small nod. He gestured with his hand in a circular, soothing motion that definitely meant just breathe. Dean decided to listen rather than gripe about the fact he was breathing, damnit.

"Follow the rules," Dean confirmed with a nod, trying to work on that whole breathing thing. Given the fact he was finding it harder than usual, maybe Sam had had a point. Not that he'd ever, on pain of death, admit it. "He's telling us we're not cheating our way out of this."

"Out of what?"

Dean's fingers curled into fists as he stared ahead at the hallway. No other direction but forward. One way they could go. God, he fucking hated the archangel when he was pulling this self-righteous shit.

"Our destinies."

Sam frowned immediately, brow furling in a way that Dean itched to warn would get stuck. But he held back – they had enough shit to deal with without him adding to it. There'd be other times. Like once they got the hell out of here.

"You dying, me selling my soul. The whole shebang," the older Winchester added, voice dropping low as he could in case Gabe was listening. Not that he was revealing anything he hadn't already said loud and clear in that diner.

"A crossroads deal is cheating," Sam muttered, the confusion in his voice almost as thick as the annoyance. Dean just snorted.

"Yeah, well, he was never great with hypocrisy. It's kinda his thing." Just wait until his kid brother – honest, good, moral to a bleeding fault – found out just who this trickster actually was. "Come on, let's keep moving. Figure out what the fuck kind of stupid game this is."

And how to follow the stupid rules that would get them the hell out of it.

-o-o-o-

They came upon a ladder before they found a turn or intersection or any other option than straight. It was just… sitting there. A rickety, old, wooden thing. It was leaning against the wall, leading up to a section in the ceiling where one of the large stone blocks was missing. It was dark beyond that square hole, with no hint of what might be up there.

"Well…" Sam turned a raised brow and a one-shouldered shrug toward his brother. "It's the only thing we've found so far. So… up?"

"Ugh, I don't want to," Dean muttered but already had one hand on a rung and was climbing up the rickety, rotting thing before he'd finished grumbling about it. The ladder held, though it creaked ominously and some of the wood steps definitely bowed under his weight. He made it to the top without problem and stuck his head through the stone.

There was nothing but another friggin' hallway.

"It's the same," Dean called back down, frustration thick in his voice. He hauled himself through the opening, grabbing the edges of the hewed stone and pulling himself up until he was sitting on the lip. He looked back down at Sam, ten feet below. "Another fucking hallway."

Sam just shrugged. He hadn't known what to expect, and more of the same wasn't all that surprising. Certainly not the worst they could have found, though it was hardly encouraging, either. He pulled himself up the ladder as Dean swung his legs up and climbed to his feet. By the time Sam reached the top, Dean was standing over the hole, hand held out. The younger Winchester took it without hesitation and allowed his brother to help haul him through the space.

It was, indeed, the exact same above as it had been below. Enough so that Sam glanced more than once down the hole and ladder to make sure they weren't in some freak, Escher-like painting where they were somehow still in the same hallway. It wouldn't be the weirdest thing to happen to them today.

"It's like a maze," he muttered, more to himself than to his brother. Sam dug into his pocket with a sudden idea, pulling out the same, rusty old key they'd been given in the last world. It had still been in his hand when he crossed into this one, so he'd just shoved it into a pocket. It wasn't much of a weapon – unlike the bow and quiver or Dean's sword which had very much not come through with them – but it was probably iron, if nothing else. In their world, that was absolutely a weapon.

Not that they were exactly in their world.

Dean watched, pulling his head back with a confused frown, as Sam scraped the key against one of the blocks above the hole and ladder. He carved a large, crude X into the surface, then stood back to observe his work.

"I want to know where we've been," Sam offered as an explanation. "In case we cross it again."

The stormy look on Dean's face suggested he hadn't thought of that possibility, and really, really didn't like it. He gave a firm nod – the older Winchester equivalent of 'good thinking' – before glancing either way down the identical hallways. "Same way as before?"

"Sure." Sam's shrug verbalized the unspoken 'why not?' It's not like either of them had any real clue which way they should be heading.

So off they went.

-o-o-o-

"It's a hole," Dean announced helpfully when they ran into their next not-just-boring-hallway section. It was, indeed, a hole in the ground. A big one, stretching from wall to wall and about the same distance across. Maybe ten feet, give or take a few.

More like a gap in the floor, really. One big gap. Sitting right in their path, (obviously) purposefully placed (in Dean's opinion), with no clear way to get around it.

"What the fuck is this place?" Dean griped, running an annoyed hand through his hair. "What kind of game is this? Whatever kind, it sucks."

Sam didn't bother responding, though he didn't disagree. He was eyeing the distance they'd have to jump across before glancing back the way they'd come. He really didn't want to double back, fairly confident there wasn't any other way forward but this one. But they could go back for the ladder. Pull it up from the level below and use it as a make-shift bridge. If it held. But they'd been walking on this level for at least fifteen minutes. It wasn't a short trip back.

"Think we can make it?"

Dean snorted. He knew exactly what Sam was actually saying, which was, 'think you can make it?' Sam's stupid cricket legs could clear that. He'd seen the beanstalk jump similar before. Maybe not in this timeline, but it's not like Sam had grown – or shrunk – any in ten years. Dean could probably make it. Maybe.

He muttered something, not quite under his breath but not really wanting Sam to hear it either.

"What?" Sam leaned in.

"I said I need a running start!" Dean snapped, overcompensating by shouting it now. He huffed at his brother before Sam could even react, though he absolutely knew how the beanstalk would react. The older Winchester spun on his heel and marched away, big heavy stomps blocking out Sam's abysmal attempt to cover his snickers.

"I'll go first," Sam called after him, but Dean didn't acknowledge it. In a quieter voice filled with way too much smiling (Dean could hear it), he added, "In case I need to catch you."

The tips of Dean's ears turned red in anger (absolutely not from humiliation. Nope, not even remotely possible. Definitely anger) but he refused to respond, finally stopping when he'd gotten a couple dozen feet from the gap. Probably more than he actually needed for a running start, but damnit, there was a point to be made here.

(Not that Dean knew what that point was, exactly, but damnit, he was going to make it, regardless.)

Sam gave him a more serious, somewhat-somber nod – having moved a handful of feet from from the edge himself – then launched forward with three great heaping strides. He cleared the gap by a foot at least, momentum keeping him staggering forward a couple extra feet before he righted himself. He turned and walked cautiously back up to the edge, ready to give Dean as much of a hand as he could in case he shortchanged it.

The stupid giant offered a smile that was probably supposed to be encouraging but just looked patronizing. Or shaky. Dean picked the former. It was easier to be annoyed at.

"Okay," the older Winchester muttered under his breath, eyeing the gap and feeling pretty good about his chances of clearing it. He bounced on the balls of his feet a couple times, stance wide and shoes planted like a sprinter taking their mark. He blew out a breath between his teeth. "Easy as pie. You got this, Winchester."

Pep talk sufficiently pepped, Dean bounced on his feet one more time before he surged forward in as fast a sprint as he could manage. It helped that his body was years younger than he was used to, even after so much time here. While he was starting to forget the aches and loss of vitality that inevitably came with age, his mind hadn't quite forgotten that he wasn't actually in his prime. It liked to warn him he couldn't do things like jump ten-foot gaps in creepy dungeon hallways anymore.

His brain wasn't completely wrong. He almost made it. Landed one foot on solid ground, even. It wasn't his fault the ground didn't stay solid. The edge of the stone he'd managed to land the ball of his foot on (and nothing more), gave way with a little crumble that took the rest of his weight with him. Forward momentum meant he was still going the right direction even as his leg dropped out from under him, and Dean hit the stones hard, chin bouncing off the ground with a crack even as Sam scrambled for him. He dug his nails into the grooves and cracks available to stop the backwards slide that threatened to sweep him into the death pit below (or whatever it was).

Dean didn't slip too far into the hole, just to his hips, before his brother had a solid grip on his arm and torso, and he had bloody fingernails but a damn solid hold on the edge of the stone he'd landed on.

"Ow, damnit," he grumbled, kicking his feet uselessly against the wall of the pit, looking for purchase. It took a bit of effort and longer than either was comfortable with, but between the two of them, they managed to haul him up and out of the hole. Dean rolled flat onto his back, Sam collapsing onto his butt beside him, both panting. "That sucked."

"Yeah. Let's not do it ever again," Sam agreed, the slight tremor in his hand the only giveaway to the adrenaline coursing through him. He was eyeing the hole with less-than-veiled distaste, obviously imagining a different outcome than the one they had. Dean hit his calf with a floppy hand.

"Come on, help me up." He flopped the same hand back and forth in Sam's face. His kid brother huffed something like annoyance, but they both knew he was playing along. "We've got another exciting hallway to explore."

Sam climbed to his feet, dusting his hands off on his jeans before clasping Dean's hand and hauling him up with a grunt. They both stared at the stretch of hallway before them with equal aversion, stone and flickering flames that eventually disappeared into darkness. Just how long would they be at this? It had to have been over an hour already.

As Dean started forward with begrudging steps, Sam drew up short, still staring into that awaiting darkness. A darkness he swore just moved. Or maybe… got closer? The younger Winchester squinted, trying to see that far down the dimly lit corridor. But as he did, the darkness absolutely grew closer. One of the furthest flames he could still see had been snuffed out. And then another.

And another.

Sam took a hesitant step back, acutely aware of the pit they'd only just managed to cross. "Um… Dean?"

His brother turned partially, glancing over his shoulder only to frown at the growing fear on Sam's face. "What?"

"I think…" Sam shook his head, still staring at the darkness. Two more flames were gone, and now it was obvious that something... something big was coming their way. Something dark that glinted in the flames before they disappeared. "Um. Run."

"What?" Dean repeated, staring wide-eyed at Sam before whipping back around to whatever it was he saw. It took a moment, Dean squinting into the distance as well, before he saw what Sam had seen. "What?!"

As it grew closer, they could hear it. A shift of scales on stone. The unmistakable hiss of a tongue tasting air and scenting them. Black, iridescent skin glittered as it caught the flames that weren't being extinguished so much as blotted out by the huge, approaching snake.

"What?!" Dean screamed this time, immediately stumbling back only for Sam to catch him by the elbow and keep him from stumbling right over the edge of the pit.

"Jump!" Sam yelled, immediately spinning and gearing up to undo what they'd only just managed to do. Without the couple steps leap and ample time to prepare, he only barely cleared the jump this time, stumbling to one knee and managing a tuck and roll to avoid the same problem Dean had had of catching the edge.

Dean stared wide eyed between that gaping hole and the fast-approaching snake. His brain still hadn't gotten over the freaking Harry Potter Basilisk that was very much baring down on them. It was like a skipping record of what? over and over again.

What the hell was this game? And oh, how he was going to eviscerate Gabriel once they caught up to him.

Dean stumbled as many steps away from the edge as he dared – putting himself that much closer to the freakin' snake (and good god, he would never make fun of Indiana Jones ever, ever again) – and then he ran.

He knew he wasn't going to make it long before his feet left the ground. He could tell he didn't have the speed to clear it. Sam's face showed the same conclusion even as he scrambled on his knees to the edge, desperate to catch his brother. They managed an awkward as hell hand grab that had Dean slamming into the stone edge right at chest level, and he was certain he should have broken at least one rib from that impact. It hurt, sure, but he didn't feel the telltale crack or jarring pain of suddenly broken bone.

Sam desperately grabbed at his arm, but there was little he could do to haul Dean up as the older Winchester scrabbled for purchase with feet that found nothing but smooth stone.

"Son of a bitch," Dean growled out, trying and failing to pull himself up. He knew when Sam's head snapped up to stare well over his head, that getting him back up and into the hallway was the least of their problems. Son. Of. A. Bitch! "Let go, Sam."

His brother's gaze snapped back to him, and Dean would have primped and preened at the look of speechless shock there, had it been any other situation. "What?"

"Let go and run!" Dean hollered, trying to pull away from his brother. It didn't take much. Sam's shock made it pretty easy to pull right out of his grip. Dean had one moment to yell – and he was sure Sam would absolutely murder him for it later – "Fly, you fool!" before he slipped right over the edge and disappeared into the darkness.

"No!" Sam lurched forward, still reaching for his brother. "Dean!"

The hiss of a snake – a pissed off snake, by the sound of it – drew Sam's head back up to the approaching danger. He scrambled to his feet, eyeing the pit Dean had disappeared into, then the giant reptile only sixty, maybe fifty feet away and closing.

"Shit," the younger Winchester swore, realizing there was no way he could outrun that thing, even at his fastest. He stared at the hole that had swallowed Dean one more time before swearing, again, "Shit!"

Sam Winchester launched himself into the darkness, after his brother, and hoped whatever was down there was somehow more pleasant a death than being eaten – or run over – by a giant snake.

-o-o-o-

The pit, it turned out, was more of a chute. The walls narrowed quickly, and what should have been a rough landing turned into more of a sloping slide. Sam was pretty sure physics weren't supposed to work that way, but given they'd been chased down said chute by a giant snake that certainly didn't exist in any world with physics Sam was familiar with, it didn't really matter much, did it?

The chute went from vertical to horizontal over the length of maybe two hundred feet, all in complete darkness, before a square of dim, flickering light visibly marked the end. Sam came tumbling out of an opening about twice as wide as his shoulders, which deposited him back into a less-than-surprisingly familiar hallway.

Dean managed to roll out of Sam's landing pad at the last second, having been sprawled across the stone floor, panting from what certainly felt like a near death experience. He climbed to his feet with a groan and a grunt as the younger Winchester went head over feet a couple times before coming to a rest in a very similar sprawl.

"Ow," Sam commented, mostly deadpanned as he stared up at the ceiling without bothering to get up. Aches and scrapes were quickly registering now that he wasn't tumbling to a possibly gruesome death. Dean offered him a hand, his other braced on his hip in a pose that radiated exhaustion. With a sigh and a grunt, Sam grabbed his brother's hand and allowed Dean to haul him up.

"Well. We're not dead," the younger Winchester offered less than enthusiastically. He walked the two feet back to the wall they'd emerged from, sticking his head into the opening of the chute. There was nothing to see, just the gentle slope disappearing up into darkness.

"Or eaten," Dean added with a similar level of grump and disdain. "Yay, us."

Sam pulled away from the hole and straightened, taking in the endless hallway that looked – surprise, surprise – exactly like all the others they'd been through already. The hunter didn't try to hide his growing agitation. "Giant snakes? Holes in the floor. What is this game supposed to be?"

Dean just threw his hands out in a clear, physical expression of 'fuck if I know.' Whatever it was, he hated it. Hated it. With every fiber of his being. When he got the fuck out of here, he was killing Gabe. Timeline be damned. Archangel be damned.

Sam sighed, rubbing at the back of his head like he might have a lump back there. Dean hoped not. Even twitched a little with the urge to fuss. But Sam was a big boy, and he wasn't displaying any signs of a head injury, so the older Winchester did his best to shove all those big brother instincts down.

"So… left or right?"

Dean snorted at Sam's question, his voice filled with resignation.

'Neither,' is what Dean wanted to say. 'Fuck this place, and this game.'

But that wasn't actually an option at the moment, so instead he just growled and wordlessly picked left, taking off in that direction with clear irritation.

The sound of Sam's jogging footsteps preceded his brother joining his side. "Did you seriously quote Lord of the Rings before falling to your death?"

Dean's non-verbal grunt was confirmation enough. It had seemed fitting, at the time. Maybe even more so, now, considering how permanent that 'death' had been. "Did you seriously jump after me, Romeo?"

"God," Sam chortled, ignoring his brother's comeback (which was hard to resist. After all, Dean's choice of names made him Juliet, and that was not easy for Samantha to pass up*)*. Instead, he focused on his revenge, twenty-four years in the making. "You're such a nerd."

The scandalized expression that hit his brother's face with the force of a bag of bricks was worth every year he'd had to endure the same taunt.

-o-o-o-

"Take it back," Dean demanded, arms crossed, head tilted back as he watched Sam ascend the ladder first this time.

"Not a chance, Nerd."

If he thought the rungs had bowed under his weight, watching them dip under the beanstalk's was downright disconcerting. Not that they knew if this was the same ladder, of course, but Dean had a bad feeling.

"You take it back or I swear to God-"

Sam made a noise of disgruntled disappointment as he pulled himself through the square hole in the ceiling, legs disappearing. Dean already knew what he'd found before he said it.

"It's the same," he confirmed, standing next to the large X he'd marked into the stone wall the last time they'd climbed a ladder. "My mark's up here. We got sent back to the start."

"The start of what?" Dean practically snarled as he started up the ladder, not bothering with Sam's offered arm and pulling himself up through the cutout himself. Sam's mark was, indeed, there and Dean wanted to spit at it.

So they'd fallen down a hole that somehow took them from a second story hallway to a first story hallway, at least a half mile apart. What. The. Hell.

"Chutes and Ladders," Sam suddenly said, straightening up.

Dean eyed him from the side. "What?"

"The kid's board game, Chutes and Ladders. Remember? We played it once, at Pastor Jim's." Sam was looking up and down the hallway like it suddenly, somehow made sense. Like any of this could ever make sense.

"Uh…" Yeah, no. Dean didn't remember playing some stupid board game thirty- twenty- forty- fuck it, decades ago.

Sam pulled the key out of his pocket and crouched down, drawing out a large rectangle which he then divided into sections. Like a tall building with ten floors. "Okay, so it's a board game where you start here-" he made a little X in the bottom right corner- "and you have to move along each floor until you come to a ladder-" he drew a crude approximation of a ladder leading up to the next floor- "where you get to move up, or a chute-" this time he drew what looked vaguely like a tunnel, leading from the second story back to the first- "where you fall down."

He drew a rough star in the top right corner of the rectangle. Then the beanstalk stood from his crouch, key still gripped in his hand as he looked back down at the game. "First person to make it to the top wins."

Dean stared at the drawing, caught between something akin to pride (his brother really was damn smart, and it was somehow better to know what they were facing) and disdain. "That's stupid. This is stupid."

"It's a kids' game," Sam admonished, like that somehow made any of it better.

"And the giant snake?" Dean challenged right back, hands on his hips and glaring at his brother. Daring him to explain away that one.

Sam shrugged, a sort of sheepish, regretful look taking over his face. "There's another version, called Snakes and Ladders. Where the snakes replace the chutes, and you slide down them instead."

Dean just stared. And stared.

"That's even stupider."

Sam didn't bother telling his brother 'stupider' wasn't a word. Not really the battle he wanted to wage at this juncture. Instead he just shrugged again. The fact that a magical being of immense power had trapped them in a game seemed to override the importance of getting the details of said game right. At least in Sam's opinion.

"The trickster probably just combined them."

Like a dick. One who thought he was funny. Yup, that sounded like Gabe, Dean thought, still irritated beyond what could be put into words or grunts and growls.

"The real question is how long it'll take to get to the top," Sam said with a sigh that was both resigned and annoyed. There were things to consider here. Things the younger Winchester didn't really want to consider. When would they sleep? Eat, or drink, for that matter (and not just when for those things, but also what). Between this game and the last, they'd probably been at this so-called lesson for at least twenty hours. Oddly enough, Sam wasn't hungry yet. He hadn't had to take care of any bodily needs, either.

Perhaps it was the Trickster – or whatever he was – taking care of their, er, needs for them? As disturbing a thought as that was, at least it was convenient (unlike anything else in this situation). Or maybe time, in the traditional sense of biological function – stopped in these illusions? Sam wondered if they were actually unconscious in the Impala, sitting outside that college campus and all of this was just in their heads.

Who knew how an unknown-entity's unknown magic actually worked.

"And how many times we get booted back to the bottom." Dean's comment, added through clenched teeth, brought Sam's mind back to the present.

He eyed his brother from the side. What they needed was more information, and Dean had it. But he didn't feel safe sharing it, not here, which meant the Trickster was probably watching them. Sam wasn't sure how they were going to get around that. But until they figured it out, he had to get Dean to step back from that edge he was clearly toeing.

Dean had never done well stuck in situations out of his control. Luckily, Sam knew exactly how to diffuse that particular bomb.

"Well…" He shifted that side eye to be even less direct, then watched in amusement as Dean tensed, eyes narrowing in immediate distrust. "Your death count in that last game was what? Nineteen?"

It turned out, Dean could express at least some of his irritation fairly well in growl form. Of course, Sam was immune to such methods of communication, so it got Dean nowhere. The taller hunter just grinned sunnily. The growl went from expressing irritation to promising fratricide.

"Want to beat that record, Nerd?"

-o-o-o-

Lucky – or perhaps unluckily – for Sam, Dean didn't manage to murder him before the snake did it for them both. And boy, was that an unpleasant experience. Dean almost thought he'd take the troll and spiders back. Almost.

Best as they could tell, there was only one snake, and it roamed the corridors one at a time, level by level. They managed to get past the first chute – Sam scraping another X into the stone to mark where they'd been – and two additional ladders before they found the beast again. This time, they were not lucky enough to have a chute to drop into or ladder to climb. Dean woke up after the very, very visceral experience of having one's body flattened – and he meant flattened (bones crumbling, organs bursting, muscle and blood trying to push straight through skin for lack of anywhere else to go) – beneath a two-ton snake, only to find a hastily drawn X carved into the stone wall next to him and a ladder coming up from the floor below.

God Friggin' Damnit.

Sam materialized a moment later to his brother throwing a truly spectacular temper tantrum. The rage screaming and stomping wouldn't change anything, but it wasted some of that pent up energy, at least. Once his toddler of an older brother had blown the last of his steam, Sam climbed to his feet and pulled Dean off the wall he'd all but collapsed against.

"Feel better?"

"Not one damn bit," Dean snapped back, but sighed and allowed the tension still in his shoulders to loosen and slump. "We've gotta come up with a plan."

Sam raised an eyebrow. "For getting to the top?"

"For getting out." Dean gestured around them, but Sam knew he didn't mean this particular hallway or game. Out of wherever the Trickster had sent them.

"We can't plan if we can't talk freely," Sam muttered quietly, keeping his voice pitched as low as he could.

His brother straightened up suddenly, eyes holding a new determination. It was a look Sam hadn't seen since anger primarily took over every aspect of the older Winchester, two games and a hundred Sundays ago. "Yeah. Yeah, you know what, you're right."

Sam almost asked him to repeat that, but he was more interested in whatever Dean had just thought of than ragging on him. "Right about… what exactly?"

"Talking in private. Gimme that thing." Dean made an open-palmed grabby hand towards the younger hunter. Sam didn't actually know what that 'thing' was, but considering all he had on him was the antique key from the last world, he handed it over without a clue as to what his brother was on about. In the meantime, Dean started grumbling and mumbling to himself about being stupid and not thinking of this sooner.

Sam didn't know what this could be, so he refrained from responding with several of his own choice comments.

The man from the future turned to one of the walls and started drawing on the stone to the left of Sam's X. The younger Winchester watched on, first in confusion, then realization, morphing finally into avid attention. Dean was drawing wards. He put up no less than eight of them, in as much of a circle around them as he could. He got Sam to give him a boost up – a knee, actually – so he could scrape two of 'em into the ceiling.

Sam didn't recognize most of the symbols, but he could proudly identify those written in Enochian. The younger Winchester hadn't had much time to dig into the angelic language outside of working with Cas and Bobby to create a dictionary of sorts, so his understanding was limited. Wards had been high up on the learning to-do list, but Castiel insisted a basic understanding of the language was important; it would only make them more competent at specialized wards in the future.

She'd cast a look Dean's way that everyone in the room had been able to read. Clearly, his Castiel hadn't taken the time to form that foundational base. The man from the future had just glared and muttered that a friggin' apocalypse didn't exactly come with educational downtime, sue him.

When it came to Enochian sigils, Sam only had the angel-banishing one under his belt so far, so he didn't recognize most of what Dean was drawing. But from the individual words buried within the warding that he could read (thanks to, he was sure Castiel would say if she were here, a good foundation), it was for protection, privacy, and silence.

Dean was building them a space they could talk in.

Sam, realizing that such a place would only be better reinforced if Dean could ward all six sides rather than just four, went over to the hole where the ladder came up from the floor below. It took some effort, some grunts and heaves, but he managed to pull it up through the gap in the stone floor and let it clatter to the ground. Dean paused in his drawing efforts to stare at Sam in confusion.

"For the sides," was all Sam offered as he used one foot braced on a rung and a couple good pulls to splinter the ladder. He handed Dean one half – a long wooden pole with half the rungs still attached, and went about laying his half across the width of the hallway.

Dean grinned when he got it.

"And here I thought they called you the smart one for no reason."

Sam rolled his eyes but didn't deign that worthy of a return insult. Dean was already starting to carve symbols into the wood – albeit smaller than those on the stone. But size didn't matter when it came to wards: only accuracy and completion.

Once the older Winchester had finished carving, they switched places. Sam laid the finished beam along the width of the hallway, as centered as possible, allowing them to 'close in' their warding bubble on either side. Dean started carving into the other piece of wood, already in position on the other side of the hallway.

When finished, the man from the future climbed to his feet, handed the rusty old key (the end of which was significantly duller now), and dusted his hands off. Sam had half expected the wards to do something – glow, flash, something – when completed, but he supposed whatever his brother had been drawing didn't have a form of activation.

"Are we…" Sam looked around, then turned to Dean. "Can we talk?"

"We should be able to," Dean hedged, giving the back of his neck an awkward rub. "I'm, uh- I was never the best with wards, but we should be good. Even if Gabe is watching."

Sam's brow furled immediately. "Gabe?"

-o-o-o

The archangel leaned back into his lazy boy with a huff of irritation and nothing short of a pout. "Well, that's just not fair."

Gabriel was glaring petulantly down at the board game spread out between him and Castiel. He'd turned her chair to face the low-lying coffee table, on which Chutes and Ladders (or, well, his version) was set up. Two of the pieces – the blue and green ones – were huddled together on one square, so very close to the bottom of the board. They were also surrounded by a glowing bubble of translucent blue power.

"It's not even necessary!" Gabe argued, using both hands to gesture at the pieces like his companion might agree with the outrage. "It's not like plastic tokens can talk."

Castiel just glared, wrists and chest still strapped to the chair, duct tape firmly in place over those mouthy lips.

"Oh please," the archangel 'pfft'ed, waving away the expression on his sibling's face. "You're just grumpy they're not winning."

The little angel that could was in the lead, actually. The white token was very nearly to the last level on the board, with a scant twelve more spaces to go. Not that Cassie had been allowed to move her own piece, tied up as she was. Gabe had been playing on her behalf as needed, good brother that he was.

Castiel just continued to glare in obligatory silence.

The archangel sighed loudly, poking at the bubble of power. Maybe he should make some more friends. This game night was mediocre at best.

-o-o-o-

"Gabriel."

Dean winced at the tone. And the emphasis embedded in the tone. And the bitchiness embedded in the emphasis. "Yeah."

"The archangel."

The man from the future went for a grimace this time rather than a wince. Just to mix it up. "Yeah."

"And that… that didn't seem worth mentioning?!" Samantha was practically yelling, but Dean knew that tone. It was the 'my brother is an idiot; why, why me?' lecturing tone Sam always got when Dean had fucked up to some degree. It wasn't anger so much as… disbelief. Maybe a little outrage.

"I told you we didn't want anything to do with him!"

"That's not even remotely the same thing, Dean!" Sam threw his arms out to the side and Dean winced again.

"Look, I didn't think we'd be dealing with him, okay?" The older Winchester shrugged defensively, having run out of anything that might serve as a better excuse. "I thought we'd have time-"

"You always think we'll have time," Sam snapped back immediately, but he dropped his arms and with it the tension in his shoulders. He kinda sagged, and somehow that made Dean feel worse than anything yet. "We both think that. But we never have time. So you have to start telling me things as they come up, man. There's never time after, and it keeps biting us in the ass."

"Or running us over," Dean muttered under his breath, the memory of their recent death-by-snake still fresh in his mind.

"As they come up," Sam repeated firmly, insistence in every word. He gave Dean an eyebrow not quite a bitchface but building up to one – daring his brother to refuse. The older Winchester sighed.

"As they come up," he agreed, telling himself he'd figure out how to do that next time. As it turned out, forthrightness wasn't really his thing. Not without some conscious thought, at least.

Sam nodded in acceptance and uncrossed his arms. "Good. Now… how do we get out of an archangel's trap?"

Dean blinked at his brother's specific phrasing, spine straightening with a memory. He grinned at his brother, who seemed wary, at best, of his sudden change in mood. "We make a trap of our own."

The sasquatch raised an eyebrow, glancing around at their meager – very meager – supplies and surroundings. "We can do that? Here?"

"Uh…" Dean grimaced again, realizing that, at least for a moment, they were going to have to keep playing the game. "Not exactly. I mean, an archangel's still an angel, so all we need is-"

"Holy oil." Sam finished the thought, even as that second eyebrow joined the first. "Uh, Dean… I don't think an archangel is just going to give us a game with holy oil in it."

Not knowing what it could do to an angel, at least, Sam thought. He could still remember the heat from the flames they'd encased Castiel in that first night. And what Dean said it could do to the angel if she-he- they crossed it.

"No, but if he sticks the Impala into one of these stupid things, we're golden." When the younger Winchester turned a surprised expression his way, the man from the future shrugged. There'd been a container in Baby's trunk for three months now, tucked safely in the back of her trick compartment. "I don't like being without it in End Times."

Fair enough.

"So… is Gabriel likely to throw the Impala into one of these… erm… games?"

Dean shrugged again, this time both frustrated and clueless. "He did last time. Granted, it was TV Land, not Game Land but… I mean, he's kind of predictable, really."

Sam stared at his brother for a good thirty seconds, then glanced around the live action game of Chutes, Ladders, and giant Snakes they were stuck in. This was predictable?

"Okay…" the younger Winchester drew in a breath, pushing all the crazy that was their lives to the side for now. They needed to deal with the problem in front of them. "So, we just need a racing game, or something."

The suggestion sounded even kind of hopeful. Racing games were pretty common, or so he thought. That didn't sound like a completely impossible probability, at least.

"Ooh, or Grand Theft Auto!" Dean practically crowed with excitement. "Now that's my kind of game!"

Sam didn't bother raining on his brother's happy parade by reminding him neither Trickster nor Archangel was likely to give him anything he wanted. But he kept quiet because in order to get out of here, they were going to need a certain amount of pure luck, and Sam didn't want to jinx that in any way.

"Alright," the younger hunter gave an encouraging nod. They had a plan. A weak plan that relied entirely on their enemy to slip up without realizing it, but at least it was a plan. Now all they had to do was survive the Archangel's tricks and games until they found one with the Impala.

Hopefully.

And if Dean's enthusiastic grin seemed a little too optimistic… well, Sam kept that to himself.

-o-o-o-

"Finally!"

Gabriel leaned forward as the little bubble of magic popped and disappeared. "Friggin' chatty Cathies over here, am I right?"

Castiel's only response was her ever-unchanging glare. Gabriel sighed.

"Alright. I'll tell you what." The archangel snatched up the dice from the board, holding them out to the angel that couldn't take them. "Twelve spaces till you cross the finish line and win. Manage that with no more fuss, and I'll let you see the boys."

The amount his kid sister perked up at that, glare immediately replaced with the wide, innocent eyes of expectation, was almost gag worthy. Whatever those two mooks had done to get their weak little human nails dug so deep into his sibling, Gabriel didn't know. But he was going to have to undo it before it got her killed.

Piercing blue eyes (that were eerily reminiscent of the blues so commonly threaded throughout Castiel's grace) dropped down to the pair of dice sitting in Gabe's hand, then back up to him.

"Oh, right. Let me just roll those for you."

He gave them a toss, and the game resumed.

-o-o-o-

They got better at it. Whether that was experience, determination, or the optimism of having a plan (one that Dean was on board with, so he stopped whining (quite as much)), Sam couldn't say. But they were certainly making progress.

The younger Winchester began keeping a mental count every time they ran into the snake, trying to track how long it took for the beast to make a full loop and cross paths with them again. By his best estimate, they had about fifteen minutes between encounters. Dean kept track of their exits: the many chutes in the ground, and the almost-twice-as-many ladders scattered about. When Sam's counter got low, they stopped trying to make any progress forward, instead nervously hanging out by the nearest escape, ducking down a level until the thing passed, then scrambling back up before the stupid beast made it through the level below.

Without the giant death snake as an impassable obstacle, they started gaining real ground.

It rankled Dean to no end that playing along was pretty much the key to making any sort of progress at all, but that was Gabe's whole point, wasn't it? It had ended up being the archangel's downfall the last time he'd played this stupid game with them. It was going to be his downfall this time, too. Dean just had to be… patient.

His favorite.

"How many stupid levels can this stupid game stupidly have?" Dean practically screamed as they made it up a ladder to their eighth- no, ninth- identical hallway. Okay, so the whole being patient thing was only taking him so far, really. He still thought he was doing great, considering.

"Well-"

"Shaddup, it was rhetorical," came the immediate growl, cutting Sam off before he could start reasoning out an answer that would only piss Dean off more anyhow.

Sam opened his mouth to retort when the now-familiar slide of scales on stone had both men freezing in equal parts fear and surprise. The two moved instantly. Dean, who hadn't even gotten his legs out of the hole yet, just flat out dropped back down. He took the fall with a roll to avoid breaking any bones, but damn if his legs didn't protest the harsh landing regardless. Sam managed to half-scramble, half-slide down the ladder, losing his footing three rungs from the bottom and landing hard on his ass.

"Ow," he groaned, rubbing at his posterior which was currently reminding him just how little padding he had back there.

"What the hell," Dean said, staggering back to his feet. "What happened to your count!"

Which sounded like an accusation, but Sam ignored that part as his brother extended a hand and hauled him back up. Dean always sounded accusatory when he was angry. Or surprised. Or tired. Or… well, let's just say Sam was used to it by now.

"I don't know," he answered honestly, leaning into the space beneath the ladder hole, watching black snakeskin pass above in almost darkness. The iridescent shimmer and noise they made as the creature moved were the only giveaways of the near-silent, stealth killer. Finally, a tail passed overhead and the soft glow from flickering torches returned. Sam started climbing up, lest the snake appear on this level next. "Either his pattern changed-" unlikely considering how long they'd been playing and yet to see such a thing- "or this is the top level."

"Wait, what?" Dean shouted from below, voice a weird mix of eagerness and outrage, as if Sam had been holding back that information (and really, even if that was true (which it wasn't) Dean would be one to talk).

Sam cleared the hole as Dean started up the ladder, his pace faster than it had been in hours. "Well, the snake has to start somewhere, right? It starts at the top and makes its way to the very bottom level. Then… restarts."

Which would do more than just throw off his count (after all, who knew if the snake appeared on the top level right away, if it took time to travel from bottom to top, or where it might spawn along the level. All data Sam lacked. Magical Trickster-slash-Archangel worlds weren't exactly among the math examples taught in school). But at least if he was right and this was the top level, they had time before they ran into it again.

"Cas!"

Sam spun at his brother's exhilarated cry. Dean had made it most of the way up the ladder, hands already on the stone floor and arms bent in preparation to pull himself through the floor, but his head was turned to the left (where the finish line might be, if Sam's theory was correct).

The younger Winchester followed Dean's gaze, eyes widening in surprise. A hundred feet away, barely visible in the dim lighting, was the end of the hallway. A solid stone wall that created a dead end – a thing they'd yet to encounter on any other level – and sitting in front of it was Castiel.

"Cas!" Dean yelled again, scrambling and clawing his way out of the hole only to take off running. Sam started after him almost as eagerly, though a part of his brain was firing in overdrive, worried this was a trap. The angel was sitting in a chair and, from the stiff and awkward way she held herself, might be tied up.

"Dean-"

But the older Winchester was pulling ahead, running without reserve, and Sam had little choice but to follow. As they got closer it became obvious that Cas was, indeed, tied to a dining room chair: wrists, chest, and ankles all bound with rings of duct tape. Her mouth was covered in a single piece of it, which explained her silence as they approached.

She tossed her head animatedly as Dean rounded the chair, sliding to an eye-level squat in front of her. He immediately reached out, one hand cupping the back of her head, fingers sliding through that stupidly perfect hair, the other going for the tape across her mouth.

Those blue eyes were all but glowing with ferocity, and it made Dean's chest do loopty-loops he was totally on board for. After all, if Cas still had fight left in those beauties, he – she – was alright, and that was worth all the loopty-loops.

"Cas! Thank fuck," he half-growled, half-prayed, and the angel tilted her head with a chastising look that had him almost gasping with laughter. He was pretty sure that was her 'Dean, it's too early for blasphemy' expression. His fingers slipped on the edge of the tape, again and again, unable to find purchase, and the hunter realized it wasn't normal tape.

'It's grace, Dean. It is intent.'

Right, right. Bullshit, is what it was. Same as it had been in heaven. With a growl, Dean dropped his hands to settle atop hers (for lack of anywhere else to put them, of course) and started clawing at the tape there that had no grip, either. Like it was a part of her skin, rather than stuck on top of it. With a growl, he focused on the important thing: "You're okay."

Well, as okay as an angel could be taped to a chair in some fucked up game with a giant snake out to kill them.

Castiel tried to say something – it sounded like a warning – just as Sam caught up, coming to a stop a few feet away. Something about this didn't feel right, even if the younger hunter couldn't put his foot on it.

"Dean… maybe we should-"

His words were interrupted by a glow that started at the feet of both hunter and angel, then started to build. Sam took a step back in surprise, gaze dropping to the stone below his brother and Castiel. Unlike the rest of the hallway, which was a repeated pattern of roughly hewn square stones, the ground beneath the two of them was one, long rectangle that stretched from one end of the hallway to the other. Its top was smoother than the surrounding stone, as though it had been polished.

And carved into that flat surface was the word 'Finish'.

Dean stared down, slightly dumbfounded, as the glow – the same damn bright light that had signified the end of the last game too – grew too bright to continue staring at. He didn't even have a chance to look back up, to meet Cas's eyes, before the light took over the end of the hallway entirely, engulfing them both.

"Son of a-!"

When the light faded, Castiel was still tied to the chair, glare full of righteous fury and utter dismay as she stared at the empty space in front of her. Dean was gone, leaving just the angel and the younger Winchester alone in the empty, dimly lit hallway.

Sam sighed. He should have finished his warning after all.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: Ain't I a stinker?

Up Next: Even MOOOORE shenanigans! But for real, next chapter is the essence of Changing Channels and possibly the most fun I've ever had writing a chapter. I can't wait to share it with you all.

Chapter 123: Season 2: Chapter 89

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Welcome to the main event!

Chapter References: Before being thrown into Gabriel's pocket dimensions of hell, the boys were at Bobby's. While waiting to head out, Dean hollered to Sam that he was taking so long because he was packing like a girl, which Castiel then had to ask about, not understanidng the differences between the genders and their packing habits. See Chapter 115.

Chapter Warnings: We've got some rapid fire gaming to do, but first! Sam gets to have a conversation with Castiel (well… a one-sided one, at least), becasue he's patient, unlike his brother.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 89

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Sam approached the bound angel a lot more cautiously than his brother had, careful not to cross the line onto that final stone where Castiel sat. She watched him, head turned practically ninety degrees, blue eyes full of warning and frustration.

"Are you okay?" he asked, crouching down just as Dean had so he was at the angel's eye level, but keeping a good foot back so he wouldn't trigger the end of the game.

She nodded slowly, eyes neither blinking nor moving away from his own. She tried to speak again, the words still muffled by the tape that Sam didn't dare reach out for. It sounded different than what she had tried to say to Dean, but it was still a warning. Sam could hazard a guess.

"We know," he said softly, nodding at her doubtful expression. "About the Trickster. We know."

When both eyebrows rose in surprise, Sam sighed.

"Dean's known the whole time."

Those same brows dove sharply in the opposite direction, and the younger Winchester found himself nodding again.

"I know. I know. He's bad at this. We're… working on it." Sam sighed again, mentally shelving his own frustration with his brother's inability to communicate in anything even remotely resembling a timely manner. Instead, he focused on Castiel. "Are you really okay?"

Her nod was firmer this time, eyes softer (yet no less fierce, a talent Cas seemed particularly skilled at). Sam was still learning how to read the far more stoic angel, but he was fairly certain she was trying to tell him to worry about himself. And his brother, of course.

"I'll watch out for him," Sam said firmly, just as firm as her own, non-verbal response had been. He rose to his feet. "Stay safe, Cas. We're coming for you, okay?"

With that promise, Sam crossed the finish line, placing his hand on the angel's shoulder as he came to stand in front of her. Those blue eyes looked conflicted – no doubt a protest about them prioritizing her when they should be escaping themselves – but they were quickly overtaken by the blinding light of the next transition.

-o-o-o-

"Oh, don't look at me like that," Gabe said the minute Castiel rematerialized in his living room. He hadn't even lowered his hand from snapping her back into existence. Sheesh. "I told you you'd get to see them. I didn't promise anything more."

Her glare spoke whole lectures, all at once. It was pretty impressive, actually. Gabe snickered.

"Dean's face was pretty good, wasn't it? You think he'll ever learn to look before he leaps?" The archangel threw himself into the Lazy Boy once more, rocking back and forth with the obnoxious squeak of old springs. "And Sam! Clearly the brains of the operation. We knew that, of course, but sometimes it's just nice to be right."

Castiel's glare continued. In fact, that lecture was quickly deteriorating into a scolding. Gabe might even get it up to a full rant, with a couple more well-placed pokes and prods.

Grinning, the trickster dug the TV remote out from under his butt and flipped the device on. He gave a sharp whistle and Jack, curled up next to the TV stand in his little donut bed, popped up. He swiped the game controller off the edge of the coffee table and trotted over with it, short tail wagging.

"Who's a good boy?" Gabriel cooed as he took the controller from him, exchanging it for chin scritches. "You are. Aren't you?"

With a chirpy little bark, Jack returned to his bed, circling several times before settling back into a curl. Gabe pressed a couple buttons, then settled in to watch the loading screen pop into existence.

Time for the next game!

-o-o-o-

It was dark. Sam blinked at the pitch black that confronted him. He tried to turn, to look around, but found that he couldn't. He was able to turn his head, lean side to side, but he couldn't turn his body. Or seemingly move forward or backwards at all.

The wave of panic wasn't unexpected. Sam tried to keep his thoughts on top of it, rather than get pulled down into the fear of not being able to move. This was just part of whatever trick the Trickster – archangel – was playing now. He was fine. Once he figured out what he was supposed to do, he'd be able to move again.

With that line of reasoning helping keep the panic at bay as much as possible (which wasn't to say all that much at all, just enough to keep thinking through it), Sam started testing what he could move. Neck, fingers, arms all fine, although only so much as up and down. He couldn't cross his arms in front of him or reach behind at all. Just up and down in line with his sides. A pattern was forming, as far as Sam could tell. He could only move side to side, along a line.

"What the friggin' hell is this supposed to be?!"

The scream – pure annoyed outrage Sam was way far too familiar with – caught the younger Winchester by surprise. It was coming from some distance away, but most definitely in front of him. Sam squinted, trying to locate his brother in the darkness. There was a far-off light source, but it was too distant to identify as anything other than a rectangle of light. There was nothing else but the black.

"Dean?"

There was a moment of silence.

"Sam!"

Sam let out a breath he didn't realize he'd been holding. "Yeah. You okay?"

"Oh, I am so far from okay-"

"I can't move," Sam interrupted what was mounting into a surefire rant. "Can you?"

"No!"

Ignoring the anger behind that barked response – like it was somehow Sam's fault – the younger hunter tried again. "Can you move side to side?"

Another stretch of silence followed. Sam could almost make out whatever curses his brother was grumbling, loudly. But not loudly enough. He was at least fifty feet away, Sam estimated.

"Yes. What the fuck game is this, Sam?"

Before Sam could answer (that not only did he not know, but why did Dean think he had all the answers to these places?), there was a loud, low, electronic beep. It droned out once, twice, then a third time.

"What the-" Sam tried to look around for the source of the sound.

A ball of white, like a perfectly round balloon filled with light, flew out of the darkness, straight at him. With a yelp, Sam threw himself to the side and out of the line of the projectile, whatever it was.

A second beep blared out from the darkness, and a giant, red '1' – like one of the numbers on the face of a digital clock – appeared in the sky to Sam's left.

"What just happened!" Dean yelled from the other side of the darkness.

Sam climbed back to his feet, rubbing at his elbow which had taken the brunt of his fall. The gears in his head started clicking, in tune with the next three beeps. A countdown.

"Dean, hit the ball!"

"Hit the wha- holy shit!"

There was a beat of silence, then the low-tone sound rang once again, and a second, giant red '1' appeared in the sky, this time on the right. Sam pinched the bridge of his nose.

"I know what game we're in," he called out, tone giving it away well before Sam actually gave name to it.

"This better not be Pong!" came Dean's absolutely furious, outraged response as the countdown began again. "Are we in friggin' Pong?! I'm gonna kill him!"

-o-o-o-

"I don't know how to drive oxen!"

Branches creaked around them in the building wind, leaves rustling. The air smelled like wheat, sun-soaked dirt, and an approaching storm.

"I don't even know what oxen are!"

Sam shook off a shiver as a push of wind swept his bangs off his forehead. His grip on the hunting rifle tightened, for all the good it would do him. This was tornado country, and he didn't like the look of those gathering clouds. "I don't think they're what you should be worried about, Dean. Pretty sure most people die from dysentery in this game."

His brother cast him a side-eye that lasted a little too long, reins in hand as the oxen trotted along, pulling their wagon behind them. "I don't want to know what that is, do I?"

"No, you do not."

-o-o-o-

"Run!" Dean screamed, just about at the top of his lungs, as he streaked down the blood-spattered hallway faster than he ever had in his entire life.

"I am running!" Sam yelled right back and backwards, given he was ahead of Dean.

"Run faster!" Dean tried to close the widening gap between him and his stupidly long-legged brother.

"Is it even following us?" Sam didn't turn around to ask; he kept his eyes and flashlight – the device having been in his hand when they landed in this awful, awful game – trained on the ground and walls in front of them as they came up fast. Outside of that ten-foot circle of light, they could see nothing. The hallways they'd found themselves trapped in were the darkest black Sam had ever encountered.

Dean made the mistake of checking over his shoulder, following it up with his own flashlight. Whatever he saw caused him to whip back around and start gaining ground on that gap. "Nope! Nope, nope, nope!"

"There!" Sam yelled as he rounded a corner just seconds ahead of Dean. "There's an elevator!"

"Oh, thank fuck!"

The taller of the two Winchesters slammed into the open space at the end of this nightmare labyrinth. He twisted around just as Dean hit the wall beside him and scrambled forward for the 'close' button by the time his brother righted himself. With the button hit repeatedly, Sam pressed himself back against the rear wall next to his brother. Two beams of light and two pairs of horrified eyes were locked on the darkness beyond the elevator doors.

"Come on, come on, come on!" Dean glared at the panel of buttons beside the still open doors.

"I thought you said it was chasing us," Sam whispered harshly, somehow afraid to raise his voice. If it had lost them in the dark, he certainly didn't want to attract it back.

"Yeah," Dean panted, eyeing the 'close' button just scant feet away, taunting them. He weighed whether it was worth moving closer to the open doors so he could hit the damn button again. "But like, slowly. Dude's fucked up."

"What kind of game is this?" Sam hissed. "Who plays games like this?"

"Normal people, man." Dean swallowed heavily before making a sharp lunge for the buttons. It was at that same moment that the doors started to slide shut.

And the thing chasing them staggered into the light, arm raised and already swinging.

Dean screamed as the doors stuttered closed on the blade of a giant knife – more like a friggin' sword – and, thank fuck, they stayed closed around it. That did not stop Dean from continuing to scream like a little girl until that rusty, blood-splattered blade was tugged free from between the doors and the elevator started a shuddering, chuggy trip upwards.

"Dude." Dean stood on shaky legs, hand pressed over his pounding chest.

Sam wasn't doing much better. He was pressed to the wall like he thought he could melt into it if that thing came back. "I know."

"It had a triangle for a head, Sam!"

"I know." Sam closed his eyes, trying to see anything other than that. "Though, uh, it was, um… technically more of a pyramid."

Dean turned his head slowly to stare at his brother with an expression one could almost call it a bitchface, though Sam would never deign to say such things aloud.

-o-o-o-

"I feel ridiculous. I look ridiculous!" Dean yelled into the sky in his polo shirt and plaid, knee-length shorts. He glanced over at Sam, whose long hair was elegantly tucked behind a lime green paddy cap. It matched the color of his shorts. "You? You fit right in."

"Oh, shut up," Sam snipped back as he raised his arms back in an elegant arc before swinging the club down and through. The whack of a golf ball sent flying into the air was surprisingly pleasant. He raised a hand to block the sun from his eyes ('Making the purpose of the stupid hat, what, exactly?' Dean grumbled under his breath) and watched the little white ball plop down and bounce onto the green, coming to a stop a dozen feet from the flag.

Dean stared at, both impressed and disgusted.

"Right. In."

Dean sliced his ball directly into the nearest pond. Whether that was on purpose (as an act of a rebellion, according to Dean) or not (even remotely, according to Sam) was a matter of some debate.

-o-o-o-

"This is copyright infringement! You hear me!"

This game found Dean shaking his fist at the sky he continued to yell at. Sam ignored his brother in favor of directing the twelve-foot stone statue of a horse to F6. He, himself, stood in the position of the King's Rook. His brother had chosen to be the King. Sam wasn't entirely sure Dean knew how a game of Chess was won.

"You're going to hear from Rowling's lawyers!"

-o-o-o-

Sam kicked his ass at Chess. Literally. The final move from his Queen quite literally kicked Dean off the board. Which hurt like a bitch.

But that was okay, because he repaid his nerd brother the favor when it came to Risk. Dean knew how to command soldiers, as much as it irked him (stupid divine destiny and all that crap). Plus, he always had taken a little too much joy in conquering Australia.

-o-o-o-

When Sam slammed into him three games later, pushing him off the main path to stumble back to his home base, he shouted out a very, very unapologetic, "Sorry!"

-o-o-o-

"You have to throw it."

"Why do I have to do it?"

"Because it's your battle." Sam pinched the bridge of his nose when his brother continued to stare obstinately at him. "You're the one with the Pokéball."

"Pokéball," Dean grumbled, glaring down at the red and white sphere in his hand. "What a stupid name."

"Dean."

"Yeah, yeah, alright." He tossed the thing up once, caught it, then pitched it into the field in front of them.

Their apparent opponent (a friggin' child who was fourteen at most, if they were lucky) stood on the far end of the circle of grass. In the center was a really big, orange, gecko… lizard… thing that had come out of the kid's pokéball.

Its tail was on fire, so that was neat.

According to Sam, that was a Pokémon, summoned by the snot-nosed brat across the way from them, and Dean was going to have to fight it. Well, not Dean himself, but his Pokémon. Whatever the hell that was gonna be.

The red and white ball bounced twice on the grass before rolling to stop a few feet from the cute lizard. Nothing happened. The orange reptile blinked at the unopened pokéball, making a cute noise of confusion, but keeping its distance.

"No, Dean, you have to-" Sam cut himself off, planting his face into his hand. Through the meat of his palm he mumbled, "You have to call out the Pokémon you chose."

Dean pulled his head back, making a face that would not be out of place on a toddler. "I have to what? Why?"

"Have you seriously never heard any of this before?" Sam blew out an exasperated breath and his bangs lifted off his forehead from the strength of it. "You have to say the name of the Pokémon, then 'I choose you.'"

The older hunter just stared at him, face perfectly portraying exactly what he thought of that.

"Dean."

"That's stupid. This is all stupid! You're in pigtails, Sam!" And he wasn't even going to mention the short-shorts and red suspenders, or the weird, multi-colored egg his brother was just… carrying around for no apparent reason. Dean spun back to face the field, where Charmander and his inactive pokéball both sat. "You're stupid! Your game is stupid, your orange lizard is stupid! You hear that! You're all stupid!"

Sam buried his face in his hand once more.

"Dean."

"Well, which one am I supposed to pick, man?" The older Winchester crossed his arms over his chest defensively. "I don't know any… po-kay-whatever-they're-called."

"Well, uh…" Sam struggled to recall some of the names he'd heard in passing when the game had been such a craze. "There's Pikachu. And, um… bull… bull… asaur? I think he's a water Pokémon, which is probably good against a Charmander-"

"Castiel, I choose you!"

Light flashed on the field as the ball sprung open. When the glow dissipated, Castiel sat on the field, still bound to her chair. Her back was to them, the angel facing her soon-to-be opponent. She blinked down at the small, orange dragon with its big eyes.

Dean was grinning, clearly proud of himself, by the time Sam lowered his hand from his face for the third time.

"Dean."

"Well, it worked, didn't it? She's all I could think of!" Dean snapped back defensively, grin shrinking. When Sam's eyes climbed into his hairline, that smile turned right upside-down. He shoved a warning finger his brother's way. "Not like that!"

Their opponent cried something out in the background of their bickering, and Charmander charged. Dean spun back to the field as the little thing let out a battle cry – something between a squawk and a roar that was way too cute to be remotely frightening – whipping his body around to lash his tail out against Castiel. Fire streaked around him as he spun out of the attack, sliding to a halt on all fours to face his enemy once more.

The angel stared down at the small creature, face stern but otherwise nonplussed. The very bottom corner of her tan coat was on fire, lazily burning against Castiel's leg. She didn't seem to care much, though her stare darkened as she continued to smolder.

Charmander actually looked repentant, taking a step back and letting out something of a meep of confusion.

Dean was back to grinning winningly. Beside the older Winchester, Sam groaned.

"Dean."

-o-o-o-

"Are you kidding me right now?!"

"Well," Sam reasoned as he dodged something that was round, blue, and really fast. It shot by on his left and kept spinning forward. "We did, technically, want a racing game."

"This is not a racing game!" Dean bit back, despite the fact that they were, very much, racing. He struck his palm against the steering wheel of his very pink go-kart. "This is not my Baby!"

Sam snickered from the next cart over, swerving dangerously for a moment on the translucent, rainbow road they were speeding across. The ridiculously large, polka-dotted mushroom cap he was wearing slid dangerously to the side, almost coming off his head. "I think it suits you."

Dean put all his weight down on the pink pedal beneath his high-heeled foot just so he could pull in front of his brother's stupid, blue car and drop a banana peel.

-o-o-o-

"We can't keep doing this," were the first words out of Sam's mouth as they came into existence in the next twisted game Gabriel had lined up for them. Sam didn't know how long they'd been at it, but it had to have been at least two days. He suspected longer. The younger Winchester was exhausted, even if his body didn't ask for food or water. He didn't know how much longer he – either of them, given Dean's own exhaustion and increasing frustration – could keep this up. "We could die here. For real, I mean."

He held out the colorful pieces of paper to the man behind the teller, who looked suspiciously like Milburn Pennybags. "St. James Place, please."

"I know," Dean said beside him, pulling his wallet out of his back pocket with a grumpy look on his face. The folded piece of leather had a silver shoe stamped into the surface, the style of which matched the thimbles printed across Sam's tie. Dean shoved a handful the same colorful paper at the teller, a lot less politely than Sam had. "Electric Company. And St. James? Really? Rude."

"You're the one who insists on wasting money on the Utilities." Sam took a small slip of cardstock in receipt of his purchase, turning to Dean. "We can't wait for him to put the Impala in a game. If he puts it in at all."

"It's not wasting; Utilities matter. And she is not an it, mister. But, yeah… I know." Dean collected his own card, turning away from the monocled teller. "What do you want me to do? We didn't come up with a Plan B, Sammy, and I'm out of ideas over here."

"Well… is there anything else we can use against an angel?"

The man from the future scoffed. "Yeah, sure. Uriel's angel blade."

For a moment, Sam lit up in surprise at another option even existing. It didn't last, however, when he realized where that weapon must be. They were right back at square one. "I didn't know that was in the trunk."

"It's not. It's at Bobby's." At the look of surprise on Sam's face, Dean gave a one shouldered shrug, leaving the extravagant lobby of the bank through the old-timey, wheelhouse door, glass set into tarnished brass. "I figured he needed it more. Didn't think an angel would make a move against us anytime soon. But if they found where Cas was hiding out…"

Sam's gaze slid away from his brother's as they walked into the hustle and bustle of a city mid-day. He hadn't thought of that – that Cas had likely become a target of her own family years earlier in this timeline. And she'd been defenseless in that healing trance. Bobby too, though not so much on the defenseless part. Certainly outmatched, regardless. They could have lost them both, and it hadn't even been on Sam's radar.

Sometimes, he supposed, Dean had good reason for keeping things to himself. Knowing was a burden. Of course, keeping all that weight to himself never ended up well for them in the long run. Plus, Sam really didn't like not knowing. But he got it. At least, sometimes.

"Good," the younger Winchester agreed, clearing his throat when his words came out quieter than he'd intended. They stopped at the curb, waiting for the traffic to clear so they could cross the street. "That was a good plan, but with Cas awake now, we, uh, we should probably keep it on us."

Especially if they were going to keep running into angels Dean hadn't told him about.

"Gee, thanks, Sherlock. Where were you twenty-four hours ago?"

"You mean before getting killed a couple dozen times by a trickster you forgot to tell me about?" The side-eye Sam cast him was Ultimate, and Dean flinched because… fair. "Pretty sure I was being accused of packing like a girl, Dean."

Surprise flashed across the older Winchester's face for a moment before that memory came flashing back. He managed not to laugh, but just barely. Instead, Dean cleared his throat loudly, glancing away and making the wise choice of not commenting on that one because touché.

"There's nothing that'll make a dent against an archangel. At least, not that we're gonna find in a friggin' video game. We're pretty much weaponless unless he gives us the Impala." Dean ran a frustrated hand through his hair. "I mean, we could blast him with the banishing sigil, but I don't think that'll kick us out of this place. Just him… away from us."

Which was tempting, both Winchesters could admit, but ultimately unproductive. If this is what an archangel did for fun, they didn't want to see what he could think up to if they made him angry.

With a tired sigh, Sam reached up and adjusted his way, way too expensive thumble-stamped tie over his equally too-expensive dress shirt, which felt like the softest silk against his skin. He didn't even want to think about how much it cost. The last car passed in front of them and Sam stepped into the street to cross, drawing up short once he noticed his brother hadn't followed.

The man from the future was still standing on the curb, gaze almost a decade away. Back in a library with an exhausted, bloody-eyed Cas suffering an Attack Dog spell.

"Dean?"

"There is something else that might work," the older hunter said, coming back to the present and stupid capitalist boardgame they were trapped in. There was an idea forming behind those green eyes. A risky one, but they'd faced worse odds. Dean stepped into the street with renewed confidence, briefcase swinging at his side (which he absolutely did not need; it made him look like a total douche and was completely useless as an accessory. It didn't even have anything in it). "We just need a game with cops."

Sam frowned, jogging after his brother as they crossed Wall St and headed for a lower-leveled, green building with orange trim. The sign above the main doors identified it as a Hospital. A very old-school one, apparently. That Sam now owned, given it was on St. James Place.

"What can we get from the police that would work against an angel?"

Dean grinned. "Handcuffs."

-o-o-o-

Dean was a frog. A frog that looked very much like Dean Winchester, in open boots ill-fitted on slim feet, his green jacket open and flapping in the breeze, and an abundance of bracelets wrapped around a thin, green wrist.

"I am so done with this shit."

Sam's big, bulgy eyes were no less puppy-dog effective in frog form. Which was deeply disturbing. "Not like I'm enjoying myself over here. I think I'm sitting in my own slime."

Dean's eye slid his way in a very disorienting roll. "Ew."

"So… we just cross the road?" Sam tried to look either direction down the pavement they were sitting on the edge of, but his vision was distorted and entirely unhelpful. Except for flies. When those passed by, he seemed to actually have some degree of focus. Everything else was a wet, warped blur.

"Uh… I guess?" Dean was looking around with bulbous eyes of his own, rolling in his sockets as he tried to glance back and forth. "Can you see anything?"

"Not a thing."

"Great. Well, here goes nothing."

Dean took a mighty hop, launching into the middle of the road right as a speeding truck went by. Sam flinched as it slammed into his brother mid-leap with a blaring horn, not even stopping.

-o-o-o-

"Oh, come on!" The older Winchester yelled up at the metal ceiling. "Is one stupid pair of handcuffs too much to ask!"

Sam adjusted the cap on his head, staring nervously at the panel of blinking lights, buttons, knobs, and gauges in front of him. He turned to his brother and hissed, "I have no idea how to use any of this."

"And you think I do? Just push one and hope it does something." Dean hissed back, pulling at the navy blue neckerchief around his neck. The striped shirt beneath was a particularly garish detail of the game. Sailors stopped wearing that shit before submarines even existed, damnit. He pointed at the radar screen in front of him, which looked conveniently more like a grid than any radar he'd ever seen, but at this point who cared. "Aim here."

"Like I know how to aim," Sam grumbled. Nervously, he raised a hand and, after only a second of hesitation, pressed a button that looked like it might fire a torpedo. There was a soft thud and a minor shudder throughout the control room. They waited in silence as the seconds ticked by.

There was the distant sound of an explosion, muffled by water and metal, but the crew around them broke into cheering. Someone shouted in the distance that the enemy battleship had been sunk. Sam let out a breath of relief, and Dean slumped in his chair.

"The next came better have friggin handcuffs in it, or I swear to god-"

-o-o-o-

"Oh god." Sam didn't entirely know how his brain was processing enough to get the words out, but they bared repeating now that he had. "Oh god, I'm traumatized."

Dean was standing beside him, equally dazed, a little shocked, definitely a little too curious, but holding his prize.

"I'm never going to see again. No amount of soap will ever fix this."

While his brother lamented the irrecoverable loss of his (questionable) innocence, Dean lifted the handcuffs up, dangling from one finger. He stared at the pink fur that lined both the inner and outer rings. "I didn't even know they made games for Fifty Shades of Grey."

Sam turned his way. The ruddy-red blush high on his cheeks (and ears) (and neck) had yet to subside, and Dean found that just fantastic. (No comment on his own coloring, of course.)

"Fifty shades of what?"

"Don't ask. It's a future thing you don't wanna know about." Dean tucked the pink monstrosities into his jean's pocket (happy to be fully dressed, once more) before anyone in this new game might notice them. "Let's just figure out where we are and find somewhere safe to carve these guys up."

He didn't bother wondering how they were going to draw sigils in that fluff. That was a future Winchester problem. Sam gave a one-shouldered, 'here goes nothing' shrug, and opened the door in front of them.

-o-o-o-

"Just get out of the pool, Sam!" The older Winchester stood at the edge of the backyard swimming pool, watching his brother swim laps back and forth on route. Occasionally, the beanstalk of a man would stop and try to pull himself out of the swimming pool, which couldn't even be six feet deep. But he fell back in every time he tried. Dean, tapping his foot against the edge of the pool impatiently, repeated himself, this time with more expletives.

What Sam heard through the splashes of water around him was, "Whippna choba dog."

"You think I haven't tried?" he yelled back, stopping mid stroke to turn and grab the ledge of the pool. For the fourth time, he braced his wrists, locked his elbows, and tried to pull himself up. A second later he was back to doing laps.

What Dean heard was a bitterly growled, "Boobasnot."

"Speak English, damnit!" Dean yelled, now pacing the poolside, but it came out as, "Garnar frash. Uhh shamoo ralla poo."

Sam gave it a fifth attempt with no better luck. "Mik mak maka!" He splashed back into the pool with a flail of arms that suggested frustration.

This would all be pretty damn hilarious – annoying as hell, sure, but still hilarious – if Sam wasn't actually starting to look tired and was, apparently, no longer able to climb out of a swimming pool without a ladder.

"Ooh shanga day!" Sam whined as he started yet another lap.

-o-o-o-

"Are you friggin' serious, right now?!" Dean yelled from the driver's seat of a modified '67 Chevy Impala. The car swerved at incredibly dangerous speeds as he found himself, quite suddenly, behind the wheel and on a racetrack, mid-race. He'd be pissed about the alterations – and he was, let there be no mistake about that – if having the inside of his Baby rearranged to resemble a professional racing car wasn't at least sort of cool and maybe a childhood dream come true. "Now we get a game with Baby?!"

"Just stay focused," came Sam's voice from within Dean's helmet. His kid brother must be part of the pit crew. "You still have the handcuffs, right?"

A flare of panic resulted in a very-near miss with the car next to him, but Dean corrected pretty smoothly and started patting himself down with one hand and driving with the other. Luckily, they were on a fairly straight stretch of track. There was an audible sigh of relief in the car and through the headset as he found them tucked inside the racing jacket he was wearing.

"Yeah, I got 'em," he reassured his brother, who echoed his sigh of relief.

Dean could practically picture him: a pair of racing overalls (not quite long enough for his stupid beanstalk legs, of course) that matched Dean's own suit, clipboard in hand, big ole' headset over his ears, mic in front of his mouth which he would be unnecessarily pressing closer as if that would magically make Dean listen to him.

Total nerd.

But back to the part where they now had Baby – meaning they now had holy oil – which Dean was driving around a course at truly impressive, thrill-inducing speeds. Really, he'd be enjoying the hell out of this if it wasn't for the timing.

"Do you have any idea what I went through to get those cuffs!"

"Yes, Dean," came Sam's pained, pointed response. "I do, and I will never, ever be the same."

The older Winchester rolled his eyes. His brother was such a prude.

"But now we have cuffs and holy oil." Sam was ever the voice of reason. It annoyed him as much as it calmed him down. "That's a good thing. So stay focused."

Dean took a deep breath, fingers flexing around the wheel of his Baby before he did as his smart brother instructed and kept his focus. Driving a race car was no easy thing, not at the speeds he was currently rounding the track. A crash could be deadly. At the very least, it would totally suck.

"Alright, I'm fine. I'm good. Totally calm, totally focused." The older Winchester took in and let out an even breath and worked on passing the car beside him on the next curve. "What's the plan?"

"After the next lap, come into the pit." Sam adjusted the microphone in front of his mouth, glancing between the clipboard in his hand (full of information he couldn't actually make sense of) and the Impala zipping its way around the far side of the track. "I'll grab your cuffs and get the holy oil out of the trunk."

"And I'll keep racing while you set the trap!"

Sam lobbed a generalized bitchface in the direction of his brother. "You could try to sound a little less excited about me doing all the work."

"Oh, but I am so very excited, Sammy. I was born for this."

Dean's grin was audible, his excitement evident. Fanboy vibes were practically dripping off him, and the only thing that kept Sam from rolling his eyes was the fact his brother was driving a hundred plus miles an hour around a track where a resulting crash could very easily cost him his life. The younger Winchester didn't dare take his eyes off the Impala for even a second.

"Get the crew ready. I'm coming in for a pit stop."

-o-o-o-

Watching the crew work in a flurry of perfectly timed motion around the vehicle was really impressive. Sam had only just shut the trunk, holy oil in hand, when a member of their pit crew hit the side of the car twice and Dean was speeding off with tires spinning and smoke trailing. He hadn't been stopped for more than ten seconds, if that, and six of them had been taken up tossing the fluffy cuffs to the closest, random pit crew.

"You got them, right?"

At his brother's voice in his ear, Sam dropped his eyes down to the light green thermos gripped tightly in his hand. It had been right where Dean said it would be, in the trunk (Sam considered themselves lucky the Impala still had a trunk in this game), next to the holy water and rosaries. Their best chance out of here.

"Yeah, I got them," he answered, gesturing to the pit crew guy who was still staring at the pink handcuffs in his hand, clearly confused as to why his driver had tossed them to him, or had them on his person to begin with. With a surprisingly complex expression for an NPC, he handed them off to Sam with both befuddlement and relief.

"Alright. We've got six more laps to halfway and we can switch drivers then. So get a'carving, Sammy."

This time Sam did roll his eyes. It was just like Dean to leave him with all the actual work while he played and somehow made it sound like he had the hard job. The younger Winchester left the pit but kept his headset on so he could keep track of his brother, who was busy humming Metallica's 'Fuel' as he drove. Sam made his way into the stadium tunnels, hoping to find a quiet place to set their trap. The wide hallway had an underground feel to it, with its twenty-foot cement walls and lack of windows. It didn't seem particularly utilized, either; it was limited to crew and staff only, and with the race in full swing there weren't many, if any, wandering the halls. It would work.

Sam set to work pouring out the circle of holy oil. He kept it as wide as he could without risking running out before it was complete. It wasn't as large as the one they'd drawn for Cas – the thermos didn't have as much holy oil as Pastor Jim had given them – but Sam wanted to increase their odds that Gabe showed up inside it, or close enough they could get him into it without the archangel noticing their plot.

Once he finished and was fairly satisfied – if not also fairly nervous – that they had as good a trap as they could, Sam looked around for a place to stash the thermos. He left it atop an electrical box attached to the wall a few feet down the hallway. The beat-up thing blended right in; an innocent something left behind by a passing employee. Then he pulled out Dean's fluffy cuffs and a knife he'd snagged from the Impala as well.

Time to give a pair of handcuffs a shave and a carve. But no, no, Dean had the hard job.

-o-o-o-

By the time Sam made it back to the track, their next driver was suited up and raring to go. There was a twitch in his leg and enough other crew hovering around him for Sam to realize the computer-simulation of a man was annoyed.

The Impala was nowhere near the pit lanes. Heading away from it, actually.

"Dean, it's been six laps," Sam said into the mic, voice tense. "Where the hell are you?"

"One more, Sammy."

His brother's tone was anything but in trouble, and Sam dropped his head, rubbing his forehead and the headache forming behind it. How. How was he technically four years younger than this man, who also had ten years in the future on him.

"Dean."

"Just one more lap! Come on, what's one more gonna hurt?"

Sam pinched a little harder. "Need I remind you, we are trapped in this game by a souped-up Trickster and this is our only chance to get out of it."

Despite the fact his older brother probably didn't mean for him to hear it, the grumbling came over the headset loud and clear. "Guy can't even have a little fun around here."

Sam dropped his hand to glare at the approaching Impala as it pulled off the track and into the pit lane. He grabbed the microphone at his cheek so he could pull it closer to his mouth and say, "I think you got plenty of fun in the last game. Don't you?"

He could see Dean's grimace as the car came to a quick halt. A deep whistle came over the headset, reverberating painfully through the speakers. Sam could see his brother's lips pursed through the windshield even as his crew started pulling him out of the car. "Low blow, Sammy. Low blow."

The Impala was screeching back out of the pit before Dean was done pulling off his helmet. He watched after her with a deep frown. He did not like strangers driving his Baby. But this was a video game. The real Baby was waiting for him on the outside. With a determined growl, Dean headed for his brother and the two hurried into the cover of the stadium's lower levels.

Sam pointed out the ring of holy oil as they came up to it in the hallway. Dean could just make out the shine of it on the linoleum. Sammy had done good, keeping the liquid spread as thin as possible so it wasn't noticeable but would still light. Hopefully, this way Gabriel wouldn't spot the trap before they could spring it.

The younger Winchester pulled a lighter out of his breast pocket and the de-fluffed cuffs, holding both out. Dean took the bracelets – eyeing the patches of pink that still remained with a side-eye his brother only returned (in the form of a far more successful Bitchface) – but held the lighter back out to his kid brother.

"Keep it. He might expect it less coming from you."

Not that he thought the archangel suspected anything. They'd likely already know if he had. But there was something about Sam that was always just… less aggressive. If Dean kept his attention, maybe he wouldn't pay much attention to what Sam was doing.

It had worked the first time, at least. Of course, Sam had been a car in that version, but details.

Sam raised his eyebrows in response but didn't question it. He tucked the lighter into his palm, keeping it loosely fisted at his side. "So… cuffs first, then fire?"

Dean let out a puff of air, tucking the carved cuffs into his racing jacket where he could grab them quickly. His hands settled on his hips as he stared down at their trap. Hopefully, with the last-minute inclusion of the Impala and the switch back to Plan A, they wouldn't need handcuffs at all.

"Let's stick with the fire. It's the safer bet. Cuffs'll keep him from using his powers, but he could still rabbit the old fashion way. Fire will keep him in place. Keep him trapped."

Plus, the circle would be easier to trick the Trickster into than the cuffs. Dean hadn't been looking forward to getting them on the archangel when they'd become the primary component of Plan B.

"Alright, this is gonna go down fast," Dean warned, rolling up the sleeves of his race suit. "I'll call him down, you light the oil soon as you're sure he's inside it. Got it?"

Sam nodded firmly, eyes also trained on their trap.

Dean let out a breath and physically shook the tension out of his shoulders. "Ready?"

Sam glanced at his older brother, then nodded with all the confidence he didn't entirely feel. He thumbed the lighter in his palm, reassuring himself that they were as prepared as possible for this dangerous plan. He flicked it open.

"Ready."

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: [Author cackles maniacally]

Games in Order of Appearance: Pong, Oregon Trail, Silent Hill, Golf Pro, Chess, Risk, Sorry, Pokemon, Mario Kart, Monopoly, Sims, Frogger, Battleship, Casa Erotica (the Game!), Grand Turismo. The previous chapters were inspired by a mix of Skyrim/Zelda, then Chutes and Ladders. Some were more inspired-by, others were downright copyright-destorying-but-what-is-fanfiction-for-right, yaaaaay!

Fun Fact 67: I am not much of a gamer, which means most of this chapter required assistance from my gaming friends! So a big THANK YOU to my partner for many meals spent describing various games and how to write certain genres accurately, to Forestpelt for helping me come up with all the games to throw the Winchesters into (you all can thank her for that Silent Hill excerpt), and Vaesse for Beta-ing this chapter!

Fun Fact 313: All the sims language I used is legit and translatable ;P

Fun Fact 314: I had a part planned in Sims where Cas showed up, presenting Dean with a heart, asking him out on a date but no clue as to why, or what Dean was saying (in a language the angel had never heard, and she'd heard them all). Buuuuut that didn't end up working out because Gabriel isn't onboard the Ship yet. (Key word there? yet ;D) If we weren't Jane-Austen-On-Steroids slow burning, here, we would have gotten so much game shippage [insert verbose-AF-sobbing here]

Comments: Alrighty, wonderful people! If I am being quite honest, I could use some cheering on. This is probably my favorite chapter I've written so far, and I hope it was cackling-worthy for you all as it first was for me. Unfortunately, I seem to have lost that joy. I don't know if I've read through the chapter too many times or if I'm just having some holiday blues (maybe stress more so than blues? It has been a very rough year, which I think I'm only just catching up to mentally and emotionally), but I was so, so excited after I first wrote this, yet that excitement has since withered. Which is so disheartening.

So, on that note, I would really, really like to hear from you on this one. Pretty please, if this chapter made you laugh or grin like an idiot, share that with me. Whether you're a lurker or a first time reader, a regular commenter or a only-on-the-truly-delightful-chapters, please let this be your one comment for the year! I will always, always take the simple but much appreciated, "Like Button pushed!"

Thanks everyone!

Silence

Chapter 124: Season 2: Chapter 90

Chapter Notes

A/Ns:
Was I watching Good Omens when I started this chapter? Yes, yes I was. If you haven't seen/read it, I highly recommend it

(Though… maybe wait for Season 3 to come out if you don't like cliffhangers.)

((Then again, if you don't like those, what on earth are you doing here?!!?))

Chapter Warnings
: Despite ^ that, I do not leave you with a cliffhanger today (mostly). I do, however, leave you with the end of the Gabriel Arc!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 90

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

"So then there's this angel, named Aziraphale- yes, yes, I know that's not a real angel," Gabe flapped his hand up and down as his sister's eyes once again interrupted him mid-story. "You've seriously got to get this whole pop-culture thing down. Nobody cares about real things anymore, Cassie. It's all characters, books, and shows. Take Doctor Who for example-"

Before Gabriel could launch into his next educational breakdown of essential information his sister somehow did not possess – the sixth or seventh in a row with no discernable transition point that he could tell was both confusing and irritating to the smaller angel, which only made him plan for more topics to jump to – he drew up short as Angel Radio hummed to life inside his noggin'. It was a private prayer.

Castiel, who had been working very hard to tune her baffling brother out (with varying degrees of success), noticed the abrupt silence far quicker than she would have any specific word. Her head snapped to the side. Gabriel was staring into the distance, head tilted ever so slightly up and to the side, expression serious, and Castiel knew he was listening to a human prayer. Her vessel tensed, stomach clenching in a way that could only be described as tying itself into knots.

Guess that was one less human expression that needed deciphering.

Gabriel tuned back into his surroundings, glancing at his sister offhandedly. The archangel held back a burst of laughter the second he noticed Castiel's rigid posture and guarded eyes. Despite the unblinking stare locked on him, she couldn't hide the concern that flickered through her grace in ochre rivulets. Each vein bled green dread along the edges, mixing together to form eddies of tarnished bronze.

She already knew the Winchesters had given up. The little angel that could was finally seeing how weak human resolve was. Good. If she learned that lesson now, she wouldn't end up on the wrong side of everything when the world tore itself in two.

He held up a finger and offered her a wink. "Hold that thought, Cassie. I've got to see a man about an Apocalypse."

Gabriel left behind the muffled rage of his sister. Alone in the Ether for the first time since kidnapping his sibling, the archangel allowed his smile to drop. He headed for the Winchesters and, finally, the beginning of the end.

-o-o-o-

"Uncle!"

Dean let the words echo along the tall walls and long hallway. When no snarky comeback came, Dean dropped his arms.

With an annoyed roll of his eyes, the time-traveler added, "We'll do it!"

Still nothing.

Dean had just turned to give Sammy a, 'What now?' look – they definitely hadn't come up with a Plan C – when there was a slow clap from behind them. Both Winchesters spun around, surprised to find the short, familiar vessel of the Trickster standing five feet away from them. And at least fifteen feet away from the circle of oil he was supposed to appear inside.

'Son of a bitch!' was the look Dean now wanted to send his brother, but tapped down on it hard as both Winchesters squared up to the archangel.

"I'm surprised this is the game that broke you." Gabe raised a sardonic eyebrow at the hunter in the racing suit. "Let me guess; nobody puts Baby on the racetrack?"

"You shut your piehole," Dean growled. "You don't get to say her name."

The Trickster snorted, shaking his head with an eye roll that threatened to tear orbital muscles. When they managed to roll back into his skull, he raised his hands up, fingers curling into air quotes. "So. 'You'll do it. ' Do what, exactly?"

The boys exchanged looks. How were they going to talk the archangel in a literal circle around them. Dean cleared his throat and decided, well, here goes.

"Follow the rules."

"Which rules?"

The Righteous Man rolled his eyes. "The rules of the game ."

Gabe grinned. "Which game?"

"You know which one," Dean growled, already getting worked up. Sam put a hand on his shoulder.

"The biblical one," Sam spoke up, glaring at the archangel but trying to remain a calmer, more neutral party. Or, at least a less aggressive one. "You want Dean to sell his soul. For me."

"Well…." the Trickster shrugged haplessly. Sam's jaw clenched. "Doesn't have to be for you, but… pretty sure that's the only way it can go down."

"You don't know that." Dean took a step forward, and Sam clamped his hand down harder. They didn't need to back the archangel even further from the circle they needed him to be in. "You don't."

Gabe had the gall to look regretful. "I'm sorry, guys. I really am. But I do."

The silence stretched between the three, with the two hunters torn between what the archangel was saying and what they needed to do to escape.

"So. Ready to go quietly?"

"Whoa, whoa, whoa," Dean found himself saying without thinking. They needed to stall, they needed to get Gabe on the other side of the hall behind them, and he didn't have much going as far as a plan. "Not so fast."

Gabriel raised his arms in an annoyed gesture and an impatient look that said, 'What is it now?'

Dean exchanged a glance with Sam, whose eyes were a touch too wide. The older Winchester bit back a groan, realizing his brother didn't have a better plan than his not-a-plan-so-much-as-a-half-formed-thought he was working on.

Damn.

"Well, back to Plan B."

The hunter charged the Trickster with no warning, tackling him to the ground.

"Dean!"

The cuffs were out of his racing jacket by the time they hit the hard floor in a mad scramble to get both of them on the archangel before Gabriel could react. Dean managed to get one snapped tight around the man's wrist with a resounding click. He had a firm grip on the other arm, but no real way to get the metal wrapped around it. There was a scramble as Gabriel realized what Dean was trying to do, and the two rolled and fought for control over the remaining cuff.

There was a click-click-click and the tightening of metal around skin.

Everyone froze. Dean pulled back, taking Gabe with him as the chain between the two cuffs pulled tight. One bracelet was closed around Gabriel's wrist, the other, Dean's.

"Ha!" Gabe yelled triumphantly and raised his one free hand, fingers preparing to snap.

A leather band closed around the archangel's raised wrist, locking shut with the snap of a buckle. A second followed, closing around the other wrist, just below the first, metal handcuff. Sam, standing just behind Dean and leaning over him to get into the tussle, released the sigil-covered leather cuffs and pulled back, having successfully bound the archangel.

The world around them blinked out of existence, causing both Winchesters to snap their heads around at the abrupt change of scenery. The stadium hallway was replaced with a large, empty warehouse. There were oil stains on the ground, empty shelves randomly left about, and broken windows high up on tall walls. The distant sound of roaring crowds and racing engines was gone and, in its place, the echoing silence of a large, open space.

Gabriel, meanwhile, unsurprised as he might be by the environment, was surprised by his newly imprisoned wrists. He stared at them in something akin to disbelief.

"The rhinestones are a nice touch," he commented casually, raising an eyebrow at what was very, very clearly bondage cuffs attached to his wrists. Rhinestone-studded, chain-linked, black leather bondage cuffs engraved with binding sigils.

Not really his kink. Particular the whole sigil-binding, bit.

Above him, still straddling him, Dean snorted. There was a downright mischievous grin stretching across his lips. "You should have seen what Sammy here had to do to get those."

The glare the younger Winchester pinned his brother with was impressively cowing, though somewhat undercut by the way his entire face turned tomato red.

"I'm starting to see where I went wrong," Gabriel kept his bound arms raised, this time spreading his hands out in apology. He'd never been particularly good at those. However, considering the sigils were in Enochian , he was pretty sure the game (or games , ha! Get it?) was up. Time for damage control. "The erotica game crossed a line. I get that now. But we can talk this over, right guys?"

"Oh, sure. We'll talk." Dean leaned back on his calves, heaving out a triumphant, but rough breath from the struggle. He dug the handcuff key out of his jeans pocket, the racing suit replaced by his familiar, comfortable clothes. He stabbed the thing into the cuff on his hand, twisting until he was able to release himself with a single click and the slide of metal. "We'll talk once you-"

The minute the cuff fell from Dean's wrist, Gabe punched him in the face with both fists. Dean fell back on his ass and off of the archangel with a flail of surprise and a burst of blood from his nose.

"Dean!"

Sam didn't have time to reach his brother or get the archangel back under control. An obnoxious shout of 'Nutcracker!' and a well aim kicked had him doubling over, re-learning how to breathe through the lightning storm of pain between his legs.

Gabriel scrambled to his knees, then his feet, and took off running. Fortunately for the hunters, he headed right for the circle and Dean knew they still had a slim chance. Hand clamped over his bleeding nose, the older Winchester launched himself to his feet and gave chase. He didn't make it far before pain flared in his chest, like an anchor had been left behind buried in the floor of the warehouse, and its chain, attached right to his heart, pulled tight. Dean hit the floor for a second time, this time on his hands and knees, clutching at his chest as it tried real damn hard to stay right there, regardless of where the rest of him was headed.

"S-Sam!"

Still hurting, the younger Winchester managed to turn and stagger after the archangel. His much longer legs and sheer determination saw him close the gap between them. As Gabriel crossed the line of holy oil, running for his life, Sam leapt forward, tackling the angel around the waist. They both went down hard.

"Dean!"

Dean lifted his head, teeth gritted against the pain in his chest. It was forceful and demanding, nothing like Chest Cas's usual warnings. If he didn't have an angel taking up residence in his chest, he would assume he was having a heart attack. Only he'd had one of those, after losing fifty years to a poker-playing witch. He knew what a heart attack felt like, and this was worse .

“Light it!”

A zippo clattered across the floor towards him, tossed by his brother. Jaw clenched, bearing through the pain as it finally started to fade, Dean stumbled to his feet and scooped up the lighter. He made it to the circle, his brother and the archangel struggling within it. Gabriel might not have access to his powers, rendering him basically human, but he was a scrappy little fucker. Sam had his hands full, even with the foot and a half he had on the archangel.

“Dean, light the circle!”

Trusting his brother had an out, Dean did as Sam demanded. He flicked the lighter to life, flame dancing in the air, and dropped it atop the oil. It took immediately, igniting a ring of fire that quickly grew in height. With a well-timed kick, Sam managed to roll away from the archangel, and continued rolling straight through the flames.

Dean stumbled away from the fire as it roared upwards in sync with a flare of pain in chest. Chest Cas really, really didn’t like being near those flames. So Dean kept a wide berth as he hurried around the circle to his brother, who was smoldering. He patted out the flames and embers on the back of Sam’s flannel as the younger man scrambled to his feet, trying to extinguish the flames on his arm, which thankfully went out pretty easily. Despite being a bit scorched in the clothing department, the kid seemed okay. Other than a hell of a shiner on his right eye, courtesy of their new captive.

“You okay?” were the first words out of Sam’s mouth, despite the fact he was still smoking slightly. Those worried, hazel eyes dropped to his brother’s chest.

Dean rubbed at his recovering sternum, but nodded. In a low voice, ignoring their imprisoned archangel for the time being, he leaned towards his brother and mumbled, “Don’t think Chest Cas liked the idea of ending up in a ring of holy fire.”

Sam’s eyes widened, cheeks losing some of that red color from the struggle, and he dropped his gaze down to Dean’s chest again. It had been a while since he’d thought of that sliver of grace in his brother’s chest as having consequences. But it made sense, he supposed. Their Castiel had been warning them for some time now that Dean’s soul and the sliver of grace were merging dangerously fast. Cas’s grace must have been trying to warn him not to get caught in the circle, because he wouldn't be able to get out as Sam had.

It was… a little disturbing to think his brother – his human brother – might not be able to escape a trap intended for an angel. A problem for another time, Sam decided. He nodded at his brother, who seemed okay for the time being, and turned his attention to their prisoner, instead.

Gabriel had climbed to his feet amid the flames, cuffed hands held in front of him, one bracelet dangling free, patches of pink fur still stuck to that metal. He grimaced, the expression something of a grin but falling shy, as he lifted his bound wrists. The metal handcuff wrapped around his wrist was in worse condition than its twin, covered with even more splotches of fuzz. The Winchesters had obviously tried to clear the metal to the best of their ability.

Best being a relative (and weak) term, here.

"Don't you just hate it when your girl can't do a Brazilian to save her life?" Gabe waggled his eyebrows, jiggling the dangling cuff. It swung back and forth like a patchy, pink pendulum of kink. "I've got a fella, let me get him your number. One rip and wowza! Bald as the day you were born, let me tell you."

"Please don't," Sam immediately responded, forehead smoothed out and glare firmly in place. At the same time, Dean's voice came from beside him, "Could he do Sam's hair?"

The glare turned on the older Winchester was beyond Ultimate . It was in a bitchface class of its own. Especially with that growing shiner.

"What? He offered!" Dean gestured to the bound archangel, green eyes trailing up to Sam's luscious locks. "And you could use it."

" Dean ."

"Where'd you get the holy oil?" And wasn't that just a pleasant little cherry on top of his dangerous friggin' Sunday.

The older of the two brothers grinned at him in a way that made Gabriel want to slap the expression right off the human's face. "Shouldn't have given me a game with my Baby."

Right. Gabriel sighed. That was a predictably dull answer. It wasn't even creative! Gabe had literally handed the two hunters the weapon they needed to escape. Twice, apparently, he thought as he spared a glare for the dual handcuffs wrapped around his wrists. Unnecessary now, given the holy fire, but no less annoying.

"So how did little Cassie do it, hmm?" The question, asked so nonchalantly, drew both hunters' frowns. Dean growled, taking a step forward at the overly casual mention of his captured and missing angel, only to be halted by a hand from his brother. Gabe shrugged, unintimidated by the display. "Gotta imagine she figured a way to tell you who I was."

"She didn't have to," Sam answered honestly, but without giving any information away.

When Gabe raised a genuinely surprised eyebrow, Dean snarled. "We're not playing the same game as you, asshole."

The archangel's eyes narrowed. "Meaning?"

"We make our own rules," Dean growled out. Beside him, Sam glanced his way, hand still on his shoulder to hold him back.

"Well, that's just cheating." The archangel's lips formed a perfect little pursed pout. He raised his wrists again, jingling the chain between the leather bindings. "Not to mention, puts me at a biiiit of a disadvantage here."

"Cry me a river," Dean snapped.

"How does an archangel end up as a Trickster anyway?" Sam asked, confusion and hurt-fueled curiosity filtering across his face. Dean had been pretty sparse on the details; they'd had more pressing matters than a backstory at the time.

Gabriel offered a tight, unamused smile. "My own private witness protection. I skipped out of heaven, had a face transplant, carved out my own little corner of the world."

"Why?" The younger hunter shook his head. "Why would you leave your home? Your family?"

His genuine turmoil was painful for the brother beside him to hear. That was Sam, Dean thought. Always wanting to see the best in people, believe in the best. That maybe this archangel had his reasons. Like it would make what he'd done to them somehow understandable. Forgivable. That was Sam, always willing to forgive. It wasn't something Dean had ever been able to understand. Not really.

"Oh, you do not know my family," Gabe laughed out, tilting his head back. When he finally lowered it, he did so with a sigh, face solemn and perhaps even sad. "I love my brothers. Love them. Dad too. But watching them all turn on each other? Tear at each other's throats? I couldn't bear it, okay? So I left. And I was happy. Until you two came along."

Sam's confusion turned into a sharp frown. "Us?"

Gabriel glanced between the two brothers, confusion and caution flickering across his face. "You don't know?"

The younger Winchester glanced at his brother, but Dean wasn't entirely sure what the archangel was referring to. He tried to convey that with his gaze, lest Sam think he was hiding things again. To Gabe, he hedged, "We know you want us to start the end of the world."

The archangel barked out a laugh that had no mirth. "Oh, want has nothing to do with it, boys. You're destined to end the world. From the moment Dad flipped on the lights around here, we knew it was all gonna end with you. Always."

The silence was thick in the warehouse. Sam didn't dare look at his brother. Dean had always said it was some bullshit 'destiny' of theirs to end the world but hearing it from an Archangel…. The weight of that firm belief – a biblical belief coming from damn near the horse's mouth – was pressing down on the confidence Dean had instilled in his younger brother that they could change it. That they had changed it. Sam could feel the doubt starting to worm its way through his mind. He did his best to bury it.

"Guys… I wish this was a video game," Gabe confessed, expression genuinely sorry for their fate. For all of their fates. "Easy steps to follow, try as many times as you want to get it right, satisfying ending after so much work getting there. But this is real, and it's gonna end bloody for us all."

"But it doesn't have to," Dean snapped. "If you would just friggin' man up and face your family-"

You don't know anything about my family!" Gabriel yelled, hands fisted in their cuffs. "You think Armageddon is a big deal? That was Sunday dinner for me. There is no facing my family!"

"Then help us stop it," Sam insisted, desperately throwing an arm out as he tried to get through to the angel without telling him they'd done it once before. They could do it again. "We can stop it."

"You two-! Like talking to a brick wall!" Gabriel raised his arms, fingers curling towards each other in frustration. He spun away, letting out an irritated growl, struggling to keep his emotions from bursting out without his permission.

After a stretched moment, the archangel deflated, shoulders dropping. When he turned around, his eyes were watery but hard. "It can't be stopped, Sam. This isn't about a war…. This is about two brothers who loved each other, and betrayed each other. Unresolved anger like you can't even imagine. And it's about to be unleashed. You can't stop that.

"As it is in Heaven." The angel raised his hands above his head, fingers reaching towards the heavens. When he lowered them, each palm faced a different brother. "So it must be on Earth. As it is written."

Dean stared at the archangel. Little brother to Michael. To Lucifer. Little brother to a shitty family handed a shittier deal. He turned to his own little brother. A man that had found out Dean traveled back in time ten years to stop an Apocalypse, and asked how he could help. Didn't run away from the shit hand God dealt him. A God he still believed in, even after learning what had been 'written' for him by that god.

He could have run away. He could have stayed at Stanford, refused to believe Dean. Or he could have crumbled. Given in to Azazel and taken the blood, any number of times it was presented to him. Gotten it over with. Any of them could have. Andy could have found his little corner of the world and smoked himself to an oblivion, still able to talk. Or went his brother's route and leaned into the plans of the Yellow Eyed Man. Bobby could have told Dean to fuck off after he invited a demon into his house, or brought an angel into the fold like he was family. The old hunter could have told Andy to make his own way or the boys to take a hike. Could have said no, to any one of the too-many favors Dean and Sam demanded of him far too often.

But they didn't. They'd all faced the impossible and decided screw it. Might as well try.

You'd think if a human could do it, an archangel could at least consider it.

"You're such a coward," Dean spoke firmly, repeating his brother's shocked and disappointed words from the diner, after finding out a Trickster had been messing with their lives so he could get the end of the world started that much sooner. His own words, from a decade past, came readily. "This isn't about some prize fight or some destiny that can't be stopped. This is about you being too afraid to stand up to your family!"

"Get this through your thick skull, you arrogant dick." The archangel's eyes were dark. Deadly. Gabriel clenched his teeth, hands curling into fists again, this time in anger. "I am going to have to watch my brothers kill each other, and there's nothing I can do to stop it. Just like there is nothing you can do to stop Sam from dying. How can you not understand that I just want it to be over! You'd think you could relate."

Sam blinked, the "What?" escaping his mouth in a mind-numbing matter. He glanced at Dean, who the archangel was staring so fiercely at.

"Oh, you sorry sons of bitches," Gabriel breathed out, shaking his head with realization. "What did you think all of this was about? It was a warning . Sam, you're going to die. It has to happen, so it will happen. There's nothing you or your brother can do to stop it.

"And Dean." The archangel turning his gaze to the furious older hunter, whose face was so stony any mortal man would fear for his life. "You're going to be there. You're going to be right there as Sam dies, and you won't be able to stop it. You're going to sell your soul to make it right, because you can't live with knowing you couldn't save him. You proved that. Again. And again. And again."

"In a game ," the older Winchester bit back, taking another step forward only to have his brother bring him up short once more, hand to his upper chest. "A sick, twisted game ."

"It's going to happen in the real world too, bucko. As it happened in Heaven, so it must happen on Earth. Might as well get it over with." Gabe sighed at the end of his gritted, bitten out response, suddenly exhausted. This was going nowhere, and that wasn't going to change anytime soon. He felt bad for these two morons, who couldn't accept the fate headed their way.

He looked away for a moment, wanting nothing more than to leave this conversation behind in a beat of wings, before clearing his throat. “So. Boys. Now what? We stare deep in each other’s’ eyes for the rest of eternity?”

The older of the two hunters sneered at him, while the younger just looked disappointed. Gabe found it incredibly annoying how much that bothered him and brutally shoved it aside.

“Well, first of all,” Dean squared his shoulders, drawing himself up to a demanding height, “you’re gonna bring Cas back from wherever you stashed him.”

Gabriel raised an eyebrow. “Him?”

“Her. Whatever,” Dean growled, managing not to roll his eyes in annoyance. Really, he was supposed to be the backwards one. Why was everyone else so caught up on gender? “Bring Cas back. Snap to it.”

Gabriel’s eyes narrowed once more, neither liking being ordered about, nor the order itself. “Aaaand if I say no?”

“We're gonna deep-fry ourselves an archangel.” Dean’s grin was purely predatory, and even though he was pretty sure the hunter was bluffing, a shudder ran through Gabe regardless as he glanced at the dancing flames encircling him.

Dean’s eyes narrowed when Gabe didn’t ‘snap to it.’ He raised his head to the ceiling and called out in prayer, “Cas?”

The imprisoned archangel’s brow furled, looking dark and dangerous, Sam thought. But also uncertain. Like he’d possibly approached this whole thing on the wrong foot and was now reconsidering. Sam supposed being surrounded by one of the few things capable of killing you would make anyone feel like that. Still, the younger Winchester waited with baited breath for the faint sound of wingbeats and the arrival of their angel.

When nothing happened, he got a bad feeling in the pit of his stomach, formed entirely around what his impulsive older brother might do next.

Dean, still glaring daggers at the encircled archangel, pulled his phone out of his jeans pocket and hit the speed-dial for Cas. It didn’t even ring, just immediately switched over to the beep-beep-beep and the pre-recorded voice of a woman informing him the number he dialed was no longer in service. He hit the end button hard enough to damage the phone.

Gabe gave a sheepish grimace, raising his hands in the face of all that fury, and a fire far too close for comfort. "Now look-"

"Where is he?" Dean snapped, and for a moment the archangel was taken aback by the look in the hunter's eyes. Then his own narrowed.

" She's fine. For now."

Sam immediately took a half step closer to his brother, muttering Dean's name warningly. He knew Dean would have picked up on that threat, and he was absolutely worried it would tip his brother's rage to a boiling point. And while Dean's fists curled and his shoulders shook with tension, he didn't move. Or deep fry the archangel.

"Let Castiel go," Sam insisted, keeping his voice firm but more reasonable than his brother's. "And we'll put the fire out."

For a moment, fear flickered across Gabriel's face before he covered it with anger. "Come on, guys. Try to see my side, here. You don't let me out, Cas is dead."

Sam's gut twisted, realizing he'd given the archangel all the ammo he needed to turn the tables one-eighty on them. But Dean just scoffed, arms crossed over his chest, eyes never leaving the archangel.

"No, he- she isn't."

His words were backed with such confidence, both brother and angel were left blinking. Sam knew where that confidence came from; the archangel did not. Still, Gabe recovered first, burying the increasing feelings of unease. There was something up with Dean Winchester. Something… wrong. Something off script. But he had bigger, hotter, flame-related problems to deal with right now. Getting out of that was priority numero uno.

"Yeah?" he asked, putting more bravado into his tone than he necessarily felt. "You willing to risk her life on it?"

"Yeah, I am." Dean uncrossed his arms, leveling a finger at him. "Because you may be a giant douchebag, but you're not a killer."

Beside him, Sam whipped his head his way. "Dude, he just spent weeks killing us ."

Even as he said it, Gabe gestured wildly with his bound rests, as if to say 'Listen to your brother! He's the smart one!' But Dean wasn't listening. He didn't need to; he knew this angel.

"Oh, he may not give a shit about anyone else's family, but he won't hurt Cas," Dean continued, speaking to Sam but never taking his eyes off Gabriel. "He's your brother."

"I got thousands of those," Gabe shrugged with pretty convincing nonchalance. Sam glanced at Dean, but the man from the future wasn't buying in.

"Yeah, but they matter to you, don't they? Every single one of 'em. You can't even fight against the literal devil, cuz he's family," Dean scoffed, the judgment in his eyes all-consuming. It only made Gabriel angrier, and the archangel really didn't want to reflect on why that was. Instead, he buried that rage beneath the hypocrisy of Dean Winchester judging anyone for loving their brother too much. "You're definitely not gonna kill the one angel that actually deserves that title. You may rough him up a bit, throw your weight around as a big brother, but you'd never kill one of your own. You don't have it in you."

Gabriel was breathing deep, even breaths to keep his calm, but he couldn't keep the growing fury off his face. There was a power building around them. A tension Sam could practically feel. It reminded him of the terror he'd felt when they first summoned Castiel, only more powerful. But Dean never wavered, and Sam still didn't know how his brother did it. How he stood so strong and confident in front of the wrath of an archangel.

"You just love your brothers too damn much," Dean finished burying the knife, then twisted it. " That is gonna be the death of you, Gabriel."

There was a finality to that statement that left the warehouse and its occupants in a tense silence. Sam had heard such certainty coming from his brother before, and now he had no doubt the archangel in front of them did die where Dean came from. There was something tragic about that. Sam found himself wanting to change it.

"Help us," he tried one last time, pleading with the archangel. "We can change it. We have to try."

Gabe stared at the younger Winchester and, for just a moment, let himself imagine a different future. But he knew it couldn't be. He knew his family. And hoping – dreaming – would only hurt worse in the long run. "I'm sorry. But you're going to fail. And I'm not letting Castiel go down with that ship."

"That's not your call to make," Dean growled, taking another step forward. His chest burned the closer he got to the flames, but he ignored the pain; it was manageable for now. "Cas can make his own damn decisions."

Gabriel actually snorted. "Wow. Have you tried saying that in a mirror lately, Mr. Big Brother?"

Sam grabbed Dean's shoulder with strong, bruising fingers to keep him from rising to that jab. (Not that the archangel was entirely wrong, though Sam definitely didn't need to add his opinion to this mess.)

"You have to know Heaven is corrupt at this point. They're not even going to try and stop the end of the world!" Sam tried a different angle of attack, the honest desperation clear in his voice. "Castiel isn't safe up there. She's safer with us-"

"Ha!" Gabriel leaned his head back and laughed loud and long. "Safe? Safe ? Cassie's grace is a Dad-damn mess . That didn't happen in Heaven, I promise you that."

"What?" Sam's eyes widened in surprise, and he glanced between his brother and the archangel. "She- she got hurt in a demonic trap, but-"

"And how, exactly, did she end up in a demon's trap?" Gabriel snapped out. "Pretty sure that never would have happened if she hadn't gotten tangled up with you two chuckleheads."

"She is helping us stop the end of the world!" Dean yelled, fists curled and face red with rage. Not all of that anger was for Gabriel, but taking it out on him was easier at the moment than facing his own guilt. "While you sit on your ass-"

The chipped and broken windows high up on the walls shattered completely with a thunderclap of power. Sam flinched, the pressure that had been building finally popping with enough tangible force to feel like a slap across his entire body. Gabriel was still imprisoned within the circle, leather bindings smoking but thankfully intact. His face was a myriad of emotions, fury the primary one.

"You shut your cakehole," he hissed and spat, eyes locked on Dean Winchester. "That is my sister you are talking about, you mud monkey, and you are going to get her killed! I am protecting her by keeping her away from you!"

If Dean was taken aback by the ferocity of Gabriel's defense, he didn't show it. The confession, more than anything, proved Dean's point that the angel could never hurt Castiel. Not really.

"Cas is the best of all of you," he growled, voice low and dangerous. "The only one in your family worth a damn. Keeping him from us isn't gonna save him from anything. He'll make his own damn decision – and it's gonna be the right one – with or without input from me or you."

Gabriel's jaw snapped shut, clenched in an angry silence that covered a turmoil of emotions.

"So. You gonna let him go, or are we walking out of here with that fire left burning?" Dean's voice was a no-nonsense threat, and everyone heard it loud and clear.

The muscle in Gabe's jaw flexed as he ground his teeth, but he didn't say a word. Dean scoffed and turned away.

"So what? You're just gonna… you're gonna leave me here forever?" There was a vein of panic in the archangel's voice, but Dean didn't stop walking. Sam stared after his brother, even as he felt the angel's angry gaze shift his way. "Sam? Come on, Sam."

Dean pushed the nearest exit door open with a harsh squeal of metal. It slammed shut in his wake, and the younger Winchester turned back to the imprisoned angel. A tense quiet filled the space between them, Sam not quite meeting Gabe's fierce eyes.

"Can you heal her?"

Gabriel blinked, taken aback at the soft question. "What?"

Sam's brown eyes met his, and they were so damn earnest, Gabe found himself blinking again. "Castiel. You said her grace was…. Can you help her?"

It was Gabe's turn to look away. He hadn't meant to reveal all that. To let slip how conflicted he'd felt seeing the damage to his sister's grace. It had been a long time since he'd been around any of his siblings. It was frustrating, really, to find himself so quickly returning to old habits. Caring.

"Yeah," he muttered, still not looking into those stupidly desperate brown eyes. To acknowledge that maybe these humans cared about Cassie the same way he did when all physical evidence was to the contrary. "I'll help her."

Sam nodded, expression thankful and comforted. Gabe looked away again.

When the younger hunter turned and started walking away, however, his gaze snapped back. "Hey! Come on, seriously? You gotta let me out!" But Sam kept walking, so the archangel raised his voice. "I can't help her if I'm trapped here, you know!"

When Sam got to the door he paused, turning to meet Gabe's eyes. He reached over to the fire alarm on the wall beside the door and pulled the handle. Water sprang from the ceiling in a shower of droplets, and Gabe looked up at the ceiling, squinting in the rainfall.

"Just…don't hurt her, okay? She's our family too, Gabriel."

The clinking sound of something metallic and small bouncing across the cement floor drew Gabriel's gaze back down. The key to the handcuffs was just feet away, glinting in the firelight. The archangel turned his admittedly surprised – though no less pissed – gaze to the warehouse door, but Sam Winchester was gone.

The flames – sputtering, sizzling, and flickering – died down around him.

-o-o-o-

The Impala was right outside of the warehouse, and Dean had to close his eyes against the frustration of having no memory of parking her there. He simply had to trust that he had, and Gabe hadn't messed with his baby. They really needed to get her angel proofed. Soon as they figured out how to exclude Cas from the warding.

Dean was waiting in the driver's seat, checking over Baby's interior, when Sam came out of the warehouse. He closed the door slowly behind him, face pensive. Once he was safely in the passenger seat, Dean pulled away from the building.

"I triggered the sprinkler system," Sam confessed quietly, some miles later. He was staring out the window. Had been since they'd left the archangel behind. When Dean didn't say anything, he added, as if to explain himself, "Sometimes to gain trust, you have to give it first."

The man from the future cleared his throat, staring straight ahead as the seconds ticked by. Eventually, he nodded. He'd sort of figured that's what Sam had done, anyway. It's what they'd done last time. And Cas probably would be better off if the archangel made it back to her sooner rather than later.

"You're not wrong," he admitted, the words thick in his throat. "And I'm not gonna tell you it was the wrong move, either. Time'll tell."

Sam let out a quiet sigh and Dean merged the Impala onto the nearest highway, pointed towards Ohio's southwestern border. From there they'd turn due west, heading for South Dakota.

"What about Cas?"

The younger Winchester almost didn't ask the question, worried about the response it might trigger in his brother. But Cas deserved better than Sam's avoidance. She was one of them, and they were leaving her behind for lack of any other option. He understood it, but it didn't sit right with him. He knew it wouldn't be sitting right with Dean, either.

"She'll be alright, for now," the man from the future acknowledged begrudgingly.

He was pissed, of course, but less at Gabriel than he thought he'd be. No, at this point his anger had reached a higher level. He was sick of getting his angel back only to lose her to one thing or another. It was like Time itself disliked her presence this early in the timeline and kept stealing her away. Dean was getting real, real damn tired of it. Of feeling like there wasn't anything he could do to stop it from happening.

She would be alright, though. At least this time she was with a brother Dean knew wouldn't hurt her. Unlike with Uriel, Dean didn't have to worry. Well, as much. He was still going to worry plenty, and pray about as much. Because Cas was being held prisoner by one of her douchebag family members hellbent on keeping her away from the dirty, useless humans.

Dean really hated angels. All of 'em except Cas, of course.

“How do we get her back?”

The older Winchester sighed, part exhaustion, part frustration. They had no leverage on Gabe, not for averting the apocalypse and not for bargaining Cas’s return. Dean rubbed his chest, which seemed to ache with sympathy for his plight.

“I’m working on it,” is what he said, even though he had no plan. He didn’t even have the beginnings of a plan. But he’d figure out a way. Hell, He’d gone to Heaven and back to get her last time. Gabe couldn’t be nearly as much of a pain in the ass as that.

At least, he friggin’ hoped not.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns

: Sooooo, that got long real quick 👀 Usually during such a pivotal moment or important plot point, I try to use as much dialogue from the episode as possible. Some of it’s an ode to the show, some of it’s laziness (😒), most of its sticking to a wibbly-wobbly concept of ‘if nothing changed in the timeline, the character should say the same thing this time around.’ This one was a little rough, though, because I was pulling from multiple episodes, and I struggled deciding what to keep and what to skip. I think I maybe should have skipped a little more than I did □

They Left Cas?!?

I know, I know, I see how this looks. I swear, this both is and isn’t me, as the author, needing to keep Cas out of the way. I knooooooooooow. But I do, sorta, need her out of the way, and look, so does Gabe! 😬 How convenient for me!

But fear not, dear readers! Unlike when I got her out of the way with heaven that first time… or healing in heaven that second time… or healing at Bobby’s that third time… or going off to make some safe houses that fourth time (does that one even really count? It was only, like, yesterday story-time wise!) this time we’ll still get plenty of her in the story! Just, stuck with Gabriel 😬 Which means we get plenty of Gabriel in the story!

(That's right, you heard me. From this moment out, Gabriel is now a recurring character worthy of main title credits)

Comments:
Thank you everyone who took some time to comment on last chapter! I really needed it, and it was wonderful to get to be on your reading journeys through the game chapter. I appreciated that boost ❤ I have not replied to most of you, but I will be making an effort to get around to at least some this week.

(I am definitely battling a particularly anti-social bout of depression, so at the moment I am struggling just to answer texts Ugh, it's the worst. But as it clears up I'll hopefully start replying to comments a little more regularly!)

Fun Fact #90: Season 2 is now officially three times longer than it was supposed to be. Whoopeeeee! [insert headdesk here]

Thank you all for your encouragement and support! And for enjoying mah little beastie of a story

Cheers,

Silence

Chapter 125: Season 2: Chapter 91

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Me: [playing VR mini-golf at 12:15 in the morning] Whelp, I think I'm all set with the Castiel part. Thanks for the story help. Now, off to write!

Forestpelt: [Also playing putt putt and kicking my ass] Are you gonna post a chapter tomorrow?

Me: O.O Oh f!

Chapter Warnings: SO. This chapter might have a little cough less editing than normal cough cough. Shorter chapter as well, but it's all Castiel! That's right, you heard me, and ENTIRE CHAPTER of our favorite angel. And it only took… um… 123 chapters to pull it off? [headdesk]

Chapter References: Last time on the Gabe and Cas show! Gabriel commented on Cas's messed up grace and refused to let her put Angela into a memory loop, saying she'd just mess it up with her current state. The last we saw of Gabriel, he had received a prayer from Dean (saying they were giving up) and told Castiel he'd be right back, he just had to see a man about an Apocalypse.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 91

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Castiel was, admittedly, bored of staring at the large expanse of black, empty television screen in front of her. And it had taken a lot of staring before she'd been willing to admit that, stoic warrior that she was. She could turn her head, as only her chest and arms were affixed to the chair, but the rest of Gabriel's dwelling, at least what she could see of it, left little more to stare at.

It had been almost a full day since she had last seen her brother.

Castiel was unsure what Gabriel intended to do with the Winchesters, but considering his firm stance on the Apocalypse to come… it was not something Castiel could allow to come to pass. Unfortunately, there was little she could currently do to stop her brother.

Gabriel had not been completely wrong about the state of her grace, though he certainly had exaggerated parts of the diagnosis (for what Castiel could only assume was the dramatics of it all) (or so Angela would surely suggest, were her consciousness with him at the moment). While almost fully recovered from the Prince's trap – as much as it would ever be, at least – the physical appearance of Castiel's grace was… disagreeable.

Had another angel assisted with the healing, those cracks may have closed over with time, mending in appearance, though not strength. That was unlikely to ever fully recover, unfortunately. Like an old wound, Castiel would carry the evidence of the injury for the rest of her existence. Healed but never gone.

It was not much of a concern to her. Her grace was functional with or without scars. However, a healer would have performed a much better… cosmetic repair, Castiel reasoned. Patching the cracks had not been as important to her at the time as mending the grace. Gabriel's taunts, while annoying, were inconsequential. Nothing was more important than Castiel's mission to assist the Winchesters in averting the Apocalypse.

None of them were likely to come through such a task unscathed.

Of course, sending Angela into a loop of her own memories would hardly have been taxing. Gabriel was a ridiculous exaggerator Though, Castiel supposed, if she had been staring at a brother with recently fractured grace, messily mended by an amateur's hand, she too might be concerned. Perhaps not so… vocally , of course. But damage that severe was uncommon among angels, certainly not in the last several millennia. Not since the Fall, Castiel supposed.

Gabriel likely hadn't seen evidence of such trauma in a sibling since it had been Lucifer and Michael doing the damage.

The smaller angel decided the current train of thought was unproductive towards escaping and stowed it away for later contemplation. While placing Angela into a memory loop was well within the limits of her mended grace's abilities, breaking free of Gabriel's hold was not. She had attempted several times since the onset of her captivity, though those attempts had been strategically half-hearted. Mere tests against the limitations of her brother's restraints.

Limitations that were, unfortunately for Castiel, not within her restrained reach.

Realistically, as much as Castiel did not want to admit it, Gabriel's power was beyond her strength, restrained or free. A Power had no chance against an Archangel in any situation.

Still, that was no reason not to find a way. Castiel closed her eyes and put her not-inconsiderable strategic resources to work forming a plan. One that would not require her grace to break her out of her confines. Which, very unfortunately, meant relying on guile. Castiel tried not to feel as utterly hopeless about that as she very well knew she was.

She hadn't gotten far – certainly not as far along as she had hoped to be – when Gabriel came back. Unlike the previous times he had disappeared and reappeared in the apartment, this time the archangel came back through the front door. The Jack Russell Terrier the archangel kept for a pet was yipping happily at the return of his master, tail wagging as he pranced about Gabriel's legs.

The archangel paid him no mind, however, instead heading directly for the bound angel. His expression was grim, bordering on restrained fury, and Castiel immediately tried to withdraw from the approaching wrath.

A hand curled around the back of her chair and she was yanked off balance, tilted onto the back two legs.

"What have you done with the Winchesters?" she tried to ask, fearful of what an enraged archangel could have done to her charges. What came out, however, was a muffled, unintelligible mess of tangled sounds bound by tape.

"I'm so not in the mood," Gabriel growled as he dragged the chair and the angel bound to it across the floor towards the front door. Waving an arm, the coat closet beside the entryway flew open and he tossed both chair and sibling inside. The duo tilted dangerously to one side, given he'd spun her about so she faced him, before righting in a wobble on all four legs. "So shut it."

He slammed the closet door in the face of a bewildered Castiel, who was cast into the confines of darkness and several musty-smelling jackets.

She heard Gabriel muttering angrily to himself on the other side of the closet door for several minutes. His voice was too low and too muffled by the wood to properly hear, though she gathered he was talking to the dog. Ranting was probably a more proper term, considering the dog was not an active participant in the conversation.

Heavy footsteps passed by the closet door and Castiel straightened with expectation, but the door she heard open was not the one in front of her. It was the door to the apartment, and it slammed shut just as quickly.

The dwelling – her closet included – fell into heavy silence.

A moment passed in which Castiel, confused and uncertain as to what had led to this change of events, pondered the silence, unsure what to do next. The sound of small nails skittering across hardwood floors suggested the dog had retired to his bed by the TV. Castiel waited for several more minutes, but Gabriel did not come back.

There was no other noise or movement in the apartment for hours and, eventually, Castiel had to resign herself to waiting in the dark for the return of her brother and, hopefully, some answers.

-o-o-o-

When the closet door finally opened once more, Castiel expected her brother. Possibly wrathful (intent on releasing whatever anger remained onto his sister) or back to his falsely jovial, mischievous self (which was quite possibly worse, Castiel really wasn't sure). What she received was neither. The man standing in front of her was one she did not recognize, blinking wide, human eyes at her.

"Huh," he exclaimed rather bluntly. He had slicked-back, dark hair and a lanky, wiry frame which was covered in tight jeans, a white button up, and an ill-fitting vest. "There really is a woman in his closet. Usually Mr. Laufeyson is joking when he says stuff like that."

"You must release me," is what Castiel tried to say, though it more closely resembled, "Mff mfft rmm meef mee," which the human had very little chance of understanding.

"Sorry, Miss, but Mr. Laufyeson was very specific. I'm not supposed to talk to you." The human reached into the closet, taking a long, red leash off a hook on the wall. Gabriel's dog raced into view, yipping excitedly as he circled the human's feet. "We'll be back in a little bit."

The man closed the closet door once more, and the sound of him and the dog leaving through the front door left Castiel in stunned silence once again.

-o-o-o-

Castiel's glare when the closet door opened once more was nothing short of irate. The human had the decency to look apologetic, at the very least, as he hung the dog leash on the wall where it apparently belonged. The dog was preoccupied in the kitchen, muzzle deep in a bowl piled high with food – the contents of which were entirely inappropriate for the diet of a small canine, from what Castiel could tell – which was being devoured at an alarming rate.

"Erm… well, Mr. Laufeyson didn't say anything about keeping you in the closet, I suppose," the human offered with a weak smile that was far more of a grimace, considering the bound angel's obvious displeasure. "Let me just…"

The man dragged Castiel's chair forward by the arms. The legs of the chair scraped loudly across the hardwood floors, causing both humanoids to wince at the noise. Once out of the closet, the human turned her around and dragged her in a very similar fashion as Gabriel had, only far less easily, until she was positioned once more in front of the TV.

Castiel's protests, grievances, insistence for freedom, pleas, and threats – all equally unintelligible through the duct tape – were ignored.

"Sorry I can't untie you," the human offered in apology as he adjusted the angle of the chair, regarded the positioning of the angel, and approved of his choices with a nod. He reached for the remote, resting atop the arm of the lazy boy beside Castiel. "It's just, Mr. Laufeyson pays for me not to ask questions, and he pays well . So. Animal Planet?"

The television turned on with a click and a warm buzz. The human shuffled through channels faster than Castiel could keep track before settling on two cheetahs chasing a gazelle through wide open, golden plains.

This must be the Animal Planet, whatever that was. Castiel missed Angela Garrett fiercely in moments such as these.

“Okay, so… uh, I’ll be back same time tomorrow. See you then!”

The human made his exit in quick order, leaving the bound angel and feasting dog alone once more.

-o-o-o-

The human did, indeed, return the next day at the same time. Gabriel’s dog was glad to see him, for he had spent most of the morning trying to nap on the warm space provided by Castiel’s thighs, meeting with little success. The third time he slipped off – entirely his own fault, as he was wont to roll in his sleep, belly to the sky – the dog had regarded her with such disdain that the angel had not been entirely surprised when he lifted his leg and urinated on her pant leg.

Displeased, of course, but not surprised.

“You know,” the human said once he had cleaned up the mess and patted her leg dry the best he could with paper towels, “he’d warm up to you a lot more if you paid him some attention. He loves having his belly scratched! You could try that.”

Castiel stared up at the human, wrists and chest bound to the chair, and tried her very best to ask exactly how she was supposed to do that with an irritated gaze alone. The human didn’t take notice of the predicament, so she must not have done a very good job of it.

When they returned from their walk, the human asked if she needed anything – to which she muffled through another round of demands to be set free – before departing once more.

The dog jumped into her lap for attempt number four, and Castiel resigned herself once more to another twelve hours of Animal Planet. Which, it turned out, was recordings and narration about Earth’s many animals, of which she already knew everything there was to know. In fact, many of the programs got details wrong, particularly about the mental and emotional capacity of many species. It was rather tiring, actually.

-o-o-o-

When the human returned on the third day, Castiel regarded him with such desperate eyes (she’d been practicing) that he relented.

“How about the movie channel?” he asked, picking up the remote with a sympathetic smile.

Castiel dropped her head, let out a sound of pure defeat, and nodded dejectedly.

-o-o-o-

Gabriel's dog, while certainly spoiled to a fault (that fault being a complete and utter disregard for obedience or respect), was not all that bad, Castiel reasoned. It was rather nice to have company, even if that company was consistently unimpressed with her presence.

They had worked out something of a compromise on the whole napping situation. Castiel would roll her feet to the tips of her shoes, decreasing the angle of her thighs and providing the dog a flatter space with which to take a nap. It was tedious, but it did seem to please the small creature. And unlike a human, Castiel could keep the position for as long a period of time as the dog deemed necessary.

It would be easier if the canine was a feline, Castiel thought during the dusk hours of the third day of Gabriel's absence. Sometimes when the dog strutted by, he would rub himself against Castiel's leg for attention. The angel did her best to return the gesture, knowing the creature sought the companionable comfort of touch, but she was limited in what she could do while bound.

A cat was far more likely to do the work itself, which would be a great relief. Cats did so love rubbing themselves against humans, as Castiel had observed on multiple occasions (and had experienced personally a handful of times across the millennia). They were neither shy about their affections, nor particularly displeased when such attention was rebuffed. Plus, they were far more appropriately sized for laps.

Yes, this would definitely be easier were Gabriel's dog to become a cat instead.

-o-o-o-

Castiel was watching a movie about a British spy who (for reasons she had not quite followed) was now participating in an international poker game, when there was noise at the front door. Surprised, for the human dog walker did not come at this time of day, the angel turned her head to the door as it swung open, revealing her brother. The archangel, who did not look his usual playful self but still rather serious, froze at the sight of his angelic house guest and less-angelic house pet.

Jack was sitting on his hunches in Castiel's lap, very much in the shape of a cat.

A significantly lengthened tail of silky black fur flicked from its place. curled about a slim, feline body, and he regarded Gabriel with slit pupils and an unblinking stare. Above him, Castiel's expression was an open book: eyes the size of saucers, eyebrows up yet somehow still void of emotion. Gabriel was certain that had there not been tape over her mouth, those lips would be ever so slightly parted and downturned in a nervous frown.

It all said, so clearly, 'I didn't do anything, I swear.'

Gabriel burst into laughter. He didn't try to hold back as it bubbled up from deep in his belly. He doubled over, one hand braced on the wall, the other on one knee. He laughed so hard he almost choked on his own mirth.

Jack jumped off Castiel's lap and, tail in the air, strutted out of the room.

"Oh, dear Dad," Gabriel straightened, wiping at his eyes. "Oh, that was brilliant."

Castiel looked like she could not decide between being worried and being annoyed. Gabe took pity on her.

"Didn't I tell you? Could have sworn I did. Jackie does that," he offered with an ear-to-ear smile, eyes still shining with mirth. He threw himself into his Lazy Boy, shoulders still shaking. Castiel's expression was leaning decidedly towards annoyance.

"He used to be a lot bigger. And a wolf! We had to downsize to fit through the apartment door." He spun the chair towards his sister with a lazy grin. "I take it you're a cat person?"

Castiel frowned, as if she didn't know what kind of person she was. Oh, right, she wasn't a person at all; she was an angel of the Lord, and they were neither dog nor cat people. Castiel settled on annoyed. Definitely annoyed.

It triggered another round of laughter from her brother.

"Ah, I needed that." Gabriel let out a deep, content sigh as his laughter settled into an occasional chuckle. He felt better than he had all this past week. Spinning about lazily, he caught sight of Castiel once more. She was entirely unamused. "Oh, right."

The archangel reached forward and ripped the tape from his sister's mouth. Once more, she didn't even flinch. Serious spoil sport.

"Sorry about the closet," Gabriel apologized mostly sincerely, head bobbing side to side. "That was a pretty dick move. I needed time to cool off. But hey, Lenny took good care of you, didn't he?"

He gestured to the fact that she was no longer in the closet. If anything, his sister looked even more annoyed. Gabriel delightfully ignored it, twirling his hand through the air, coming back with a can of pop in his grip.

"You know how I found him? He pickpocketed me. Me! Pretty good at it, too, for a kid." The archangel popped the soda, then summoned another loopty-loop straw with a quick snap. He plopped it into the can and took a long, slurping draw. He turned his head to Castiel with a Chesshire grin, straw lazily spinning in the can's small opening. "Talent like that shouldn't be wasted. Don't you agree?"

"What have you done with-"

"The Winchesters. Yes, them ," Gabriel finished for her with a look. He wanted to sigh, definitely roll his eyes, and maybe put his sister back in the closet. Ultimately, though, the archangel decided he'd been cruel enough to the smaller angel. So he did none of those things and instead answered honestly. "Nothing. They called me out."

Castiel's eyebrows climbed into her hairline, blue eyes wide with… was that hope he saw? Oh brother.

"Yup. Put me in a ring of holy fire . Wonder where they got that idea." He tilted his head towards the other angel, one eyebrow raised accusingly.

"I did not reveal your identity," Castiel returned, face forcefully stoic in a way that told Gabriel she knew exactly how the Winchesters figured it out. Whether or not she'd admit it to him. When he harrumphed in reply, she pierced him with a glare. "You did not give me any opportunity."

Well, she wasn't wrong there. Which only piqued the archangel-turned-trickster's curiosity all the more. Somehow, she had found a way to tell them. Or… they'd already known. Gabriel puckered his lips as cartoonishly as possible and wrapped them around the tip of the straw. He tucked the plastic into his cheek and started chewing on it obnoxiously. He glanced at Castiel, the littlest angel that could, out of the corner of his eye.

"Is Dean Winchester from a different timeline?"

His sister hid her surprise well. Gabriel barely even caught the recoil, but catch it he did.

"Wasn't all that hard to figure out," he offered with a smirk in the corner of his mouth. "That man of yours talks a lot. Like, a lot, a lot. And that's something, coming from me."

Castiel sighed. Audibly sighed. Gabriel could barely contain his glee.

"Yes. Dean is from the future," the smaller angel confessed, avoiding her brother's gaze by staring at the TV, still playing the spy movie. Agent zero zero seven was now being tortured by the man he had beaten in the poker game. Castiel was not certain she properly understood human entertainment. In moments like this, he missed Angela. She was excellent at explaining movies in a way that made sense. Or, at the very least, made them entertaining. "A timeline from which I sent him back to avert the Apocalypse."

"Ah-ha!" Gabriel shook his head, looking far too amused for the topic of conversation. Castiel turned to stare at him. "I knew they were cheating! So Dean comes back from failing the first go around, summons you down – breaking the timeline, I might add – and convinces you – just like that – that you and him can change it."

Castiel frowned. "We can change it. We already have."

Gabriel scoffed and leveled a look at his sister that caused something inside her chest to clench uncomfortably. "Have you, now?"

She eyed him with a hint of wariness. "Yes. Not enough to avert the apocalypse, not yet. But we will."

"Well… I think you're wrong."

Castiel frowned at her brother's words, said so simply, as if there was no other option but the one he declared.

"I think you've been duped by two – admittedly persuasive, I'll give you that – human mooks. They're wrong, too, of course. What's coming is written in stone , Cassie. You should know better. But hey," Gabriel reached over to the side table next to the Lazy Boy and picked up the TV remote, “I’m nothing if not a fair guy. I’ll give you a chance to prove me wrong.”

With a click and a buzz, the television turned on. His sister was staring at him, that wariness growing.

“What do you mean?”

“I think Dean is going to sell his soul for his brother and jumpstart the Apocalypse, little sis,” the archangel proclaimed, tone inappropriately cheerful. It irked the other angel immensely. “He couldn’t manage not to in my fake reality, so I don’t see him standing much chance in this one. You think he won’t – by some miracle, I might add – and if he doesn’t, that will fix everything! All hunky-dory.”

The black screen of the television flickered to life, revealing a wet night outside a small building on the side of a country road. Neon-lit signs indicated the human dwelling provided fuel and sustenance.

“Guess we’ll see who’s right, huh?”

Castiel turned a slow, piercing gaze from the television set to her brother. She recognized the tangible weight pooling in her stomach as dread. “Gabriel, what did you do?”

“I got the ball rolling. Might have told a demon or two where to find the Winchesters.” He held up an object, delicately pinched between two fingers. It was a hex bag: one of the Winchesters. The last of their supply, formally hidden within the safe confines of the Impala. “Pickpocketing ain’t all Lenny’s good for. Did you know Dean warded that car of his against angels? Sheesh. Paranoid much?”

A vehicle pulled onto screen, and Castiel took in a sharp breath at the sight of the Impala, coming to a stop outside the building. Dean Winchester climbed out of the driver’s seat and the heart Castiel did not need started to beat very fast.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: See! A whole chapter of Cas! In… the closet…

We’re doing Jane so damn proud. I think at this point even she’d be fed up with the pace of this burn

Okay, I know that was mostly filler, but hopefully it was entertaining filler! And necessary to set up our -- wait for it – waaaaaaaaaait for it – SEASON 2 FINALE, whaaaaaaaa?! No way. You mean…. FINALLY?!?!?!? Sixy whole chapters later than predicted/aniticpated/necessary?!!?

[Did I mention a headdesk yet? No? Well HEADDESK]

Gabriel's Dog, Jack: A reviewer asked if the name choice for Gabriel's dog (who does appear on the show in Tall Tales, but never again), was a reference to Jack Kline. It was not, actually. The dog is a Jack Russell Terrier It seemed right up Gabe's alley to name his dog something that was just one step above naming him "Dog". I almost, aaaaaalmost called him "Wolfie" and also hinted as to why

Also, he shapeshifted into a cat because of all the wonderful, adorable artwork I have seen of Castiel and cats. I don't know how/when that became a thing, but it's definitely a thing. And it's adorable.

Fun Fact #121: I have figured out how to sneak Jack (Kline) into this story, at least in reference! It won't be for a while, but I'm very proud of figuring out how to wiggle something of him into the first five seasons

Fun Fact#808: During this chapter I learned that "loopty-loop", which I have always used to refer to a roller coaster's loop, actually comes from Loop-the-Loop, which was the name of a very early looping roller coaster!

Hope you all enjoyed! I know this one was short, especially since lately all chapters have been damn near twice as long. Next chapter will be back to being that long Because of course it is. [authors wanders off muttering different variations of the word "verbose" to herself]

Cheers,
Silence

Chapter 126: Season 2: Chapter 92

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Ooookay, so it's Sunday. Y'all probably knew it was Sunday. I… vaguely new it was Sunday. But more in the "that's the name of the day" sort of way and not in the 'hey, you were supposed to post a chapter last night' way that actually mattered. So, heh, apologies for the late update! I realized this morning and spent the day editing (because I forgot/slipped up enough that the chapter wasn't even ready to go) At least it was an enjoyable chapter to edit. Especially since it is twice as long as usual. Because of course it is.

Chapter References: Since this is a bit of a prep-chapter for all that is about to come, there is a lot going on! Few things to remember.

--> Gabe broke Dean's favorite ivory-inlaid gun during the Mystery Spot Redo.

--> Dean hasn't worn his Amulet since the first month of time-traveling (too much of a reminder of what it represents to him). However, when Sam called him out on it, he hung it on the rear-view mirror (to honor what it represents to Sam) and it has been there ever since.

--> During the bank heist/shapeshifter fiasco with Ronald Resnik, Roger "Okie Dokie" Miller was the security guard for Milwaulkee Trust International.

--> Cole Trent went MIA from the military when he spotted Dean on TV at the robbery.

--> And lastly, our favorite FBI Agent Victor Henriksen has been working with Dave "the Analyst" Attingwood (who many of you have called out as being a possible demon) to identify the Winchester's cell phone numbers from every number that was active in the Sturgis Hospital during Andy's stay. Poor Demon Dave (I'm not actually admitting he's a demon. I'm just playing along with alliteration. Because I can. And because I'm evil.)

Chapter Warnings: If that wasn't hint enough, we're busy this chapter! Dean and Sam are still searching for Ava, Ron and Ash are teaming up, Bobby's restricting Andy to the grounds, Andy isn't listening because when you gotta go, you gotta go, Roger "okie dokie" Miller is paid a visit, Henriksen apologizes and doesn't spontaneously combust (it's a pre-season-finale miracle!), Tom's got himself a new body, Persephone's asking Chuck the hard questions, and things. Are. Finally. HAPPENING.

Here we goooooooooo!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 92

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

"Yeah, yeah, we got it," Dean said as he leaned against the front of the Impala, phone pressed to his ear. He glanced over his shoulder at Sam, who was sitting in the passenger seat, window rolled down, having a conversation of his own with the Roadhouse. "We'll make ourselves scarce. Thanks for the heads up, Bobby."

The older Winchester shut the phone with an aggravated sigh, tilting his head back and closing his eyes against the noonday sun.

Really, when were they going to get a break?

They had been missing for five days. And in that time, friggin' FBI Special Agent Victor Henriksen had shown up on Bobby's door. It wasn't entirely surprising – one of the reasons the boys had chosen to clear out of Sioux Falls was because of the possibility – but it was a pain in the ass, regardless. Henriksen hadn't done anything more than throw his weight around, but Bobby couldn't rule out the property being under watch. He didn't think the FBI had sufficient cause for a warrant or surveillance, but now they wouldn't know for sure.

Dean couldn't recall Henriksen ever bothering Bobby before. Which meant they'd changed shit again and didn't that just figure. Not like any of the unexpected changes they'd dealt with so far had ended well for them, and Dean had no illusions that this would somehow be the exception. Not with Henriksen involved. Of the many things they'd faced over the years – demons, angels, monsters, humans, the friggin end of the world – the Law had always been the most frustrating, efficient, and painful distraction. Never an enemy, not really, but absolutely the most bullheaded of obstacles. From local LEOs to FBI, getting the Colt back to hunting down Lucifer, the threat of being locked up was hardly the scariest thing they'd faced, but damn if it wasn't always the one thing they never had time for.

Especially now that their access to Angel Air had been cut off for the foreseeable future.

Worse yet, Henriksen had gone and dragged local law enforcement into it. Bobby hadn't named the Sheriff who'd shown up at his door, but he hadn't needed to. The town only had one.

Jody.

Dean hadn't flinched at the mention of her at all, and his chest – both human and angelic – certainly hadn't ached at the thought of seeing that particular friendly face.

Not that it would be friendly right now.

The man from the future lowered his head with a silent sigh, stowing all that ache away somewhere he couldn't feel it quite as strongly. They had bigger problems that future friends lost to time travel. Like the loss of access to their best (and only) safehouse. If they couldn't go back to Bobby's, the boys were left traveling the roads. Which wasn't foreign to them by any means – they'd done just that for years before the presence of demons brought them back to Bobby's front door.

But somehow, it felt wrong, now. No Bobby, no Cas. It felt like all the cards were stacking up against them. Like something big was coming. And Dean, no matter how much he'd tried to prepare, just wasn't ready for it yet.

Scrubbing a hand through his hair rather viciously, the older Winchester pushed off Baby and made his way around her to Sam's open window.

"Thanks, Ellen," his brother was saying from where he was seated inside the Impala, catching Dean's eye with a nod. The dark circles under his eyes (formed over a dozen Sundays and then a Russian roulette of games) hadn't improved with the night of sleep they'd tried to get in a heavily warded, angel-proofed motel room. "Have him call us whenever it comes through."

Sam lowered the phone and rested his elbow on the door, device in hand. At Dean's raised brows, he said, "Ellen says Ash has some new data for you, but the algorithm's still running."

The older Winchester shrugged, nonplussed. "It's nothing I don't already know."

And maybe if Ash kept that information to himself this time, demons wouldn't feel the need to blow him up. Dean could only be so hopeful.

"Don't be so sure," his brother said with a disbelieving half-smile. "Apparently Ronald is the one who gave him the idea."

Dean's eyebrows climbed in surprise. Huh. Imagine that (and he totally was – the idea of Ronald Resnik and Ash teaming up on anything was… well, it was something, alright). Perhaps, for once, Dean was going to be proven wrong about their track record with timeline changes.

"Damn," is what he said, matching the smile on Sam's face with one of his own. "Alright, then. Guess we'll see."

"Ellen said he'll call us when he's got the results. Until then," Sam tapped the side of the car with his cell (gently, of course. Heaven forbid he get Dean started on a rant about the car's paint job), and Dean raised his eyebrows questioningly. He knew the signal, his brother was telling him to get in the car. "There's something up in Wisconsin. Part of Ash's algorithm, I guess. Lots of unidentified omens? Maybe demonic, Ash doesn't know. It doesn't have any ties to the other psychic kids yet, but…"

"It's something." Dean nodded in agreement, trying to absorb some of that optimistic energy for himself. If Sam could muster it, then so could Dean. He knew his kid brother was still worried about the missing Ava Wilson. If Sam wasn't planning on giving up the search for her anytime soon, no matter what distractions – bank robberies or Tricksters-turned-angels – got in their way, then neither would Dean. Omens weren't much, especially if they weren't even the usual demonic ones, but they were something, which was more than anything they currently had to go on. "We'll take it."

Sam was already sliding over into the driver's seat, which resulted in Dean's eyebrows turning decidedly judgmental, but he ultimately opened the passenger door and climbed in. As they pulled away, Sam switched the radio on, adjusting the tuning knob. Dean's eyebrows went full Bitchface.

"Driver picks the music," the younger Winchester offered with a pleased grin. He didn't even have to finish that statement – Credence Clearwater Revival already coming through the speakers – for Dean to start groaning.

-o-o-o-

When Bobby got off the phone with Dean, Andy was rolling on the balls of his feet. Sarge's leash was clenched tightly in both hands, the kid having been about to take the German Shepherd for a walk around the property when the boys had finally called. Now Andy was waiting anxiously for whatever news Dean had about where they'd been for the last week and a half. Sarge was sprawled at his feet, deciding on a nap since a walk was apparently not in the cards yet.

"Boys found themselves a Trickster," Bobby started, pulling his hat off and running a hand through his hair. Andy's widened and the fidgeting got worse. "Which turned out to be an archangel in disguise."

(And boy, did Bobby have words for the time-traveling Winchester about that. How, exactly, had the archangel Gabriel, disguised as a trickster (who had, apparently, messed with the boys multiple times in his timeline), not made it into his cliff-notes on the future?!)

Andy's eyes grew impossibly wider and Bobby raised a hand to stop the rapid-fire Sign already in progress. Sarge's leash was forgotten, draped haphazardly over an elbow as he frantically moved his hands.

"Everyone's fine, for the most part. Cas got nabbed-" he had to raise that hand again when Andy immediately launched into another round of hand gestures – "but Dean's certain she's alright. Gabriel won't let her go, but apparently he won't hurt her, either."

Or so Dean said. Unfortunately for everyone else involved, there wasn't much they could do but trust his future knowledge. And where Feathers was concerned, Bobby knew better than to question it. If Dean said she'd be alright, then she'd be alright.

Lord knew (and so did everybody else) that boy would move Heaven and Earth if he thought otherwise.

Andy deflated a bit, but it was a mix of released tension as well as distress. Bobby could relate. He put his cap back on.

"As for the FBI-" The kid straightened, distress returning but in a rigid sort of way- "Dean agrees. You're lying low. Which means no leaving the house."

Hands started flying, blurring with the speed the kid was trying to protest. But Bobby was having none of it.

"And," he added loudly, forcing Andy to curl his gesturing fingers into fists and listen. Not something the kid was great at. Or thrilled to be doing. Well, tough luck. Bobby reached forward, taking a hold of the dog leash, pulling it free from where it was tucked into the crook of Andy's elbow. "We're getting too close to Azazel's battle royale. Which means you are camping out in the panic room from here on out."

Andy's eyes all but bulged out of his head. He waved his hands – really, the full length of his arms – in a big, crystal-clear gesture that said 'Oh Hell no.'

'That's in May!' he argued immediately in Sign. 'That's two months away! You can't keep me locked up for two months!'

"I can and I will if it keeps you alive, kid," Bobby argued right back, though he knew realistically he had no real way of keeping Andy locked inside. But if the kid was smart, he'd listen. It was his life they were discussing, after all.

Andy stared. And stared.

When he lunged forward suddenly, Bobby wasn't all that surprised. It didn't stop Andy from snatching the leash back and bolting for the front door. Sarge scrambled to his feet, nipping at the kids heels as he followed, barking joyously at the new game. Bobby gave chase, hollering at them both.

The images that flashed through his brain were a jumbled mess of protestation, childish outrage, and desperate pleas to at least let him live in the van, of all things.

-o-o-o-

"Alright, so," Agent Attingwood drawled into his FBI issued desk phone, receiver pinched between his ear and shoulder so he could juggle a stack of papers in one hand, scroll through a spreadsheet on his monitor, and type one-handed with the other. He'd been the damn King of Multitasking since Agent Henriksen had given him the Phone Number Assignment from Hell (what he'd been calling it in his head for the last three months) in addition to all his other Analyst work (thank God Victor had finally gotten him a starting number or it would be another three months before he had anything worth calling the man over). "With that number you gave me, assuming it is Robert Singer's cell-"

"It is," came the confident, intimidating voice that had never once actually intimidated Dave in the slightest. It reminded him of his older brother, really. Just like Agent Henriksen, Josh thought he was right about everything all the time too. And was equally terrible at admitting when he wasn't.

"-even though you refuse to tell me how you got it," Dave continued, completely unphased. "If it's the real deal, then I've narrowed it down to three numbers in the Sturgis area that consistently sent messages and made calls to one another or Mr. Singer during the time frame you provided."

Dave flipped the top page of the stack, said numbers highlighted among hundreds of calls made in the week-long period the Winchesters were believed to be in and out of that hospital. "Of the three, two consistently texted back and forth with the third, while only making a few calls or texts to each other. I can only assume – emphasis on the assumption part of this, so no blaming me if it's wrong later – that those two numbers belong to the Winchesters, and the third is Andy Gallagher."

"Run them," Henriksen demanded immediately, hardly letting Dave finish, let alone congratulate him on the gargantuan feat of pinpointing three numbers among thousands. "I wanna know where those phones are and who else they've been talking to."

Dave huffed. A little appreciation would be nice. And certainly not misplaced.

"Gee, Analyst Dave, great job with that!" Agent Attingwood said into the phone, making a face he knew Henriksen couldn't see. "You're the best! I sure take you for granted!"

"Agent Attingwood," Henriksen warned, and Dave sighed.

"You're impossible, you know that? And also, totally undervaluing my skills." Before Henriksen could warn him further – which Dave could tell was coming – he continued, "I already ran them, Mr. Bossy."

Silence stretched down the line. Dave enjoyed it immensely.

"And?" Victor practically barked.

"Aaaaand," David drawled, using one hand to scroll down his spreadsheet to the data he needed. "The Winchesters are currently off-grid, if they're even still using those phones. There's been no usage, coming in or going out. Last ping was from a college town in Ohio, two weeks ago."

Henriksen growled down the line, and Dave decided he'd probably had enough fun. He did value his job, after all. He'd rather keep it.

"However, Robert Singer has been in frequent contact with a number in Nebraska registered as a… uh, hold on," Dave had to switch tabs, pulling up the search he'd made minutes before calling Agent Henriksen, "a bar and restaurant in central Nebraska called the Roadhouse. Listed owner is Eleanor Harvelle."

"Any information on her?"

"Not much." Dave shuffled papers again, looking for the file he'd printed out on the woman. "No priors, she's owned the bar since her husband passed in a hunting accident-"

"Hunting?"

Dave blinked at the surprise – and suspicion – in Victor's voice. He double checked the info. "Uh… yeah. Don't have the details. Want me to get them?"

"Yes. And I want a full workup on this Harvelle woman."

David resisted sighing. It was all he managed to resist. "I do have other work, you know. Other agents in the FBI who need things too. Whole office full of 'em."

The growl that came down the line did not form words. Dave rolled his eyes but jotted down Ellen Harvelle's name on a pad of sticky-notes on his desk, half buried under all the work he was currently doing for the demanding agent.

"As for Andy Gallagher, he has been chatting up a proverbial storm," Dave continued, switching back to his spreadsheet and shuffling papers once more for the list of numbers this particular phone had been texting. "No calls, weirdly enough-"

"The man's mute," Henriksen interrupted with a gruff response.

"Aaaaand that information would have been seriously helpful three months ago," David deadpanned. "'Our suspect can't talk, so look for a number that only sends texts, Dave.'"

Silence stretched down the line again, though this one had a distinct flavor of not-angry to it.

"Sorry."

Dave blinked. Then blinked again. He straightened, freeing one hand to pull the phone away from his shoulder and stare at it. It wasn't spontaneously combusting. Huh.

"Apology accepted," David said, still stunned he'd gotten one, as he tucked the phone back into his ear. "Alright, so now we can be a lot more confident that number is Andy Gallagher's. So, Mr. Gallagher has been texting the Winchesters' numbers a decent amount, or at least he was when they were still receiving. He's also texting a number with a Nebraska area code – same as the Roadhouse – that has been all over the place."

And Dave meant all over the place. Montana, Wyoming, Iowa, Michigan, Utah, New Mexico, Arizona, and that was just the last two months. There were plenty more states before that. Whoever owned that number lived on the road, far as the analyst could figure.

"It's a pre-paid, so I don't have a name for you," he continued, only a little bit apologetic (he was a damn boss for getting Henriksen all this already). "And last of all we have a Sioux Falls number he's been texting a lot-"

"Wait, what?" Victor's voice had taken on that surprise-suspicion thing again.

"It's not that surprising," Dave replied, digging for the file he'd printed up on the woman who owned the number. The only surprising thing, really, was that she was a sheriff. "Given that Mr. Gallagher's number has pinged off a Sioux Falls tower almost exclusively. Guy doesn't really get around much."

The silence that followed wasn't so much a silence as an intake of breath and a beat.

"What?"

Even Dave straightened, phone falling from his shoulder to be caught in his hand. "What, what? What'd I miss?"

"Robert Singer lives in Sioux Falls," Henriksen all but growled.

"Yeah," David answered easily enough, confused as to why that information – readily available and widely known at this point – was a big deal. "Singer Salvage Yard, just outside city limits. The same place the number's coming from, probably, given the tower it keeps pinging off of is, like, two miles down the road from that address. Why's that a big deal?"

The only answer he got was the dial tone of an agent that had just hung up on him. Dave sighed and put the phone back on its cradle on his over-crowded desk.

"Thanks, Dave. You really cracked the case, Dave. You're awesome, Dave!"

The FBI analyst gave a little shake of his head in something between irony and resignation and got back to work. Twenty minutes later, still annoyed at Victor hanging up on him (not surprised. Hardly surprised. He knew the man, after all. Just annoyed, is all), Dave decided to do a little digging of his own. He typed Agent Henriksen's government-issued cell phone number into his computer and clicked on the last number he'd contacted, seconds after he'd hung up on Dave.

A federal judge.

Huh. Guess whatever information Dave had provided was enough to get a warrant.

-o-o-o-

Persephone lowered the pages of Chuck's latest chapter, settling them in her lap as she transferred her gaze to the window right beside her. A woman was walking past the prophet's house, a dog trotting several feet in front of her at the end of a leash. The mailwoman was making her rounds in the odd, square truck that all mail carriers seemed to use. The world beyond kept spinning, heedless of what was coming.

She had already read this section of the novel twice. The prophet seemed to be dragging his feet writing what remained. Persephone was not entirely surprised. It was clear from the mounting tension of his latest writing that they were building to something. The Grand Finale, as human entertainment would call it, usually in a tone that implied nothing good to come.

Just like the author, Persephone was not entirely sure she wanted to get there in any rush, either.

"Hey, Steph?"

The millennia-old creature turned her head to the prophet, who was sitting at his makeshift desk across the room from her. He had a pen in hand and another tucked behind his ear, which he had probably forgotten was there. His right leg was bouncing up and down in a manner Persephone had quickly learned to read as unease.

"Yes, Chuck?"

"Do you, uh… want to, um…" Chuck tried for a smile, but it was a faltering, weak thing that he gave up halfway through. He cleared his throat, instead. "Are you okay?"

"Of course," she replied immediately, uncertain why he would feel the need to ask.

"Oh. Uh. Right. Good, I mean! That's, uh… good." The writer turned back to his computer, that leg jiggling faster now.

Persephone set the pages down on a side table and rose from her curled position. She didn't need to reread them a third time and the prophet's behavior suggested something was up. Persephone made her way over to the writer, who had clearly noticed her approach, given his leg stilled, then resumed its bounce, then stilled again. All the while he kept his gaze locked on his screen, fingers poised to write, even tapping nervously at a key or two, but not actually pressing any of them.

She came to stand beside the desk, positioned against the back of the couch. She leaned against the sofa, arms crossed casually, which was far more relaxed than anything she'd done when she first showed up on his doorstep all those months ago. As far as Stephanie went, it was downright making herself at home.

"Are you alright?" she asked the writer.

"Yeah, yeah, totally. I'm great. Wonderful. A-Okay." Chuck leaned back in his chair, going for casual as well but missing by a mile. His hands landed in his lap as he turned towards her, abandoning the attempt. The shaky smile was back. Steph raised her eyebrows at its return.

"Is your head starting to hurt?" She automatically reached for his pill container, buried in the couch cushions from the prophet's last headache-inducing burst of inspiration.

"No, it's not that," Chuck admitted, then winced when he realized he'd just confirmed it was something. "Just the, uh, story. Going somewhere I'd prefer it didn't. As usual."

As Stephanie straightened from the sofa, pills in hand, she regarded the writer with an expression he couldn't read. Chuck turned away from it, fearing it was pity, and instead reached over to his laptop and struck a key. The printer next to Steph stuttered to life, spitting out page after page until a healthy collection lay in its tray. Chuck grabbed them, hesitating only for a moment, before he held them out to his editorial assistant.

"Here you go. Final chapter."

In the moment it took his assistant to take them, the writer couldn't help but stare at the freshly printed pages. So fresh the ink would still smudge if he rubbed at it hard enough. For a moment, Chuck entertained doing just that. Just rubbing away the last hour of work – the last year's, the last millennia, the last… forever, really – and do it all over again.

The writer shook his head, freeing himself of such morbid and… existential thoughts. The story was what it was; it always seemed to write itself more than Chuck ever did. There was something weird about that, but the prophetic author didn't dwell on it. He had bills to pay, and he supposed this was at least one way to do that.

Stephanie took those final pages with what Chuck would call trepidation. But that was probably just in his head. The back of her hand bumped against his (or maybe it was the other way around?) and Chuck stared at the spot on his hand as he brought it back to his lap. His fingers felt fiercely warm and kinda tingly.

He wondered if Steph noticed, because she rubbed at her hand as well, the motion absentminded. The writer wondered about that, at the contact and the fact that she was always somehow nicer after moments like this. The poor man tried not to read too much into those times. Instead, he turned back to his lonely computer and all the death and horrors he'd written there.

"Hey, Chuck?" Steph had dropped her hand, but she had that distant look in her eye she always got at times like this. Chuck didn't know what to make of it, but something deep within him, something he didn't even realize existed most days, had taken great care to encourage that slowly growing ember. "Do you know what's going to happen next?"

It was a weird question to ask of an author, Chuck thought. Then again, he seemed to be the kind of author that didn't know what was in store for his characters. Last minute planner, his publisher had teased, but Chuck always wondered if it was more than that. If it was weird not to feel in control of your own story.

"No," Chuck answered honestly, because he liked to think he was at the point of friendship with Stephanie that he could be honest. Maybe not honest enough to tell her he didn't even like his own story most days. But honest enough. "I don't. Sometimes I think the story will go one way, but usually when I write it… it's completely different. Not the way I'd have taken it at all."

The writer frowned at that, scrunching up one side of his face. He wondered what it would be like to write the story he wanted to write, and not the one that came to him in flashes of bright lights and a lot of head pain.

"What do you want to happen next?"

Chuck – and something altogether not Chuck – blinked in surprise. He glanced over at his editorial assistant, not sure why the question caught him off guard as much as it did. He supposed… no one had ever asked him that before. Probably because it had never occurred to anyone to need to.

"Oh. Um. Well…" Chuck had to pause, had to actually think about that answer. Funny, that. It turned out he hadn't thought to ask himself, either. The prophet smiled almost idly. "I think something big is coming," he admitted with a slight shrug. "And, well… it sounds silly, but… I want everyone to pull through."

Steph was staring at him in that way he couldn't read again. Whatever it was, it was kinda nice, even if he was pretty sure it was more pity than anything else.

"Guess it's not very good writing if everyone makes it out unscathed, though, huh?" Chuck sighed with another shrug, this one far more self-deprecating than the previously awkward one. "Tragedy maketh money, and all that. Not that I'm making much money, of course."

He chuckled with embarrassment, completely missing the downturn to Stephanie's lips. But the thing that lived deep inside him, that saw all when it wanted to, didn't.

We're close, He thought. Just a little more. One more push and she'll be where the Winchesters need her to be.

Assuming Time allowed her to play on the board at all. But that wasn't His call to make, nor would he be weighing in on it. He was interfering more than he'd planned already, and Time, while surprisingly collaborative, was not particularly forgiving of interlopers.

The drawn-out moment they weren't really having (at least, not outside of Chuck's overactive imagination) ended when his Editorial Assistant's eyes shuttered and she raised a hand to her neck, rubbing at the rapidly reddening skin there. Stephanie set the pages down on the edge of a desk, unread. Chuck stared at them, dismay mounting, as she crossed the room for her purse.

"Let me guess," he started, fully expecting Steph to finish the sentence.

He could see her expression in profile as she picked up her purse and coat. There was distaste crawling over her features, shifting into something dark – something angry – as it went. It was a look Chuck had seen several times, now, and she always left immediately afterward. As she turned back to the writer, Stephanie at least attempted a weak smile for him.

"I have to leave," she announced, indeed finishing his assumption for him. Her purse and coat were already in hand, though she hardly looked pleased about it.

"Yeah," the writer said with a sad smile. "I figured."

He didn't know why (though he suspected the reason was rather pathetic), but he never liked when his editorial assistant had to leave suddenly.

The God within him knew why and felt a specific sense of loss as well. A missed opportunity. Hard work down the drain. And so easily, too. If He weren't trying to tip the scales in the Winchesters' favor (even though He had committed Himself, so many years ago, to never touch them again), God would be indignant. To see one of His creations – by proxy, if nothing else – crumple so easily to the darkness inside her.

Especially when she had once told Him – Him! – that He was wrong about that darkness.

"It is Friday," Persephone said, so abruptly that whatever Chuck had been thinking a moment ago was gone.

He blinked out of his reverie – unsure what it had even been about – and focused on his editorial assistant, standing rigid and ready to go. Her grip on her purse was tight in a way that didn't make sense to the human. Offhandedly, Chuck wondered if she still had that deleted scene he'd given her, about the hex bag. Wondered if maybe it was in that purse she was clutching like a lifeline.

Chuck blinked again. Weird thoughts today. Maybe another headache was coming on, after all. He should find his pills. He'd, uh, kind of gotten used to Stephanie already having them on hand by the time the headache really hit.

"I will return Monday."

The writer smiled, and nodded, but for some reason he couldn't begin to explain, he didn't believe her.

-o-o-o-

"So, Mr. Miller, you were the security guard on duty that night at Milwaukee National Trust Bank?" Cole Trenton asked, sitting at Roger Miller's kitchen table with pen, notebook, and fake press credentials. "The night the Winchesters and Mr. Resnik attempted to rob the place?"

"That's right," Mr. Miller confirmed, sitting across the round dinette set. He had a cup of coffee between his hands, which he fidgeted with nervously. He shook his head, eyes taking on a watery sheen. "It was awful."

"I can only imagine," Cole said sympathetically enough. He set his own mug down on the table and picked up the notebook he brought with him, flipping it open to the first free page, about three thirds of the way through. "I've interviewed several of the civilians who were held hostage that night, but you spent the most time with the Winchesters."

Mr. Miller balked, face flushing with embarrassment. "I don't know about that. But I did escort them to the security booth and back out. Which is when they brought out the gun."

"Let's start there," Cole uncapped his pen and leaned back, projecting the picture of active interest. He had pages of eyewitness accounts of the Winchesters. He knew how they spoke, how they operated, how they held up under pressure. Now he wanted to know how they planned. "They wanted to see the security cameras. Tell me everything that happened, everything that was said. Don't leave anything out, Mr. Miller. I'm all ears."

-o-o-o-

Sam and Dean were on their fourth ghost town in Wisconsin, hoping against all hope to stumble on Azazel's new Cold Oak. Or whatever demon he had doing his dirty work, since they were pretty sure he wasn't back topside yet. Or so they hoped, at least.

They'd decided to start with abandoned towns, assuming Azazel's backup location for the Battle Royale wouldn't be particularly different than his first. Unfortunately for the Winchesters, there were a lot of ghost towns in Wisconsin. They'd narrowed it down to about a hundred-mile radius, according to Ash's algorithm determining where the omens were popping up. But that was more than half the state, so it hadn't exactly narrowed things down, much.

There were fifteen towns in that radius, either abandoned or rumored haunted, and they were systematically crossing them off one after another. It wasn't exactly efficient – the search area was huge, and they didn't even know if they'd picked the right tree to bark up – but it was all they had until something better popped up.

Speaking of. Sam's phone rang just as they were coming out of the last, empty building. A fourth bust, not that either hunter was all that surprised. This was the very definition of a longshot.

"Hey, Ash," Sam said once he'd answered the phone. "Yeah, we're in, uh-" the hunter had to glance at his phone, switching it over to GPS, to remember which ghost town they were in. They were starting to blur together. "-Stonehaven. No, nothing here."

Dean started to wander off as Sam chatted with Ash, who was hopefully calling with something further to go on. Maybe a narrowed down search area, at the very least. Really, he'd take anything.

"What do you mean, it's not safe?"

The change in Sam's tone immediately spun Dean back around, and he was marching over to his brother. Sam's brow was furled, and he gave Dean a small headshake – he didn't know what was going on either.

"Dude, we're nowhere near the Roadhouse right now," the younger Winchester responded to whatever it was Ash was saying. "We can't just drop this and head there."

Dean, who had a growing suspicion in his stomach that felt a lot like nausea, reached out and stole the phone from his brother's hand, much to Sam's indignation. As he pressed it to his ear, he heard the end of Ash's hushed, tense response.

"-just get here, Sam."

"What did you find?" Dean demanded, already knowing the answer.

Ash made an annoyed, sort of desperate sound, and Dean's churning gut hardened into the cement of certainty.

"Not over the phone," the MIT dropout responded in a way that made it perfectly clear he was repeating himself. "Get to the Roadhouse."

"No," Dean immediately said, shaking his head, grip on the phone turning his knuckles white. "Get out. Now, Ash. You and Ellen get the hell out of there. Head to Bobby's."

"What? Dean-"

"I'm serious," the older Winchester interrupted, practically barking the words like a command. "Get out of the Roadhouse. Now, Ash."

He didn't wait for the man's response, just handed the phone to his brother and started heading back to the Impala. Sam muttered a hasty, "Just do it, Ash," before hanging up the phone and jogging after Dean.

"What's going on?" he asked as he caught up, tucking his gun away as Dean dug the keys out of his front pocket.

"Demons blow up the Roadhouse to stop Ash from getting us that info," Dean answered so matter-of-factly that Sam stumbled beside him in pure surprise. "They get him, but not Ellen. She brings the stuff he found to us."

Sam swallowed roughly, trying not to think of that future. It wasn't going to happen. Dean had warned them, and Ash would (hopefully) listen. "What stuff?"

"He found a hellgate in Wyoming. Samuel Colt – yeah, the guy who built the Colt – created a hundred-square-mile devil's trap out of railroads around it."

"Iron," Sam breathed out in awe. "Wait, I remember that. They get the hellgate open with the Colt. After…"

"The battle royale," Dean finished for him as Sam trailed off in realization. He opened the driver's door, but paused, elbow on the roof. He met his brother's eyes across the Impala. "It's not gonna happen, Sam. Not this time."

"But it's coming," Sam replied, not denying Dean's statement, but not as confident as his brother. "Ash calling…. It means it's started, doesn't it?"

Dean looked like he didn't want to answer. He glanced away, fisting the keys in his hand. Eventually, he managed a nod. "Yeah. I think that's exactly what it means."

As he climbed into the car, Sam scrambling in on the other side, the younger Winchester gave a weak, but determined nod. There was a confidence in his words that he didn't feel, but one he knew his brother needed. They both did. "We better call Bobby. Warn Andy."

Dean was already spinning tires and spitting dirt as he pulled away from the abandoned town at speeds only his Baby could handle. Sam pulled out his phone, grip tight enough to hide the way his hands were shaking.

-o-o-o-

Persephone stared at the demon in front of her, an unfamiliar meatsuit leaning against an unfamiliar car. He was bulky with thick, rippling muscles that were highlighted by too-tight clothes. His skin was darker than the last time she'd seen him, tanned gold in a way that didn't look natural. He was stockier, too, with dark, short-cropped hair, but she knew who he was well before his eyes flicked black instead of yellow.

Azazel was many things, but a showoff wasn't one of them. Which meant this was Tom. Joy of joys for her.

The demon spawn was leaning back, legs crossed at the ankles, swinging one hand back and forth. The gold chain swung like a pendulum from his grip, fading out of existence a few feet from his hand, but Persephone knew where it ended. Her neck was still aching from the bastard pulling on the thing.

"Hello, Princess." Tom had his usual smug grin slapped in place, but his eyes carried a malicious glee to them that was new. It instantly set Persephone on edge. He pushed off the car, gesturing towards her reddened neck with the same hand that held the end of her reinstated leash. "See you got my message."

"See you found a new body," she snipped back, hand tightening around the strap of her purse. "Took you long enough."

"And I'm sure you behaved like a perfect little pawn while I was gone." The smug grin lessened some, replaced with annoyance, though the malice in his eyes remained as sharp as newly forged dagger. "What did you get up to, I wonder?"

It was all Persephone could do not to shift the purse against her side. The purse that held her best shot at escaping this demon; the paralytic hex bag Chuck had provided her.

"Spa Day," she supplied with a one shouldered shrug. The picture of nonchalance and absolutely zero innocence. Tom scoffed.

"Right. I hope you got your fill of mud masks and pedicures, Princess. Time to go." He gestured with his head to the car, even as he opened the door for her.

Persephone didn't move. "And where are we going?"

The grin that stretched across his face cemented the dread building in her insides. "To acquire your prince, of course."

-o-o-o-

Sarge's whining finally caught Andy's attention and he pulled the ear buds out of his head to notice the German Shepherd standing at the entrance to the panic room, tail tucked, head ducked, and eyes looking about as uncertain as Andy had ever seen them. Sarge was nothing if not stalwart most of the time.

'What's up, buddy?' he asked in his own head, signing along with the question, knowing the dog could neither hear him nor read Sign, but it hadn't stopped him from chatting to Sarge in either form yet. He uncrossed his legs from the cot they'd dragged into the iron-walled room since Andy would be spending more than just an evening hiding out down there (and gee, wasn't he just the luckiest. Nothing like an ancient army cot older than he was and iron, sigil-scrawled walls to make home sweet frickin' home).

Andy stood, stretched, and crossed the small room to crouch in front of the dog. 'You gotta go pee?'

He made the hand signal for bathroom that Jody had taught him and Bobby – the one Sarge's previous handler had picked – and the dog whined again, turning and heading for the stairs. Andy stood, following after with only a moment's hesitation and a quick glance back at the panic room. Five minutes out of it wouldn't hurt, and it was only to go upstairs and grab Bobby so he could take Sarge for a walk.

Really, Andy could admit with very little shame in it, any excuse to get out of his little iron prison was a welcome one.

The two climbed the stairs, Andy trailing behind the much faster four-legged beast. When he got to the top of the stairs, Sarge was already waiting at the front door. Andy held up a finger – not that they'd actually taught Sarge what 'one minute' meant, but that dog was a smart one – and ducked his head into the study.

Bobby was on the phone, back turned to the psychic and, from the sound of it, he was buried up to his elbows in a case for another hunter. Andy didn't have a convenient way to interrupt the man without using his powers, and was reluctant to do that when the old hunter seemed on edge enough already. He glanced back into the hall. Sarge was staring at him with desperate eyes and whined immediately once he had eye contact.

How long had he been asking to go out? The hunt must be a bad one, Andy figured, if Bobby hadn't noticed.

Well, he could take Sarge out. Yeah, the Winchesters and Bobby had both told him not to leave the panic room, and definitely not to leave the house, but what was five minutes going to hurt? Honestly, he could use the leg stretch. Besides, Bobby's property was warded seven ways to Sunday. No demon – Prince of Hell or otherwise – was setting foot in the salvage yard.

As for the FBI possibly watching…. Andy's gaze shifted to one of Bobby's baseball caps and a knitted scarf hanging from the same hooks as Sarge's leash. He could go incognito for the five, ten minute walk Sarge would want. Really, that wasn't much. And what were the chances the feds were watching, anyway?

Andy grabbed his disguise and Sarge's leash, opening the front door. Sarge bolted with an urgent need that left his guardian wincing in sympathy. Andy followed after the dog as he disappeared into the night in nothing short of desperation.

It wasn't until a good ten minutes later that Bobby finally hung up the phone after shouting Carl Bates through a Banshee banishing spell after the thing had almost taken the head off his hunting buddy. Which meant a follow-up shouting bout for keeping a man alive when his neck was kind of hanging on by a thread. Bobby heaved a tired sigh. He really was getting too old for this.

It took another second for him to realize that Sarge was barking in the distance. Not inside the house, but from… the yard. Bobby straightened and spun around, dread pooling in his gut. Sarge was in the yard. The front door was open. And so was the basement door.

"Andy!" Bobby surged to his feet, but the stairs to the basement were deserted and no psychic came answering back with his telepathic powers or physical presence. The old hunter bolted for the front door, heart pounding. Sam had called just that afternoon to warn them shit was starting to go down. The kid knew better than to leave the panic room!

When he found Sarge, the dog was barking furiously at the far fence of his property, nothing but empty night beyond it. His leash was attached to his collar, dragging on the ground around him, but there was no sign of Andy.

-o-o-o-

The Winchesters were headed out of Wisconsin and towards South Dakota as fast as they could, pushing speed limits and the boundaries of safety, as night fell. Rain came with it, pushing the boundary of sleet as the temperature dropped with the sun. It came down in patches as they drove, forcing Dean to drive a hell of a lot slower than we wanted to.

By the time they pulled over for gas just outside of La Crosse, Wisconsin, the rain had abated but the road was scattered with puddles and it was near freezing out. Sam climbed out of the car, already heading for the restrooms on the side of the convenience store attached to the pumps. It wasn't clear if his jog was out of necessity or to keep warm.

"Make it quick!" Dean shouted over the top of the car. He'd already told the beanstalk that he wasn't allowed to leave the warded confines of the car ever, at least not until they had a panic room to transfer him to. The look he'd gotten for that hadn't quite been a Bitchface, but it had been close.

"And if I have to pee?" the brat challenged back, though Dean could tell from the tone of his voice that he wasn't actually going to fight the man with all the future knowledge on this.

To his horror (and exasperation), Sam had spent the next ten minutes, at his brother's instruction, searching the front and back seats of the car for a bottle. He'd come up empty (to his relief). Which meant he was now heading towards the gas station restrooms, with their running water, soap, mild privacy, and ventilation.

Which wasn't much, considering the state of most gas station bathrooms, but it was definitely a step up over peeing into a water bottle with his brother riding shotgun to the whole experience.

Sam waved an arm in response to Dean's pestering, not bothering to turn around or respond. The older Winchester made a face of frustration at his back, but turned to fueling Baby. As the gas started pumping, he glanced towards where Sam had gone, checking he was out of sight before pulling out his phone. He scrolled through his contacts quickly before dialing, tapping a nervous beat out on the Impala's roof with his free hand.

"Ah, Squirrel. To what do I owe this unexpected pleasure? Miss me already?"

"Shut up, Crowley," Dean growled into the receiver, checking again, almost compulsively, that Sam wasn't nearby.

"Charming as always," the King of the Crossroads drawled, and Dean could practically see his deadpan expression. "What do you want?"

Dean licked his bottom lip, nervously, then bit down on his tongue. He was the one who'd made the call, but he couldn't bring himself to ask the question he knew he had to ask.

"I'm waiting."

The older Winchester rolled his eyes, grunting as he cleared his throat. "Is there any way to make a deal without booking myself a one-way ticket to Hell?"

"Oh for the love of-" Crowley cut himself off, but Dean could hear the disbelief-fueled outrage behind the words. He winced, if only because the demon had a point. And it was never a good situation when the *demon*was the voice of reason. "How hard is to just let the moose die, you codependent waste of plaid!"

The hunter pulled his head back, staring at the phone for a moment as his brain attempted to process that insult. As he brought it back to his ear, Dean fell back on his reliable, old friend: anger.

"Can it and answer the question."

He could all but hear the crossroad demon rolling his eyes, and the hunter checked over his shoulder again to make sure Sam wasn't headed back.

"No, there's no way to save your brother without selling your soul, and there's no way to sell your soul without going to Hell." Crowley didn't sound sorry about that, but Dean could detect something in his voice. Exasperated resignation, maybe. Like Dean starting the Apocalypse was a given and Crowley had just been humoring him by believing otherwise. "Sorry, Squirrel. Those are the rules."

The hunter ran a hand over his face. Yeah, he'd figured. But he'd had to ask. He'd had to try.

"Not sure it matters, really," the King continued, almost offhandedly. "Lilith's got something of a backup in place, as it were."

"What?" Green eyes snapped open, and both panic and hope flared in equal measures, leaving Dean nauseous with the combination. "What is it?"

"Haven't the foggiest."

Dean bit back the growl as all that nausea sunk into his gut like lead, leaving him feeling sick in an entirely different way. He had no idea if Crowley was telling the truth or not, but it didn't really matter, did it?

"Whatever it is, it's in the charming state of Minnesota," Crowley continued. "The part I've been stuck with, at least. I've been stuck in this freezing state for three days, Squirrel. Why you humans choose to live in these places, I will never know. My talents are wasted like this."

Dean tuned out as Crowley continued bitching and moaning. Minnesota? The tine traveler frowned, trying to think of a time Hell had gotten up to anything there. A second Hellgate he didn't' know about, maybe? Was that Lilith's backup plan?

Dean's phone gave a beep, causing him to pull away to stare at the screen. Bobby was calling. He ignored it; he could call the old hunter back once he was done with the demon.

"You're from Scotland. Like you've got room to talk," he snapped, bantering with the demonic King coming almost as naturally as breathing. "Now find out what they're up to. We're out of time."

"Excuse me, am I wearing a sign that says, 'Dean Winchester's slave?'" Crowley sniped right back, offence loud and clear, but there had been a moment of silence that Dean didn't pick up in his distracted frustration. An edge of tension to his voice that might have informed the man from the future he'd just slipped up. "You boys already owe me one favor. When do I get my back scratched, exactly?"

Dean's phone beeped again, and he pulled away again to see Bobby's number flashing on the screen. Shit. That couldn't be good. He ignored it again, but switched priorities to ending the apparently useless conversation with Crowley quickly.

"Gonna be hard to scratch anything if we're all dead," Dean growled back, deciding not to taunt the demon by telling him he had a nice big knife on him right now if the King felt like getting scratched.

The gas pump clicked and shut off, and Dean pulled the nozzle away from the tank. He'd just settled it back in its cradle, completely ignoring whatever Crowley was moaning and complaining about in his ear now, when Sam's phone started ringing from inside the car.

Shit. That really couldn't be good.

"Gotta go, find out what's going on in Minnesota." He snapped his phone shut on the crossroad demon's indignant squawk, not caring in the slightest that he'd hung up on the crossroads King. With a cuss, Dean pulled open the driver's door and crawled headfirst into the car in search of his brother's phone. By the time he found it on the passenger side floor, the call had gone to voicemail. With a growl and another swear, Dean grabbed the stupid thing and straightened up.

As he did, a flash of light caught his eye and the hunter's head whipped to the left. But it was just the headlights of a car, turning into the gas station and catching his necklace, hanging from the rear-view mirror. The man from the future stared at that amulet, the gold head and cow horns swinging gently as a result of Dean's own commotion. Even after the headlights had moved on, leaving the gold dull in the darkness of the car's interior, Dean continued to watch the thing that had a tendency to glow in the presence of God. It certainly wasn't glowing now, but those blank eyes were staring at him, like the amulet was watching him right back.

The phone started ringing again, and Dean nearly dropped it.

"Jesus," he muttered to himself, backing out of the car and hitting the answer button on Sam's cell without looking at the caller ID. The car that had lit up his amulet was pulling up to the next row of pumps. There was a woman in the front seat and a tanned man in a too-tight, black turtleneck climbing out of the driver's side. He headed for the store attached to the gas station. The girl remained in the car, playing on her phone. Dean tracked the man's progress warily, making sure he wasn't headed for the restrooms, before barking into the phone, "What?"

"He's gone," Bobby's voice was rushed, loud and panicked, in Dean's ear. He could count on one hand the number of times he'd heard panic in his surrogate father's voice. And none of those times were good memories.

"The kid's gone," Bobby repeated, still in a rush. "He took the dog out for a walk, of all things, and he's just… god damnit!"

Dean closed his eyes, the hand that rested on top of the Impala curling into a fist against her cold metal. First Ash, now Andy. He knew what that meant, but he couldn't get past the overwhelming sense of failure and fear blocking his way to doing something about it.

It was coming all too fast. Falling apart in his hands, like sand or water that he had no hope of holding onto. Hell, he was pretty sure trying to hold onto it was just making him lose control that much faster.

Azazel was early. By months. Again.

The hunter opened his eyes beneath the dimly lit gas station roof, one of the halogens flickering obnoxiously above him while panic tried to swallow him whole from the ground up.

Sam was next, and they didn't have Cas.

Son of a bitch. It was happening. It was happening now, and they didn't have Cas to save their sorry asses when it all went to shit. When Sam inevitably died because Time was a bitch, and Dean sold his soul one way or another because some things just had to stay the same.

"Sam."

The breathless word left Dean's mouth before his brain even registered it, but once it did his gaze snapped to the side of the gas station, where the bathrooms were. Sam had been gone too long. He could hear Bobby barking at him in his ear, but the words didn't register.

"We'll find Andy," he promised into the receiver, spoken in a rush. He shut the phone on Bobby's panicked response, the old hunter realizing exactly what Dean was realizing. But he didn't have time to keep Bobby updated. He had to find Sam and get him back inside the warded Impala right now. They could call the old man back as soon as Sam was safe.

Dean jogged towards the restrooms, trying not to all out run and only barely managing it.

"Sam?" He pounded on the door to the men's restroom and got no response. That panic, which had been steadily building, flared into something so strong it was all-encompassing. It was all he could feel, and it was painful. "Sam!"

He shoved at the door with his shoulder twice before backing away and kicking it open. The door gave with a bang, bouncing off the inside wall hard enough it almost slammed closed once more. Dean shoved it back open with his arm, only to find an empty bathroom inside. He kicked the door to the women's restroom down too, revealing another empty room.

No. No, no, no no nononono.

"Sam!"

Dean sprinted around the corner of the building, headed for the front of the store. Inside, the lights were too bright and the space too quiet. There was a humming in the air that was probably the halogens, but raised the hair all over Dean's body and made his skin crawl. It was the only noise in the place.

He found the attendant first, sprawled and bloody behind the counter. Another customer lay dead in a pool of her own blood by the coolers. No Sam. No demons. Nothing.

Just like last time.

The hunter stumbled back outside, mind racing with what to do next.

He had to call Bobby. He had to find Sam. And Andy. He had to find Azazel's new Cold Oak. He had to stop it from happening all over again.

Dean drew up short in the middle of the gas station parking lot when he realized a woman he didn't know was leaning against the side of the Impala, next to the passenger door, like she belonged there. She was short as hell, curvy in a stocky away, with a head full of blonde hair.

The girl from the car that had pulled up next to them. Her male companion was nowhere to be found. Just like Sam.

"Hey!" Dean called, already reaching for the gun in his waistline. It wasn't his ivory-inlaid Colt, laying broken in pieces in whatever fucked up pocket dimension of Gabriel's they'd left behind, but it was still a weapon. He trained it on the stranger who dared mess with his family and his Baby.

The woman, who had been playing idly on a phone, scuffing a sneakered toe against the asphalt, looked up at his cry. Dean froze at her glowing, green eyes.

Azazel's girl.

-o-o-o-

The house around her was still dark as the day she'd arrived, though there was significantly more collateral damage now. And blood, sweat, and tears. The haunted silence was shattered by her foot connecting with Sam Winchester's knife, sending it skittering across the dust-strewn floor. It left a trail of freshly strewn blood in its wake.

She bent down, chest heaving with each erratic pant, and wrapped trembling fingers around the hilt. With each use, her hand shook less and less. Eventually, she knew it would no longer shake at all.

Ava Wilson straightened, sweat dripping down her forehead, clothing torn and dirtied, but knife in hand as she stared fiercely into the darkness. Once soft, green eyes were hard. Her voice, when she spoke, was equally so.

"Next."

A figure in a too-tight turtleneck stepped out of the shadows, a smug smirk in the corner of his lips. His eyes weren't yellow, like she had expected at the end of that first day, but black as coal. She knew them well, after all this time.

"Coming right up."

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: You know, I think I'll just leave it at that. No author notes today 😈

Chapter 127: Season 2: Chapter 93

Chapter Notes

A/Ns:
Apologies for missing the update last week. The chapter started out at 20 pages, and despite my best efforts last weekend, including tag-teaming the editing with Forestpelt while in line at Disneyland (and also playing Pass-N-Play Carcassone on my partner's phone because what are theme park lines for but board games?!

) I did not successfully finish editing in time. For some reason, this chapter was a doozy of fixes. Apparently I wasn't in the zone when I wrote it

But it's better now! And…also…half the length

I, uh, might have went and adjusted the length of the next four chapters too, which were all about 20 pages While I'm sorry y'all have normal-length chapters to read now, the good news is I have a much larger stockpile! Ha…haha….ha….

Actually, that is more important than I'm making it out to be. I was getting a bit low. The muse has really been struggling/ fighting me with the season finale. Every time, man. Every time we finally get to a part I'm so excited to write, a part I have been waiting years to write, and the Muse panics, then hides her panic with nonchalance and disinterest

Ugh, she's such a bitch, but she's too good at her job to fire

Chapter Warnings
: Dean's getting in some late night exercise (much to his chagrin), Cas is losing her patience, Gabe's right there with her for different reasons, Bobby's getting unwelcome visitors when he really has better things to be doing, and Sam's… well, Sam's trying out his throwing arm on unexpected foes.

Yeah, that tracks. Let's go with all that.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 93

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

"Where the hell is my brother!" Dean yelled the minute he realized who was leaning against his car, and what her presence at the gas station meant. Sam was missing and Yellow Eyes had sent his messenger to collect in his stead.

Azazel's girl just stared. She didn't appear to be very concerned about the gun trained on her or the hunter approaching one cautious step at a time. At least, not until he got within a dozen feet of her, then she bolted.

Dean hesitated for only a moment, caught between shooting the rapidly retreating creature or giving chase. That hesitation cost him both the shot and his best chance at catching her. With a vicious curse, the man from the future – now very damn worried it was about to repeat itself – lowered his gun and started running after the supernatural bitch who'd kidnapped his brother this time around. She was fast – really fast, considering her legs had to be a whole foot shorter than his (hell, this chick was shorter than Jo) – as she fled towards the street at an all-out run. Dean followed, boots splashing through pooled rainwater as the chase turned onto the wet road.

The two disappeared from sight as the street curved into the dark forest around them.

-o-o-o-

Arcs of electricity – a sea of deep-rooted ocean-blue surrounded by rivers of white – pulled Gabriel's attention away from his television set as Dean Winchester took off after some mystery demon chick. Beside him, sparks quite literally flew off Castiel. Anywhere Gabriel's grace was in contact with her skin, Castiels's manifested itself like the sparks coming off a welder's torch. Bolts of pure energy arched from contact point to contact point until the little angel that could was all but glowing with the materialization of pure grace.

And deep within her core, those spiderweb cracks were growing.

"Hey, knock it off," Gabriel snapped at his sister, but Castiel wasn't listening. She may not have even heard him, for all that she reacted to his words. Those blue eyes, glowing as fiercely as the rest of her, were locked on the television screen.

When those cracks became fractures, the archangel straightened.

"Back off, Cassie. I'm serious." Gabriel reached out and grabbed his sister by the wrist. Energy jolted up his arm, buzzing through muscle and bone like a swarm of angry bees. Her gaze snapped to his and the ferocity in that glare actually caused him to loosen his grip.

It took a moment to shake off the shock. He'd seen Castiel endanger herself more than once now in an effort to escape her binds, but every time was just as surprising. The angel should know when she was caught. To keep fighting, to the detriment of her own health… it didn't make any sense.

When energy crackled again – Cassie's eyes still locked on his, testing more than material boundaries -- Gabe finally lost his patience.

"Enough!" he roared, archangel voice filling the room like a physical presence. The lights flickered and dimmed, Jack started barking from his donut bed beside the TV, and the littlest angel that-already-had (or "that not only could, but just did) finally stilled. Silence, tense and oppressive, reigned. "Just… enough . Dear Dad, are you trying to hurt yourself?"

Gabriel collapsed back into his Lazy Boy, annoyed. Annoyed that Castiel couldn't get this through her thick skull, annoyed she was going to break herself trying. Annoyed at the reality she was refusing to accept, annoyed at the truth. There was no fighting this. No stopping it.

What a mess. One, big mess.

The archangel knew the end of the world wasn't a joke, no matter how he chose to talk about it out loud. Deep down, fine, alright, he knew that. It wasn't going to stop him from filtering everything through his own way of looking at the world – through jokes – but he did know how serious this all was.

Even so, Cassie was seriously killing his vibe, man.

From his slouch, he glanced over at his sister. She was still staring at him fiercely, but her energy levels were stable. She refused to look away, to be shamed for her actions. Well fine, two could play that game. So Gabriel started a staring contest. One that the other angel, of course, didn't know they were playing. Which was why he was going to win.

Except he kept getting distracted. His gaze was repeatedly pulled to her chest, where the core of her grace was fluttering and sputtering after that most recent bout of stupidity.

Guess that was the shortest staring contest ever. Sheesh. What a mess, indeed.

"No more of that, or you're going back in the closet, got it?" Gabe declared, keeping his voice firm with another hint of that archangel power he did actually possess under all the jokes. Just a hint this time, though. He shook a finger her way, the ultimate demonstration of seriousness.

Then he leaned over and pressed a hand to her chest. Castiel flinched, but was unable to pull away. Gabe wouldn't lie; that stung. But given he had just yelled at her with the big-scary-voice and threatened to lock her up in a closet… again…. Alright, fine, she was entitled to think he might rough her up a bit.

But that wasn't the plan. Instead, Gabriel infused some of his own grace into her, thinking healing thoughts as he did. Restoration and repair. The energy seeped down into her core, wrapping around it with soothing intent. It filled in all those stupid fractures that had only gotten worse since he'd first seen her.

She was supposed to be safer here, with him. Not making her condition worse.

Gabe pulled away, unsure which he was angrier about; the guilt he felt over the state of his sister's grace or that he was honoring a promise made to the Winchester mooks. But he was sure that thinking angry thoughts while instilling grace in his sister wouldn't help her. Besides, he wasn't healing her for the Winchesters. He wasn't. He would have healed her regardless of any promise he'd made to those flanneled morons. Because he was her older brother and that's what older brothers were supposed to do.

He may not be much of an angel, damnit, but he had always been a good brother. The fact that he'd ended up promising Sam he would do just that was… coincidental, at best.

"I got it," Castiel said out of nowhere, voice oddly calm and muted given the little light show she'd just put on.

Gabriel chanced another glance her way, needing a moment to place that response. He stared at the littlest angel that could, trying to read the intent behind those stupidly blue eyes. Eventually he gave up, guffawing and turning his attention back to the TV.

Gabe decided to ignore her for the rest of the show. Served her right.

-o-o-o-

Bobby was loading the last duffle full of weapons – this one packed to the brim with shotguns, handguns, and damn near all the ammo he owned – into the back of his truck when the cars came screeching through the Salvage Yard. Mostly SUVs, black with government plates. Bobby bit the inside of his cheek as they came screaming to a halt in front of his house. Men in suits piled out all armed with government-issued SIG Sauer handguns and flashlights.

Feds.

Victor Henriksen climbed out of the lead car a lot more leisurely than the men around him, most of whom were already entering Bobby's house regardless of a lack of permission. Which meant a warrant.

Sarge, sitting in the front seat of the truck, was barking at them through the rolled down window. With a gesture from Bobby, the Shepherd silenced, sitting back on his haunches in the passenger seat, though a low growl could still be heard coming from the cab. Golden brown eyes watched the men traipsing about his territory with a predator's sharp gaze, just waiting for permission to retaliate. Bobby gave that attentive head an approving pet.

Agent Henriksen sauntered over to the pair, a smug smile on his lips.

"I assume you got your warrant, then?" Bobby asked, not even bothering with anger. If Agent Henkrisken had a warrant to search his home, then there wasn't much he could do about it. And, by the grace of Time herself, almost everything illegal that he owned was in the truck he was leaning against, waiting to go help the Winchester boys.

"Right here, Mr. Singer," the agent replied, pulling a folded-up piece of paper from his suit jacket. He handed it over, Bobby digging out his phone to use as a flashlight in the dim lighting of the Salvage Yard. He scanned it with the eyes of a man who'd read his fair share of law books.

They were looking for Andy. Proof of his presence at Bobby's yard came in the form of a phone number, pinging off the nearest tower and exchanging texts regularly with two other numbers suspected to belong to fugitives. Bobby bit back his reaction. Somehow, Henriksen had figured out the boys' phone numbers, and Bobby's personal one as well. Considering none of them were registered to their real names (or even aliases they used regularly), that was quite a feat.

He wouldn't say they'd underestimated the Fed, but they'd certainly have to up their game to stay ahead of him going forward. It was nothing but sheer (terrible, rotten, awful) luck that Andy wasn't in the very house they were currently searching.

The warrant didn't extend to any of Bobby's belongings, surprisingly enough. They couldn't confiscate anything, regardless of illegality or suspicion. The judge had been very specific about that part (which probably meant he or she had been reluctant to sign the warrant to begin with. Flimsy probable cause backed by a bull-headed Agent who wouldn't take no for an answer, most likely). Though they could use anything they saw as evidence to obtain a new warrant, of course. Not that Bobby was particularly worried about that. They weren't here for him; they were here for the kid.

And they weren't going to find him, for better or worse.

(But it was worse. So, so much worse. Bobby would rather the feds were hauling Andy out of his house right now than what was probably happening who-knew-where at the hands of demons and other psychic kids. Hell, they could figure out how to break the kid out of jail, but right now they couldn't do shit to save him because they didn't know where he was.)

Bobby folded the warrant up and handed it back without so much as a micro-twitch in expression. "There's no one in the house, Agent.

Whoever it is you're looking for ain't here; you're barking up the wrong tree."

"Oh, I very much doubt that," Henriksen returned, smug smile firmly in place. He tucked the warrant back inside his suit jacket. "See, we've got evidence that says otherwise."

The old hunter just shrugged, leaning casually against the bed of his truck. There wasn't much reason to argue, or risk saying anything that could be used against him. Andy wasn't there; they'd figure that out for themselves soon enough. Of course, he'd have to wait for the feds to complete their search before he could head out for a search of his own. A friggin' annoyance, for sure, but not one he could do anything about at the moment.

Henriksen sauntered off to join his men, leaving a single Suit outside with Bobby, probably to make sure he didn't bolt or interfere. It only took another five minutes before Victor was charging back outside, directly for Bobby, both leisure and smirk conspicuously absent.

"Where is he?"

"Who?" Bobby parroted immediately, the picture of annoyed innocence. "I told you, Agent Henriksen, there's no one in that house. Just me and Sarge."

The dog gave a single, sharp bark beside the old man, head sticking out the passenger window, tongue out and panting from the stress he could no doubt taste in the air. Bobby reached over and scratched behind his ears, hoping the comfort would settle the good boy, though knowing it likely wouldn't.

"And this?" Henriksen held up a mobile phone – Andy's, no doubt – but Bobby just raised an oblivious brow.

"Is a cell phone, Agent. Kinda thought you'd be able to identify that without help, considering it's the whole reason – the only reason – you're here." Bobby tilted his head knowingly towards the agent's chest, where the warrant was tucked away.

Henriksen did not miss the slight dig at the weak probable cause that had barely gotten him that warrant to begin with. He lowered his hand, fingers tightening into a fist around the device.

"This is Andy Gallagher's phone," he insisted: stating, not asking. The man in front of him just shrugged.

“Afraid I can’t say who the owner is, Agent.” Bobby was careful not to lie outright, but wasn’t worried about lying by omission. The phone had to be locked, otherwise Henriksen wouldn’t be talking to him about it at all. He’d have the evidence he came for and would likely be on his own phone with a judge to have Bobby arrested for harboring a fugitive. “I got lots of phones lying around. Most if not all of ‘em have former owners of one sort or the other.”

“Yeah, I noticed,” Henriksen answered dryly, recalling the row of landlines in the man’s kitchen, each labeled with a different government agency. He would most definitely be coming back with a warrant for those, and a handful of techs to figure out how Robert Singer had made his lines untraceable and untapable. But that would have to wait. For now, he would keep the conversation relevant to their current evidence, the search, and what they were allowed to be here for via that warrant. “This phone, though, was down in your little bomb shelter.”

And hadn’t that been an interesting discovery. A vault, of sorts, tucked into a corner of Robert Singer’s basement. Hand built, hardly structurally sound, in Henriksen’s opinion. It might survive a tornado given it was underground, but not much else. Oh, and lined with occult symbols. Mr. Singer was likely as unstable as the Winchesters, at this point, even if Henriksen couldn’t prove he was just as criminal.

The man only shrugged again. “Like I said, I got phones all over the place.”

Henriksen bit back his growl of annoyance and instead gestured to another agent as the majority of the men he’d brought with him exited the house. He placed the phone into an evidence bag offered by the other agent. It was one of the very few things they could take with them; anything that could belong to their fugitive. They’d found men’s clothes and shoes of various sizes, but given the array, there wasn’t much to go off of for which might belong to Mr. Gallagher. The phone, powered on but locked (with a wallpaper of Robert Singer’s German Shepherd) barely qualified under the search warrant’s strict limitations. At this point, though, Henriksen didn’t care.

Andy Gallagher had been here, of that much he was dead certain. How the two men had known the FBI was on their way, and where Gallagher was hiding now…. Well, Henriksen would find both of those things out. Just not tonight, it would seem.

“Pack it up!” he yelled, and the men started climbing into the cars. “We’ll be back, Mr. Singer. I can promise you that.”

“I can’t wait,” came Bobby’s dry reply as he watched the FBI agents leave his property. Henriksen was the last to go, eying the house, the surrounding salvage yard, and Bobby himself for a drawn-out moment. Most likely meant as an intimidation routine, though it didn’t work on the old hunter. He had plenty of other things scaring him right now than the FBI.

The moment he was sure the FBI had truly left, Bobby climbed into his truck, ran his hand down Sarge’s neck to comfort him (and maybe himself, as well), and pulled away from the house. He had no idea where Andy was, but until Dean called (and Sam, God please let Sam be with him when the boy called back), he and Sarge were heading to them.

-o-o-o-

It was dark around him when he came to, jolting awake with a gasp. The air that filled his lungs was old; dusty with disuse. Sam coughed twice, trying to clear the sensation of dust from his lungs. It only stirred up more, causing the hunter to struggle into an upright position to get away from it. He got to his feet with a groan, body stiff and angry from whatever had landed him in this place. Which appeared to be the crumbling bedroom of an old, decrepit house.

Sam spun in a circle, but there wasn’t anything apparent about wherever the hell he was. The ‘50s wallpaper was peeling, the furniture was sparse – an overturned metal bed frame and a dresser that had lost a leg and all of its drawers probably decades earlier – and the windows were dingy with dust and disuse. Sam crossed to the nearest one, noting that he was on the second floor of whatever this place was, and pushed up on the old wood frame. It did not so much as budge, let alone open.

He looked around for anything he could use to break the glass and quickly spotted the metal post of the bed frame, topped by a brass sphere. Well, it wasn’t a bat or a club like he’d hoped, but he had a decent enough throw. And his target was only going to be a foot away. Sam crossed over to the bedframe and quickly unscrewed the post topper. It was heavy in his hand, and he gave it a quick toss to judge weight and balance. Then he threw it as hard as he could at the glass.

It bounced off with a dull clink, clattering to the ground with several more bounces and more noise. Sam stared at the window, first in surprise and then the kind of annoyance one has once they realize they should not have been surprised to begin with.

Wherever he was, it was escape-proofed. Really, he should have been expecting that.

A creak sounded behind him, and Sam spun to the open doorway, the door itself half off its hinges and stuck open. He could just barely make out a hallway beyond, empty as far as he could see. He knew better – knew to trust his instincts – and quickly moved to the wall beside the door, scooping the metal topper up from the floor as he went.

It would be practically useless as a weapon, but it might serve as a distraction long enough for Sam to get the upper hand in a fist fight. He gripped the ball tightly in his hand, prepared to spin into the hall and lob it at whoever was sneaking across the floorboards on the other side of the wall.

A second creak sounded, closer this time, and Sam used that as his cue. He rounded the wall in a low stance, arm wound back, eyes immediately locking onto the dark figure approaching. Whoever it was, they were keeping a hunched form along the left wall. They had bulky clothes and a baseball cap shielding their face, and Sam's hunter instincts immediately identified the person as a threat. The lurking kind.

Target located, Sam let his arm whip forward, launching the metal ball straight at the approaching threat. It hit the man in the shoulder, causing him to stumble back and spin to the side, clutching at his bicep. The only noise was the thunk of metal on flesh – which was unexpected; a hit that hard usually got a grunt, at the very least – followed by the bounce and roll of metal on hard wood. Sam was already charging, preparing to tackle the man about the waist, when he got close enough to his adversary to properly see his face in the low light.

Sam almost tripped himself in order to stop his forward momentum as Andy Gallagher brought his free hand up to his cheek, throwing out an explosive gesture.

"What the hell!"

"Andy!" Sam straightened up, arms wide from his near tackle, ending on either of the kid's biceps – covered in a heavy jacket the younger Winchester now immediately identified as Bobby's – as he only just barely managed not to run full-on into the other man. He resisted the urge to pat Andy down for injuries. Well, other than the one he'd caused. "What are you doing here?"

'Oh no,' he thought in tandem, his brain supplying the answer before his surrogate little brother could. His grip on Andy's arms tightened as his chest did the same. 'The Battle Royale. It's happening.'

"Sam!" Andy exclaimed, dropping the hand wrapped around his own bruised arm in order to free both hands to talk. Sam was forced to loosen his grip so the kid could communicate properly. "Where the hell is 'here'?!"

"I don't know." Sam lowered his hands, looking around the hallway. His gaze snapped back to Andy when the kid smacked him in the bicep.

"Ow, by the way ," Andy Signed, gesturing towards his arm which would surely be bruised come morning. Sam winced and raised a fist to his sternum, rubbing a circle there.

"Sorry," he said, both in Sign and aloud. Then he got his first good look at the kid and blinked. Andy looked… well, ridiculous. He was wearing that bulky jacket of Bobby's, a knitted scarf that was wrapped around his neck several times, effectively covering the lower half of his face, and a baseball cap pulled low over his forehead. "Why do you look like you're trying to rob the world's coldest bank?"

Before Andy could answer, there was a loud thud, followed by a knocking that quickly escalated into panicked pounding. The muffled yells for help from a female voice followed, and Sam and Andy both took off in the direction of the sound.

They clambered down a set of stairs that creaked in a concerning way beneath their shoes. The pounding quieted the moment they did, and Sam was afraid something had happened to the owner of that voice. But then it started up again, twice as loud as before and more desperate. As they made it to the base of the stairs, Sam realized it was coming from the closet space under the stairwell.

"Help! Somebody help! Get me out of here!" the woman was screaming, pounding on the door as the two men rounded the base of the stairs in a hurry. The stairwell cabinet had been nailed shut with two planks, and an old entryway table had been dragged in front of it. Sam and Andy quickly moved the furniture to the side, pushing and pulling it across the uneven, damaged floorboards. There were marks dug into the wood floor, as though it had been slid into place in front of the small door often.

Sam decidedly didn't think about why that might be in this old, most-likely-haunted house.

Andy pried the boards off with the creak of old nails giving up their grip. Sam came around the table and yanked the closet door open as his brother tossed the last plank aside. Shock hit the younger Winchester like a body to the chest as none other than Ava Wilson tumbled out of that closet and into his arms, tears running down her cheeks.

"Ava?" Sam exclaimed, not quite able to wrap his head around the woman in his hesitant grip. She'd been missing for three months; how could she be here now? "Have you- have you been here this whole time?"

At the sound of her name, Ava's desperate prayers and hiccups stopped in abrupt surprise. She pulled away from her rescuer, blinking up at a familiar face. "Sam? Oh my god, it's you!"

Sam didn't get a response out before he was tackled into a second hug, this one tighter.

"How- How did you…" Ava pulled away again, staring up at the much taller man, doe-eyes watery from unshed tears. "I mean, how did I…?"

"Ava," Sam spoke calmly, trying to break through her panic. "How long have you been here?"

"What do you mean? I just woke up here, like…" she asked, glancing around them and only then noticing Andy, standing just off to the side. He offered an awkward wave paired with a sheepish smile, and she turned back to Sam Winchester. "Who's that?"

"Andy." Sam gestured to his mute little brother, then reversed the motion for Andy's sake. "Andy, Ava." Though his focus was more on the girl who'd been missing for three months now standing right there in front of him in a decrepit, likely-haunted house. "Ava, you've been missing . For three months. Have you been here that whole time?"

"Three months?" She blinked, shaking her head slightly. "That's not… what? I haven't been- Sam, I saw you like… two days ago."

The hunter's stomach sank, realizing that for whatever reason, Ava had been taken earlier than the others. Whatever Azazel had planned for her, it was different. Or maybe…oh god, what if Azazel's plan for her had been interrupted by Castiel exercising him to hell? What if Ava had been missing for so long because of the Winchesters? Because of Sam.

At least…. At least she didn't remember that time. That was a blessing, or so Sam hoped.

"Okay… um, that was…" he took a deep breath, trying to figure out how to tell someone they had missed that much time. "We met in December, right? Okay, well it's March now. You've been missing for three months, Ava. My brother and I have been looking for you everywhere."

"That's-" She laughed, then sniffed and wiped at her nose when Sam didn't laugh back. Her face fell. "That's not…. Okay, Sam, that's impossible."

"I'm sorry, Ava." Sam let go of her, shoulders sagging.

"But that… that makes no sense…" Ava bit her bottom lip and Sam felt terrible. Then her already large eyes widened further. "Oh my god. Brady! My- My fiancé. If I've been missing for that long, he must be freaking out!"

"Well… uh…" Sam's eyes betrayed him, widening slightly before his mouth thinned to a line. He looked away, shaking his head. How was he supposed to tell her the man she loved had been dead for all the months she'd been missing?

"Sam?"

A soft clap of hands pulled his attention away from Ava – whose eyes had started to question his hesitation – to Andy, who was trying to get his attention. He'd unwound the scarf from his neck, though it still hung across his shoulders, and he'd taken off the baseball cap while they were talking (Sam spotted it hanging atop the baluster at the base of the stairs), making him look marginally more normal.

"We need to get out of here," Andy Signed, trying (tactfully) to tell the two acquaintances to wrap it up.

“Right,” Sam stood taller, determination straightening his spine. He gave Andy a nod. “I couldn’t break the windows upstairs. I doubt the doors will work any better. We need to find out where we are.”

‘Right,’ Andy Signed with a nod. ‘We find a name or address, any clue, I can send it to Dean.’

Sam froze, realizing what Andy was talking about even if he only caught three quarters of the signs. He could contact Dean. Andy could contact Dean! They just had to get a location, somewhere for Dean to head to with the cavalry, and Andy could send an image of it to him.

He grabbed the kid by the arms once more, grinning. “Andy, I could kiss you.”

“Please don’t,” Andy signed immediately, though he had an ear-to-ear grin himself. “I’m saving myself for the right man.”

Sam laughed – really laughed – before turning back to Ava, who was staring at the two of them with the less-than-impressed side of incredulity.

“So… I take it you two know each other?”

-o-o-o-

They must have run a quarter mile down that stupid road – which wound its way deeper through the woods until the trees blocked out the moon (along with any hint of manmade light) – before Dean decided, screw this. He hadn’t gained a foot on Azazel’s girl, and he was starting to think that was friggin’ intentional. She sped up anytime he did, and slowed down when he got tired.

The bitch was toying with him. This was nothing but a damn distraction, keeping him from looking for his brother.

Dean slowed to a stop in the middle of the wet asphalt, chest heaving, and raised his gun with grim determination. The hunter clenched his jaw and drew in a steadying breath, holding it to keep his burning lungs from messing with his aim. The hunter fired twice into the night.

The shots had felt true, but if he hit Azazel’s girl it didn’t slow her down. She kept running into the darkness, until Dean couldn’t see her anymore. He looked around at the woods he stood in the middle of, the country road unlikely to have any visitors any time soon. Just him, and the quarter mile walk back to the Impala.

Dean spun on his heel and started back to the gas station.

“Son of a bitch!”

-o-o-o-

He made it back to the Impala at a decent jog, lungs burning and legs damn sick of running. The gas station was deathly quiet and still. No one had stumbled on the crime scene yet; two bodies were still lying, untouched and growing cold inside the store. Not a living soul in sight.

“Sam!” Dean called out, already knowing it was futile. Still, he had to try. He gave it one more second, one more desperate moment of hope, before he pulled open the driver’s side door of his Baby and slid into the car.

Tired screeched as he pulled out of the parking lot and onto the road. The phone was out, Bobby’s number already ringing in his ear, before he made it back to the freeway.

-o-o-o-

Green eyes followed the ’67 Impala as it drove out of the gas station and off into the night. Persephone stepped out of the trees across the street, still watching the taillights of Dean Winchester’s car fade into the distance. Another vehicle pulled up seconds later, tires splashing on the wet road as it came to a stop in front of her. She opened the passenger door and climbed in.

“What have you done with Sam?” she asked the driver before the door was closed. Tom pulled the car onto the road, following the same direction the Impala had gone.

“What did you do to Dean?” Tom asked in return, sparing her a devilish grin. Those black eyes dropped to her shoulder, where her blazer was stained red around a suspiciously bullet-sized hole in the fabric. Persephone turned away, looking out the window with a roll of her eyes.

“Nothing.”

“Well…” Tom drawled, one hand on the wheel, head tilted her way.

Smugness poured off him in waves as black as his eyes. “Ditto.”

Her lip curled into a snarl, but the demon’s grin only grew. Then he returned his eyes to the road and Persephone took the opportunity to reach into the footwell. Before she’d had to dart off for a nightly run with the oldest of the Winchesters, she’d stashed her purse beneath the seat. She withdrew it now, keeping her peripheral on the demon beside her.

“Where are we going?” Surreptitiously, Persephone opened the purse to check its contents. The hex bag she’d made – following Chuck’s written directions to the letter – was still tucked safely inside. Persephone swallowed her reaction, instead adopting a bored expression as she stuffed the purse back at her feet. “Another late night jog?”

“Appleton, Wisconsin,” Tom answered, surprisingly straightforward for once. Enough so that Persephone stared at him in surprise. But the Hellspawn kept his eyes forward. “There’s something there I want you to see.”

Persephone watched her keeper for a moment more before turning back to the window. “Lucky me.”

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns:
It’s allllll coming together, or should I say they’re all coming together, mwaaahahahah!

Chapter 128: Season 2: Chapter 94

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Whooooooheeeeeee did this one suck! This chapter was supposed to be up last weekend, but I had a horrendous time trying to edit it. I wasn't sure why until the experience repeated itself this weekend, and I finally remembered that I had a beast of a time writing it, too. Which made me remember… oh, yeah, I hate Battle Royale scenarios, they are not my jam and I do not enjoy them 💣 So apologies this is late. I might have the same problem with next chapter 👀

Chapter Warnings: We're getting into the thick of it. No direct warnings, but y'all are gonna start getting itchy trigger fingers with me. Try to hold tight!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 94

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Ava followed after Sam as he started to poke – very cautiously – around the first level of the house. Andy trailed along behind, glancing about the haunted space like an exit might just be waiting around the next corner. Ava didn't particularly like him. He was too blasé about all of this. But Andy wasn't her focus right now. Sam was.

"Sam, uh… about Br- um, how long I've been… missing."

The hunter, ducking his head into what was once a parlor room, given what was (barely) left of the furniture and décor, tensed before he could help it. But he pushed past it, giving the room a once over – Andy had wandered a dozen feet away to poke at a taxidermy bear's head, which hung crooked on the foyer wall – before turning back to her. She deserved to know the truth.

"Look, Ava… I'm sorry. I wish I didn't have to tell you this."

Her expression was frozen, like she knew what he had to say, but wasn't ready to hear it yet. "Tell me what?"

Before Sam could form the words, the ceiling above them creaked in that very distinct way wood does when someone walks on it. All three froze, staring up at the very real possibility another person was in the house with them. Sam glanced back down to see the fear in Ava's eyes and unease in Andy's.

The hunter raised a finger to his lips, catching their attention with the movement. They both nodded, one shakily, the other determinedly. Sam moved towards the stairs cautiously, bending down along the way to pick up the broken remnants of what was probably once a chair. It would work as a rudimentary club, need be. Andy followed behind him, moving equally stealthy as they started slowly up the stairs.

As they neared the top, which reached a landing before immediately turning into the second story hallway, another creak sounded just on the other side of the wall. Sam gestured to Andy, pressing both of them against that wall. He Signed as much as he signaled to Sam – a mix of proper ASL hand signs and old military ones – that he would round the corner first.

When Andy nodded, Sam spun himself around the wall separating the stairwell from the hallway, bat raised. Unfortunately for him, the figure in the hallway had the same thought – the same militaristic training – and they swung their respective clubs right into each other. Sam's opponent had the better choice in weapons – something made out of metal. It tore through the hunter's wooden chair leg like it was butter, enough so that Sam's arm hurt just keeping hold of the broken half. His opponent was strong.

Sam stumbled back a step, brain rushing to figure out his next move – defense – when Andy suddenly launched himself between the two of them. He was waving his arms in a classic 'stop' motion, then held one arm out towards each man, keeping them from attacking each other. Their opponent backed off in surprise, taking a step back. Light from what was once a sunlight and was now just a hole in the roof, illuminated him enough to see basic details.

He was another kid, like them. Taller than Andy or Ava, probably six foot easy, Black, shaved head and army fatigues suggesting military. He lowered his weapon hesitantly as he blinked at them, realizing similar things about them.

“You’re just-”

“Kids. Like you,” Sam supplied, though he didn’t really think of himself as a kid anymore. Not that it mattered – if he’d encountered a bunch of people in their early twenties, kidnapped by evil forces and forced to battle to the death, he would have called them kids too.

“Where…where are we?” the kid – Jake, Sam guessed warily, based on the description his brother had given him about his murderer – looked around the house, eyes wide and haunted. “Last night, when I went to sleep, I was in Afghanistan.”

“Yeah,” the hunter nodded, talking over Andy’s head. The kid had dropped his arms around the same time Jake lowered his weapon, though he made no move to step out from between them. “Wisconsin.”

Andy made a sign, and Sam nodded his way, translating for him: “South Dakota for him.”

“You know Sign Language?” Jake Tulley asked, lowering his weapon further and shoulders relaxing a hair’s width.

“Learned it along with him,” was Sam’s answer, once more gesturing to Andy with his head.

Jake glanced between them. “What, are you brothers or something?”

Andy positively beamed, raising a fist and knocking in time with the nodding of his head. Sam huffed a laugh.

“Something like that. Look, we need to figure out where we are.” He turned as he said it, addressing Ava as she climbed up to the landing of the stairs, joining them hesitantly. Andy moved out of the way as Jake took the few steps forward needed to see the fourth kid trapped there with them. “Ava, this is Jake. Jake, Ava.”

“Wait,” Jake straightened, eyes snapping to Sam’s. His body language screamed that he wanted to back away, but he kept himself still. “I never told you that. How do you know my name?”

Sam grimaced, the expression pulling into a self-deprecating smile. Andy was already Signing the same answer. “I’m psychic.”

“Psychic,” Jake repeated, skepticism clear in his voice.

“Yeah. We all have powers.” Sam glanced at Ava, but he was really talking more to Jake. He knew Ava had powers; knew she’d fall in line with what was happening more readily. Perhaps not as prepared as someone with military training, but unlike Jake, it wasn’t the crazy that was happening right now that would cause Ava to double take. “It started a little over a year ago, right? You found you could do things? Things you didn’t think were possible?”

Jake’s eyes were wide, but edged with something dangerous. He was more suspicious that Sam knew these things than the truth itself. If this was the kid destined to murder him, Sam was going to have to keep a careful eye on him. Maybe he could talk him out of anything rash, get him to see that they could all make it out alive if they worked together this time.

“I have visions. I see things before they happen,” Sam continued, trying for some even ground.

“Yeah, me too,” Ava added, offering a small, weak smile at their newcomer.

Andy started signing away, and Sam struggled to interpret before he figured out the direction his pseudo-brother was going.

“He can communicate telepathically,” the Winchester offered. “Send images to people’s minds. It doesn’t work that well on us, though. Comes with a hell of a headache.”

The kid offered an apologetic grimace and a shrug of his shoulders. Jake transferred his stare from Andy to Sam.

“What do you mean, us ?”

Sam sighed just under his breath, really dreading this next part.

-o-o-o

They met on the Wisconsin border. Dean had already been headed south, for Sioux Falls, and Bobby reasoned him out of driving the rest of the way there. Especially with the Feds hanging around. They didn’t have much to go on, but Ash’s algorithm had landed them in Wisconsin in the first place. They might as well continue on that hunt like it might be fruitful.

It made Dean twitchy as hell, but they didn’t have any better ideas.

“The kid’ll get you a sign,” Bobby said with more confidence than he felt, but doubled down, regardless. Andy would reach out to Dean the same way he had in Dean’s timeline. They had to believe that. “Just give ‘em time to figure out where they are.”

‘If they’re alive ,’ Dean thought, mood dark, but he didn’t voice it. It would be cruel. He glanced at Bobby, then looked away. Andy had become one of them. Family. He was terrified they would be too late to save him. To save them both.

“Where’s the next town you and Sam were looking at?”

Dean shook himself from morbid thoughts that wouldn’t find his brothers any faster. He pulled a map out of Baby’s glovebox and spread it out on the hood. The corners flapped in the frigid breeze, and Dean hoped wherever Andy and Sam were, it was indoors.

“Saint Martins.” Dean pointed to it on the map, circled in red. “South of Milwaukee.”

“Alright, then we head there,” Bobby decided firmly, carrying the decision for the both of them. He knew Dean was panicking and hiding it behind anger and pessimism. So he’d just have to be the pragmatic optimist for the both of them. “And we call everyone we know on the way. See if any of ‘em have heard anything. We’ll start with Ash.”

Dean nodded, head hung low, but he folded up the map and rounded the Impala for the driver’s side door. He paused with it open, one foot already in the car. “What about psychics?”

Bobby, who was heading for his truck parked behind the Impala, raised his eyebrows in surprise. “Psychics?”

“Yeah, Pamela and, and… Missouri. Could they help find ‘em?”

“Pamela Barnes?” Bobby clarified, surprised Dean even knew the name. She hadn’t come up in Dean’s notes on the future, though the more they went through that supposed future, the more Bobby realized the boy’s memory was spotty. Not that he could blame him. Ten years’ worth of details – some that might not have seemed important at the time – was a lot to dredge up and recall with perfect reflection.

“Yeah, best psychic in the state, right?” Dean offered half a smile, more sad than anything else, and Bobby tried not to read into that.

“Yeah,” Bobby confirmed warily as he regarded Dean, unsure what to make of his expression. “I’ll give her a call. Don’t know the other one – Missouri? You got her number?”

Dean shook his head. “Missouri Mosely. She’s the psychic dad went to after…”

Bobby nodded, knowing exactly when John went to a psychic. He’d said as much, when he’d first come to Bobby to train up. He’d just never mentioned a name. “Alright, I’ll see if someone out there does.”

The Winchester boy nodded, trying not to look as hopeless as he felt, and climbed into the Impala. Bobby followed suit, getting into his truck. He glanced over at Sarge, who met his gaze with a small whine.

“Don’t worry, boy,” Bobby said, scratching behind the Shepherd’s ears. “We’ll find ‘em. We’ll bring ‘em both home.”

-o-o-o-

Jake and Ava were not taking the news particularly well. Not that Sam had expected them to. But for once he would love to skip the whole ‘truth is out there’ spiel, followed by the panic and denial of civilians wishing they could take back the last hour of their lives and go back to ignorant bliss.

“So, we’re soldiers in a demon war to bring on the Apocalypse?”

Sam winced. “When you put it like that…”

They had relocated back downstairs, in what was probably once a respectable foyer in whatever house they’d found themselves in. Ava had already tried the front door, Andy lending a hand when it hadn’t budged.

“And, we’ve been picked?” The skepticism in Jake’s voice was again, warranted, but unhelpful in their current situation.

“Yes,” Sam sighed, really wanting to end this conversation and start looking for clues as to where they were. The faster he could get Ava and Jake on board with the idea they weren’t getting out of here without help, the sooner he and Andy could start finding that help.

“Why us?”

“I’m not sure, okay?” Sam lied through his teeth, trying for a smile but landing with a grimace. “But look, I just know-”

“Sam, I’m sorry,” Ava interrupted as she came back to the group, abandoning the door. Andy trailed after her, and she crossed her arms over her chest, either in fear or self-consciousness. “Psychics and spoon-bending, that’s one thing. But demons?”

“I know it sounds crazy,” Sam tried again, Andy nodding along in support. “But-”

“It doesn’t just sound it,” Jake muttered, cutting Sam off. It was from his expression that Sam was losing him. Glancing at Ava made it clear he was losing them both.

“Look, I don’t really care what you think, okay? I know what brought us here-”

“A yellow-eyed demon ,” Ava said hollowly, clearly not believing him. “You said you’ve seen him, but I haven’t.” She glanced at the other three psychic kids. “Have any of you?”

Jake shook his head, while Andy nodded emphatically, an expression on his face saying he wished he hadn’t.

“He hasn’t… been around lately,” Sam finished lamely, realizing explaining Azazel’s disappearance was only going to muddy things further, pushing them further away from acceptance. Sam considered giving up; let them believe what they wanted, while he and Andy found a way out of here. But he had to give it one more try. Their odds of escaping alive increased if they stuck together. If they didn’t turn on each other out of fear and desperation to survive. Sam cleared his throat. “My brother and I exorcised him back to Hell. But his plan is still in motion. The fact that we’re all here is proof that it's started.”

“I thought you said he was your brother,” Ava sniffed, gesturing to Andy with her head. Andy was already Signing a response.

“Oh, I was there, ” Andy confirmed, expression wide before crumpling, “ Getting my ass handed to me.”

When Sam didn’t immediately translate, instead looking pained himself and lowering his gaze to the floor, Jake prodded. “What did he say?”

“He said he was there,” Sam bit out, voice quiet and clipped. “I didn’t catch the rest.”

Andy sent him a knowing look, a little smile in the corner of his mouth regardless of their circumstances. “Liar.”

“Look, it doesn’t matter if you believe me or not,” Sam insisted, trying to get them back on track and not think about his surrogate little brother bleeding out on the ground from a demon who had set this trap just as surely as the Rivergrove one. Trying not to think of Dean’s notes, that only one of them would walk away from this, and it wasn’t him or Andy.

He gestured with a sweeping arm towards the front door, still locked up tight. “We’re not walking out of here. Wherever this is, it’s on supernatural lockdown. So we have to find another way, and the best way to do that is together. ”

Ava tensed, but when Jake glanced her way she gave a one shouldered shrug. “I’m just a secretary from Peoria. This is so above my paygrade.”

“Alright,” Jake conceded, looking back at Sam and giving a tentative nod. “How do we get out of here, then?”

“We find weapons, if there are any,” the younger Winchester breathed out, trying not to sound as relieved as he felt to have them on board. “Iron, silver, salt, if we can find it.”

“Salt is a weapon?” Jake asked with raised eyebrows. He glanced at Andy for confirmation, the kid nodding. He mimed pouring salt in a circle around him.

Sam huffed. “Brave new world, right? We need to find out where we are, too. If we can find an address, or any sort of clue, Andy can send it to my brother.”

“Dean?” Ava asked, voice tentative like she wasn’t sure she had the right name. “The guy you tried to call in Lafayette?”

“Yeah,” Sam nodded, smiling gently.

Ava shifted weight on her feet, looking both hopeful and terrified of that hope. “Where is he?”

“Hopefully close.” Sam glanced at Andy as he said it, trying to convey the same confidence and strength he was hoping to instill in Ava. He turned back to the scared woman. “We were still looking for you, Ava. Some signs pointed to Wisconsin, so that’s where we were. If we’re lucky… Dean’s not far from here.”

If they were lucky. Which was a big if.

“Let’s split up into groups of two. No one goes anywhere alone.” Sam looked at each of the kids in turn, already feeling the weight of responsibility for them settle in his gut like lead. “Andy, go with Ava. Look for an address, anything that tells us where we are.” Ava looked put out by that, but Sam ignored it, instead meeting Andy’s gaze. “You find something, you send it to Dean. Right away.”

Andy nodded, eyes filled with more determination than fear. That was his Jedi.

Sam turned to Jake. He didn’t want Andy or Ava alone with him, not if it was the same man Dean had talked about. The one that stabbed Sam in the back, literally. Which left the younger Winchester as the one to be paired with the army man. He could hear his brother throwing a hissy fit already, but better him than the other two. At least Sam was prepared for what might happen.

“Jake, you and I will search for weapons.” The army man nodded, and Sam tried to bolster his own confidence with a deep breath. It just came out as a dreadful sigh. “Let’s get going. Stick together, and stay safe.”

-o-o-o-

Persephone stared at the iron-wrought gates of a cemetery as they drove under the arched entryway. It was dark and quiet; the gravesite was an old one rarely visited by grieving families, let alone anyone so late at night. There was no electric lightsource to mark the dirt road they drove on, which was bumpy and ill maintained. As Tom put the car in park two-thirds of their way through the plots, Persephone turned her ward-blue eyes on the demon.

"This is not Appleton, Wisconsin."

"Aren't you the observant one," Tom answered without answering, smiling at her in the same way sharks would smile, if only they were able. "This is a pitstop."

With a flourish of his hand, that delicate gold chain formed between Persephone's neck and his hand once more. He went about tying the end of it to the steering wheel, whistling as he did so. When he pulled his hands away, the chain was fused to the leather ring with no start and no end. Persephone glared at it.

"Don't trust me, demon?" she asked with a mocking smile of her own.

"Why rely on trust when I can ensure you'll stay right here?" Tom opened the driver side door and climbed out of the car. He bent over, one arm on the top of the door, one arm on the roof, to give her another version of the same grin. "Sit tight, Princess, I'll be back in a jiffy."

Persephone stuck her tongue out at the demon as he closed the car and sauntered off into tombstones and darkness. Once he was out of sight, the woman grumpily pulled out Chuck's phone – which she had stolen on her way out of the house earlier that day – to learn what a 'pit stop' was.

-o-o-o-

Andy and Ava ended up on the second story after a search of the first floor, divided among Sam and Jake, didn't yield any sort of information on their whereabouts or the last owner of the house. The whole of the first floor had been picked pretty clean by scavengers, bored teenagers, and squatters over the years. So, they headed upstairs, hoping to find an office of sorts for whoever lived here last.

"So how'd you lose your voice?" Ava asked casually as they searched what was once a bedroom. She was pulling dresser drawers open, but there wasn't much left except moth-eaten clothing from what had to be the fifties or sixties. So exciting.

Andy signed something she couldn't read, turning from the bedside table he was searching through.

"Not sure why I asked," Ava muttered, turning away.

Andy just shrugged and went back to the top drawer of the side table. There was an empty bottle of horse tranquilizer and a couple of old needles. He closed the drawer, careful of the exposed tips. A junky had probably camped out in the place at some point over the years. He hoped whoever it was had lived through the experience. This place gave him the creeps like only a hunt ever did. Andy was under no illusion this place was haunted. Especially given the last location Azazel had tossed a bunch of psychic kids together.

But he wasn't thinking about that.

Working extra hard to not think about demon girls in forests or impromptu vocal cord amputations, Andy gestured to Ava that he was heading to the next room. She followed behind him.

The next room had more potential. There were tables up against the wall, an old desk, some filing cabinets and lockers that looked beat up but not particularly rifled through. There were taxidermy animals up on the walls, covered in cobwebs from years left hanging in this musty place. Every surface in the room was covered in a disarray of papers and notebooks, pamphlets and books, broken photo frames, and an array of bits and bobs. Andy supposed most people looking for an abandoned house weren't interested in paperwork. This place, wherever it was, was apparently no exception. It took some digging as he and Ava split up the room, but eventually Andy found what he was looking for.

He raised his arms in triumph, staring at a stack of unopened mail that had been a desk drawer. Andy hurried over to the window for what little light the moon outside offered and held up one of the envelopes.

It was addressed to a Freeman Daggett, 121 Summerland Road, Appleton, Wisconsin.

"What is it?" Ava asked, crossing the room towards him. Andy didn't answer, knowing she wouldn't be able to understand him anyway. He was too busy staring at that address, trying to place where he'd heard of it before.

When it came to him, Andy almost dropped the letter. The Morton House. Dean had mentioned that once, on a hunt. One of the most haunted houses in America. What had he called the ghost that terrorized anyone who dared to stay the night?

A pissed off, Silence of the Lambs inspired, psycho ghost.

Andy swallowed past the lump in his throat. It didn't matter. They could deal with Hannibal Lecter 2.0 after he got a message out to Dean.

"Andy?"

Ava was behind him now, but Andy didn't pay her any attention. He closed his eyes, holding the envelope with both hands, and concentrated. He'd never sent an image to a target so far away before, but he was confident he could do it. He just had to focus.

-o-o-o-

Ava stared resolutely at her companion's back. Andy, who didn't seem to pay much attention on a good day, was ignoring her now, focusing on whatever it was he'd found in the desk. Slowly, Ava pulled the knife from the inside of her jacket and she neared the other psychic kid standing by the window. Ava drew a steadying breath, reminding herself that this got easier with each kill, and she had quite a number of those under her belt now.

"Sorry about this," she whispered insincerely from right behind Andy. Ava pulled her arm back, prepared to bury the blade in his spine.

She thrust forward just as her head exploded in pain.

-o-o-o-

Dean climbed out of the Impala, rage-disguised-fear building with every stupid town he and Bobby went to that didn't have his brothers. Not that they'd made it far; this was only their second, but it didn't matter, because it wasn't the right location either. Hopelessness was building, and with it, fury.

Once they'd called her, Pamela Barnes had promised to get on a séance immediately. She'd called them back within the hour to confirm Wisconsin as their target location. Northeastern Wisconsin, to be more precise. Not that it had been. It narrowed their search radius to the same 100-mile one Dean and Sam had already been checking.

Bobby had cuffed him on the head for saying that aloud, and he'd had to grumble an apology to Pamela. It confirmed they were in the right area, which was more than they'd had before. Pamela took it like the champ she always was, shrugging off Dean's anger like it was water rolling off oil.

"This isn't working," the older Winchester griped as he and Bobby made it back to their vehicles. Sarge barked from the window, as if to agree with him.

"You got any better ideas, I'm all ears," Bobby sniped back, knowing Dean's frustration wasn't aimed at him but getting sick of it all the same. He was just as worried too, damnit, but you didn't see him whining and complaining about how unfair their shit lives were.

"Sorry, Bobby," Dean grumbled. "It's just-"

Whatever he was going to say was cut short as Bobby's cell started ringing. Dean looked towards him with a heart-breaking amount of hope and Bobby dug the phone out of his pocket. "Yeah?"

"We made it to your place," came Ellen's voice, and Bobby switched the cell to speakerphone. "Me, Ash, and Ronald."

Dean, who's hope had been dashed when he heard Ellen's voice, did raise his eyes at the inclusion of their Mandroid buddy.

"I'm getting the boys down in the panic room, then I'm headed your way." Ellen's voice booked no room for nonsense. She was in action mode now, and that did make Dean feel just a little bit better. "Soon as you tell me which way that is."

"Green Bay, Wisconsin," Bobby replied, tugging at his cap. "That's where we're headed, for now. We'll fill you in when we got something more specific."

Right in the middle of the conversation – which Dean might not have anything to add to but at least took some consolation being a part of (at this point, he'd take anything just to feel like they were doing something) – pain flashed through the time traveler's brain like a sledgehammer to his skull. Dean stumbled into the side of the Impala, clutching at his head.

"Dean?"

He gasped as another flash hit. Light blinded him from behind his eyelids, and he bent double against the front of the car as his legs threatened to give out. He couldn't focus on anything but the agony in his head, like a gripping vice trying to squeeze something in that didn't have room to fit.

"Dean!"

There was another flash, this time coalescing into a rectangular shape on the undersides of his eyelids. The edges were a deep blue, dim and hard to discern, like it was further away. The rectangle sharpened until it was less a blinding light and more a too-bright sheet of paper. No, not paper, an envelope. An envelope with an address. The squiggly lines shifted in and out of focus, but Dean tried to pour all his concentration onto those words.

Freeman Daggett

121 Summerland Road

Appleton, Wisconsin

"Dean!"

The younger hunter very nearly lost his footing, collapsing entirely onto the Impala's hood, with only Bobby's arms and his own holding him up.

"Holy shit," he mumbled once his vision cleared and he could properly feel the inside of his mouth again rather than just one big mass of cotton. And his legs, and his arms. Dean pushed off of Baby, only stumbling a little, as he got his body back under him and fully functional.

"Andy?" Bobby asked, voice so full of hope Dean almost couldn't look him in the eye. He nodded.

"Andy," he confirmed, licking his lips and closing his eyes for a second. He had to shake off the lingering spikes of pain across his eyes and temples. "I know where they are. Bobby, it's not good… but it's close."

The old hunter had his phone pressed back to his ear, ready to rattle off the destination for Ellen (who was hollering at being ignored). He thanked whatever cosmic power existed in the world that he and Dean were less than two hours away from the infamous Morton House.

-o-o-o-

Andy spun at the clatter of noise behind him, breaking his concentration. It was okay, though. He was pretty sure he'd gotten the message out.

Ava had collapsed to her knees, hands on the sides of her head. There was a wicked looking hunting knife on the ground in front of her – the clatter of which had startled Andy out of his concentration. He immediately crouched down, reaching out one hand for the woman's shoulder. She jolted at his touch, looking up at him in fear and then suspicion.

"Sorry," he signed, mouthing the word as well so she might better understand him. He picked up the knife from the ground, Ava watching closely as he did. He used the arm on her shoulder to guide her back to her feet. Then, with a smile, he handed her the knife, hilt first.

"That was… you?" she asked, eyeing the blade before taking it back, knuckles white around the hilt.

Andy nodded, making the same sign again to apologize. He didn't bother telling her he couldn't control it. That much had to be obvious, and it's not like she would understand him. He gestured for the door, mouthing, "We should go downstairs. Find Sam," and hoping she understood.

Whether she did or not, Ava followed after him as he left the room, massaging her temples like she had one hell of a headache. He only felt mildly guilty about that as he headed for the stairs.

-o-o-o-

Sam, alongside (and keeping a close eye on) Jake, had found scant little in terms of weapons so far. They had started on the first floor, taking the east side of the house while their other two companions took the west, before making their way to the basement. The kitchen had been picked clean – not surprising, given how long this house had been obviously abandoned – and the basement wasn't proving any more fruitful. There were army rations, so at least they wouldn't starve. Sam tucked one into the pocket of his jacket. It would probably be bland as hell, but he knew Andy was always hungry. He'd appreciate food in any form.

"There's not much down here," Jake said after they'd picked through the dark room using their single light source. Sam wished they had flashlights, having to instead make do with Jake's phone, which had no service, of course, but did have a working flashlight. The man turned that light on Sam now, making his way across the room to join the hunter over by the rations. "Who the hell lived here?"

"Someone paranoid," Sam answered satirically.

"Someone who thinks a bomb shelter's actually gonna save his ass," Jake muttered sarcastically as he turned the light in a slow circle, actually looking for a bunker. He didn't see anything obvious, but there was an old coal-burning furnace in the corner. He made his way over to it. It didn't have a door any longer, but it looked like it could be made of iron.

He grabbed the cone-shaped portion meant to hold the burning coal, and yanked. The whole thing gave easily, crumpling in his hands as he pulled it free from the vertical vent and three-foot base. Jake chucked it to the side, instead focusing on those three feet. He ripped one clean out of its bolted foundation. Glancing over his shoulder, he waved it at Sam, who had come closer once Jake started making a racket.

"Would this work?"

The hunter raised surprised eyebrows, glancing at the crumpled iron on the ground next to them. He huffed in disbelief at the mangled wreck created by very human hands. "Yeah. Yeah, that's great."

Jake handed the iron rod to Sam, then tried to prop his phone up on the ground so it lit the remaining two legs. Sam bent down, picked the phone up, and pointed it at the space Jake had been trying to light. It worked a lot better than the propped-up attempt.

"Thanks," Jake said as he ripped free another leg and handed it to Sam. The hunter couldn't help but stare at the end of it, where the metal was twisted and deformed: ripped from its anchoring in the floor.

"I'm not Superman or anything," Jake said, a little self-consciously. Sam looked back down at the man to find he was being watched. Jake shrugged, again looking self-conscious, and turned back to the last iron leg. "It's no big deal."

Sam offered something close to a smile. It was weird, being around this guy and knowing what he was- well, might be capable of. After everything Dean had told him – and yeah, it hadn't been particularly detailed – Sam had been expecting a monster. But the kid in front of him was… well, just that. A kid. One that was as freaked out as the rest of them, dealing with it the best he could.

"You were in Afghanistan when this started?" Sam asked conversationally, that little flame of hope once again flickering to life. If he could connect with Jake, convince him they were on the same team, maybe he could change what had happened in Dean's timeline.

"Yeah, I started getting headaches." Jake ripped free the last leg and stood. "Then there was the accident. This guy flipped his vehicle on a bad road. He got pinned underneath. I lifted it off him like it was nothing. Everybody said it was a fluke adrenaline thing."

Sam chuckled, having lived this tale in another form. "But then you did it again, right?"

"Bench-pressed eight hundred pounds, stone-cold calm." Jake held out the last of the iron rods for Sam to take. "I never told anybody of course, it was just too crazy."

"Yeah, well, crazy's relative. Keep it," Sam nodded at the furnace leg in Jake's hand, well aware this man could kill him with it with a single swing. Then again, he was pretty sure Jake didn't need a weapon to take out a human being. Not with that kind of strength. "It works against ghosts. Interrupts them. They kinda… flicker out and it takes a few minutes for them to reappear."

Jake lifted the bar, giving it a little toss to test the weight. He looked back at Sam. "And demons?"

The hunter gave a humorless smile. "I wish it were that easy. Exorcisms are the simplest way to get rid of one, but those take time."

"And a mastery of Latin," Jake replied, equally humorlessly. He shook his head, and it was obvious from his expression that he was rethinking that earlier line about crazy. Sam offered his phone back and Jake took it, but didn't move towards the basement stairs. "By the way, I appreciate what you're doing here."

Sam raised his eyebrows, lips quirked up in a sardonic smile. "What am I doing?"

"Keeping calm. Keeping them calm." The man nodded his head towards the ceiling, where their other two companions were exploring the rest of the house. "Especially considering how freaked to hell you really are. I know the look."

The smile dipped downward and Sam had to look away.

This man was supposedly going to kill him, if Dean and all his future knowledge was right. If Castiel was correct about time wishing to stay the same. This man was going to take him away from his family. But he was just a man. Hell, a kid. Nothing inherently evil. No devil incarnate.

In another timeline, he had killed this man who had apparently killed him first.

"You wanna know the truth?" Sam swallowed, the movement rough and raw in his throat as he forced the words out. "The size of this thing…. It's big. World-ending big. And I know how crazy that sounds. But I just keep thinking…"

"That we're not gonna make it out?"

Hazel-brown eyes flicked over to meet Jake's, and after a moment of analyzing the other man's gaze, Sam nodded. It felt like defeat, even just admitting it, but he couldn't deny it, either. Couldn't really keep it hidden.

"It doesn't matter if we believe it," Jake said, eyes still locked on Sam before drifting to the ceiling. "Only matters that they do."

"Yeah, I guess you're-"

Sam's words suddenly stuck in his throat like a bug caught on flypaper as pain flared throughout his head. He and Jake both hit the ground, Jake grabbing at his head while Sam balanced on his knees and elbows, riding out the pain by clutching at his skull. An envelope with an address – an address all hunters knew, like their own version of a boogeyman – flashed across his brain like a red-hot brand. It receded just as quickly as it came, leaving both men panting on the ground.

"Shit," Jake swore, still massaging his temples with his hand. The phone had fallen from his grip during whatever that had been, and the flashlight was aimed uselessly at the ceiling from its place on the hard cement. "What was that?"

"Andy." Sam got his breathing to even out before pushing back onto his calves and straightening up in the darkness. "He found an address. Sent it to my brother."

"Not just your brother," Jake grumbled, stumbling to his feet and scooping up his phone on the way. He walked the couple feet over to the hunter and offered a hand. Sam eyed it for a moment's hesitation before he grabbed hold and Jake pulled him effortlessly to his feet.

"He never figured out how to target one individual," Sam explained, at least somewhat apologetically, still rubbing at his forehead and the phantom pain there.

"Well, that sucks. Guess I know why he uses ASL now."

Sam let out a laugh, but froze as the flashlight on Jake's phone flickered. He looked around immediately, instinctually tense, and his companion picked up on the change.

"What is it?" Jake raised his makeshift weapon, spinning in a slow circle, flashlight still on the fritz.

"Ghosts cause electrical interference. Could be nothing," Sam added hopefully, but his gut was anything but.

"Or, we could have incoming."

The two of them locked eyes, Sam raising his own iron rod as well. There was a short burst of static that came from Jake's phone. Just enough of a noise to cause both men's gaze to snap to the device, and then the light went out.

Both phone and iron clattered to the ground a second later, flashlight bursting back to life. Sam was alone in the basement, his own weapon still raised.

-o-o-o-

The dashboard clock indicated nine minutes passed before Tom emerged from the darkness of the cemetery with something in his hand he had not previously had. It was not until he neared the car, tucking the object into the waistline of his too-tight jeans, that Persephone recognized the shape.

A gun. An old one, unlike the ones all over television. This one looked more like the type used in cowboy movies. She'd seen one or two, usually while channel surfing in the motel room Azazel had kept her locked in.

Tom certainly didn't look like a cowboy, she thought idly, looking away as the demon opened the driver's door and climbed into the car. Azazel must have hidden it and left instructions for his spawn to find.

Persephone knew what that gun probably was from hours reading the Winchesters' story, both published and freshly printed. A weapon that could kill anything – more than likely, herself included – and it was less than a foot from where she sat.

She kept her gaze locked on the world outside. Tom put the car into gear and pulled away from the cemetery and, presumably, towards Appleton, Wisconsin.

-o-o-o-

Sam came racing up the stairs, yelling Jake's name. He had the three iron rods tucked into one arm and Jake's phone in the other, flashlight swinging around dizzyingly as he searched for the missing man. The noise alerted Ava and Andy, who came crashing down the stairs from the floor above.

"What's going on?" Ava asked, hitting the landing just behind Andy, who was already signing the same question.

"Jake – he just disappeared," Sam panted as he regrouped with them at the base of the stairs. "I think a ghost took him."

"We need to find him!" Andy signed immediately and the younger Winchester nodded.

"We need to get out of here," Ava breathed out in barely contained panic, unaware of the conversation happening between the two boys. She looked on the edge of an anxiety attack, holding her head like she was dizzy and in pain. Probably residual effects from Andy's message, Sam thought.

"Are you alright?" he asked, concerned. He reached out to place a stabilizing hand on her elbow. Ava looked up at the contact, big doe eyes filled with unshed tears.

"No, I'm not alright! We're stuck in a- in a haunted house, and you're telling me one of us just went missing?" She was sliding right into that panic attack, breaths coming faster. "How is any of that alright?"

"It's going to be okay," Sam tried, cupping her elbow more firmly. He raised his other hand in a calming gesture of up-and-down motion and hoped she might subconsciously sync her breathing to it. "We'll get out, Ava. But we have to find Jake first."

Those hazel-green pools widened, filled first with surprise, quickly followed by stunned disbelief. "Find- Sam, he's gone. A ghost took him! We have to get out of here before we're next!"

"We don't know he's gone." Sam settled that second hand on her other arm, physically slowing her breathing down with slow, steady circles since that first attempt clearly hadn't worked. "We have to try to find him, Ava."

As she finally began to calm, expression still dazed, Sam gave her arms one more squeeze and let go. He turned towards Andy. "That address- did you find anything else to go with it? Anything on Freeman Daggett?"

Andy's expression gave away his confusion long before his hands made the sign for 'what?'

Sam pinched his eyes shut for a moment, running a hand through his hair in an effort to keep his own stress levels under control. "This house, it's the-"

Ava screamed. Both Sam and Andy spun to find a new man – loose suit, old-fashioned glasses, Dick-Tracy fedora – standing in the foyer not five feet away from them. He was rubbing at his chin, swaying side to side in a need for movement, clearly on edge.

"What the hell?" Sam muttered, pushing both Andy and Ava behind him warily.

"Look, buddy…. I'm sorry, that's it," the man announced out of nowhere, lowering his hand from his chin to gesture at whoever he was talking to. It wasn't the three kids; the guy wasn't quite facing them, looking off to their left. He raised his second hand, both arms out in a beseeching manner. "I'm telling you, that's all the money I got-"

Before he could finish, gunfire came out of nowhere. Literally. Sam stumbled a hasty step back, taking the others with him as the guy took three to the chest and fell back. His dying scream echoed, even after he had already disappeared.

"Oh my god," Ava breathed out, before letting out a blood-curdling scream.

Sam rounded on her, trying to interrupt the panic attack. Andy stared at the space the man had just been, signing a similar reaction to the empty room. He turned to the other two kids, stepping into Sam's field of vision even as the hunter kept working to calm Ava down.

"A death echo?" Andy signed, expression dumbfounded. "Someone got shot here?"

"No, not…" Sam shook his head, struggling to understand it himself. This was the Morton House; he'd researched it once, when he was still a wet-behind-the-ears kid who'd heard the name in passing. One of Dad's hunter friends (at least when it was convenient to John) had been talking game about it. Like an old fishing buddy with one of those 'the size of that fish, let me tell ya' stories he never stopped telling. It had piqued young Sam's curiosity just as much as it had left him rolling his eyes at certain embellishments.

Which meant adult Sam knew that no one had ever been shot in the Morton House. Not that he had ever found.

"I don't know," the younger Winchester continued, rubbing Ava's arms and telling her they were okay, they weren't in danger – to which he received one hell of a look. At least it confirmed the whip-smart girl was still with them. "This is the Morton House. The only death I know of before it became an infamous haunt was the last owner, Freeman Daggett. He had a heart attack in '64."

Andy frowned, pulling his head back in a motion so reminiscent of Dean, Sam momentarily forgot the predicament they were in. "That makes no sense. How is it here?"

"I don't know," Sam repeated, his own frustration – both at the situation and with himself – coming through clearly in both body language and tone. "None of this makes much sense."

Silence fell between the three of them. Ava was still working on her breathing, muttering that they had to get out of there, Sam rubbing her arms, muttering comforts, which left Andy frowning at the excessively haunted house around them. He raised his hands, cupping them in front of his chest and bringing them up with a huff of air that blew his hair off his forehead.

Sam frowned at the sign he didn't recognize. He pointed to Andy's hands and made the gesture for 'what?', brows pulled into a questioning frown of his own.

Andy's eyebrows went up in return and, despite the darkness and horrors around them, he was grinning as he fingerspelled the word. "B-A-L-L-S."

Sam choked on his own spit and it took him several seconds of coughing and recovery before he could say, "You've been spending too much time with Bobby."

The kid just grinned all over again, this time with a touch of pride.

"Um… excuse me, hello?" The two turned as one back to Ava, who Sam was still holding by the arms. Her eyes were huge, face disbelieving, eyebrows of her own up in disbelief and annoyance. "Stuck in a haunted house, remember? Want to go home? Curl up on the couch with my fiancé, have bad popcorn and watch an even worse movie! Can we maybe work on that!?"

She ended almost in a shriek and both boys winced. Sam went back to rubbing her arms, as much good as it was doing any of them.

"Dean knows where we are, Ava. He's coming," Sam promised, believing it with all his soul. He knew Andy had gotten that message out, which meant his brother was on his way. "He'll get us out, we just have to survive until then."

Ava stared at him like he was crazy.

"And we have to try and save Jake," Sam added, closing his eyes even as he said it. He knew what Ava was thinking. Jake was gone, they were next, they had to prioritize themselves. Get themselves out alive.

But there was Sam, risking his own life (and potentially theirs as well) to save a man that was supposed to kill him. Who knew the intelligence in that decision, but in the end, it didn't actually matter. Sam knew he couldn't abandon an innocent kid – just another victim of Azazel's machinations – without trying to save him. And no matter what Dean said about his future, or how Ava looked at him like he'd lost his mind, Sam believed in Jake's innocence.

At least until proven guilty.

"I have to try," he reiterated. "You and Andy stay here, okay? Take these-" he passed them two of the iron supports Jake had ripped free from the basement furnace- "they'll protect you from any more ghosts. I'll find Jake."

Andy was already shaking his head, but Sam didn't give him time to argue. "What room did you find that envelope in?"

"Upstairs, second door on the right," Andy signed immediately, but his expression and the words he was mouthing strongly protested Sam going off on his own. The younger Winchester squeezed his shoulder, offering as reassuring a smile as he could manage. Given Andy's return expression, it hadn't been at all successful.

The hunter turned back to Ava, resting his hand on her shoulder and offering as much comfort as he could, given where they were. "Andy will take care of you, alright? Stay with him."

Andy nodded firmly, though his eyes remained on Sam. A promise to a brother more than reassurance for an innocent. Ava looked less sure, staring at Sam with that same hint of incomprehension. But Sam didn't have time to explain why he had to leave her. Why he had to do this.

It was his responsibility. She would understand that even less than she had understood his insistence back in Lafayette, facing down his death from her vision.

Sam headed for the stairs, just a few feet away. They hadn't searched the house for Jake yet, but somehow he knew they weren't just going to stumble across him. Sam would check the second story anyway, to be safe, but he had a feeling they needed to treat this like a hunt. Because this was the Morton House. It may not be a leap year – another cherry on top of this nonsensical sundae – but Sam could feel evil here. And nothing like that death echo downstairs. Something a lot… deeper. Rooted in the house.

Whatever had taken Jake, they weren't going to find him easily. Which meant Sam needed research on whatever was haunting the Morton House, and he needed to find it faster than he ever had before.

He found the room Andy indicated quickly enough. It was very clearly a den of sorts. Taxidermy animals on the walls, stacks of papers and books, old filing cabinets. A mess of an abandoned life; what was left of Freeman Daggett before his unexpected heart attack. The room had some remnants of more recent activity – a spray painted pentagon (incorrectly drawn, Sam noted) and other graffiti, the furniture a bit tossed, like someone had given a half-hearted search for something interesting and given up when it wasn't an immediate treasure trove – but for the most part, the room was pretty well preserved. Not a lot of squatters or troublemakers stayed in this house – or survived – long enough to leave much of a mark beyond the first floor.

Sam started shuffling through the piles of old papers. There was a desk centered in the back half of the room so the hunter started there. Old drawers contained pens and pencils, a book on taxidermy, ripped out magazine articles on the threat of nuclear annihilation, and other odds and ends left over from an age of fear.

"An optimist," Sam muttered to himself as he tossed aside a book on surviving an atomic blast.

A stray thought had him pausing before he got to the next item, gears turning. Hadn't Jake joked about a bomb shelter? Sam looked back at the Survival Guide. Guys like that, living through the Cold War, had lived in paranoia. The army rations in the basement – more stacked on a shelf in the corner of this very room – in a house where the owner practically lived in one room. A paranoid and lonely man.

"A bunker," the hunter muttered, picking the book back up, staring at the yellow cover, a red mushroom cloud blooming across it. "A man like that would have a bomb shelter."

Sam dropped the book and spun back for the door. The first place to look for a bomb shelter would be the basement.

He immediately drew up short at a figure standing in the doorway.

"Ava," Sam said in surprise, blinking at the girl who was supposed to be downstairs. "What are you doing up here? Where's Andy?"

"He wanted to search the first floor for Jake," she said evenly, big doe eyes locked on Sam. "I told him I'd come help you."

Sam let out a relieved breath and resumed his path for the door. "You should have stayed together. It's safer that way."

Ava was still standing in the doorway, blocking his way to the hallway. After an awkward moment where he expected her to move, Sam ended up squeezing past her on one side. It was only then that she stepped aside to make more room.

"You were saying something," Ava began, rather out of nowhere, as Sam made it into the hallway. He turned back to her, brow furled. She continued, "Earlier. About Brady."

There was something in her tone that sent Sam's heart down near his feet. He knew his expression crumpled right along with it. He could see it reflected in Ava's own face, and he looked away. "Ava…"

"No, Sam." She shook her head, crossing her arms over her chest. She still had the iron rod in one hand. The other had a knife. The knife he'd given her three months ago. Sam stared at that blade a second longer than was normal, something teasing at his brain. But he didn't know what – the dim light wasn't giving much away – and Ava's voice drew his stare away from that knife and back to her face. "If you know something, you have to tell me. I deserve to know."

There was something in the way she said it. Something… unstable, that gave Sam pause. This wasn't the time to tell her she'd lost her fiancé. They needed to keep their heads, focus on escaping. Grief would only push Ava's panic further over the edge.

"Ava, I don't think now is a good-"

"Time?" The woman tilted her head back and laughed. With her defensive body language it came across as crazed. Her eyes matched as she lowered them back to the man in front of her. "We're being picked off one by one, here, Sam, so now seems like a pretty damn good time to me."

"Ava…" Sam resisted the urge to take a step back, confused as to where the instinct to do so was even coming from. This was Ava. A good kid scared out of her mind, sure they were going to die. The only thing he should fear from her was losing her. But his instincts were screaming something entirely different. He just didn't know what. "We're going to make it out of this."

"Are we?" She looked away, biting at her lip as her eyes filled with unshed tears. But there was something in her posture that didn't match the crushing fear in her eyes. Her body said one thing, her face another. "We might not, you know. Not all of us."

Guilt flashed through Sam's gut, for Jake and the man's unknown fate. He needed to be looking for him if there was any chance of saving the kid.

Ava misread the guilt as something else, and her expression crumpled into further despair. "What happened to Brady, Sam? Where's my fiancé?"

Sam couldn't meet her watery eyes, but knew he couldn't keep it from her any longer. "I'm sorry, Ava. When the demon broke into your house to take you…" The younger Winchester took a deep breath, closing his eyes against the memory of bloodshed. "Brady didn't make it. I'm sorry."

He expected tears. Screams, denial, a sobbing woman in his arms. But none of that happened. Something in Ava shifted, but it didn't go the direction the hunter expected. Every instinct in Sam's gut warned him – firmly now – that he was in immediate danger.

"No," Ava ground out from between clenched teeth. Her fists tightened around both weapons, knuckles turning white.

Sam's brain told him to step up, to offer a comforting hug to his friend who was suffering a major loss. His feet didn't move.

"No, he can't be…. He can't be dead. That would mean that all of this… everything I've done was for… for what?" She laughed, then. It was cold. Hard. Broken. Sam found himself taking a step back.

"Everything you've done?" the Winchester echoed, brain starting to turn sluggishly in a very, very bad direction. "Ava…?"

Watery green eyes met his, but there was no fear in them now. Sam took another step back as the iron rod she was holding clattered to the ground. Ava raised her free hand to her temple, pressing the pads of her fingers into her head like she had a headache. Those previously-doey eyes closed and her face scrunched up in pain. Her other hand, still clenching the knife, raised it to press the knuckle-wrapped handle to her head.

The blade slipped into a stream of moonlight coming in through the filthy windows, and Sam realized what it was that had been bothering him. He hadn't seen it clearly in the dark, but shining in the filtered white light, he couldn't miss it.

There was fresh blood on that knife.

"Ava? What are you-"

A presence manifested into existence behind him. He could feel it, like a shadow of undulating hatred against his back. Every hunter instinct that Sam possessed lit up, all screaming red alert. He straightened, breath quickening with every 'Run!' signal that hit his brain in rapid succession.

Bracing himself, Sam turned around.

There was a man – no, a ghost – right behind him, blocking his path back to the stairs. He was tall – taller even than Sam – with a tightly buzzed hairline, janitor overalls from decades past, and a truly gruesome face, both blank and full of rage simultaneously. He was a terrifying sight and one that was far, far too close for comfort, even for a hunter.

The younger Winchester recognized that face from research years old, now. Freeman Daggett. The last owner of the Morton House.

-o-o-o-

Castiel stared at the television screen hanging on the wall (a relatively new design, according to Gabriel, who seemed very proud of the device) showing the now-empty hallway of the haunted house Sam Winchester was trapped in. Her eyes blazed an ethereal blue and fingers dug into the wooden arms of the chair she was strapped to.

Sam was in imminent danger. She had to escape Gabriel's captivity. She had to save Sam. She had promised Dean that she would be there to save his brother. To stop the beginning of the end. Castiel had to escape.

But how?

Her grace was no contest against Gabriel's. She would not be able to break his bindings on her own. And it was unlikely that she would successfully talk Gabriel into releasing her in time. Sam Winchester was out of time. He needed Castiel now.

So she had to escape her brother's grace without using her own. An impossible task, it may seem, but Castiel was good at puzzles. If she could not use her grace… then she would have to use Gabriel's.

The grace the archangel had imbued within her was currently tendrilled around her core, working on the most egregious damage. Eventually, it would integrate itself into her own and become hers, but right now it was still very much the Archangel's grace and would be for some time. It had been left there with the intent to heal, so that was what it was doing, all the while encouraging Castiel's grace to do the same.

But that exchange was a two-way street. In a normal healing, the injured party was a more active participant, making the healer an assistant to their recovery, not directly in charge of it. Which meant Gabriel's grace was likely to listen to her input, so long as it did not clash with its intended job: healing. Perhaps Castiel could convince the grace that the best way to heal her was to release the binds. If she was allowed access to her own grace, she would certainly heal faster.

It would not be a simple task. Castiel had never attempted subterfuge on grace before. She would only have one chance; if that energy sensed any deception, it would cease to listen. She would have to proceed slowly.

Sam might not have time for slow but, unfortunately, Castiel had no other choice.

"If Sam Winchester perishes and you do not free me to stop it," she began aloud, her gravelly voice even deeper than normal with the severity of her words. Castiel turned her head and fierce gaze to her brother, sitting beside her in his red recliner. "I will never forgive you, Gabriel."

The archangel stared in silence for a long, drawn-out moment before snorting so hard he almost spilled his soda out of the wrong orifice. He broke into laughter, wiping his nose with his sleeve.

"Oh, Cassie, your spunk is positively adorable," Gabriel announced once he had his breathing back under control, but he kept his eyes on the television screen, playing out the horrors of the Morton House.

Outwardly, he remained relaxed. Jovial. Perhaps a tad dickish. Inwardly, Gabe found himself annoyed by the promise his sister had just made, grave as the hole Sam Winchester would find himself in at the end of all of this.

The archangel shifted in his seat, irritated with his own irritation, and decided to blame Castiel for it. He picked up the remote and aimed it at the flat screen.

"Let's see what Dean's up to, shall we?"

-o-o-o-

The Impala rumbled along the smooth asphalt of the Interstate, pushing all sorts of speed limits as she roared towards the Morton House. An old tow truck followed behind (a far less loved, though no less cared for, vehicle), headlights a consistent and comforting presence in Baby's rear view mirror. Dean's eyes kept checking on those lights, as if to make sure Bobby was still with him if Sam couldn't be.

His fingers tightened on Baby's wheel, the leather creaking beneath his white-knuckled grip.

Sam would be fine, Dean told himself, over and over and over again. Even though he was racing Time, in more ways than one. Even though his brow was furled in the brooding way that meant bad shit was going down and they didn't stand a chance of surviving it. Even though he didn't believe it, himself.

Sam would somehow be fine.

If his kid brother wasn't, if Dean didn't get to Sam in time to save him – to stop it, all of it, from starting all over again – he wasn't sure what he'd do. He knew what he couldn't do. What he wasn't supposed to do. What he promised he wouldn't do.

But what else could he-

-o-o-o-

"Booooooriiiiing!" Gabriel hollered at the television screen, rolling his eyes and head in Castiel's direction. "One track record, this boy. Am I right?"

The archangel grinned winningly as he clicked the back button on the remote with such dramatic flair. The screen switched back to the Morton House and, beside him, his sister had a go at fratricide with nothing but a pair of pretty blues and an adorably optimistic amount of spunk.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: Oof, that one killed me. But it's done, it's edited, and now it's out in the world. Fly free, you little bastard of a Battle Royale chapter. Fly free.

Why didn't Bobby get Andy's message: Mostly to match canon, but if you need a real reason (cough always cough), Andy was actively trying to send it only to Dean, and he partially succeeded. Those close to him still received the message, cuz the strength of it to reach so far was big, but the further away from Andy, the more direct the message got, targeting only its intended subject. Everyone in the house just got hit by the wake of the psychic bullet! By the time it got to Bobby, the wake was itty bitty and he didn't even feel it, let alone get the message. (I'm a visual person, this is how I visualized it, shhhhhhh, it totally makes sense XD)

Hope you all enjoyed, thanks so much for your patience!

Cheers,
Silence

Update - 7/24/2024: OMG, guys. I was doing a random re-read of this chunk of chapters when I was suddenly like... wait. Jake was just mentioned, but we haven't met Jake yet. I definitely haven't read the part where they meet Jake. What the heck?

Somehow... three whole sections of writing got left out of the post when I transfered it to A03 and FF.net. How many of you were like "where did Jake come from? Huh."

□♀□□♀□□♀□□♀□□♀□

So that's been fixed now. Sheesh.

Chapter 129: Season 2: Chapter 95

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Oh man, guys, I am suuuper tired right now and just barely eeked out an edit on this chapter, so I don't think a lot of chatter is going to happen. Let the chapter speak for itself, and enjoy!

Chapter Warnings: Sam's at a party (and he may not be crying, but he could if he wanted to!) Andy's being his wonderful Andy-self despite a less than wonderful situation, Daggett's playing with his toys, Ava's being a villain, and Sam's the damsel in distress (as Dean would say, he's got the hair for it)

Actual Chapter Warnings: Tertiary character death, description of corpses, Ava being a villain, Sam being a distressed damsel, and Andy being his wonderful Andy-self.

Oh, and a no good, dirty rotten cliffhanger. #SorryNotSorry!

(Let's be honest, you all have been through worse at this point)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 95

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Sam woke to darkness, or very near to it, and blasting music. Wherever he was, the only light in the room was coming from a cell phone, lying face down on the table in front of him, flashlight on and pointed toward the ceiling. Music, on the other hand, was coming from a record player somewhere in the darkness, and it was turned to max volume. A scratchy vinyl of 'It's My Party' was playing (on repeat, he soon discovered), and the pounding in Sam's head started to match the beat.

Great.

Ignoring the headache playing bongos with his temples, Sam tried to figure out where he was. The diffused light was enough to eliminate the others seated around the table, and Sam instantly wished it hadn't been. To his right were two corpses, their skin dried out and partially mummified, while other parts, like their eyes, had clearly been preserved. They had party hats – those ridiculous cone-shaped ones with string straps – atop their heads. Their faces were stretched into ghastly expressions – wide eyes and wider smiles – that were probably intended to mimic happiness but, in reality, were horrifically unsettling. The entire thing was unsettling.

To his left was another body, though this corpse had partially fallen forward onto the table, so Sam (thankfully) couldn't see much of that one.

'Taxidermy,' Sam thought, recalling the manual he'd found upstairs. Freeman Daggett had been an amateur taxidermist. His animal of choice was, apparently, humans.

The younger Winchester stared at the body closest to him on the right. His hand was propped up on the table, cup attached to long-dead fingers, probably with glue. But next to his arm, lying on the table, was a Dick Tracy style fedora and that's what had captured Sam's attention. His eyes shifted to the clothing, dusty and now-decades old, that the corpse was wearing. It was the same loose suit he'd seen on the Death Echo – the one that had been shot multiple times.

'Oh, gross,' Sam thought with a grimace, turning away from the taxidermied corpse as his rapid-fire brain put two and two together. Daggett had been a hospital janitor; he was someone with access to dead bodies, an interest in taxidermy, and living a lonely Cold War life of paranoia. The table was set for a party, the record player had Lesley Gore on repeat, and this house was full of Death Echoes that hadn't died here.

Daggett had thrown a birthday party and made himself some friends.

"Don't worry," a voice came from behind him, deep and gravely, and Sam fought off the shiver that chased its way down his spine. He tried to turn around, but he was tied to the chair he was seated in, and couldn't do much more than toss his head back and forth, trying to spot the ghost. "It stops hurting. So don't worry."

"Get away from me," Sam growled, rocking the chair back and forth in his efforts to loosen the ropes that bound him.

Daggett stepped into his line of sight and the hunter stiffened when he picked up a long, narrow knife from the table.

"Don't worry," Daggett repeated and Sam leaned as far away as he could manage.

"S-Sam?"

The new voice was groggy, thick with confusion as its owner came to in the middle of a nightmare. Sam straightened in surprise, head whipping forward, towards the far end of the table.

"Jake?"

He couldn't see much of the kid, since Jake's phone was on the table between them, the flashlight too bright to see past and not really illuminating its owner. But he was sure that it was Jake, probably tied up the same way he was.

Daggett started towards the other end of the table, and Sam renewed his struggles.

"Stay away from him!" he demanded, though it did him little good. The ghost crossed the length of the table and Sam could just make out Jake struggling in the chair as Daggett moved behind him with the knife. "Don't. Don't!"

"Sam, what is he-" Jake's words cut off with a gurgle of surprise, and then the awful sounds of someone choking on their own blood.

"No!" Sam fought in his chair as Jake drowned. "Jake! Jake, stay with me. Jake!"

"Don't listen," Daggett whispered as he pulled the knife free from Jake's neck, and the army kid went silent, slumping forward as much as the ropes allowed. "You'll stay with me, now. A good, long time."

"You son of a bitch," the younger Winchester seethed, even as the ghost started back his way. By the time he came back into the dim light, the knife was no longer in his hand, and Sam desperately searched for it, unsure if Daggett still had it. "Get away from me."

"This won't hurt," the ghost said as he crossed behind the hunter, out of his range of vision. Sam fought against the ropes, but there was little give even with all his struggles. "It's okay. Relax. Relax."

Sam stiffened as he felt hands as cold as ice brush his cheek and neck. Another shiver ran through him, this one feeling a lot less like the anticipation of death and more like death itself. Something thin snapped to his chin, a light weight settling on his head, and then the ghost was moving away.

He'd put a goddamn party hat on him. Sam had to breathe through the shaking. Fear and anger were mixing in heavy doses with adrenaline and leaving him sick to his stomach.

"I was so lonely," Daggett announced in the darkness and turned his head to either side, trying to identify where the ghost was. "It was my birthday, you know. I put on quite the party. But no one came."

Slowly, brown eyes shifted back to the table and the taxidermied guests. Sam swallowed hard.

"So at midnight, I locked them in and went upstairs." The ghost came into view on his left, and Sam stiffened again, unconsciously leaning away. He was way too vulnerable tied up like this. But Daggett walked past him to the corpse that had toppled forward. He pulled the mummified man upright by his shoulders. The body was rigid and creaked in a way that Sam shut his eyes against and hoped to forget forever. "And overdosed on horse tranquilizers."

His eyes snapped back open, locking on the ghost who stared down at his only friends – friends he'd had to make – with a look of hateful sorrow. Those hollow eyes slid back to the hunter and Sam found himself pressing back in his chair.

"Now I have many friends." Daggett drew closer, sliding along the table towards him, dead eyes locked on Sam the entire time. "I have you, Sam Winchester."

Sam fought against his ropes as the ghost came right up to him, then rounded behind. A heavy hand fell on his shoulder and the hunter froze, trying to calm his breathing as Daggett moved out of sight once again. He fought yet another shiver down his spine at the anticipated touch of steel to the base of his neck. It never came.

"And you are the one to get," Daggett continued, voice near his ear and causing Sam to recoil. Then the ghost's words registered, and Sam froze for entirely different reasons.

'The one to get?' Wait, he'd heard that before. He'd heard that phrasing before, specifically about Azazel's Battle Royale. 'The man to get is Sam Winchester.'

Where had he heard that before? And how the hell did the Morton

House Ghost – a hunt that predated Sam by decades – know anything about it?

-o-o-o-

Andy came to lying on his stomach on the floor of a room he didn't know and couldn't remember coming to. Or the apparent bender he'd gone on that provided the raging headache and music that he was definitely imagining. That, or whoever's house he was in had a record player and 'It's My Party' was stuck on repeat in another room.

Maybe he was in hell, Andy thought, as he closed his eyes and focused on breathing. That seemed like the kind of thing demons would think up as a form of torture.

Andy also wondered what the hell he'd fallen asleep on that was digging so painfully into his side. Considering he was on the floor of a very dark, very disused kitchen, it could be anything, really. Knowing his luck and the searing pain, he'd fallen asleep on a freakin' knife.

Oh.

Andy pulled his hand away from his body and, even with splotches of white playing ping-pong with his vision, he could see the blood covering his fingers. Knife was a really unfortunate guess, apparently. Why couldn't he have thought of something soft, like a bunny? Or heck, he'd have taken something dull. Like a spoon.

'No,' Andy thought in a voice that sounded exactly like Alan Rickman as the Sheriff of Nottingham. At least in his head. "That would hurt more, you twit.'

He closed his eyes and focused on breathing. What had happened? How did he get himself stabbed? (Again). Or maybe shot? It didn't feel like a bullet hole, though. More like a knife wound. He'd had both before, so he could tell. And wasn't that a depressing (and, okay, also kinda badass) thought?

But if he'd been stabbed (again), why did his head hurt so badly?

With a groan, Andy gathered his knees beneath him. His side didn't hurt as much as he was initially terrified it would. Oh, it still hurt, that was for sure. It was all shooty and stabby, with fiery nerve endings that Andy absolutely wished he could not currently feel. But he'd also had way, way worse. Hell, given the completely reasonable amount of blood coating the hand pressed to his side, he wasn't even bleeding out.

That was nothing. Just another regular old Tuesday (or whatever day it actually was.)

As Andy managed to straighten up on his knees, only groaning a little, he saw a smattering of red on the edge of the kitchen counter in front of him. Out of instinct more than sequential, logic-based decision-making, Andy raised his free hand to his head. There was one heck of a lump there and his hair was matted with blood.

That was probably why his head was killing him.

Speaking of, the music was gone now. Andy blinked, realizing the silence was kind of echoey inside his pounding skull. But it wasn't complete silence. If he strained – which, ow with a headache – he could still hear the song, really faintly.

With a curious little frown, hand still pressed to his bleeding side (again, totally nothing. What honorary Winchester hadn't been stabbed once or twice? It was most definitely a Tuesday), Andy bent back down to the floor. It pulled a bit at his torn muscle and flesh, and he kind of regretted prioritizing what was still most likely an auditory hallucination, but he pressed his ear to the dirty, ancient linoleum anyway.

"It's my party and I'll cry if I want to. Cry if I want to. Cry if I want to."

Man, for an illusion, it was a real crooning one. He could even hear the scratch on the record that caused a skip for every turn of the vinyl.

'What the hell?' Andy thought as he straightened back up on his knees again, groaning because there was no one around to tell him to stop being such a baby.

In other words, Dean. Dean wasn't around to tell him to suck it up. Oh, right. Because he and Sam had been kidnapped by a yellow-eyed demon that wasn't supposed to be walking around Earth, available for kidnappings.

But there they were. In a haunted house. With… with two other kids. There were two other kids here, too! Andy couldn't really remember their names or faces at the moment. Just blurry, half-formed recall. A jittery woman Sam had known and an army guy.

He'd been with Ava (Oh! Her name is Ava. Would you look at that.

Thank you, brain) while Sam had been… Sam had been upstairs, searching for Jake. And Andy had wanted to help, so he'd told Ava they could search the first floor together.

And that was the last thing he remembered.

It took a moment to get one foot under him, then push off without toppling enough to get the other leg to join, but then he was standing. The room wasn't spinning, which was a great sign. Just… throbbing. Yeah, that was a good description of the way Andy could feel blood pounding behind his eyes, vision kind of pulsing along with it.

He hoped Ava was okay. Although, given that Jake was missing, Sam had been upstairs, and ghosts didn't carry knives… he also kind of hoped Ava hadn't – literally – stabbed him in the back. She'd seemed so nice.

"…If you wake up somewhere you don't know surrounded by other kids like you, you do whatever it takes to get out of there, you hear me? You defend yourself, no matter what that means, and then you run."

Dean's voice flashed through his head, grave and serious, for the second time since the older Winchester had given him that speech. What felt like a lifetime ago, actually.

This was another Battle Royale and just like Dean had told him – just like Sam had known all along – they were going to have to fight each other to survive. Azazel would see to that. Maybe that yellow-eyed bastard had been telling that to Ava, too. Maybe she'd believed him.

He really had to stop turning his back on psychic kids. You'd think he'd have learned after that asshole, Jonathon.

Andy closed his eyes, focusing both his thoughts and breathing on the problem at hand. He began a visual search of the floor around him for the iron rod he'd had when he entered the kitchen. It was dark and there were scraps of furniture upturned, paper clippings and old trash, odds and ends kind of everywhere, so it took a couple moments for Andy to spot it. Luckily, Ava – if it had been Ava – hadn't bothered taking it with her.

If she had a knife, he supposed, she didn't need a make-shift iron club.

Andy groaned as he managed to squat down, keeping his spine as straight as possible. The wound was at his waist, a little more towards his back than his front, and Andy supposed Ava really had tried to stab him in the back. Well, she'd missed (thankfully, or he probably wouldn't be alive, let alone doing squats). He must have turned into the blade without realizing she'd had one in her hand. Just responded to her coming up behind him.

He hissed as he scooped up the rod and made it back fully upright. Next step was to find Sam. He could send out a system-wide message again, but that meant Ava would get it too. If she was the backstabber (again, literally), then the last thing Andy wanted to do was alert her to his very-much-still-aliveness.

But he didn't exactly have the energy or time to search for Sam. He may not be at Rivergrove or Cold Oak levels of dying, but he had been stabbed. Plus, he didn't know where Ava was in the house. He really didn't want to run into her again while searching for Sam. She'd have the upper hand in a fight, given that she could be armed with a knife and he had been, again, stabbed.

Andy leaned some of his weight against the kitchen counter. First thing first: get the wound to stop bleeding. He still had Bobby's scarf hanging off his neck, but the knitted material probably wasn't the best idea for an open wound. It wouldn't be much of a tourniquet, either. So, carefully, Andy stripped out of both the scarf and Bobby's heavy jacket, which now had what was most definitely a knife slice in its side, not a bullet hole.

He winced. Bobby would understand, of course, but Andy still felt bad. He hadn't even asked if it was okay to borrow it. He hadn't planned on being gone long.

A litany of curse words hissed through his brain as he tied the coat around his waist, looped the arms, and pulled as hard as he could. He quickly added another loop, knotting the fabric just beneath his navel as fast as he could before he lost his nerve and the tautness he'd achieved.

'Son of a bitch!' he swore, loudly, in a voice that was an absolute dead-ringer for Dean. At least in his head.

Now that that was taken care of.

Still working through the rise in pain levels, Andy decided sending a message to Sam was the smartest next move (or so he hoped). Finding and regrouping with the younger Winchester was not only his safest bet, but their best chance for escape. Especially if Sam was in danger, which he very well might be.

But not from the kitchen. If Ava had been the one to try to kill him, alerting her to the fact that he was still alive and then staying in the last place she had seen him was probably not a great idea. If she wanted another shot, she'd have to find him first.

So Andy eased off the counter and headed, quietly as possible, for the door to the kitchen. He peaked around the frame; the dining room and foyer beyond that were both empty. He didn't know where anyone was, but the music he'd heard was most definitely new. So, for better or worse, he was heading towards it. It had been coming up from the kitchen floor, so that meant the basement. Not his first choice, by far, but it probably wasn't Ava's either, which meant the basement could actually be the safest place in this haunted house.

Said no one in the history of ever.

Andy crossed the dining room carefully, prioritizing silence over speed (and there was that whole, you know, being stabbed thing to consider). When he made it to the foyer, he glanced down the hall and up the stairs, but neither direction yielded Ava or Sam. So Andy crept down the hall towards the basement door and opened it as quietly as he could. It creaked and he winced at the noise, halting his movement. There was no other sound in the house as he stood there. Andy hoped that meant no one had heard (and not that someone was just better at stealth than him).

Slipping inside, he started down the stairs slowly, ever aware of his burning side, and prepared his mental image as he went. If Ava was a traitorous turncoat, he should warn Sam. But he didn't actually know if she was; he had no real memory of the attack. And if she was with Sam when they both got the message… she might attack him before he could react.

Okay, simple message then. What was a single image that could quickly and easily convey: 'Hey guys. Woke up in the kitchen by my lonesome. Been stabbed. I'm a champ tho, think I'll pull through. Thumbs up emoji. Where you at?'

It took a minute to think of the best option, but once he was satisfied, Andy sent it into the ether with a confident nod and all his concentration focused on Sam Winchester.

-o-o-o-

When the bright red question mark flashed across the underside of his eyelids, Sam didn't immediately give it much thought. He was, after all, busy trying to escape his bindings as a madman of a ghost walked towards him, holding the same knife he'd used to kill Jake Tully just minutes earlier.

The second time it hit him, flashing several times on a black background, Sam had his eyes open and the interruption was much more noticeably not his own brain supplying random thoughts in panic. Also, the question mark was clearly a spray-painted one, dripping red down the black background not unlike blood. Had the very existence of the psychic image not been proof Andy was still alive, Sam's own blood would have run cold at that.

"Andy?" the younger Winchester said aloud, more out of surprise than on purpose.

The fresh blood that was on Ava's knife upstairs had been on his mind despite his own dire situation. With Jake missing and the woman actively confronting Sam, there had been only one other person that blood could have come from. Sam had been trying his best not to worry – he had enough to deal with saving himself – but he couldn't deny his genuine fear that Andy had already been dead.

"Andy!" the younger Winchester bellowed, turning his head side-to-side and repeating the call as loud as he could.

"Shh, quiet now," Daggett whispered, rounding behind the restrained hunter. That hand landed on his shoulder once more, and Sam fought against it in earnest. "Don't struggle. This won't hurt for long."

He stiffened at the touch of a sharp point to the back of his neck. In the same moment, there was a distant crash – a big one, like a large piece of furniture being knocked over – and then the room, which had been sealed for forty plus years, was flooded with fresh (well, fresh*er*) air.

"Sam!"

The mental cry pinging through his skull was loud enough that Sam physically flinched, but his relief far outweighed the pain. Andy swung at the towering (and terrifying, good god!) ghost standing behind his surrogate brother, the iron rod still tightly clenched in his hand. Daggett disappeared with a flicker and a garbled yell, the blade clattering to the ground where he'd been standing. Andy tucked his makeshift ghost club into his elbow and squatted – as gently as possible, despite being in quite the hurry – to pick up the knife. He immediately put it to use, hacking at the ropes wrapped around Sam.

"Andy," Sam breathed out in pure relief, still panting from the close call. The ropes loosened as Andy cut through them and the hunter stood quickly, physically and mentally shaking them – and the entire experience – off. He looked at his friend with equal parts relief and thanks. "Nice timing."

The kid grinned winningly, raising both hands, fingers curling into two thumbs up. Which was when Sam noticed the layer of dark red, shining and wet in the dim light, coating the inside of one of them. His eyes dropped in an immediate once-over, quickly latching onto the red puddle on his right side, along with Bobby's jacket tied around his waist – too high and too tight to be remotely comfortable.

"You're hurt!" the younger Winchester exclaimed, reaching out for Andy's side, but the kid shook his head and pulled back a step. Instead of pushing, Sam turned around and leaned across the length of the table, careful to avoid the other 'guests' as he snagged Jake's phone. He trained the flashlight on his little brother's bloody side.

Andy didn't try to stop him from prying, but didn't relent, either. They had bigger things to worry about than stab wounds. He raised his hands to sign – the right one stained completely red from pads-to-palm, which Sam desperately tried not to think about – and asked, "Is Ava the bad guy?"

Well, actually he signed, 'Is Ava Stabby McStab Stab?' He had to finger-spell out the ridiculous title since there was no sign that matched Andy's unique sense of morbid humor. Sam kind of wanted to hug him and head-slap him in the same go.

"Yeah," Sam said, voice as downhearted as his expression. His chin dipped, eyes on the floor but also far away. "I- I think she's been here the whole time. Killing… killing the other kids Azazel put here with her."

Andy looked devastated to hear it, but quickly compartmentalized, pushing it to the back of his mind and giving a firm nod. No doubt shoving aside his own memories of lives lost in a battle royale.

"I think she has a knife," Andy signed, gesturing with one hand to his bloody side.

"She does," Sam confirmed, remembering the blood-soaked blade (coated in Andy's blood, because she'd tried to kill him before coming upstairs to confront Sam). The knife Sam had given her for protection. Clearly, she'd been using it for far more than that. The younger Winchester instantly felt another flash of guilt. And anger. A lot of anger. "I never should have left you alone with her."

Not that he'd known – how could he? The last time he'd seen her, she'd been… well, adorable, frankly. A chaotic ditz of a charming human being, who'd driven through the night to save some random stranger from getting blown up.

What had happened to her?

Sam cursed himself for not questioning any of her story sooner. He should have known something was up with the time loss. She'd been missing for three months, but she was the only one who had missing time. Only… it wasn't actually missing, was it? She'd been stuck here the whole time, killing other psychic kids. For months. Sam felt another flash of guilt. He should have found her sooner. Should have saved her from this.

They'd tried. He and Dean had really tried. They'd been looking. Cold oak was the first place they'd gone, and if they'd known where to try next, they would have.

Hell, he and Dean almost had found her. They'd only been hours away.

And months too late.

Sam closed his eyes. As much as it pained him to see what Azazel had done to Ava, what he'd successfully turned her into, he couldn't let it get to him right now. It wasn't his fault; it was Azazel's. Maybe he could still get through to her. Except the loss of her fiancé was what had finally flipped the switch. Finally broke her beyond what she could hide behind a façade of innocence and fear. She'd probably been doing what she had to to survive. To get back to her life and to Brady.

As much as Sam wanted to say he'd never turn like that, never kill innocent kids for his own survival, he couldn't actually say it with surety. Because just like Dean, Sam didn't know what he would do to get his brother back if something were to happen to him. Or Andy or Bobby. And before… before he'd been dragged back into the hunting life by Azazel, there was nothing he wouldn't have done to get back to Jess.

Sam opened his eyes at a touch to his arm, finding Andy right in front of him with a sympathetic, understanding smile. The kid gave his bicep a squeeze with a blood-covered hand (and Sam could not help but momentarily be levels of big-brother-annoyed, sure that Andy had chosen that hand on purpose) and a weak, but one hundred percent Andy smile.

"Let's get out of here before she finds us," Andy signed after releasing Sam's arm. (And yes, there was a bloody handprint on his jacket, and yes, Andy absolutely had a twinkle of mischief in his eyes and a smug little smirk in the corner of his mouth).

The kid twisted the knife he was holding around, offering the hilt to Sam. He'd be better with it to begin with, adding leaps and bounds to that when factoring in a stab wound. Then Andy grabbed his iron rod from where he'd tucked it in his armpit and turned for the door.

Sam took Freeman Daggett's knife, coated in Jake's blood (and who knew how many others), but didn't immediately follow. He was staring at the blade, trying to think.

There was no way Daggett's ghost could have known what Azazel told the other psychic children. That Sam Winchester was the one to get. Not unless one of them had told him.

"It's not a leap year," Sam suddenly said, belatedly realizing that as the sluggish gears in his head got really turning. Daggett shouldn't be active; the Morton House was famously a dead haunt every other day of every other year. Enough activity to keep trespassers and the curious away, but the disappearances and deaths only happened at midnight on February 29th.

Daggett shouldn't even be awake right now, let alone kidnapping psychic children or knowing a demon's end game.

This wasn't just bad timing, with the ghost showing up when it did. It couldn't be. Nothing about that added up.

Sam remembered the headache Ava had complained about, the way she'd been clutching her head when he'd found them after Jake's disappearance. The way she'd gripped her head again upstairs, right after Sam's gut had warned him he was in imminent danger.

Daggett hadn't just shown up; he'd been summoned. Summoned and told who to go after.

Ava could control ghosts.

Andy was already heading through the doorway he'd burst through, having to watch his step amongst a mess of papers and books scattered across the floor. Sam followed quickly, mind still reeling and dread pooling in his gut. He needed to tell Andy what Ava could do. And then they both needed to find a way out before she did it again.

The source of the crash he'd heard before Andy rescued him became apparent as he followed Andy's path over a toppled bookshelf, the contents of which they were now scrambling atop. It must have been hiding the entrance to Daggett's bomb shelter.

"What are you doing down here?"

The voice – cold, hard, and most definitely female – snapped Sam back to attention. He almost ran into Andy's back, the kid having frozen as he spotted the figure barely silhouetted in the darkness. Ava stood at the bottom of the basement stairs, staring at them. Sam raised Jake's phone, illuminating her. Hazel eyes that used to be so innocent were now deadened, locked on Andy.

The bloodied knife glinted in the new light, clasped tightly in her fist, and Sam moved in front of Andy, pushing his injured little brother behind him.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: I don't have a lot of end chatter, either, other than to take a no good, dirty rotten bow and head to bed! Hope you all enjoyed the chapter. I know the tension is ratcheting up but it's not going to get better anytime soon, I'm afraid. Season Finale's are not for the faint of heart. Stay strong, I believe in us!

Cheers,

Silence

Chapter 130: Season 2: Chapter 96

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Oooooh boy. Okay. So. This one. This one is going to hurt, guys. I procrastinated it so hardcore, even though I was sure of my choices. Even after all the decision making, and pep talking, and re-pep talking when I lost confidence, and the writing, and the finishing of the writing, and the thinking I did great and could move on, I am still, even now, procrastinating the hell out of this one.

Chapter Warnings: Things are getting real heavy as we enter the true season finale, the big one. Not everyone is gonna get to walk away and I foresee a lot of all caps in my future.

Actual Chapter Warnings: Character Death (did I mention this one is gonna hurt, y'all?)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 96

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

"You're supposed to be dead," Ava said, staring at Andy with a look in her eye that was hardly human, lip curled up in an ugly snarl.

Andy regarded the woman with unimpressed annoyance. He raised his hands and, after a rude gesture, signed, "You're supposed to have better aim."

Sam was by his side in an instant, one hand snatching onto a wrist, forcing him to stop antagonizing Lady McStabStab. Not that she could read what he'd signed, of course. But the distasteful scowl across her once beautiful face said she understood enough.

The younger Winchester had to resist the urge to push Andy behind him, both to stop him from antagonizing the murderous woman in front of them, and to protect his already injured little brother. But Andy was safer in his peripheral. They didn't know where Daggett had gone, but Sam doubted the ghost would be gone for long. He didn't want to risk putting Andy at his back, only for the ghost to appear behind them.

Ava was blocking the only way out. Which meant they were going to have to go through her. Unless Sam could get through to her.

"What happened to you, Ava?" he started, keeping his hand on Andy's wrist, lowering his arm. Half of his intention was to keep Andy from signing, the other half to keep him back.

Ava stared at Sam, the man who'd told her exactly where she'd end up and had been right. After a moment, she looked away with a little sniff. She raised the hand holding the bloody knife, using the back of her fist to swipe beneath her nose. There was something so very dead in her eyes and in the smile she sent their way.

"Had you going, didn't I?" She laughed, and it was a broken sound that Sam's heart ached for. "Yeah… I've been here a long time, Sam. And not alone, either. People just keep showing up. Kids like us, batches of three or four at a time."

Sam's heart fell at the confirmation of what he'd already known. How? How could this sweet, caring woman have become a monster? "You killed them? All of them?"

Ava offered a winning grin, but it was dark. Wrong. All teeth and no actual enjoyment. "I'm the undefeated heavyweight champ."

Andy moved beside him and Sam held him back. He knew Andy's history with losing people to this Battle Royale bullshit. Sam knew how much it hurt him to be confronted by another version of the evil that Azazel cultivated in his special children. Another Jonathan, who'd killed others without care. Without any respect to the lives they had, the souls he'd destroyed. Just to win.

Sam squeezed his wrist and Andy relented, but he was seething beside the younger Winchester. Sam couldn't blame him.

"How could you?" he asked, voice soft and broken in its own way. He was mourning the loss of the woman who had come to a stranger's hotel room in the middle of the night just to save his life.

"I had no choice," she spat back, crossing her arms defensively over her chest. "It was me or them. You or me."

"It doesn't have to be," Sam bit back almost before the words were out of her mouth.

Ava just tilted her head back and laughed. When she lowered her gaze to them once more, there was nothing in her eyes that could be called human. "Oh, you haven't been here long enough, Sam. But you'll learn. Or not."

She loosened her arms with a one-shouldered shrug, raising the knife as a reminder of what was coming. Ava wasn't going to let them leave this room alive, and Sam didn't know how much longer he could stall her.

"Ava, my brother is on his way," he tried, words taking on a desperate edge. "Please, we can all leave here, alive. You can go home."

"Home?" she echoed with disbelief, then scoffed. Her next words were shouted. Practically shrieked. "My home was Brady! Don't you get it, Sam? All of this- I did all of this, so that I could go home. And you come here, after months of this fucking hell, and you tell me I can never go home again. Brady's gone."

Sam's eyes widened, realizing with a sinking feeling in his gut, that there was no stalling Ava. There was no talking her down, no saving her. She was gone. She'd died the same night her fiancé had, they just hadn't known it.

"He's dead," Ava bit out. There were tears in her eyes, but those once doey pools were empty of any other sign of life. She started towards them. "There's no point fighting it anymore."

Sam took a step back, stumbling slightly on the mess of spilled objects on the floor. He pulled Andy with him, keeping his surrogate little brother behind him as much as possible. He knew they were in trouble. Trapped, weaponless. He could likely take Ava in a fight, but every instinct was screaming that it wouldn't be that simple.

"Fighting what?"

She sniffed again, offering a weak and watery smile. "What we are, Sam."

The hunter stiffened at the words. Too reminiscent of Azazel's. With trepidation matching anger, he growled out, "And what are we, Ava?"

She laughed and a shiver slithered its way down his spine. Ava lowered her head, looking up at him through lashes that had once been the picture of innocence and fragility. Now her face was one of promised blood and pain. "Powerful."

Andy jumped as the bookcase to his right suddenly up-righted itself and slammed back into place, blocking the bunker Sam had slowly been backing them into. His head snapped back to Ava, eyes wide. She was telekinetic. Andy used his other hand to grab onto Sam's wrist, the one gripping his own.

Oh, they were so screwed.

"The learning curve is so fast, it's crazy," Ava said with a laugh that was nothing short of maniacal. Sam swallowed roughly, realizing what his body had been trying to tell him. Ava wasn't just armed, she was dangerous. Really dangerous. She shook her head, still advancing towards them, knife catching the light with the same murderous intent as her eyes. "The switches that just flip in your brain. I can't believe I started out just having dreams. Do you know what I can do now?"

Sam took another step back, pushing Andy behind him now that there was nowhere to go. "You can control ghosts."

Andy's head whipped his way, mouth dropping open, but Sam didn't have time to explain.

Ava huffed something that could be a laugh, surprisingly callous in its nonchalance. "I shouldn't be surprised you figured it out."

She raised her hands to her head, knife still fisted in her right. Her eyes narrowed in concentration, brow furling, and Sam knew what came next.

Daggett.

"Sorry about this, Sam, but it's over."

Without waiting around to be proven right, Sam charged. He tackled Ava around the waist, taking both of them to the ground before the much smaller woman could react to his sudden movement. They hit the floor hard, a plume of dust billowing up around them from the old cement floor, particles catching in the flashes of Jake's cell phone, still gripped in Sam's hand.

Ava released a scream of frustration, trying to stab him with the knife he had given her to keep her safe. To keep her alive, should the worst happen.

Well, it did happen. And she had kept herself alive.

Sam cried out in pain, having managed to block a much more serious hit to his side with his arm, but that meant taking a knife to the bicep. It wasn't great, but it wasn't fatal, either. His arm was on fire – a warning of torn muscles that wouldn't respond should he use his dominant hand – but he'd live.

Taking advantage of the fact that her weapon was currently buried hilt-deep in his arm, Sam rolled to the left, off of Ava, twisting his arm as he did it. It hurt like a son of a bitch, but it ripped the hilt of the blade free from her grip, and Sam wrapped his left hand around it, pulling it free of muscle and skin, as he rolled across the floor and away from his now unarmed opponent.

The only problem was that Ava, at least this new version of her, was never unarmed.

Her hands pressed against her temples, eyes squinting in concentration, and Sam braced himself for the return of Daggett. He didn't have any iron on him, he realized belatedly, having lost it when the ghost first took him. Sam went to charge, hoping to interrupt her summoning before she could complete it, when every muscle in his body seized up, rendering him immobile. The knife clattered to the ground beside him.

"Stop!"

That was Andy! Sam's eyes darted to the side when he found he couldn't turn his head. The boy was standing a few feet in front of the righted bookcase, hand held out in front of him, fingers splayed and entire arm shaking with effort. His eyes were locked on Ava, and Sam followed that gaze to find that she, too, had been rendered frozen. Hazel-brown eyes widened as he realized Andy was controlling them both in his efforts to stop her.

Ava glared furiously at the other psychic holding her captive. Her own hands shook where they strained to remain against her temples and blood began to drip from her nose as she fought his powers with her own, determined to summon the Morton House ghost despite this interloper. She was stronger than him. She knew it.

Her eyes slipped fully closed, and Sam's heart leapt with fear.

"Andy!" he yelled, struggling against his friend's powers if only to save him. But there was a shift in the air and Sam knew, knew with terror in his heart, that he couldn't.

Andy made a choking noise and suddenly Sam was released, staggering forward. He righted himself in time to see Daggett behind his little brother, knife in hand, buried high in Andy's back.

"No!" The scream tore from his throat and Sam ran. "Andy!"

The kid turned, half staggering, and swiped weakly with his other arm – the one still clutching the iron rod – right through the ghost. Daggett disappeared with a flicker and a rageful cry and Andy fell to his hands and knees, trying to reach over his shoulder and free the knife from his back. He fell onto his side before he managed it.

Sam was feet from him when a force tore him off his feet and he soared through the air only to slam into a wall and crumple to the floor. Ava had tossed him, he realized with a groan as he scrambled back to his feet, and she'd made a run for the knife.

His eyes locked on Andy's limp form, blood pooling beneath him, and Sam realized with a trill of terror that if he wanted to save him, he had to end this now.

But he was outmatched. Ava was fighting with weapons Sam didn't have a defense against. He and Andy would lose this fight if he didn't figure something out.

'I need demon blood.'

The errant thought was not new, and Sam slammed his eyes shut against it.

'No,' he repeated firmly to himself, fisting his hands on the cold cement beneath him before pushing himself back to his feet. 'I said no, and I meant it.'

It's not like Ava needed demon blood to kick his ass, he thought bitterly. But that thought brought him up short, and Sam straightened as the truth of that hit him. Ava didn't need demon blood. Neither did Andy. Both of them had far surpassed their original abilities, and certainly Sam's, without the crutch that Sam had been so reliant on.

His eyes widened, possibility flooding his brain.

'The learning curve is so fast.' Ava's words echoed in his head as Sam turned away from Andy and to the woman standing in his way of saving his brother. 'Stop fighting what you are.'

"And what am I?" he whispered just under his breath as the woman he had once thought of as a friend and an innocent, turned to him. The smile in the corner of her mouth was inhuman. She raised the knife, soaked to the hilt in blood.

'Powerful.'

Sam remembered the Baku, writhing in pain beneath his mental hand. Dripping blackness from its once-pure soul. Like Max Miller had, as Sam had tried to tear that darkness from the boy. He remembered the car he'd crushed into nothing more than a wrecking ball on the side of a road outside Sioux Falls. And the gun he'd emptied into Azazel in that cabin in Michigan. He'd had another brother dying in his arms that night.

Closing his eyes, Sam lifted his hand and splayed his fingers wide, feeling the air - the temperature, the flow, the fill of it all – in the room and looking for more. He didn't need demon blood to access what had always been in him. That crawl beneath his skin that had always been there. Always set him apart, made him different, made it so he didn't belong.

'Demon blood don't add to you,' Azazel had said. He'd meant it to break Sam's resolve, but the boy used it now for strength. For a power he'd always had. 'It only brings out more of what's already in there.'

Sam opened his eyes and saw a very different world around him.

The same darkness that had slid and dripped from the Baku, from Max Miller, was wrapped tightly around Ava's soul. It writhed and pulsed and squirmed about her center, clutching tight to what had once been the woman. Sam could see it for what it was: protection. That blackness had curled around a once pure light, covering and coveting, and now it clung to her with such possessiveness that there was no breaking through. There was no freeing her from what she had become.

Ava had turned to that darkness to protect herself and now it would never let her go.

Sam reached out with his mind, grabbed onto that darkness, and threw it to the side. Ava went flying through the air with a screech, hitting the floor and rolling several times from the force of his toss. Sam did not waste time, running straight to Andy, who had yet to move.

"Andy!" he gasped as he reached the boy's side, gently easing him up and into his lap, mindful of the blade still sticking out of his back, just below his shoulder blade. Shit, there was no way it hadn't pierced his lungs. Sam hesitated to pull it out for fear that Andy would bleed to death before he could get him help.

A hand, weak and bloody, wrapped around his, and Sam's gaze shifted to his friend's face. Andy gave him a weak smile, and that hand over his formed a loose thumbs up. Sam huffed a laugh, but he could feel the tears already building.

"You're going to be okay," he whispered, glancing around the room for anything he could use against the wound. Ava was staggering to her feet on the other side of the room. Sam would have to deal with her again shortly. She was already preparing another ghost summoning, trembling hands rising towards her head.

But in his arms, Andy was shaking his. His left arm wouldn't move properly – probably due to the whole being stabbed thing (again) – so he gave up Signing and mouthed, "It's no good, Sam."

"No, no, you're going to be fine," the younger Winchester insisted, shaking his head. But Andy knew what death felt like. It had never come with the wet rattle in his lungs before, but the rest of it was all the same: cold, numbness, acceptance. Sam, however, was still shaking his head. "I'm going to get you out of here."

Like he'd promised he would.

"It's okay," Andy mouthed again, lips stained with flecks of blood that confirmed a punctured lung. He raised his trembling hand to grip Sam's again. "Get out of here. I got this."

Sam started at the voice, loud and clear, that filled his head. The words were confident – resigned even – and tinged with an edge of black humor that could only ever be Andy Gallagher. Those blood-stained fingers curled against his own, turning Sam's hand over to deposit something in his hand.

"Run, Sam."

Sam stared down in unseeing confusion at the bloodied Persian sleep coin pressed to his palm. His gaze snapped back to his fatally wounded friend, but Andy had closed his eyes, hand now limp by his side. The only sign that he still had life in him was the furl of concentration sharp across his blood-smeared brow.

Sam's head whipped up in shock as Ava suddenly screamed. Dagget, who had just reappeared in the room with them, flickered and staggered, as if he too could feel the psychic attack. And then he was gone and Ava was on her knees, clutching her head like it was going to explode and her fingers alone might keep it together.

With the surprising realization that it was Andy attacking her, and the coin in his hand protected him from that attack, Sam hastily set his injured friend back onto the floor, keeping him on his side so as not to jostle the knife still sticking out of his back. He pulled his arms out of his flannel shirt as quickly as he could, practically ripping the fabric off his lanky frame.

He had to stabilize that knife before he could move Andy.

Keeping his eyes locked on the struggling, screaming Ava, Sam hoisted his friend back upright so he could wrap the flannel around Andy's torso, under one arm and over the other shoulder. He crossed the arms of the shirt over the kid's chest, then fed them over and under his arms once more to the back. He tied the sleeves together, pulling as tight as he could. The boy in his arms grunted, brow furling as Sam pulled back to check on him, but he couldn't afford to be more careful. Leaning over Andy's shoulder, his head pressed to the boy's, Sam checked that the hilt of the knife stuck out between the two strips of flannel – edges already staining red – was braced, as much as could be, by the tightly crossed fabric.

God, that wasn't going to be good enough, but Sam was out of time and options.

Scooping his dying friend into his arms, one arm under his knees, the other low on his back and pressing Andy into his chest, Sam clambered to his feet. Ava wasn't screaming anymore, her voice having died out. But she was still on the ground, writhing in pain and clutching at her head. Sam had to risk moving past her, running and praying Andy would hold on, his attack lasted, and Ava stayed down.

The boy in his arms needed medical attention immediately, which meant he was the priority. If Ava died under Andy's assault, the doors would unlock, and Sam could get his friend to a hospital. Sam wished he could take the stairs two at a time – his legs were certainly long enough – but with the weight of Andy in his arms and that knife very much on his mind, he couldn't risk it. Balancing speed with care was slowing him down, and Sam wasn't sure which was more important at this point.

He had just made it to the top stair when the door to the basement slammed shut in his face. Sam almost toppled backwards down the stairs as he reared back to keep Andy – and his own face – from getting hit.

"Where are you going, Sam?" Ava called from below, and he turned on the top step to find her at the base of the stairs. There was blood running down her nose – smeared all over her lips and chin – her hair was a frantic mess, and the look in her wide, unblinking eyes was crazed.

Sam tightened his hold on Andy, glancing down only to find him unconscious in his arms. The hunter's hands dug into the boy, pulling him close to his body, desperate for any sign of life and terrified he wouldn't find one. Andy's head lolled, limp and heavy, into his neck and Sam's own breath caught in his throat. He should have felt Andy's breath against his skin, and he didn't.

"You can't leave," Ava continued, setting a foot onto the first step but going no further. "The house is still on lockdown. It will be, as long as there's still two of us."

Hazel eyes slid shut at her words. She had no way of knowing if it was two or three, but the words still dug their barbs deep into his heart. Andy had stopped breathing, he was sure of it.

Sam tightened his hold on the boy who had become a brother to him, and turned fully to face Ava. He was prepared to fight her, probably kill her, when his eyes shifted at movement behind her. His forehead smoothed out, and he took a steadying, deep breath.

"I don't think that's going to be a problem for much longer."

Ava's once beautiful eyes narrowed at first, then widened as she sensed what Sam could clearly see. The psychic spun only to find Freeman Daggett directly behind her. And by the look on his face, he had not enjoyed being controlled.

She tumbled onto the stairs as she tried to back up. He towered over her, reaching out to grip her shoulders.

"Don't worry," he said. "This won't hurt for long."

Ava screamed just before the two disappeared together.

Sam turned and shouldered the basement door open. It gave easily. He could still hear Ava screaming, further away now and muffled by a wall and bookcase. Sam kept going and didn't look back.

The front door unlocked with a loud, echoing click as Sam approached it. He didn't bother with the knob. The door slammed open with a resounding kick, frame splintering and glass shattering. It bounced off the wall with a loud crack, the top hinge snapping off with a screech of rusted metal tearing. The younger Winchester left the Morton House and stepped into the fresh, frigid outside air, Andy tucked in his arms.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: I'm sooooooooooo sorry, please don't murder me. This one was real hard; even the no good dirty rotten author doesn't want to take credit for it.

Yell at me in the comments; I could use it. I haven't written in weeks and I honestly think this chapter is the cause. I was fine. I was fine, and I did fine, and I knew it had to happen, and I was okay with it happening. And then I realized I had to post it and suddenly I was not so fine. Cue epic procrastination. So line up the-all caps reviews, please. The muse needs to be yelled at: it's her fuel. That and incoherent keyboard strokes.

Nom-nom-nom

(I'm sooooo sorry, please don't kill us. We could really use the reassurance we didn't lose you all by being no-good-dirty-rotten authors)

Chapter 131: Season 2: Chapter 97

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: What's this? A weekly update? No, you're not hallucinating, it's real, but don't get tooo excited, because I think the schedule will have to go back to two weeks soon enough. However, I didn't feel it fair to leave you on such an awful cliffhanger for any longer than absolutely necessary.

Unfortuantely, you all are going to continue not to like me (though, on that note, thank you very much for all the comments about Andy, even if the all caps was suspiciously absent)

Chapter Warnings: Sam's been crowned Queen of the Pageant, Bobby's talking sense into a pessimistic Dean, Cas is getting on Gabe's last nerves, and Sarge is a damn good boy

Actual Chapter Warnings: I'm not done hurting people yet…

See the end of the chapter for more notes

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 97

-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-

Until Sam Winchester stepped outside of the Morton House, Castiel had not dared look away from the television screen playing out events like a television show. The distraction (compulsion, she would go so far as to admit, though not without vexation) may have set her back in terms of escape, but it could not be helped. Castiel had found she could not turn away – even to break free – for fear that when she looked again, Sam Winchester would be dead.

Once Sam emerged from the house alive – Andy Gallager's soul following behind, a Reaper by his side – Castiel finally allowed her eyes to close and her focus to turn inwards. The progress on convincing Gabriel's grace to release her had been slow-going without direct attention. Nothing more than murmurs of how her freedom would aid in its goal.

Now she could focus her full attention on convincing it to free her of the restraints. The grace had been primed by her whispers, at least, and should now, in theory, listen to Castiel as she turned suggestion into direction. All that was left was to direct it to release her.

If the attempt was successful, she would have to move fast. Her escape would not go unnoticed for long. She would only have one chance to reach Sam and get him to safety before Gabriel undoubtedly caught up.

-o-o-o-

From the cemetery, they entered Wisconsin from the south around an enormous lake. Had Persephone not utilized the map on Chuck's phone, she most certainly would have mistaken the unending body of water for an ocean.

(Considering how much the Winchesters traveled and that, at least for the time being she was supposed to keep an eye on them, Persephone supposed it was past time she learned the geography of the country they spent so much time criss-crossing.)

From there, they drove north another two hours, cutting west, away from Lake Michigan. The homes and businesses around them started to thin out, replaced with woods that thickened as they ventured further inlaid. Tom started taking turns onto smaller and smaller roads, driving deeper into the forest until finally they were bumping along rough asphalt that had not been maintained in decades. There were few houses on the road and even fewer turnoffs. Tom finally took one, turning onto a road in worse shape than its predecessor. It followed a bend along the edge of the woods for fifty or so feet before crossing in front of an old, abandoned house that had been fenced off from the public.

Tom put the car into park in the middle of the road, about two dozen feet away from the house but with a clear view of the front porch. He waggled his eyebrows at his passenger, who remained unimpressed. "Here we are, Princess."

Persephone glanced around them, perhaps a little out of curiosity but largely for show. She raised her eyebrows right back at her captor. "How impressive, demon. You've brought us to nowhere."

Tom chuckled and pulled the keys out of the engine. He pointedly turned his eye to the dark, motionless house beyond like he was expecting something to happen. Persephone hated to play along with his stupid game, but ended up matching his gaze nevertheless.

Her patience did not last long. "Are we waiting for any particular reason-"

"There he is," Tom interrupted and Persephone looked back to the house in time to see Sam Winchester exiting the front door, a body in his arms. "Right on schedule. Azazel knew he'd be the winner. Sam's his favorite, you know."

She stiffened, brow furling. Sam was supposed to be with his brother, searching for the missing psychic, Ava Wilson. Persephone knew it, because Chuck had written it and she had read it earlier that day. How had Sam ended up in an abandoned house in Appleton, Wisconsin? Clearly without his brother, as the hunter was alone. Aside from the smaller body in his arms, which was definitely not Dean Winchester.

And what, exactly, had Sam won?

"Showtime," Tom announced, looking at her with a grin that Persephone found unsettling. He twisted his hand midair, gold chain appearing in his fingers. The demon quickly fused it to the steering wheel, ensuring Persephone would stay in the car. "Be right back!"

She pulled at the chain with a feral snarl, but Tom was already climbing out of the car. Her eyes locked onto his back, where the Colt was visibly tucked into the waistline of his pants. Persephone's hand clenched into a fist at her side.

Tom shut the door and bounded off towards the house, where Sam Winchester was descending the front steps. Persephone was stuck sitting in the passenger side of the car, watching through the windshield as Azazel's hellspawn approached the younger Winchester.

-o-o-o-

Dean was definitely taking the worsening roads at faster speeds than were safe – or good for Baby – but he refused to slow down. His knuckles had been white around her wheel for half an hour now. The joints in his fingers hurt (at this point he wasn't entirely sure he'd be able to release the wheel when they finally got to the Morton House) but the pain was distracting, and he needed to be distracted.

This wasn't happening. It wasn't. He had two fucking years to fix this, and yet here they were. Him and Bobby speeding off towards another Cold Oak, Sam's fate unknown. Dean shuttered his eyes against the memory of how it had ended and the accompanying terror that came from knowing it was all more than likely about to happen again.

Sam dying in his arms, Dean too late to do anything to stop it.

The shrill ringing of a phone made Dean jump, car jerking to the side. He fumbled for his cell, which was somewhere on the seat next to him, along with a map of Wisconsin, Sam's phone, and a handgun loaded with demon-trapping bullets. When he finally got his hands on the right cell, Dean flipped the thing open without glancing at the screen.

"What?" he barked, letting out some of that anger that had no other outlet than the road churning under Baby's wheels.

"What's the plan?"

Dean closed his eyes briefly against Bobby's steady voice. His headlights had been a constant reassurance in the rear-view mirror, even if Dean would never admit it aloud. But that didn't mean he wanted to talk to the older hunter at the moment.

"Save Sam."

Bobby's snort immediately told him he wasn't getting away with that. "Yeah, I figured as much. Was hoping for a little more detail, though."

The man from the future growled, using the back of the hand holding his cell to scrub at his tired, aching eyes. "Come on, Bobby. What do you want from me?"

"What do I want?" the old hunter barked back, irritation growing in his voice. He'd never been one for pity parties. "I want you to start acting like we got a chance to save your brother!"

Dean had to lower the phone to keep from swearing into Bobby's ear. He was half tempted to send the thing through the windshield instead. The old man was right, of course. He usually was. Dean was already thinking like they'd lost. The problem was, he was pretty sure they had.

Time was a bitch, one that apparently hated the Winchesters, and he had no defense against that. No weapon that could take on time when it was damn set on repeating itself.

“And if we can’t?” Dean asked when he finally brought the phone back to his ear. His chest was aching fiercely and for the first time in a while he couldn’t tell if it was him or Cas doing it. Dean kept his eyes on the road, stubbornly ignoring the fact that his vision was growing blurry.

There was an angry silence on the other end of the phone, and the time traveling hunter was pretty sure he’d crossed a line. Wouldn’t be the first time (or the last). “You wanna find that out yerself, or should we just give up right now, you idjit ?”

Well, that one certainly hadn’t been meant as a term of endearment.

“I’m here, ain’t I?” Dean barked back, pushing down on the gas a little more, like he was trying to prove something to Bobby that he’d already disproven to himself. He swiped angrily at his eyes, refusing to acknowledge the water gathering there.

“Are you? Cuz you sure as shit aren’t acting like it.”

Dean glared into the rear-view mirror and the headlights there, blood rising. “God damnit, Bobby, back off! I’m trying.”

“Well try harder!” his surrogate father roared into the phone. “Now. What’s the damn plan, Dean?”

Green eyes shut against his surrogate father’s anger, which Dean knew wasn’t undeserved. The problem was, he didn’t have a plan. He’d had two years to come up with one, and so far everything he’d tried had failed spectacularly, because here they were .

“I don’t know, Bobby,” Dean croaked, finally letting that despair overwhelm his anger. His fear. He felt deflated, like a leaking balloon, tired to the bone. “I don’t know how to save him.”

“Start by acting like he ain’t dead yet.” The older hunter wasn’t yelling anymore, though he wasn’t exactly pulling punches yet, either. “Yer brother’s got more information than he did last time and you know he won’t take anything lying down. So you don’t either, you hear me?”

That was true, Dean reasoned, sniffing. Sam was going to fight tooth and nail to get out of this, to get back to his family. He was doing his baby brother a serious disservice thinking that didn’t mean a damn thing. Dean struck the steering wheel with his palm, mentally berating himself for letting the tidal wave of emotion pull him under.

"Yeah. Yeah, alright. I hear you." He used the back of his hand to wipe at his face again, this time swiping beneath his nose. He shoved back the despair, the waterworks, and all the shit he'd deal with later. After they saved Sam. "So… then, uh, Sam saves himself and we're the getaway car."

Bobby huffed down the line. Not exactly a stellar plan, but at least the kid was back with him.

"This is the Morton House, boy," the hunter barked, though there was little bite to it this time. "It ain't gonna be that easy and you know it. So talk. What do you know about the place?"

Dean made a strangled noise into the phone, recalling the hunt he'd dragged Sammy into back when he was so certain he was dead that he'd started courting Death every chance he got. But Bobby was right (again). Dean knew that house and all its haunts, which meant that just like they would have had at Cold Oak, they had an advantage to press here, too.

So, with no shortness of testiness (but maybe also a little grateful for the distraction), Dean started talking through everything he knew about the house and all the ghosts they were very rapidly approaching.

-o-o-o-

Coming out of the dark house, Sam was momentarily disoriented by the world outside, quiet and serene, free from the blood and horrors behind him. It was night, but the almost full moon meant there was more light than had been inside. Sam pulled Andy's body tighter to his chest.

The boy hadn't been breathing for at least four minutes now and Sam could feel blood soaking through to the forearm that supported Andy's torso. His hands curled into fists around his surrogate little brother, now certain that Andy was gone. Even if he could resuscitate him, the Morton House was twenty miles from the nearest hospital.

He wasn't leaving him, though, no matter what. Sam adjusted the body in his arms and started down the front steps of the abandoned property.

The hunter drew up short as he reached the bottom only to find an unfamiliar man waiting for him a dozen feet away. He was leaning against the open gate of the chain-link fence that surrounded the property, muscular arms crossed over a bulky chest covered in a cheesy black turtleneck. His face stretched into a grin of too-white teeth and his eyes slipped black as he stepped forward.

Sam's grip tightened around Andy protectively, but there was nowhere he could back away to. The hunter stood his ground.

"Sam Winchester," the demon announced, his smile widening. All Sam saw was teeth and danger. The hell spawn spread his arms out wide. "Congratulations. You won."

"Won what?" the hunter snarled, deciding then and there that he wasn't going to stand and listen to this demon – no doubt Azazel's stand-in – who was responsible for the death of the man in his arms, along with all the innocent kids in the house. Sam pushed onward, crossing the overgrown yard that stood between him and the demon, pointedly ignoring him. He kept his eyes forward.

"Azazel's final elimination round, of course. Hell's own Miss America Pageant. And you walked out with the crown!" The demon fell in line beside him as he walked, like they were buddies discussing last night's game. Sam tightened his grip on Andy, arms practically shaking with rage, but he kept moving. There was a road beyond the chain-link fence and roads led to civilization.

"You know, you were always Dad's favorite," the demon continued conversationally, confirming himself as one of Azazel's children. Well, his demon children, at least. Meg had been one, Sam recalled, loathe now to know there were more just like her. He started walking a little faster, but his pick-up in pace was effortlessly matched. "He was still rooting for you, even after you sent him to Hell."

"I don't care," Sam growled out before biting his tongue. He started a mantra in his head, repeating over and over again that he would not engage with this demon. He was getting Andy out of there; that was his priority.

When he got to the road Sam glanced both ways, spotting a vehicle on the asphalt a couple dozen feet away. The hunter turned and headed for it without much deliberation. He could hotwire it, so long as the engine still worked. If it had been sitting out in the elements, unused for too much time, it likely wouldn't start. Although, strangely enough, the vehicle didn't look like it had been there all that long.

Maybe the demon had driven here, in which case Sam would be exorcizing him and then stealing his (probably stolen) car.

"Oh, but you should," the annoying demon answered what had most definitely been a rhetorical comment, still following alongside the hunter. From the corner of his eye, Sam finally realized what about the man's wide smile bothered him. It didn't match his words, which were congratulatory. But his grin was predatory in a way that raised the hair on the back of Sam's neck. Unlike the majority of demons he'd dealt with so far, this one wasn't very good at subterfuge. He couldn't hide the intention in that grin. Sam looked away, but vowed to keep the demon in his peripheral from that point on. "He has plans for you, Sammy. Big plans."

"It's Sam."

There was an odd echo as he said it that caused both men to pause. Sam looked around, wondering if he'd misheard someone calling his name. Maybe someone else had survived?

The hunter hastily spun, eyes tracing the silhouette of the Morton House, backlit by the full moon. But there was no one in the dark night but hunter and demon, and the noise did not repeat. The road was empty, the woods around them quiet.

Beside him, the hell spawn was looking around as well, so Sam at least knew he wasn't crazy (not that confirmation via demon was exactly reassuring). But eventually those black eyes came back to him, eyebrows up and expression far too close to a 'you heard it too, huh?' form of comradery for Sam's comfort. The hunter turned sharply away and resumed his march for that car.

"As I was saying…" the stupid demon picked right back up where he'd left off, both verbally and physically. Sam's teeth ached under the pressure of his grinding jaw. But he couldn't talk back through clenched teeth, now could he? "Big plans, Sammy. And you're at the center of them all."

When he got within a dozen feet of the car, Sam hesitated at a shadow in the passenger seat, which was starting to take shape. It looked like there was someone in the vehicle, which immediately set off warning bells, but it was too dark to be sure. The hunter slowed, uncertain of his next move.

Before he could decide what to do (was the person friendly? Somehow, out here in the middle of nowhere, parked next to a haunted-house-murder-pageant, Sam doubted it) a set of headlights came around the bend behind the parked car, heading their way. Sam's eyes snapped to the approaching car. It was coming down the road, fast. The hunter couldn't really see much past the twin lights, but he could hear the rumble of a familiar engine, and immediately knew who was driving.

Relief flooded him enough that his knees very nearly gave out beneath him.

Brakes squealed, the vehicle screaming to a halt behind the parked car. He heard the door fly open.

"Sam!"

-o-o-o-

The moment her bonds were released – that foreign grace in her core successfully reaching out to them with annulling intent – there was a single, drawn-in breath of freedom as Castiel's grace flooded her body. She was free from the confines of the chair and her brother's grace.

Castiel launched herself from the chair and straight into the ether.

She had the address of the haunted house, courtesy of Gabriel's television show. She had seen Andy Gallagher find the envelope addressed to Freeman Daggett and memorized the words listed below the home-owner's name.

The angel touched down just outside the house, only to stumble as prayer after prayer hit her in quick succession. With her grace bound, any human entreatments had not reached her during captivity. And Dean had been praying a lot .

'Cas, I know Gabriel's got you but, damnit, Sam's missing.'

'Cas, they've taken him. We need you.'

'Cas, damnit, I know you can't get here, but I… fuck, I don't know what to do!'

'Cas, please. I-I…. We need you. God, we need you, Cas. Damnit!'

The onslaught of desperation and begging coming from a man who rarely displayed either was overwhelming. It took Castiel precious seconds to gather herself.

She turned in a circle once she realized Sam was no longer on the front steps. Her focus had been turned inward to free herself, which had taken an unknown amount of time. Though, Castiel doubted it had been more than a few minutes. The stretch of wild lawn was empty, but humans traveled. Sam was unlikely to remain in the vicinity now that he was free.

The angel started across the lawn, heading for the fence and road beyond. Roads led to people, so that was the best and most logical course of action for Sam to take. All Castiel had to do was catch up to the young human and send him away from this place. Preferably to Bobby Singer's, but any location would do, so long as he was hidden from Heaven, Hell, and Gabriel.

As she got to the edge of the asphalt, a recognizable figure became visible down the road, walking away from her. Sam. Hope flooded her, but there was a second figure standing at his side: shorter, bulkier, and in no way Dean. Even from so far away, the angel could sense the hell rot that curled around the man.

Castiel's gut clenched with fear and she spread her wings, preparing to launch towards what was surely a demon at Sam Winchester's side.

A weight slammed into her from the side, tackling her back onto the Morton property and into the lawn of overgrown grass and wild bushes.

-o-o-o-

"Dean!" Sam cried out, immediately shifting Andy in his arms and taking another hasty step forward.

He stumbled towards his brother, eyes wide in relief and disbelief. He was pretty sure his whole body was shaking. It sure felt like it was. He could just barely make out a familiar silhouette behind the lights, now backlit by a second set of approaching lights that came to a stop behind the first. That car had an older engine and a heavier tire tread that ate up the rough asphalt: a truck, then, which meant Bobby.

"Right on time," Sam heard the demon breathe out and immediately tensed. The creature was no longer by his side but very much behind his unprotected back. Those hairs on Sam's neck which had been previously protesting in a mild manner were now screaming not-good things. "Sorry about this, Sammy-boy."

The younger Winchester started to turn, to back away, to put more distance between him and the demon, and less distance between him and his brother. "I told you, it's Sam-"

The demon moved, wrapping an arm around the hunter with the speed of a snake strike. Sam saw too late the glint of metal in that hand. Pain exploded across his back, then again and again, as the demon stabbed him in the back multiple times. Something crunched deep in his spine and Sam's legs gave out beneath him.

"You brother's gotta pay his entry fee."

He hit the uneven payment in a way that should have hurt. That did hurt, but distantly, because it was nothing compared to the fire in his back. There was a dog barking in the distance. Someone screamed his name. But Sam couldn't put the two together into anything that made sense. He couldn't breathe. Or maybe that was the fluid filling his lungs. Blood, his brain supplied unhappily.

He couldn't keep his grip on Andy and the kid's body rolled onto the ground, Sam collapsed forward onto his hands and knees. He grabbed at his surrogate brother's body, managing a shaky fistful of t-shirt. He tried to pull Andy's body closer, underneath him where it would be safe, but Sam's muscles only quivered in response. After several attempts, he had to stop trying, realizing it was as futile as his continued breathing. But he refused to release the grip he had on the kid.

There was blood spreading across his back; he could feel it rolling down his sides.

Oh god, it was happening. After everything he'd done to survive it, Sam was dying. He'd failed Andy, Jake and Ava too, and now he was about to fail Dean.

Oh god, Dean .

"Sam!"

That was his brother's voice. It was far away, which was really unfortunate. Sam didn't think Dean would make it in time. His vision was growing dark around the edges and each time he blinked, it took longer and longer to open his eyes again. The demon was still above him, wiping a sharp, curved blade off on a rag. Wiping Sam's blood off on that rag.

He offered that same smile and Sam choked on a mouthful of hot, thick liquid that spilled past his lips. Definitely a punctured lung. Sometimes (more often than not, really), Sam really hated being right.

When he looked back up, the demon was gone. There was a dog (a German Shepherd. Bobby had a German Shepherd, didn't he?) next to him now, and Sam wasn't sure when it had gotten there. The dog's hackles were up and it was barking and snapping ferociously at the place the demon had been.

Sam wasn't sure if the bastard had disappeared or he'd just lost time. The dog didn't make much sense, either. Maybe he was starting to hallucinate.

The younger Winchester tilted forward, forehead coming to rest on Andy's motionless chest. He was finding it harder to support his own weight. The rough cement bit into the palm of his left hand and he couldn't feel Andy's shirt in his right anymore. He rubbed the fabric between his fingertips, trying to chase away the numbness. Thinking was becoming difficult. Breathing even more so. As well as strangely… metallic?

Ah. The blood filling his lungs. That made sense.

"No! Sam!"

He could hear Dean's pounding feet now, his voice so much closer. But his brother was still too far away. Sam knew he wouldn't make it.

"Sammy!"

-o-o-o-

Castiel had immediately tried to roll out from under her attacker, but Gabriel scrambled onto her back, pinning her arms. Bracelets of light formed beneath his wrists, trapping her grace instantaneously.

She raised her head and yelled as loudly as her human vessel was capable, "Sam!"

"Are you friggin' kidding me?" Gabriel hissed above her, releasing one of those wrists to slap a hand over her mouth. Castiel continued to yell, but her efforts were significantly muffled. "Oh, you are so going back in the closet!"

A flare of light and a familiar rumble down the road drew both angels' attention. Cars meant people. That car in particular meant Dean .

Castiel tried to launch herself into the ether again, knowing it would be futile. She rebounded back into her vessel like a ball bouncing off a wall, momentarily knocked dizzy by the attempt. Gabriel was cursing once more when she regained her faculties.

"What is wrong with you?" he muttered, furious, as he managed to grab both wrists in one hand, the other keeping her from announcing their presence. "This is written in stone , Castiel. It has to happen."

Through the grass, she could just make out the two figures, silhouetted by the lights of two cars. Which meant she saw when the taller of the two – Sam – fell to his knees.

"No!" Her grace screamed past her brother's hands and the windows of the house behind them cracked from the force of an angel's true voice. She struggled anew, this time entirely with her human body, weak as such a vessel may be, when another prayer came through angel radio.

This was not an old entreaty, stored until she reconnected to the ether. This was live. Dean was praying to her right now.

'Cas. Cas, I… I found him. He's dying. Sam's dying, he's been stabbed, and I don't- God, I don't know what to do. Please, Cas. I-I don't… We need a miracle, damnit. We- we need.. we need you, Cas. I need you.'

The angel was momentarily confused to return to the physical world only to find it blurry. She did not understand why Angela Garrett's vessel was crying, but she suspected it was an automatic response to the tightness in her gut. The compression in her chest that ached fiercely. The knowledge that Sam Winchester was dying and Dean needed her.

Dean needed her. Cas had never heard the human so broken. She had to get to him. He needed her to.

'I'm sorry, Cas.'

There was something in that last prayer – defeat, resignation, an apology she didn't understand – that told the angel to get to him. Castiel knew - she knew - that she had to get to Dean Winchester now .

She gathered all of the bound grace she could and released it in a desperate, explosive scream.

-o-o-o-

Dean ran past the parked car, uncaring where the demon had blinked off to. He only had eyes for his brother as Sam hit the ground. Dean slid to his knees in a way he knew he would be feeling later, but right then he didn't care.

Sam was sprawled stomach-down over Andy's motionless body on the broken-up asphalt, Bobby's dog barking and snapping beside them both. Sam's back was a Jackson Pollock of blood splashed across a canvas of white undershirt, so dark in the moon-lit night it was more black than red. The older Winchester didn't hesitate to scoop his kid brother into his arms, knowing somewhere in the back of his head that Sam was a dead man. Those wounds were fatal.

"Sammy." The name came out closer to a sob and Dean bit his tongue hard. He had to keep it together, damnit.

Sarge finally stopped barking, ears flattening against his head. With no target to represent the danger the animal still knew was near, he began pacing with anxious whimpers. The shepherd trotted back and forth twice in front of Dean, before finally lowering his body to the ground and army-crawling inch by inch towards Andy's unmoving body. Sarge climbed atop the boy's chest, lying the length of his still form, ears pinned back. His golden eyes glowed in the running lights of the cars as he kept guard atop the boy, growling defensively at the empty road around them.

Bobby jogged up to the group, shotgun in hand and eyes patrolling the woods to their left and the house on the distant right. The man that had stabbed Sam had disappeared in the blink of an eye, which meant demon. If that were true, Bobby didn't expect him to make another appearance. He'd gotten what he wanted: Sam dead and Dean right there, unable to save him. But Bobby wasn't stupid enough to drop his guard, either. Especially not with Dean falling apart.

The old hunter kneeled on the ground beside Andy, keeping unshed tears at bay by focusing on the tree line, shotgun braced against his side. He pressed two fingers to the kid's neck, but he already knew the answer well before he felt cold skin and lifeless veins. His eyes closed briefly, silent tears slipping past his guard. Bobby withdrew his hand, shaking his head at Dean's wide, questioning eyes. The man, looking so much more like a shattered boy, turned his head back to the brother in his arms.

"Don't do this to me, Sammy," Dean whispered, practically begging as he followed Bobby's lead and pressed two fingers to Sam's neck. There was a pulse, but it was weak. Getting weaker. "Not you too. I can't lose you both, you don't get to do that to me, you bastard."

But he knew his brother had no say in the matter, no dog in this fight. He'd given it his best – against Time, against Azazel's plans, against the bloody Apocalypse – and it hadn't been enough. It never was, was it?

Dean curled his body over his dying brother. They'd lost. Andy was gone, Sam would be in mere minutes, Cas wouldn't be flying in for a last-minute ass-saving, and Dean was out of backup plans. From here on out, Hell – and everyone else, really – wouldn't leave Dean alone. Not until he sold his soul.

He already knew he was going to make the deal again. He wouldn't even wait for Hell to push him past his limits. Everything it would do to him, everything it would start, it didn't matter. Despite all the things he'd learned since Cas sent him back, all the years before and after that he'd had to figure out one stupid lesson, he still hadn't learned it. Because he was still going to sell the world for his brother's life. He already knew he would.

Fucking Gabriel had him dead to rights.

'If eating a bullet is what it takes… '

Sam's words floated up from his memories once more and Dean closed his eyes.

Fuck it.

Fuck Hell. Fuck Heaven, fuck their destinies, fuck ' written in stone ', and fuck Gabriel. Those sons of bitches down below and up above and everywhere else in between wouldn't get their apocalypse from him. Not this time.

Slowly, the older Winchester's hand slid from his brother's neck to the gun tucked into the waistband of his jeans. It wasn't the Colt, so Dean knew it wouldn't stick, but at least Heaven would have to work for their Sword. Let fucking Zachariah and Michael scapegoat their way out of bringing him back without alerting all of Heaven and Hell that they wanted the Apocalypse to happen. Especially once he got to heaven and started mouthing off.

A moment of regret flashed through him, realizing Bobby was by his side. The old man would surely kill Dean himself if he managed to stop him first. Dean had no interest in doing this in front of him – a man more his father than his own dad ever had been – but he knew Hell wouldn't give them long. Especially if they realized what he was planning to do.

And, honestly, he wasn't sure how long his own resolve would last. Gabriel hadn't been entirely wrong. Dean was running on pure adrenaline and when that wore off, so would his willpower. He sent off one, final prayer to Cas, knowing the angel couldn't help them now, (knowing how pissed she'd be when she learned what he'd done) and wrapped his fingers around the handle of his gun.

He pulled the .45 from his back, prepared to flip the safety, cock the hammer, and pull the trigger before anyone – or thing – realized his suicide mission. But the sound of a car door opening in the night had Dean drawing that gun on something other than his own skull. Beside him, Bobby spun in time, shotgun up and trained on the thing that came out of the nearest car. The one Dean had parked Baby behind.

It had blonde hair, pale skin, and the shape of a human. But it was the glowing green eyes as the creature came charging towards them that really gave her away.

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns:
Did I mention season finales are not for the faint of heart? [insert weak grin here] I promise, I'm almost done killing people. I think. Well, it depends on your definition of "almost" [insert second, weaker smile here]

Audio Listeners
: two things for this group! First, it has been brought to my attention that my chapter and title break lines are obnoxious via text-reader, so I'd like to change them to something easier on the ears. I'd like to check with everyone (including readers, as the visual presentation of the story is equally important to me)

This is what I'm thinking for the title section:

—----------

The Road So Far (This Time Around)
Chapter yada yada
—----------

And for in-between story sections:

--- Chapter Break ---

As I don't use a text-to-speech app and only tried out one to see what would and wouldn't work, please let me know if this is a decent choice. I'm unsure if all apps read similarly, or if some will try to read the dashes out loud.

Podfic: Second question to audio listeners (and everyone, really). Would anyone be interested in a podfic version of this story? I've been playing around with the idea of recording the story, but A) have no previous experience as a reader and no idea if I'm any good and B) do not want to proceed with 130 chapters unless there's some interest in the endeavor (apparently it's 90+ hours of material, because of course it is XD)

Request for Editors: On the same note as both chapter break changes and possible recording, I am in the very slow process of a whole-story edit. I'd like to go through all the mistakes everyone has been so helpful in flagging, as well as some very minor clean up (no content change, only editing. Well, except for one line that Henriksen says that's always bugged me XD But that'll just be a word-choice change). However, as you can probably imagine, getting through 130 chapters is a lot. And I won't catch them all on my own. Vaesse is helping me with this task, but I am hoping to throw some more people at it if there are any willing volunteers. I'd like to give each editor about 10 chapters to read through and flag errors in. So if you're up for a ten chapter read through (or more) please let me know in a comment or DM. Thanks very much!

(Side note): for the people who've asked about publishing/ binding the story into a book and to whom I promised this edit ages ago, soooo sorry but I am working on it and it should be done in a month or two (I hope))

I think that was all the notes I needed to address. See y'all soon!

Cheers,
Silence

Chapter 132: Season 2: Chapter 98

Chapter Notes

Author's Notes: Another weekly update?! Surely we have stepped into an alternate reality! Jokes aside, I will be trying to keep up weekly posts until the end of the season finale, if I'm able!

Also, I know a Sunday night/Monday morning post is weird, but I tried to edit on Saturday, got distracted, got further distracted, remembered I never finished as I was heading to bed, thought I'd sit down and knock it out only for my sleepy time cannabis to kick in right as God/Chuck was having an existential moment. Soooo, that edit didn't happen Anyhoo! After that silly little anecdote, let's go murder more people!

Chapter Warnings: I actually don't think anyone dies in this chapter… Although, Sam is giving it his best shot.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 98

Persephone stared through the windshield as Sam Winchester hit the ground a dozen feet away, dropping the body in his arms and struggling to remain upright. She blinked, unsure if she had actually seen Tom stab the hunter – Azazel's apparent favorite – in the back or if, perhaps, she'd misseen. But the image didn't change, despite several extended moments of observation.

Sam Winchester was on the ground, bleeding to death.

What in the Hell ?

She startled as someone ran past the car, only realizing belatedly that it was the other Winchester. Dean bolted past, unaware of her presence inside the vehicle, to grab his brother off the ground. Persephone watched, confusion growing heavy in her gut. It was starting to feel like dread and that was not a good sign.

"Well, that was fun."

Persephone reared away from the suddenly-occupied driver's seat, glaring at Tom as he reappeared. He reached in front of her, causing the woman to draw back further (as far as she could before the gold chain still latched to the steering wheel drew taut). Tom opened the glove box, pulled out a handful of papers – napkins, Persephone realized – which he then used to wipe blood off his hands.

Sam Winchester's blood.

"You killed daddy's favorite," she announced in a bored monotone that still managed to convey disgust quite well. Persephone resettled in her seat, annoyed the demon had gotten such a reaction out of her (undoubtedly his intention). "Congratulations. He'll be so proud."

"He will be," Tom agreed with a pleased smile. He threw the bloodied napkins at her feet and Persephone stared at the mess with distaste.

"You do realize I cannot bind to a dead man, yes?" Persephone scowled at the demon, unimpressed. She leaned back against the door and crossed her arms, purposefully stringing the chain across the width of the car. With several flicks of her wrist, gold jingled obnoxiously in front of the demon. "I believe that was your father's whole reason for bringing me along."

"Azazel didn't want you here at all," Tom sniped back, rolling his eyes. Some of that mirth was turning to annoyance. It bothered him, letting this woman lessen his success with her ignorance and arrogance. He waved his hand, disappearing the chain and bracelet from around her wrist.

Persephone rubbed at the skin there, still glaring at him.

"Bringing you here was my call." He presented her with a prideful grin. Stupid creature, always so pompous. He really couldn't wait to be rid of her. "And don't worry, Princess, you're still needed . Prince Charming over there won't stay dead for long."

Persephone's eyes widened and she turned back to the road. Dean Winchester had gathered Sam into his arms. He was bent over him in mourning. The conclusion of what would happen next was not hard to predict.

So. That was their plan. They needed Sam to cross the veil. Well, if that was Hell's move, then it was finally time to make hers.

Persephone let her now free arm drop to her side, where she had lodged her purse between seat and the door earlier that night. She slipped her hand inside, keeping her eyes on the scene unfolding outside of the car as her fingers wrapped around the hex bag she'd been carrying around for weeks now. Persephone curled her fingers around it, hiding it in her palm, before withdrawing her arm. Gingerly, she settled her hands in her lap, eyes still locked on the pair of brothers just beyond the windshield. Tom didn't even look her way, watching the same drama she was.

Persephone took a slow, deep breath, and then moved.

Chapter Break

Chuck Shurley withdrew his hands from the keyboard, pulling away from his writing as surely as he pulled away from himself. God was left staring at the screen. He let the lines of text blur out of focus, into nothing more than black squiggles. Nonsensical symbols that didn't spell anything, let alone the end of the world.

This was it.

Whatever he wrote next would come to be. And not because he willed it. No, Chuck had long since stepped back. He wasn't writing this story anymore. He already had, six millennia ago. (In stone, He might add.)

Now he was only an observer. A transcriber.

One that was stalling.

There was a reason, it turned out, that God had chosen to be a prophet on Earth during the End Times. He had, to put it simply, a pathetic amount of self-restraint. He couldn't help it, he needed to know what was to come. He was – and always had been – an all-knowing being. Turning that off hadn't been as easy as flipping a switch. Even if that was essentially what he had done. Woken up one day and decided this was it. This was the day he stopped looking into the future, stopped checking where the story was going, and let it write itself.

And he'd thought, after twenty-four hours untethered from the cosmos, 'Well, that was easy. I'm doing great.'

As it turned out, going cold turkey hadn't been the wisest choice. He really wasn't used to not knowing and, as it just so happened, suspense was a bitch.

For an all-knowing being who could alter events to shape the known reality to whatever he wanted it to be… he really didn't like not being in control of the story. Not even getting to know if it was going somewhere good. It was so frustrating .

So he'd made himself a prophet, allowed to observe but nothing more. No looking beyond what prophetic visions provided, no interfering.

And then Dean Winchester traveled back in time to avert the Apocalypse.

(Which wasn't remotely like putting an addict's poison of choice right in front of them and then saying "Don't touch, kay?" Nothing at all like that. Chuck was doing fine .)

Such a task was possible, God knew. The timeline Dean had come from confirmed as much. Confirmed what he'd always hoped; that humans were capable of writing their story, and soon the angels would be too. Even if their version of events got a little… messy.

But he also knew that averting an Apocalypse was very much like swimming upstream (if that stream was a thousand-foot waterfall and gravity was a couple dozen times stronger than usual). The Winchesters alone didn't stand a chance. Not without help. Not without a significant change.

In Dean's timeline, that change had come in the form of one little angel. An angel that had accepted growth and change – things not built into his original blueprints – when all his brethen were only just realizing the possibility.

But this time, due to all the changes Dean had made….

Well. Despite it being cosmically ironic and equally infuriating, there was every opportunity for Persephone, of all creatures, to be that change this time around.

(As a writer, Chuck was very familiar with circular plots. He did not like being in one.)

And as much as he had said he would not interfere… he also did not want the world to end in a bigger mess than was strictly necessary. Which meant prepping Persephone to be that change, in as helpful a way for the Winchesters as was possible.

Because, as he'd told Dean last year, something that big likely meant altering the timeline beyond recognition. And anything drastic enough to break Time away from its chosen course….

Well, something like that could be for the better… or it could make everything so, so much worse.

So God and Chuck had primed the girl the best they could for the moment when she would have a choice to make. A choice that could change everything.

Chuck had given her a hex bag specifically capable of breaking Azazel's control over her. God had spent months fanning the embers of her old self, the remnants of a spell that had once been crafted from good intentions.

(Before God had learned where such roads usually led.)

(Straight to a tomb inside a sacked city.)

(Like he'd said: ironic.)

Which was all to say, God had been interfering when he'd promised himself he wouldn't. Then again, Persephone wasn't even supposed to be a part of this story. So Chuck figured he was allowed to cheat a bit on that one. It wasn't interfering; it was balancing the playing field.

Still, with all that he had been doing to tip the scales the Winchesters' way, God was well aware it might not be enough. Persephone had spent those six thousand years with nothing to do but stew in her anger. An emotion she'd already had in spades. Just like her father.

God had seen it six thousand years ago and he saw it now, in the woman who had shown up on his doorstep in an uncomfortable looking blouse and even more uncomfortable looking heels.

Chapter Break

May 2006

Chuck Shurley's House

"Okay, that's enough." God snapped His fingers and Persephone went limp against the back of his couch. No longer Chuck, He scooted forward on the coffee table until His knees bumped hers, but His expression remained deadly serious. "Why are you here?"

He was furious. Persephone was never supposed to get out of Gomorrah. He'd had his angels ward it specifically against any possible escape or outside interference. Only an angel could free her from that tomb, which meant she should never have gotten free.

So what was she doing sitting in His living room?

"Following Sam Winchester."

Chuck's eyebrows went up and, for a moment, he forgot to be God. He was genuinely surprised for a second time that morning, which simply didn't happen to all-knowing beings very often, you know. "Wait, this is Hell's backup plan? Dean's changing things left and right, and you are their answer?"

He laughed and looked away in amazement before He started to actually think it over. Persephone didn't respond, either not having an answer or His control over her recognized rhetoric and gave her a pass. God leaned back, putting His arm across the back of the sofa. "Well, that could backfire spectacularly. For either party ."

He did kind of want to see where this could go…. God leaned forward, bracing His elbows on His knees.

"Tell me," He said, eyeing the potential homewrecker sitting on His couch, green eyes unfocused and cloudy. "What are you going to do, Persephone ?"

Although her body remained boneless, sunk into the back of the couch with no resistance, the tips of her fingers twitched. Her nails slowly dug into her business slacks until her fingers were claws pressing into her thighs. The green of her eyes started to glow.

The silence stretched and He nudged her knee with His own. "Answer the question."

"I will protect my charge."

God's eyebrows rose. Well then. Good to know there was still a little guardian left in there after all these years.

"Do you know Azazel's plans?"

"No." There was no hint of deception in her response. Not that He expected Persephone to be able to lie at the moment. She might be actively fighting His control, but she was little more than an ant in comparison to Him.

Well, He supposed, if humans were ants in one of the most common and overused analogies out there, maybe she deserved a little more recognition.

A fire ant, then.

Her upper lip twitched and God got the distinct impression of a snarl on Persephone's blank face. "He is hell spawn. Whatever his plan, it will be unpleasant."

God snorted before He could help Himself.

"Understatement of the millennia," He muttered before clearing his throat. Adopting a more serious expression, He continued, "They plan to raise Lucifer."

Her knuckles turned white, fingers curling into full fists against her slacks. "They will fail."

"Actually," God drew out, shrugging one shoulder regrettably, "I don't think they will."

Persephone didn't answer, but the skin between her eyes was pinched. He watched her closely.

"So, the real question is…" God placed His hands atop her knees and the cloudiness in her eyes cleared up a little. She met His gaze, a question there she couldn't voice past his powers. "What will you do, Persephone?"

The silence stretched. Her chest rose and fell with each breath, gaining enough speed to suggest tension. God tried not to let the storyteller in Him read into that.

“Protect my charge.”

The smile was slow to spread across His face. Fancy that. Looked like Hell’s little backup plan had a decent chance of backfiring after all.

“Even if Sam says yes?” Those glowing eyes blinked slowly. She was trying to process information she didn’t have yet. “He is Lucifer’s true vessel.”

Persephone looked pained, straining against His powers as she was. The glow of her eyes grew, and God got the distinct impression of anger buried in those depths. Anger he had seen once before. He’d had doubts then, too, and there’d been nothing to dissuade them but time and distance.

While Persephone had no loyalty to Hell, she was no longer the guardian she had once been. She was bitter, filled with rage and thoughts of vengeance. God supposed (with maybe something vaguely approaching contrition) that several thousand years in a hole in the ground might do that to anyone.

(He was well acquainted with the concept of reaping what one sowed by now, so really, He shouldn’t be surprised it had landed right back in His lap.)

It was what lay under the justified anger that worried Him. She was her father’s child, and that was the literal core of the problem. A problem He had once gambled was not solvable, even after she had insisted He was wrong.

Well… now she’d have her chance to prove it. So long as God was willing to gamble the end of the world on it.

“What will you do then, Persephone?”

She met his gaze, her eyes aflame as she realized just who she was talking to. But under God's will, there was nothing she could do but answer the question.

“I will protect my charge.”

Chapter Break

Present

Outside the Morton House

The moment she got the hex bag with its extra-long drawstring wrapped around Tom's neck, paralyzing the demon (who jerked into an unnatural rigidity like a puppet with strings drawn taut), Persephone threw open the car door. She flung herself out of the vehicle – speed was going to be somewhat essential if she were to succeed here – before freezing halfway around the door with a sudden thought.

She turned back, ducking inside the car once more. From his frozen position in the driver's seat, Tom made a low-pitched sound of rage, locked behind sealed lips. He was trying to throw his body against the paralytic spell with little success, looking more like a wriggling fish on dry land.

Or a worm on a hook , Persephone thought with no small amount of vindictive joy.

With one knee on the passenger seat, she leaned across the car and grabbed his shoulder, hauling him forward against the steering wheel. The demon went like an overstuffed doll. The gun he had acquired at the cemetery was still tucked against the small of his back. Persephone pulled it from his waistline.

"Silly me," she said aloud, voice dripping with monotoned sarcasm. Tom made another disgruntled noise and she smirked at him with every ounce of smugness that she'd endured from months of being stuck in his presence. The rage was clear in Tom's eyes and Persephone delighted in it. She waved the Colt in his line of sight. "Almost forgot this."

She pulled back out of the car once more, leaving behind the demon's muffled screams. Gun in hand, Persephone rounded the door once more, shoving it closed with a satisfying slam. Tucking the weapon into the small of her back, she took off towards the huddle of men a dozen feet ahead.

Chapter Break

Both Bobby and Dean had their guns trained on Azazel's girl in a second flat. She skidded to a stop a half dozen feet from them, arms up and empty hands spread wide in a gesture of peace neither hunter believed for a second.

"I can heal him."

Dean blinked, brain bluescreening and needing to reboot to process that statement. Of all the things he'd expected (and, really, he hadn't known what to expect), that had not even remotely been on the list.

"Who the hell are you?" Bobby barked, shotgun braced against his shoulder. He was apparently more prepared to handle this baffling situation. It probably helped that Bobby didn't have history with this girl. He hadn't spent thirty minutes earlier that very night chasing her off into the darkness, convinced she was the one who had somehow taken Sam.

No, Bobby didn't have a clue who she was, but Dean did. Which was why the next words out of his mouth would most definitely be 'Fuck off, bitch .' Or he could forgo talk entirely and speak with his gun.

"How?"

Bobby's head whipped around as Dean's mouth moved without his permission. The sharp warning of, "Dean!" was not remiss. The man from the future wanted to tell him, 'I know! ' but he couldn't look away from the woman offering what was surely, surely, a miracle too good to be true.

"It doesn't matter how," she said in clear, enunciated words despite an accent that Dean immediately recognized from the phone call that had sent them to Rivergrove. She stayed where she was, arms still raised (possibly because of the dual guns still trained on her). "What matters is that I can do it. But only so long as he is alive to heal."

Both hunters stared at her, one with an itchy trigger finger and grief backing it, the other wondering what the hell was happening and what it could mean for the End Game. Was it a miracle? Unlikely. A trap? Much, much more likely.

"What will it cost?"

This time, Bobby's whole body turned his way, though the gun remained trained on their mystery guest. His eyes were fierce, filled with anger and heartbreak in equal measure. "Don't you even think about it, boy."

"Nothing," the blonde replied easily – too easily – and Dean had his answer.

Trap .

"Bullshit." He raised his gun more confidently, intent clear, and the woman faltered, realizing her misstep.

Before she could respond, there was an inhuman scream, deep and reverberating. All three – hunters and mystery creatures alike – spun at the noise. It had come from one of the cars.

"…That'll work," the woman announced out of nowhere and when she turned back to the men there was a hint of a smirk on her lips. She reached behind her back, having lowered her arms somewhat during the distraction, and both hunters immediately retrained on her. She paused, staring at their guns, but ultimately resumed the motion at a much slower, deliberate pace. Her other hand was back up, fingers spread wide once again, asking them to trust her.

Dean knew they should just shoot her. He knew it. But hope was a powerful thing. A dangerous, powerful thing.

When the woman pulled her arm back to the front there was a gun gripped loosely in her hand. Dean's eyes widened at the Colt. She held it out to him, grip on the barrel, butt towards the hunter: a clear message that she had no intent to use it on them.

When Dean met her eyes, they were unnaturally bright, though they remained blue this time as she stared at the older Winchester.

"Kill that demon when he tries to stop me."

"Where did you get that?" Bobby asked, eyes equally wide as he stared at the gun that could kill anything (well, almost anything). And she was just handing it over.

"Do we have a deal?" the woman asked, ignoring the older hunter's question. In fact, she was ignoring Bobby's presence entirely. Her eyes were locked on Dean. When the hunter hesitated, she added, "I'm not asking you to trust me, Dean. I'm asking you to let me save your brother."

His eyes dropped to Sam, limp in his arms, chest barely moving anymore, skin taking on a gray, lifeless hue. His brother had minutes left, at most.

There was no way this wasn't a trick. Dean didn't believe in miracles, unless they came with blue eyes and a tan trench coat. But a desperate part of him, the bit that had never been able to let Sam go, was pretty sure he couldn't make things worse.

Both he and Sam would live with no demon deal and no selling his soul? That was a deal too good to pass up.

'And too good to be true ,' Dean thought bitterly, even as he reached for the gun, knowing it had to be a trap. Knowing it was a bad, bad, bad, bad, bad idea.

" Dean !" Bobby hissed, but the man from the future ignored his surrogate father. His eyes were locked on the creature holding the Colt even as his fingers curled around it's familiar grip.

"Do it."

Persephone nodded, just once, and then all hell broke loose.

End Chapter

Chapter End Notes

Author's Notes: Mwuaaahahaha!

Chapter 133: Season 2: Chapter 99

Chapter Notes

Author's Notes: Alright, thank you everyone for waiting an extra day for this post! If you want the fairly entertaining, panic-inducing, midnight-to-four-am-emergency-meeting-with-the-muse, plot-hole reason why, see the end notes! (At the end. I do recommend reading the chapter first because there are spoilers down there and it's definitely not a time-sensitive tale 😂)

Chapter Warnings: Violence, violence, we take a break to finger paint, and then more violence! And then we should take ourselves a study break, because libraries are calm, peaceful, and boring.

Actual Chapter Warnings: Things get quite brutal and gory for a moment in this one. Trigger warnings for a pretty visceral description of bodily harm.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 99

Gabriel was so annoyed. Not that the Beginning of the End was supposed to be fun . Far from it. But his stubborn, mule-headed, willful, obstinate, infuriating sister was making it particularly unfun.

"What is wrong with you?" the archangel hissed from above his squirming sibling. She was really putting her all into breaking free, risking injury and so, so much more. Admirable as that may be from perhaps a human point of view, Gabe simply could not wrap his head around it. It just didn't make sense. "This is written in stone , Castiel. It has to happen."

She had to know that; she was an angel . They had all known it, ever since Dad turned on the lights around here.

'No!' her true voice ripped past the physical barriers of her vessel and Gabriel actually lost his grip on her, both wrist and mouth, in surprise. Beneath him, Castiel seemed just as taken aback by the outburst. Gabriel could see her grace – subdued eddies of bright yellow wibbling with strain and losing color – and he just… couldn't understand. She was risking permanent damage. For them .

Gabe quickly clamped his hand back over her wrist, strengthening the grace he formed in a bracelet around her slim arm. He covered her mouth again, but this time pushed his grace past her lips, sealing her true form within. It was an inelegant gag, but the archangel couldn't risk her interfering. These were the events meant to come. They had no business trying to change them.

The littlest angel (that could, indeed) stilled beneath him and Gabriel let out a breath of… shit, he didn't even know anymore. Relief? Frustration? Anxiety, confusion, annoyance, respite? His gaze lifted cautiously from his sister to the action happening fifty feet away.

Gabriel froze, eyes narrowing at the new female presence among the boys. She wasn't part of the script.

The newcomer was warded and, from so far away, Gabriel couldn't quite see past the charm. It was strong magic, clouding even the senses of an archangel, and that alone nagged at him. There was something familiar about what lay beneath, though. Whoever she was, Gabriel knew her. That alone wasn't odd – Gabriel knew lots of people. Even people who might show up in the middle of Hell's pre-Apocalypse finalist games.

What was odd was how familiar whatever-she-was felt to his grace, and yet how completely unfamiliar she appeared to him, both above and below the warding. Gabriel didn't know her , but he definitely knew someone just like her.

"Wait a minute…"

When it clicked, Gabriel froze completely, straightening up slowly atop his sister, unaware that as he did so, he withdrew both physical and angelic restraints. His brown eyes widened.

"That's not-"

Beneath him, Castiel exploded in sound. Gabriel nearly fell off her in surprise before scrambling to clamp his hand back over her mouth. Not that it would do them much good. She wasn't screaming in any human form. Her entire grace was crying out, and it was damn near enough to knock the archangel back.

He felt more than heard the crack of old wounds splitting open. Then every window in the house behind them shattered simultaneously, and Gabe instinctually curled his body over his sister's as glass rained down.

Chapter Break

The windshield on the car closest to them exploded, accompanied by the sound of more tempered glass cracking and very much untempered house windows exploding in the distance.

Bobby recoiled at the noise, spinning towards the violent and new, possible danger. Dean surged to his feet, vaulting over Sammy to put himself between whatever was happening and his brother, Colt already up and trained on the source of the noise. Persephone, immediately suspecting the cause, darted between the two off humans, away from the vehicles. As she did, the driver side door of the nearest car blew off, crashing into the trees a dozen feet away with a cacophony of crunched metal and snapping branches.

Bobby switched between training his shotgun on the car, then the unknown creature darting past him, then back to the car. Dean immediately turned to the source of the noise and chaos and kept his focus there, ignoring the girl completely as she ran past him for his brother. He'd made a deal and he planned to hold up his end.

A fifth person joined the soiree, hauling himself out of the vehicle like his limbs weren't quite working. Dean immediately recognized the guy from the gas station: hulking muscles and a too-tight turtleneck. His eyes slid to black as he stalked towards them.

"Persephone!" he screamed, the full wrath of Hell turning human vocal cords animalistic. "I will kill you myself!"

"You can try!" she yelled back, chin up and smirk cocky, from her crouched position at Sam's feet.

The demon snarled, Bobby's shotgun went off, and the real battle began.

Chapter Break

Castiel collapsed after her little screaming fit and Gabriel – startled enough by the tantrum and further distracted by the damage it may have done to his sister – made the mistake of releasing his hold on her.

The littlest angel that absolutely could (and was never, never, ever leaving the closet again, Dad dammit) launched herself forward with a flare of wings that very nearly knocked Gabriel on his ass. As it was, he only just barely avoided a mouth full of metaphysical feathers.

With a vicious curse, Gabe threw himself after her, just managing to wrap his hand around her ankle. The weight of his body and grace acted like an unexpected anchor. Cassie crashed into the ground with all the force of her flight and Gabriel was so done .

“Enough!” he roared, no longer heeding whether or not they were heard or seen by the group down the road.

This whole thing was already bordering on an unrecoverable clusterfuck; Dean hadn’t summoned a crossroads demon, Persephone was here in some destiny-defying feat, and now a fight was breaking out that wasn’t supposed to happen with a gun the Winchesters weren’t supposed to have.

And Gabriel had no compunction blaming his sister for all it.

Despite managing to keep her from interfering (by the skin of his teeth, he might add), nothing was going to plan. A plan written in stone , Dad dammit. It wasn’t changeable. By the very definition!

This was all Castiel’s fault. Gabriel didn’t know how, but he was sure of it. She’d jinxed the whole thing just talking about it being avoidable.

The archangel scrambled back atop his reckless, infuriating, suicidal sister and this time took no chances. He affixed his grace in binds around both wrists, neck, and chest. Before she could think up anything else dangerous, suicidal, and so fucking stupid , Gabriel pulled them both into the ether.

Chapter Break

Bobby's first shot provided Dean with the temporary (very temporary) cover he needed to tuck his own handgun into his waistline and flip open the Colt's chamber. Two bullets. Dean closed his eyes briefly. Two was not great, not for hunting a demon (they had a nasty habit of disappearing into thin air right as you fired at 'em), but it was better than nothing. He shut the chamber and spun it, lining up the first bullet.

Shotgun shells weren't doing much to deter the demon, though he did look sufficiently annoyed at the damage his hulked up meatsuit was taking. Bobby cracked his shotgun open, having spent all five shells and needing to reload, as Dean stepped up to cover him. He squared his shoulders, aimed, and drew the hammer back.

Tom's eyes locked on the gun in the hunter's hand. The demon's upper lip drew back in a snarl. It looked very much like he'd been expecting the Colt to make an appearance.

The gun flew from Dean's grip with a flick of the demon's wrist before he could completely depress the trigger. Dean damn near dislocated his finger trying to keep a hold of the weapon, to no avail.

The Colt sailed into the woods but Dean, a quick draw armed with ten extra years experience and a whole lot of rage, pulled his handgun from his waist and fired.

Chapter Break

When Tom had finally broken free of the paralyzing hex bag with a scream of rage and an explosion of power strong enough to rip the door off the car he'd been imprisoned in, Persephone did not waste time. She ducked between the two hunters who should (if what she'd read about them was accurate and not Chuck embellishing) be able to handle one little non-Prince-of-Hell-level demon. But she didn't wait around to find out.

She skidded low to the ground, circling Sam Winchester's unconscious body to grab at his ankles with every intention of pulling the injured hunter further away from the battle. A low, dangerous growl stopped her. Persephone froze, hands stretched out over Sam's jeans but not making contact, as she met the golden eyes of a dog perched atop the other boy's body. His upper lip was drawn back in a snarl, the bridge of his snout furled into menacing wrinkles, mouth full of sharp teeth that were very purposefully on display. His head was ducked low, ears back, sharp eyes locked on hers. Every inch of his body language screamed the same warning that vibrated from low in his throat.

Persephone swallowed slowly, keeping her hands visible and intentions clear. It took precious seconds she worried she might not have – the gunshots and grunts of a fight happening a dozen feet away were a constant reminder – before the dog relented. He did not relax, ears still flat to his skull and eyes watching her like a hawk, but he stopped growling and his snout slowly unfurled. Persephone would take what was given; with a nod to the animal, she wrapped her hands around Sam's ankles and pulled him away from the battle.

She got him off the main section of road, dragging him into the leaves and grasses that made up the shoulder. With a quick glance up, Persephone took in the battle (a perfunctory check that neither hunter had gotten himself killed yet), but paid it no more attention after that. She had a job to do and very little time to do it. Hopefully she had moved them far enough out of the way so as not to become collateral damage, but the fate of the fight itself was out of her hands.

Sam's wasn't, however. Not yet.

Persephone straddled the boy's hips without hesitation, grabbing the hem of his bloodied t-shirt and pushing it up to his chin, revealing his torso. Sam's chest was too pale, visually cold in an unsettling way, and the rise and fall of his chest was so slow and shallow as to be almost nonexistent.

He had less time than she'd thought.

Chapter Break

The bullet tore through Tom's gut, the demon caring far less about dodging some average bullet. Until he waved his hand, intent on tossing the hunter along with his gun this time, and nothing happened.

Tom froze, first in shock, and then with the realization that it wasn't a choice. He couldn't move . With a roar of fury and something that felt a lot like fear, the demon tried to move his feet, to step forward (backward, sideways, anything) only to find himself immobilized to the spot.

"What did you do to me!" he screamed, waving his hand again and again, trying to toss Dean Winchester into the nearest tree and hopefully snap his stupid neck.

The hunter smirked, holding up his weapon – a normal, boring gun – with a little wave. "Devil's trap carved into a bullet. Like it?"

Tom's eyes widened in what was very much fear now, bordering on panic. His gaze matched the hunter's turn for turn, both snapping to where the Colt had landed in the woods.

Dean bolted for it. The demon plunged his hand into the open hole in his stomach, desperately clawing at the edges. He had to get to that bullet before the hunter got to the Colt.

Tom could hear Dean crashing through the undergrowth, searching for the gun. He ripped at torn skin, pulling until the slippery gash was wide enough to shove his hand fully inside his meatsuit.

Out of nowhere, Tom's body spasmed. It took a stunned moment of confusion to realize that no, it wasn't the meatsuit. He had spasmed, inside the human. When it happened again, from waist to head, so hard his hand very nearly slipped free from its search, Tom's eyes snapped up.

The other hunter – the old one – had his shotgun trained on him, but that wasn't all he was doing. The demon snarled when he realized that under his breath, the man was speaking Latin.

Tom dug frantically, shoving aside organs in search of the bullet. The tip of a finger brushed something hard and foreign, and he pushed his hand in further. Tom heard the old hunter shout a warning but didn't bother listening. He was up to his wrist in his meatsuit's guts when he finally curled his fingers around the devil-trap bullet.

Which was when he locked eyes with Dean Winchester. The hunter stood between two trees, body turned to the side, arm raised and Colt in hand, deadly glare fixed on the demon.

Tom was staring down the barrel.

Several things happened at once. Two guns went off, as both humans fired simultaneously, one to kill and one to keep the demon from freeing himself. Tom ripped the bullet from his stomach, dropping it to the ground with the same movement that he hurled power at the Colt.

The demon was shoved a half step to the side by the shotgun blast he took on his right. The gun flew from Dean's grip but not before the bullet, spun wide by his power -- but not wide enough -- embedded in Tom's left bicep. The demon was spun back by the impact, howling in rage as the hits ambushed him. The bullet from the Colt wasn't close to anything vital, but it hurt . His arm lit up with flashes of orange beneath his skin, and each burst came with a flare of agony.

Slowly, as it became obvious the bullet wasn't going to kill him, the demon turned back to both hunters, eyes sliding black with rage.

They glanced at each other.

"Balls," the older one breathed out from under his mustache at the same time Dean swore, "Son of a bitch" and Tom threw power at them in a fury.

Chapter Break

Ignoring the cacophony of gunfire and screaming happening only a few feet away, Persephone slid her hand beneath Sam Winchester, between the blood-soaked dirt and the small of his back. She curled her fingers, cupping the lukewarm wetness dribbling out of his back. When she withdrew her hand, in her palm was a pool of dark, almost black blood.

She immediately dipped her fingers into it and began drawing on Sam's chest, quick as she could. A large circle spanning his torso, then divided into three sections. Sam's name went in the top left, her own on the right, and an offer of protection for the bottom, just above the boy's navel. At the top of the circle, Persephone added a blessing; it was a request for approval from a god she no longer believed in but, seeing as she had never formed the Bond without it, she wasn't going to risk excluding it now for the sake of her own pettiness.

Persephone had just completed the written portion of the ritual, shaking blood from her coated hand, when a force wrapped around her abdomen and pulled . She grunted as she was ripped off of Sam, flying through the air and tumbling across the ground half a dozen feet away. The trunk of a tree eventually stopped her roll and Persephone whipped her head up, pissed. Her falsely blonde hair was now a tangle of leaves and blue eyes flashed green in anger.

Tom smirked at her from the road, hand still raised. The demon then sent Dean Winchester – who was just climbing back to his feet from what she assumed was a previous journey through air – flying towards the very same tree.

Persephone flattened herself to the ground to avoid being taken out by the tomahawking hunter. He hit the tree with a solid thunk. She might have sympathized with the man, had he finished his job first. As it was, he had not; Tom was still breathing and, very soon, Sam Winchester would not be.

Dean crashed to the ground beside her with a grunt. Bobby's voice, raised in an exorcism, drew Tom's attention away from them and Dean struggled back to his hands and knees. He momentarily locked eyes with Persephone, propped up on her forearms and blowing strands of hair out of her face. The look she gave him would later be described by Chuck, several hundred miles away and in the middle of one hell of a migraine, as a bitchface all her own.

"Are you planning on holding up your end of this deal anytime soon?" she asked anything-but-sweetly. A leaf fell free of the tangle of blonde and drifted down to the ground below. It really framed her glare.

"Yeah, yeah, I'm working on it," Dean shot back, but his expression could almost be called guilty as his gaze slid to his brother. The hunter hauled himself to his feet quickly after that, pulling a knife from his boot that was most definitely not a gun that could kill anything.

(So things were going great, then, and Chuck had absolutely embellished.)

He took off into the fray once more and Persephone shuffled back on hand and knee to Sam to finish the damn ritual.

Chapter Break

Bobby landed on the hood of the car hard , but considered himself lucky he hadn't landed on the blown-out windshield. That would have hurt a hell of a lot more. And been a hell of a lot harder to climb out of. As it was, it would be a minute before Bobby was ready to roll off the hood, currently sprawled across it on his back, shotgun clutched to his heaving chest.

He was getting too damn old for this.

Across the road, Dean was now engaged in a knife fight; one he knew he wasn't winning. Any hits he managed to land were nothing more than scratches to a demon, and he wasn't proud to admit not that many were landing. His attempts at an exorcism between swings had resulted in his opponent punching him – apparently trying to break his damn jaw with that meaty meatsuit – anytime he got too close.

Dean needed a new plan. He needed the Colt.

The black-eyed bastard had been playing keep-away with it and Dean's gun full of devil-trap bullets. Between flinging the hunters into every tree, car, and patch of asphalt available, and flinging both handguns to-and-fro anytime they got anywhere near one of them (across the road, under the car, into the undergrowth, mix-and-match and repeat), they weren't getting very far with that whole 'kill the demon' thing.

Dean glanced quickly over his shoulder, where his brother was lying, half naked, on the ground. He was covered in bloody symbols that Dean refused to think about in that moment (regret and worry were for after Sammy survived this). Persephone was straddling the younger Winchester, much to Dean's chagrin, finger painting away on his chest. The hunter's blood boiled when she smeared his brother's blood messily over his lips, and he turned away.

It was time to end this, before he found the Colt only to use the last bullet on the thing atop his brother.

They had to get that gun, he thought, eyeing the old Patterson lying just off the side of the road. It was only half a dozen feet from Bobby, who was sprawled on the hood of the first car. Dean eyed the distance with a flicker of hope. If he could just distract the demon long enough…

A cry of pain startled the hunter out of his scheming. Tom had gotten too close to Andy and, to inform him of his error, Sarge currently had incredibly powerful jaws wrapped around the demon's shin. Tom screamed, more in rage than pain, though the pain was definitely there, and attempted to shake his leg loose while balancing on the other. But Sarge was a stubborn old bastard, just like his owner. He hung on all the tighter, growling low in his throat and tossing his head side to side, no doubt trying to rip the demon's leg clean off. From the sounds the hell-spawn was making, he was doing a pretty good job at it.

Tom raised a hand, eyes murderous and face red, and Dean knew what came next. He was damn sick of his Team getting flung this way and that across this stupid road in this stupid place, and that included the stupid dog. So, Dean did what he always did when he was out of ideas.

He started a fist fight.

The older Winchester charged Tom with a roar, tackling him about the waist and taking them both to the ground before he could attack the German Shepherd. Sarge released the demon right on cue, as if he knew exactly what the human was doing. He alternated between fierce barking (no doubt letting the demon know exactly what he thought of him) and nipping at the body any time Tom came out of their scuffle and rolled too close to the dog.

Sarge was definitely growing on him, Dean realized as he punched Tom across the face, enjoying the way the demon's head bounced off the rough asphalt beneath him. Bonus points, he thought, for the way the dog kept snapping at the demon's fingers anytime the black-eyed bastard raised an arm to fling them. Or move the Colt before Bobby could get to it.

Speaking of.

"Bobby!"

The old hunter rolled off the hood of the car with a groan, weapon up and ready to fire even as his legs took a few experimental steps to find balance. But Dean didn't need the help of a shotgun, Bobby realized as he watched his kid roll across the asphalt with a demon. He needed something else.

Bobby immediately looked around, spotting the Colt in seconds. He dove towards the gun, fingers grappling with the hilt. As soon as he had it in hand, Bobby popped the cylinder out, eying the five empty chambers. One bullet left. Balls.

Movement drew his eye, and Bobby found himself closing the cylinder with a flick of his wrist and leveling the gun on instinct. He blinked at the creature who had agreed to save Sam's life (for reasons still unknown, and which Bobby very much doubted were altruistic, but what was done was done). She was atop the younger Winchester, bent over, lips seals to his. Their mouths were painted red in what could only be blood.

"What the hell-" Bobby had every urge to shoot her. Every damn right to shoot her. That was his kid the bitch was defiling. There wasn't a spell, ritual, or cautionary tale he could think of – and he could think of plenty – where sealing a deal with a kiss or blood ever resulted in anything good.

His finger twitched on the trigger.

"Bobby!"

The old hunter swung the Colt at Dean's cry. His other kid was grappling with the demon and losing. To be specific, he was getting the shit kicked out of him.

Bobby cocked the gun. The noise was enough to draw the demon's attention and Dean used the distraction to kick away from him, shoving the demon into the clear and open road while the hunter rolled out of harm's way. An easy shot.

The son of a bitch's eyes turned black, his chest heaved, his face was red with rage, as he squared up to face Bobby head on. A wind started to pick up between the trees as the old hunter aimed between those inhuman eyes.

He pulled the trigger.

Chapter Break

Man, law books were boring.

Sam didn't think Law was boring. He'd picked pre-law because he found the legal system a fascinating puzzle of pieces you first had to find before you could put together. Plus it was a respectable career that didn't involve blood and guts or guns and danger.

But God, were law books boring.

Sam leaned back in his chair, spine popping in several places. He had to bite back a pleased groan as he added arms to the stretch and his stiff muscles started to sing.

The future lawyer was in the quiet section of Stanford's main library – the place with shushing icons and reminders on every wall, pillar, shelf, and tabletop -- and they took that rule literally . 'They' being both the students and staff in attendance at the Cecil H. Green Library (nobody actually called it that, it was just the Green Library to students). He'd learned the hard way after dragging Brady there for a study session. Sam had come to find out that day that he had a really funny roommate and an absolutely terrible study buddy.

Lucky for him, he'd found himself a much better one.

Jess glanced up from her laptop, meeting his eyes over the top of the screen. She was sitting across the table from him (and how she managed to sit cross-legged on the small library chairs and not fall off, he'd never know) with headphones securely covering her ears and fingers clacking away at the keyboard. She raised her eyebrows in question, but Sam just shook his head with a smile that was probably one part charming, nine parts besotted. He could see the amused smile in her eyes (or what was more likely amused judgment in the form of a smile) before she tucked back into her assignment.

Sam let his head loll back, eyes drifting to the ceiling of the library, and then over to the shelves of books surrounding them. He jolted in surprise, nearly tipping his chair over backwards, when he spotted a familiar woman standing in one of the aisles, staring directly at him.

It was Azazel's girl.

She looked like she had in his vision, the one in Gomorrah. Olive skin, a headful of wild, dark hair, and eyes so green they bordered on unnatural. Only now she looked odd – out of place – in a pair of dark jeans and a black button-up blouse (or was it that she looked totally normal for this place, and that was the odd part?)

"Sam Winchester."

Sam scrambled out of the chair, glancing quickly at Jess, ready to tell her to run, but he drew up short. She was still staring at her laptop, typing away. She hadn't even looked up at his mad dash upright.

"Jess?" he called, glancing between her and Azazel's girl. The mystery woman hadn't moved towards them at all, just remained standing between the two shelves, eyes locked on him.

Jess didn't respond or even look up as he waved a hand over the top of her laptop. No one in the library did. No one shot him dirty looks or shushed him for speaking. No one noticed him – or her – at all.

Shaking and fisting his hands to hide it, Sam turned to the intruder. He kept the study table between him and her. "I'm dreaming."

"In a way, yes," Azazel's girl answered, those green eyes roaming around the library for a moment of disinterested observation before returning to him. It was an intense gaze. It reminded Sam of Castiel. So did the blankness of her expression and disinterest. Only in her case, it seemed unnatural rather than supernatural. "It is difficult for the human body to maintain consciousness once the detachment process begins. Your mind chose a place of peace during the transition. It's not uncommon."

"Detachment process?" Sam glanced at Jess again, both instincts and nerves in a heightened state. But she remained oblivious to the events unfolding and Sam tried to convince himself this was a dream where she couldn't get hurt.

"Your soul, Sam."

Hazel eyes snapped back to green. Sam blinked, then drew in a breath that was a lot more like a gasp, lungs informing him he'd forgotten to breathe those last few seconds. "What?"

"Your soul is detaching from your body," Azazel's girl reiterated, and while her expression remained blank, there was a slight shift in her accented words. Sam couldn't place it, the difference too slight, but he thought she was displeased.

"I'm dying," he paraphrased, realization dawning even as the words registered.

He remembered.

And the last thing he remembered was walking out of Azazel's battle royale. A demon had greeted him, congratulated him (and oh god , Andy, no) and then stabbed him in the back. Literally.

Sam's hand drifted to the small of his back, then up as high as he could go. There wasn't any wound or blood that he could feel, but he wasn't sure if that was because he'd been stabbed higher than he could reach, or this was all in his head.

"Yes."

The bluntness of her response – just another fact in a world full of 'em – shook Sam out of some of his shock, as well as his fear. If he was already dying, there wasn't much to fear, now was there? He straightened, hands fisted at his side but this time in preparation for a fight rather than hiding distress.

"Why are you here?" he asked, chin tilted up in challenge. "You're not a reaper. I recognize you from my vision. That tomb, the one in Gomorrah. You're Azazel's girl."

Her eyebrows went up in what was most definitely offense, but the somewhat amused kind. Sam got the distinct impression she'd snorted without making a single sound.

"I knew someone was watching. I didn't know it was you." Her eyebrows rose and fell, something bordering on distaste and snark sneaking through that blankness. Sam was reminded of the woman he'd met in the bar, the one that had broken his glass and cut his hand. With a small shift of weight and body language, she continued, "My name is Persephone. And I can stop it."

Oh, she had definitely taken offense at being called 'Azazel's girl.' Enough so that it took Sam's brain a moment to catch the actual name she'd given.

"Persephone?" he echoed, gears starting to turn. The Greek Goddess of the Dead. And, undoubtedly, what she'd actually called herself that night in the bar when Sam had heard 'Stephanie' and the blonde-haired, blue-eyed woman had just smiled at him like he'd been on the wrong side of an inside joke. A detail that was so utterly unimportant right now (Sam blamed his spastic thoughts on the shock of everything that had – and was – happening (after all, he'd gotten himself stabbed, had a casual afternoon with Jess at the Stanford Library, Jess had been in danger, Jess had not been in danger because Jess wasn't real, Azazel's girl showed up in the middle of it all, and, oh yeah, he was also dying)). Then her next words registered and Sam shook his head, like he could somehow toss away the confusion and see this conversation clearly. "Wait, stop it? Stop what?"

"You, dying," Persephone explained as though it was obvious, more snark sneaking through.

Although… maybe it should have been obvious. Persephone, Greek Goddess of the Dead. But why would Azazel have a Greek deity tagging along for the sole purpose of bringing him back when what he'd wanted – needed – was Sam dead in the first place?

"Does my brother have anything to do with this?" Sam asked suddenly, voice low and cautious. Maybe even a little dangerous.

"We don't have a lot of time," Persephone sidestepped. "I can heal you, but only so long as-"

"Did my brother," Sam repeated, emphasizing every word, "make a deal for you to save me?"

The woman hesitated, eyes shuttering in distaste. She clearly didn't want to answer. Her jaw clenched and worked before she released it with a frustrated sigh. "Yes."

"Then no," the younger Winchester insisted immediately, shaking his head and backing away from Azazel's girl. "No. Take it back."

"I can't.". The goddess shrugged a single shoulder, though there was tension there that betrayed the indifference she was aiming for. Before Sam could ask why, she added, "Dean is already completing his end of the deal. Now I must complete mine."

"What end?" Sam regained the ground he'd forfeited, anger sparking in his chest. Dean had promised , damnit. But… this wasn't a crossroads demon standing in front of him. So what had he agreed to?

"To kill the demon that killed you," the woman answered easily enough. His distrust must have shown, however, because Persephone looked like she was trying very hard not to roll her eyes. She took a measured breath before explaining, "Seeing as Tom wants you dead for some reason, he's going to try to stop me from healing you. Your brother agreed to stop him first."

"And that's… it?" Sam didn't know if he believed it. Knew he didn't, actually. His gut didn't really think she was lying, but this… all of it was too easy. Too convenient. There had to be a catch.

“That’s it,” she confirmed with a nod. She still hadn’t moved any closer and a small bit – the tiniest bit – of Sam started to maybe just believe her. “Dean kills the demon and his part is done. Yours, however, is not.”

The hunter’s head snapped back up, gut sinking. There was always a catch. He clenched his jaw, hands curling into fists at his side once more. “My part?”

“You must agree to the Bind or It will kill you as surely as bleeding out is now.”

“The bind.” Sam needed to stop echoing everything she said. He needed his brain to catch up – he felt six steps behind this conversation – and he needed to start forming full sentences comprised of his own words, not just hers. “What is the… Bind?”

Well, he supposed, it wasn't just an echo or what she'd said…

“Souls are attached to the body by…” she paused, half raising a hand, fingers and thumb pinching together as though she was trying to grasp something. “What is the word? St-strings?” Persephone didn’t sound confident in her choice. She shook her head, annoyance leaking through again. “Nukirizi. Roots. Made of energy. They are not easily broken, although death does weaken them.”

“The detachment process,” Sam muttered, brain recalling the words she’d spoken earlier that he hadn’t understood at the time. Across the length of the study table, she nodded.

“Yes, a soul will start to separate when its body dies. But these roots are very powerful; even death does not break them all.”

Which explained why ghosts were usually attached to something they’d owned or couldn’t leave specific locations they were tied to. Sam’s brain was starting to churn at a familiar pace.

“There are only a handful of things that can,” Persephone continued, and Sam’s chest hitched as he finally realized where she was going with this.

“Reapers,” Sam breathed out and the goddess nodded. He couldn’t look away from those intense eyes, still locked on him.

“There are fewer still than can remake them.”

Sam realized what she was offering and wanted to run away every bit as much as he wanted to tell her yes. Do it. Get him back to his brother before Dean got himself killed or did something even dumber.

But it couldn't be that easy. He couldn't afford to be that gullible.

“You?” Sam hazarded, chest tight with the full weight of the conversation - a discussion about souls - that settled down in his gut like lead.

“Yes. It is called the Bind. I will form my own connections between your soul and your body. Once they are stable, I can then heal you.”

“Your own?” Sam's words sounded numb to his own ears, but his inner thoughts were on the express train towards panic. Souls weren’t things you let anyone go poking about. He’d only needed one childhood hunt of a rampaging crocotta to understand that.

As for the roots of energy she’d mentioned, what would it mean for her to replace that energy, his energy, his soul's energy, with her own? Because that sounded way too close to possession to Sam (or something even worse). Suspicion warred with fear and the younger Winchester could feel his pulse racing beneath his skin. There was a catch here. He knew it, he just hadn't figured out what it was, yet. What she was hinting at without saying in so many words. “What does that mean?”

“It means I will be the only one able to break those connections once they are formed,” she replied, eyeing him with caution. Sam realized, with a jolt of surprise and confusion, that she was trying to judge his reactions so she could act accordingly. She needed something from him. “If I replace the bindings of your soul, no reaper can ever claim you, Sam.”

The floor of the library dropped out from under Sam’s feet and he stared at the creature offering him… what was she offering him? It couldn’t be what he was thinking.

It couldn't be.

“What happens? When- when a soul can’t be reaped?” he asked breathlessly, afraid of the answer and not even sure what it could be. But it was better than the other question, which was just too ridiculous, too far-fetched, to ask out loud.

‘I’ll be… immortal ?’

“I heal you.” She speared him with a fierce look he couldn’t identify. “I find you and heal your body. It is my part in the Bind. One I intend to honor immediately once you say yes. Assuming you live long enough to say it, that is.”

There was no mistaking the snark now.

“What are the consequences of this?” Sam found himself asking anyway, heedless of her growing impatience. He needed answers. His hands were shaking and his brain spun and spun. There had to be consequences of not being able to die. He didn’t have any interest in immortality: never had. But what she was offering could be a way out of Dean’s demon deal. In fact, Sam was sure that was why Dean had agreed to it. If Sam couldn’t die, Hell lost its best leverage; Dean would never sell his soul. He’d never be their Righteous Man.

They could do this. They could hold out, together, and avert the end of the world.

If it was real. If it didn’t come with worse consequences than a demon deal. But what were the consequences of having an unknown creature mess around with his soul and then provide him with some ambiguous version of immortality?

Because there were definitely consequences to that insane scenario. There had to be, she just wasn’t telling them to him..

“Sam.” Persephone’s voice dropped in volume and tone, softer and more sympathetic. Sam’s head snapped back up only to find the woman directly in front of him. Shit , when had she even moved? “We are out of time for talking. You need to say yes.”

“What do you get out of it?”

Persephone blinked at the blunt and breathless question. “What?”

“You said this came at no cost.” Sam continued, taking a step away from her. He crossed his arms over his chest, feeling defensive. She was being evasive and this was no small thing they were discussing. He needed answers , whether he was out of time or not. He wasn’t agreeing to- to… whatever this was without knowing what it was first, damnit. “That all Dean had to do was kill a demon, all I have to do is say yes and- and-“ apparently never die, “-end of deal. If that’s true, then what’s in it for you?”

She watched him, eyes wary, and he realized she was trying to figure out what he wanted. It shouldn't be that hard, he thought. He wanted the truth.

"... Azazel didn't want me to," she finally answered and it was not what Sam had been expecting.

His sharp frown said as much, arms uncrossing in his surprise. "What?"

"He would not let me create the Bind." Persephone hesitated, mouth forming around words that she hadn't planned to say and was now questioning whether she should. After a moment – of what Sam was sure was frustration flashing across her features – she continued, "Azazel wanted a deal: my freedom for the Bind. But then he made me wait."

Staring down at the diminutive woman from his vision – the one he remembered being so full of bitter rage she'd all but burned with it – Sam got the impression Persephone would be pacing if she wasn't so close to him. Some of that anger was very much visible now, but it was backed by something else, too. He just wasn't sure what, and that worried him.

"There's no reason to delay a binding; they are usually done on infants, Sam, not full-grown adults. Every day you delay the Bind, you risk injury and death that could have otherwise been prevented."

"But Azazel ne- wanted me dead." Sam stumbled mid-sentence, deciding at the last second to keep what he knew of Azazel's plans to himself. Instead, he watched Persephone closely for any reaction. Did she know what Azazel's plan was? Did she know the end goal?

"Yes." Persephone shrugged, as though it was a simple thing, wanting someone dead. Just another Tuesday. "But Azazel is not here now. Your brother will kill his hell spawn, you will live, and I get to walk away from all of this, free. As a bonus, I will have messed up whatever that yellow-eyed shabarra had planned. As far as I am concerned, that is a win."

She sounded almost defensive about it, like Sam might somehow disagree.

If it was true. For all he knew, she could be an incredible actor.

"Sam." Her voice went soft again, drawing his focus away from his thoughts and back to her. She looked annoyed, but also trying to be understanding. “No more questions. It is time. Look around you.”

The hunter did, realizing for the first time that the world around them was quite literally fading. The library was growing dark, the far shelves of books had already faded into a void of nothingness, which was slowly creeping closer. It reminded him of being in his Dad’s dream, with the Baku. Instinctually, Sam knew he couldn’t go into that darkness.

That void was surrender. An End. Death.

Sam jerked his head to Jess, fear suddenly spiking in his chest. She studied on, oblivious to the way her edges were starting to blur towards the darkness. It would take her. It would take both of them, if he stayed. The thought of losing her, of letting her just disappear into nothingness caused a minor panic attack that Sam had to shove back down. She wasn’t real. She wasn’t real .

It was a mantra he repeated in his head until he could breathe through the primal fear.

“You are dying.” He slowly turned his gaze back to the goddess standing right in front of him, once more close. Too close. But there was nowhere left to go. “And if you don’t want to stay dead, you need to agree to the Bind right now.”

Persephone reached out with one hand, splaying it across his chest, and Sam suddenly found it hard to breathe There was something there , between her fingers. A warmth that tingled sharply from across his chest, and another behind his navel. They were like little spheres of heat and… tranquility.

Sam looked down, shocked (and definitely wary) to his chest glowing red beneath his shirt in those three, distinct spots. Persephone’s hand was splayed out between them all, rising and falling with his rapid breaths.

Their warmth was calming, and Sam realized how badly he wanted to listen to it.

‘It’s going to be okay ,’ they said. ‘You have nothing to fear .’

He shouldn’t listen, but oh, how he wanted to. The promise that everything would be fine – that he could relax, stand down, breathe again – was just on the horizon. Hazel eyes met green, his skin tingled beneath her hand, and Persephone’s eyes started to glow.

“Say yes, Sam.”

He stared down at those glowing eyes, the ones from his vision. But there wasn’t anger in them right now. She was desperate, Sam realized. Her freedom depended on his cooperation.

‘I don’t think she’s lying ,’ he thought, the words surprising him in their confidence. Because there was still no way this wasn’t a trap. There just… wasn’t.

‘Well, ’ another voice added to his thoughts and it sounded a hell of a lot like Dean, ‘ If she is, at least we’ll have bought ourselves time to hunt the bitch down and kill her.’

A third voice, undeniably Bobby, called them all, ‘Idjits.’

Sam took a deep breath. Persephone was watching him, waiting on him, eyes flickering back and forth between his own. He saw the moment she spotted his answer before he vocalized it. The red glow between them grew brighter.

“Yes.”

End Chapter

Chapter End Notes

Author’s Notes: Oh my god, you guys. So I was editing this chapter Saturday night, fully expecting to post that evening, soon as I was done. I was halfway through the fight, Dean having lost the Colt and falling back on his boring, normal, useless gun, when I realized OH SHIIIIIIIT. I most definitely specified several chapters ago that Dean had devil-trap bullets in that gun [insert facepalm here]

I had to rewrite the whole fight scene [insert facepalm of epic proportions here]

Soooo, that’s why you didn’t get an update last night 😬 Also, apologies for any errors. I did the full edit, then the rewrite, and an edit of just the rewrite, but I’m not entirely sure I caught everything. But it’s late now and I have to go to bed!

Extra Special Thank You: To Artemis_101 for the brainstorm session today to fix the fight and Forestpelt for waking up to my frantic DM requesting she read the fixed fight at 11pm at night so I could feel better about it (and actually doing it, despite fighting sleep the whole time and telling me to (and I'm paraphrasing here because she's a nice person who doesn't swear at her friends like I do) fuck off when I insisted she go back to sleep)

Persephone: Okay, second oh my god, you guys. Fun story - this chapter and last week's were ones that I worried about for years. I knew pretty early on in the planning stages that I wanted to include Persephone as a character, but I was very nervous to integrate an OC so crucially into the plot. But you know what?!? I didn't even realize I was posting that chapter last week. It was hours before I thought about it and was stunned to find out I was no longer nervous. You all helped me feel positive and confident enough about my character that I was no longer worried about tying her into the plot.

Thank you so much for that, everyone! You are literally helping to build a writer over here

P.S.Persephone: for those still sitting there, confused or maybe a little grumbly because your love of Greek Mythology is not being respected… still don't fear Demeter is, hands down, my favorite Greek Goddess, so I wouldn't do her daughter dirty. Give me… one more chapter? And then it'll allllll make sense.

(The muse would like me to inform you that it will not make sense, a singular question will be answered with many additional questions.)

(And I would like you all to tell the Muse to shut the hell up, cuz she's the one who planned it in the first place.)

Cheers,
Silence

Chapter 134: Season 2: Chapter 100

Chapter Notes

Author's Notes: Aaaaaaaaaand it's official. Season 2 is 100 friggin chapters long. Unbelievable.

Chapter Warnings: We have got SO MUCH GOING ON this chapter! And it's a lengthy one, oh boy. I almost cut it in two and decided eh, I won't be mean this time.

Actual Chapter Warnings: Sad. There's sad ahead, guys. And then some anger, some confusion, some reveals, a little more sad, and finally we wrap with a vocabulary lesson that just ends in made up names because Dean doesn't do vocabulary lessons. At least, not willingly.

Actual Actual Chapter Warnings: Okay, but no, really, things are gonna get sad for half a second. Hopefully with some warning it doesn't hit too hard.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 100

Tom's lifeless body hit the ground – flashes of orange and white light streaking beneath his skin, illuminating his skeleton – as wind whipped up across the road, tugging at the hunters' clothes and hair with increasing strength. Sarge tucked his ears back against the sudden change in weather. He dropped his body low to the ground, army-crawling back to Andy. Bobby shielded his face from the growing hurricane force, Colt still in hand, as he tried to pinpoint the source. Dean, hunched against the increasing winds that whipped around them like a sudden cyclone, spun to his brother, who just so happened to be the source.

Azazel's girl was still straddling Sam. She had one hand spread across his chest, where the symbols she had drawn in blood were now glowing a brilliant, glittering red, and the other curled across his forehead. And she was kissing him.

If Dean had been the one with the Colt, he absolutely would have shot the bitch.

The red glow between the two flared. The wind died as abruptly as it had begun and the sudden silence made time feel slow, maybe even stopped altogether. Sam and Persephone, now free of the blood that had been splattered across chest and chin, were painted instead by the light shining between them. It was nothing short of magical – real money shot right there – and Dean just about chipped a tooth with how hard he was clenching his jaw.

Then the wind was back, this time pulling inward, directly towards the two as though their stupid connection was trying to suck the whole world in. Dean stumbled forward a step at the incredible force. He watched Bobby do the same. It was strong enough that the older Winchester found himself crouching down to minimize his own body acting as a sail.

And then it was gone, the abrupt calm and silence once again shocking in contrast. Dean lifted his head, already wondering, 'What next ?' when Sam shot upright with a huge, gasping breath.

Chapter Break

"It's time."

Andy ignored the lady next to him. It wasn't the first time she'd said it, after all. Instead, he kept staring at a heaving, breathing, Sam Winchester. Andy couldn't look away. Sam was okay. Sam was okay. Andy could have just about cried, if ghosts could cry. Could ghosts cry? Well, this ghost felt like crying. He wiped at his eyes, just in case.

"Andy."

The kid sighed and glanced sidelong at the dark haired woman standing beside him, watching Andy instead of the actual miracle happening five feet in front of them. "Five more minutes?"

There was a smile in the crook of her mouth and amusement twinkling in her eyes even as she said, “You’ve had plenty of minutes, already.”

Andy Gallagher sighed again, louder this time, turning back to his brothers as their lives continued on. “You sure I can’t talk to them?”

Tessa, as she’d introduced herself, shook her head. The smirk only grew. She reminded Andy of this teacher he’d had once, in elementary school. “As sure as I was the last three times you asked.”

The sigh became downright dramatic, and Andy uncrossed one arm to gesture emphatically at the group. “But they’re gonna blame themselves and I-”

A hand landed softly on his shoulder and Andy reluctantly turned to the reaper who, annoyingly, had some very convincing arguments. Andy didn’t want to be convinced, right now. He just wanted to watch his family for a little longer.

“It’s not your fight anymore,” Tessa reasoned, her words kind even if the topic wasn’t so much. She’d been saying a lot of things like that since Andy had followed Sam out of the Morton House only to find her waiting for him at the bottom of the steps. That he could rest now, could finally be at peace, let go of the tension holding all of his muscles and nerves hostage like a medieval vice. Not her words, exactly, but… Andy was a good paraphraser.

“I just want to tell them it’s okay,” he said, looking back to the living. Because now, everything would be. Sam was alive and Dean was hugging him like he very nearly hadn’t been. Bobby was (mostly) unharmed from the fight, watching the brothers like a soldier who wasn’t convinced the battle had been won. And then there was Sarge, still sitting on top of him, chin flat against an unmoving chest, determined to win the Saddest Dog On The Planet award (and oh, would you look at that, ghosts could, in fact, cry). “That I’m okay.”

“Are you?”

He dragged his gaze away from his family – trying to burn them into his memory so he’d never forget – and back to the reaper. There was something cold about her, something not quite emotional enough to be human, but she was nice, nonetheless. Andy kinda liked her. Tessa was the straightforward type, and he could appreciate that in a conversation about death.

“Yeah,” he confirmed with a goofy smile. “Yeah, I’m okay with this.”

Sam was going to be alright, Dean shouldn't do anything too terribly stupid going forward, and Bobby would keep an eye on them both. Andy's part in this story could end, like Tessa had been saying. They'd be okay from here on out without him.

Meanwhile, Tracy was waiting for him, if what Dean said about the afterlife was true. Along with a whole bunch of really good memories, a solid half of which would feature the people he was now leaving behind. He couldn't stay with them, but he'd at least get to be with them upstairs.

Assuming he got into Heaven, of course. Tessa was being a tight-lipped tease about the whole process, but Andy liked to think if he was going the other way, he should have at least gotten to see a Hellhound. Dean said they were nasty buggers and Andy could admit to a morbid curiosity there.

Besides, he knew he hadn't always been good, but overall… Andy glanced over his shoulder one more time at the brothers, at Bobby and his dog, the people who would mourn him.

Overall, he liked to think he'd done good.

"Alright, let's do this," he announced, holding his hand out to Tessa like a six year old him had once done with the elementary school teacher she absolutely reminded him of. "Take me to your leader!"

The smirk was back, along with a headshake (which Andy counted as a solid win), but she reached out and took his hand. A peaceful, pure white light enveloped him and Andy closed his eyes and let it.

Chapter Break

Sam's abrupt change from lifeless to bolting upright in the timespan of a single blink dislodged Azazel's girl from atop the younger Winchester. She ended up in a half crouch, half knocked-on-her-ass kneel beside Sam as he continued heaving like he'd just run a marathon, wide brown eyes locked on her intense blue.

"Sam!"

That mop of brown hair spun at his brother's cry, and Dean was at his side, pulling him into a fierce hug before the younger Winchester had fully recovered his breath. Or figured out what was going on.

“Dean?” he asked, confused and breathless, as he wrapped an arm around his brother in return. Over his shoulder, Sam stared in shock at the lifeless body that had housed a demon last time he’d been conscious. His gaze rose to Bobby, standing a dozen feet away, near the line of cars he vaguely remembered, though they had significantly more damage now. The older hunter gave him a relieved nod and Sam, realizing that the library dream had not been a dream at all and he had been dead or dying, nodded back, water pooling in his eyes.

Those tears, which he had kept at bay with a mix of bewilderment, lingering shock, and some willpower, tumbled down his cheeks when his eyes landed on Andy. He was still in the center of the road, lying lifelessly on his back. Sarge was crouched atop his unmoving body and Sam had no doubt the dog had protected him throughout the fight.

“Andy,” he sobbed, trying desperately to pull his grief back from the emotional ledge he was absolutely approaching.

“I know.” Dean’s arms tightened around him, his voice equally anguished and Sam was pretty sure his older brother was crying right alongside him. Dean pulled back, keeping a firm grip on Sam’s arms, as though he wasn’t convinced the kid would still be there if he let go. “I’m sorry, Sammy. I’m sorry I wasn’t there.”

Sam wiped at his face, gaze lingering on Andy, before he turned to Persephone, crouched on his other side with enough distance to be aware, if not respectful, of the tearful reunion. She looked different than she had in his dream. Her skin was pale, her hair blonde and her eyes blue. This was the woman from the bar. But blue or green, that intense stare was the same. It reminded Sam of Castiel, and that gave him hope.

“Can you heal him too?” he asked weakly, still wiping his cheeks.

Persephone did not move at first, just crouched there, staring at his pleading eyes full of unshed tears. Then she stood and, without a word, headed over to Andy’s body. Bobby raised the Colt as she approached, but Persephone ignored the hunter entirely.

“Bobby,” Sam called, shaking his head at his surrogate father. “Don’t.”

The older man looked reluctant as hell to lower the gun, but he trusted his kids. At least until this woman gave him even the slightest reason not to.

Persephone returned to a crouch, this time beside Andy. Sarge growled lowly at her but did not move as she reached out with an open palm, hovering as much over Andy's chest as she could with the dog sitting atop him. The three hunters waited in silence, each holding their breath, until she rose, lowering her hand. She met Sam's eyes with a slow shake of her head.

"He's gone," she confirmed. Beside her, Bobby's chin dropped to his chest and his soft swearing, muttered under his breath, drew Persephone's gaze to the older hunter.

"But… you brought me back," Sam tried again, struggling to his feet. Dean helped him up, but Sam waved him off once he had his footing. "Can't you bring him back, too? I-I can make a deal."

"Sam, no," Dean immediately hissed, already shaking his head, but it was more warning than outright disapproval. Not like he had a lot of room to talk, after all.

A muscle in Persephone's jaw twitched, but that was the only visible reaction she let slip. "It doesn't work that way."

Sammy looked so damn heartbroken but accepting, that Dean had to look away lest that dust that had gotten in his eyes (during the battle, obviously) cause any more of a physical reaction than he'd already had. The younger Winchester, head hanging, moved over to Andy's body, falling to his knees beside him. He reached out, bracing a hand on the boy's shoulder. His eyes slid closed as he prayed over his friend's- no, his brother's body.

Azazel's girl stepped back, removing herself from what was clearly a moment of mourning. Unwittingly, she had retreated closer to the older Winchester, who was regarding her with no small amount of distrust.

"So how does it work, huh?" Dean growled, keeping his voice low enough to stay between the two of them. Persephone wasn't so much next to him as she was closer to him than she was to Sam. Which made it the perfect time for a quiet little chat just between the two of them. "What the hell did you do to my brother?"

Sam might be grieving – and make no mistake, Dean would later, when he had time – but he wasn't much for prayer and remembrance. He was more the type to grab the nearest weapon and murderize the person responsible for his grief, then bring them back so he could murderize them again. Having already done that, at least to the extent that he could, it was time for the next best thing: answers.

Persephone's eyes slid to him, eyebrows raising in a way that Dean could only read as incredibly unimpressed. That, or bored.

Yeah? Well, screw her.

"I saved him," the mystery lady responded with an even, detached tone. But it didn't matter; Dean could hear the condescension. "As I promised I would."

Dean squared up; he turned fully towards her, shoulders back and chin raised. At his sides, his fingers curled into loose fists. Unlike Azazel's girl, he didn't hold back his anger. "And the kiss ?"

Her eyebrows twitched downward, not so much a frown as the thought of one. "What of it?"

What of it? The hunter scoffed. He leaned in towards her, going for threatening. She didn't seem to notice. "You know who seals a deal with a kiss? Demons."

He almost added, 'Christo,' at the end, just to see, even though he was already pretty sure she wasn't one. For one, Chest Cas was being oddly quiet, and he was never quiet this close to demons. As he was thinking of tacking it on just out of principle, Persephone frowned. For a brief moment, she looked genuinely confused. Then she just looked offended.

"I am not a demon," she replied clearly, enunciating each word with enough distaste (along with some bafflement as to why he would think she was one in the first place) that Dean chose to believe her. For now.

"Then what are you?"

"Persephone."

Both human and creature turned as one at Sam's voice, joining the conversation that was supposed to be quiet enough to leave him out of it (which had been unlikely to begin with. Any conversation that involved Dean Winchester and some amount of anger-slash-distrust-slash-confusion was not going to stay quiet.) The younger Winchester was back on his feet, though he had yet to leave Andy's side. He regarded his brother and his savior with a mix of wariness and awe, respectively.

A muscle in Dean's jaw started to twitch and he could already feel the toothache coming back.

"The Greek goddess of the dead," Sam clarified, like Dean didn't know his lore. Which, okay, fine, he didn't, but that wasn't the point.

The point was to hear it from Persephone because he was pretty sure Sam was wrong. But as Dean stared pointedly at the woman, she remained silent. Her eyes stayed locked on Sam and Dean did not know what it was about this chick, but he did not like her. And he trusted his gut when it came to this stuff.

"That true?" he challenged loudly, still staring directly at her. Her gaze slid his way and oh, yeah, he really, really didn't like this woman.

"Is there a reason it wouldn't be?" she countered, conveniently not answering the question.

Sam, sensing the growing tension, took a step towards them. "Guys-"

"Sam," Dean interrupted before his kid brother could bring out the puppy eyes that were absolutely not appropriate for this setting. "Help Bobby get Andy in the truck."

The younger Winchester faltered, eyes drawn back to their fallen brother. Sam looked torn, both in action and emotion, as loss shadowed his face once again. But he turned back to his older brother, shoulders drawn back despite the grief that flooded his lanky frame.

"Dean-"

" Now, Sammy," the man from the future barked, pulling out John Winchester's command voice. Sam's entire manner hardened at that, and Dean knew he'd have to make some apologies later. But right now….

"Come on, Sam," Bobby muttered, coming up beside the taller hunter. "Let's take care of our own."

The younger Winchester practically deflated at that, grief winning the battle. He spared one warning look at Dean – the one that said 'At least don't kill her, alright?' – but turned towards the task of caring for his other brother. As Sam moved Sarge from his guard post with a soft hand, Bobby gestured to the older Winchester and Dean, having a feeling about what he wanted, took the several steps forward to meet him halfway.

"Chamber's empty," Bobby mumbled just under his breath as he passed his kid the Colt, keeping the gun between their bodies and out of sight. "But she don't know that."

Dean grinned at his surrogate father figure. "You're awesome, Bobby."

"I'll keep Sam distracted," the older hunter sidestepped the praise. "Can't promise how long that'll work."

Already, the younger Winchester was glancing over his shoulder at the three of them, eyes continuously sliding from his family over to Persephone in a way Dean did not like. It screamed curiosity, which, in Sam's hands, screamed trouble.

Bobby moved back over to Sam and Andy, settling a hand on the younger Winchester's shoulder and giving it a squeeze before the two got to work. Dean watched them lift Andy from the ground and begin the slow shuffle down the line of cars.

He stowed any and all feelings currently vying for his attention and instead turned back to their current (and therefore biggest) problem. Persephone was watching him: one part wary, two parts unimpressed.

"You going to give me a gun talk, now?" she asked, apropos of nothing.

Dean pulled his head back, momentarily taken aback. His nose wrinkled in confusion, and if Persephone did not already vehemently dislike this hunter, she might have found it cute. Luckily, she absolutely did not because she vehemently disliked this hunter.

"A what?"

"I don't imagine you'd kill me with a shovel when you have a gun right there," she explained, gesturing her head to the Colt, wrapped securely in his right hand.

"You don't kill the person with the shovel," Dean corrected automatically, before he realized how insane it was to be interrupting their current situation for a lesson on idioms. "You dig the grave you're going to put them into- why am I explaining this to you? What the hell are you?"

Persephone raised her eyebrows at him, though whether it was from the explanation, the rapid abandonment of said explanation, or the repeated question that had now been answered… at least twice, she believed. She was, however, oddly enjoying needling the man in front of her. She decided to stick with that.

"Not something that can be killed – or buried – with a shovel."

Oh, Dean was so done with this. He raised the Colt, leveling it her way, though he didn't draw back the hammer just yet. "How about a gun, then?"

Her eyes dropped to the weapon in his hand and stayed there for long enough that Dean seriously considered cocking it just to remind her of the situation – the perilous situation – that should warrant some urgency. The bare minimum of it, at least.

"That gun?" she finally asked, eyes sliding back up to the Winchester. "I honestly don't know. It would take quite some time to dig a grave with it, but I don't see how that would-"

Dean cocked the hammer.

"Yes, probably," Persephone conceded, changing tactics about as quickly as Dean had. She raised her hands in a slow, exasperated manner, until they were at shoulder level, palms turned out. Dean took it as the surrender it was and ignored the attitude.

"Good. So, now you're going to tell me what the hell you actually are, and I'll decide whether or not I'm going to 'probably' kill you." Dean kept the gun steady, done playing games.

"Sam already told you. My name is Persephone," the woman answered, sass dropped for now and tone more serious. Her answer wasn't, though, and Dean scoffed, growing increasingly irritated but not surprised.

"Not what I asked."

Persephone regarded the hunter like a cat might a canary. Oh yeah,

Dean was definitely shooting her. Whether or not they figured out what she actually was, Dean was definitely shooting her. Then he'd figure out what would make the act a lot more permanent and use that.

That, or he was going to make more bullets for the Colt. Which had very recently been added to his to-do list, anyway.

But until then, shooting her with normal bullets would be cathartic.

"You don't know the Greek Pantheon?" she challenged, eyebrows raised once more. "As your brother said, I'm-"

"Yeah, I know. Since when do Greek goddesses, of the dead or otherwise," he pinned on derisively (he knew things. Even if those things were announced by Sam minutes earlier), "cast spells in Enochian ?"

Dean had seen the symbols she'd painted on his brother's chest (in the kid's blood, he might add, not at all green around the gills just thinking about it) and they sure as hell hadn't been Greek. The man from the future had first been shocked, then confused, and then furious to realize what they were written in (other than his brother's blood, thank you very much!)

Blue eyes (which didn't hold a candle to Cas's, by the way. Not that Dean was thinking about that, because he wasn't) widened in the first genuine expression he had seen out of this woman. Her arms, still raised in surrender, dropped to her sides. He'd stunned her snarky ass into silence. Well, good.

"So I'll ask again," Dean repeated, lifting the Colt ever so slightly for the very purpose of getting that gaze to shift to the gun that could 'probably' kill her. Which was total bullshit, in his opinion. He didn't know what she was, but she was no archangel. He thought. Was pretty sure. "What the hell are you?"

"Surprised," came the immediate response and Dean was pretty sure his forehead pulled a Sam and smoothed out completely.

But Persephone was surprised. Bewildered, actually. Even if Dean was psychic, as Chuck's writing indicated (though she had her doubts about that. She couldn't place what about it felt false, but there was something in the prophet's words that didn't seem right), his powers gave him the ability to predict the future, not read thoughts or languages. All of Chuck's writings on the matter indicated Dean Winchester's view was limited to the very near future.

She had no clue how that could have taught him the angelic language.

The mysterious 'Cas' that had shown up enigmatically in the prophet's works was looking more and more like an angel. One that she would be avoiding emphatically from now on.

"Lady, I won't ask a third time." Dean brought her attention back to the current situation. It was obvious from the way his hand continuously flexed and tensed on the handle of the gun that he very much wanted to shoot her. She wondered why he hadn't.

(To be honest, if he could have shot her, he probably would have.)

"It would be the fourth."

(Would beating someone to death with the Colt kill them? That should count, right? It was the gun that could kill anything. Surely that logic extended beyond just the bullets?)

"You an angel?" Dean bit out through clenched teeth, deciding to change tactics yet again. Despite staring down the barrel of her own death, this woman didn't seem particularly motivated to speak truthfully. Or on-topic. And without bullets, Dean didn't have many other methods of persuasion at his disposal.

" No."

The force and derision with which she'd immediately snapped that answer left Dean inclined, at least in part, to believe her. As well as curious as to what the hell Heaven had done to piss her off. It was clearly something, because whatever she was, she did not like angels.

"And we've already covered you're not a demon."

"Do my eyes look black to you?" she spat.

"You were working with 'em," Dean countered, even though he knew plenty of reasons – had even resorted to several of them himself – for teaming up with a demon. Not that any of them had ever been a good enough reason to justify what it cost in the end.

"By necessity only. I am not some… hell spawn." Persephone's lip curled into a snarl. Irritation was now obvious in every line of her body.

Well, look at that, Dean thought. Lady was an equalist. She apparently hated everyone on the playing field equally.

Her gaze shifted past Dean, to where Sam had gone, like she could change the topic by physically finding a different one. “Is there a reason we are not having this conversation with your brother? I already explained all this to him.”

“Yeah: I don’t trust you,” Dean answered immediately. That was an easy one. “You were working with Azazel, and Azazel wants my brother dead. So you don’t get to be anywhere near him.”

“I stopped that from happening!” she argued back, growing annoyed with this human’s circular dispute that was taking both of them absolutely nowhere. “Clearly, I’m not working with him.”

“And yet he’s the one that dug you up. You tricked Sam in that bar to get his blood-- oh yeah, I know all about that – and you were the one that called us and told us to go to Rivergrove. Which was a demon trap.”

Persephone actually quieted on that last one, looking away in what Dean would call guilt if he thought the creature was capable of it. “I didn’t know what was going to happen there.”

She’d read about it, later, through Chuck’s writing, and had been… admittedly horrified. She had never heard the term ‘Zombie’ before, and several YouTube clips later, she had never wanted to hear it again. That yellow-eyed bastardization-of-nature had proven to be a real monster. She should not have been as surprised as she was.

“Azazel was blackmailing me,” she added angrily, knowing that ignorance was a poor excuse, but the truth was only a single step up from it. Especially since, even if she had known what was waiting for the Winchesters in Oregon, she likely would have made the call regardless. That was the joy of blackmail; it didn’t leave you with much choice. “But sure, call it ‘working together,’ if you want.”

“Oh, I will,” the man from the future bit out, though he had the most annoying sensation that he was somehow losing an argument he had started and should have all the high ground in. “Because I don’t trust you.”

Persephone returned to being completely unimpressed with him.

“You said that already.”

“Well, I’m saying it again!” Dean bit back more words. How was this woman this annoying? It was like dealing with Crowley, only somehow worse. Dean hadn’t thought that was possible before now. And she’d gotten him off topic, again. He corrected his aim, which had definitely gone lax between all the yelling (physically and verbally), and trained the Colt on her once more. “Last chance. You cast spells in Enochian and seal deals with a kiss, but you’re not an angel or a demon. So what. The hell. Are you.”

The woman glared at the hunter, then the gun in his hand. She chewed on the inside of her cheek, looking sullenly off to the side and contemplating which sounded worse: telling Dean Winchester the truth or dying. Unfortunately, she’d told Chuck she would return on Monday, so it would be professionally irresponsible to choose death. Persephone sighed. It was the sound of someone utterly inconvenienced.

“I’m one of the Golmagenim.”

Dean stared. If he had been expecting a big revelation that meant something to him… that wasn’t it. “Never heard of ‘em.”

“Unsurprising,” Persephone started and, given her continued put upon attitude, Dean took it as an insult to his intelligence. He had a devastating retort ready on the tip of his tongue when she continued, “You’d need something a lot older than Google.”

Huh. She sounded genuine about that. The sentiment, not the Google comment. Every monster on Earth had been around longer than Google. Except Internet Trolls.

“Well, it’s a good thing I’ve got you here to explain it to me, then.” Dean glanced over his shoulder at the cars a couple dozen feet away. Bobby’s truck was last in the line. It was hard to see past two sets of headlights, but Dean could see the silhouette of his brother next to what he assumed was Bobby. The old man was making good on his promise of a distraction, whatever it was. Though Dean didn’t know how much longer any distraction could last, realistically. He turned back to Azazel’s girl. “So start talking. What the hell is a Gol…” Dean faltered, realizing the word had gone in one ear and right out the other. “Gol…magma…nin…ja and whose side are you on? Or I start shooting.”

He waved the Colt for emphasis and not, in any way, to distract from the fact that he had no idea how to pronounce what this woman was.

“Golmagen,” she corrected, emphasis on ‘goal’ and all soft vowels on the ‘mahgun’. “Golmagenim is already plural. It’s the ‘i-m’ at the end that-”

Dean lowered the Colt and used his other hand to release the hammer. Then he raised the gun once more and cocked it again, making sure to do it extra pointedly.

Persephone cleared her throat. “I’m on my own side.”

“Bullshit, everyone has a side in this.”

“I do: my own,” the woman ground out between clenched teeth, unsure how else to get through to this hunter that she wasn’t the threat, here. As she had demonstrated by saving Sam’s life.

“Look, Azazel broke me out of my own little Guantanamo Bay, alright? In exchange for my freedom, he wanted me to bind to Sam Winchester. I’ve done that.” She gestured widely with one arm in the direction Sam had taken, and Tom’s lifeless meatsuit with the other. “Now Azazel’s not here, his hell spawn is dead, and I’m free. I am, officially, on my own side. ”

She tossed both arms out to the side in as clear a ‘get it through your head’ gesture as Dean had ever seen. This woman absolutely knew Crowley. One way or another. She’d taken lessons from him, was his protégé or padawan or something. Dean was sure of it.

And then her words caught up with him, and he exploded: “What do you mean, bind to my brother?!”

Whatever Persephone replied with, it wasn’t English. Or Enochian. But Dean was certain it was rude. Especially with the way her hands curled into claws and she shook them in front of her like she was hoping to crush someone’s skull.

She dropped her arms with a world-weary noise of resignation and abruptly switched back to English. “You know what, go ahead and shoot me.”

“Dean?”

Creature and hunter turned as one. Sam was standing next to what remained of Tom’s shattered car. He eyed the two of them warily ( both of them, this time, which Dean found much more appropriate) before holding out his hand.

"I need your phone."

Dean pulled his head back, the hand not holding a gun on Persephone was tossed out in equal exasperation. "What's wrong with yours?"

Now Sam was the one looking entirely unimpressed with him, and Dean found himself switching between his brother and Persephone, eying them each like maybe one of them had coordinated the expression.

Sam hadn't moved, but Dean got the distinct impression of Soccer-Mom Samantha putting her hands on her hips. "If I had my phone on me, don't you think I'd have called you five hours ago when I woke up trapped in the Morton house?"

Alright, fair. That was a fair hit.

Sam's phone was in the Impala. Dean knew that because shortly after hanging up on Bobby at that gas station and then running a friggin' mile after Miss God Damn Magma-Ninja, he'd tried to call Sam once he was back in the car. Only to remember that it had been Sam's phone he'd been talking to Bobby on when it started ringing from his jacket pocket.

Dean dug his hand into his jeans and pulled out his cell. He tossed it to Sam, who caught and flipped it open in one move.

"Yeah, I was worried it'd be the same," Sam said, not dialing but instead staring at the device with resignation. Dean was frowning even as his brother held up his phone to reveal a black and shattered screen.

"What the hell?" the older Winchester said, dropping the arm holding the Colt and making his way over to Sam. He took the phone from his brother with his free hand, repeatedly pressing and holding the power button. Nothing happened. "It didn't get hit in the fight… at least I don't think it did."

"Bobby's is the same," Sam explained, and Dean's eyes snapped up to his. The younger Winchester shrugged. "We don't know what caused it. I'm assuming the same thing that did that."

He thumbed over his shoulder at the completely shattered windshield

– as in, no longer there and instead scattered across the front seats and floor – of the car Dean had come to a stop behind after his frantic drive here. The car the demon had come out of.

"The demon," Dean growled, eyes snapping to the empty meatsuit lying a dozen feet away. Sam followed his gaze while Dean started planning how to bring that bastard back from the dead so he could murderize him again and then dance on his grave.

His Baby better be okay, damnit.

He'd never seen an every-day-demon do that kind of damage before, but he remembered how the driver's side door of the car had blown off like debris from a bomb blast. The demon had exited immediately afterward. And Azazel's girl said that demon was one of Yellow Eyes' children, like Meg had been.

Dean glanced back over his shoulder at Persephone, who was regarding the two of them with a forced neutrality that betrayed her interest; she was clearly listening. Catching his stare, however, she remained utterly unhelpful and completely silent. Dean was coming to expect as much, though it was no less annoying. He turned back to Sam, pressing the Colt into his brother's hands. "Stay here. Watch her."

Sam's brow rose up and he looked down at the gun, over to Persephone, then back to his brother. "Why do I need to watch her? And why do I need a gun to do that?"

"Because we don't know shit about her," Dean growled, dropping his voice to keep the conversation between them. "Just make sure she doesn't leave. I want answers and she's crap at giving them."

Sam held the gun in a way that made it very clear he had little intention of using it and instead was about to use it as Exhibit A in the case of Sam vs. Why Dean is Always Wrong. Dean could already tell he was preparing his opening introductions, and it began with a Bitchface (#9).

"Did you try asking her?"

Dean's glare was a bitchface all its own and he bodily shoved past his brother. "Just do it, will you?"

He headed past the first car, realizing it wasn't just the windshield that had taken a hit. The driver's window was completely gone as well, the passenger's shattered but still intact, and the rear window was badly cracked.

Then he saw her.

"No, no, no, no, no!" he muttered frantically, running the rest of the way to his Lady, who had a large, deep cracking running the length of her windshield, from top left to bottom right. He ran his hands along her hood before assessing the damaged glass with gentle probes. "Oh, Baby. What did they do to you?"

He was going to resurrect that black-eyed bastard and roast him on a spit.

"Sorry. I would have warned you, but I thought you already knew," Sam said cautiously from his side, staring at the windshield of the Impala with an acceptable amount of sympathy. The Colt was still in his hand, though it was down by his side, being completely useless.

Dean stared at his brother then leaned around his gargantuan frame to see the empty road beyond. He couldn't see past the first car to where Persephone had last been standing, but she sure as shit wasn't within 'watching' distance.

"What the hell, Sam!" He went to swipe the gun back from his brother, but the jerk of a beanstalk took one big step back and Dean missed.

"She saved my life, Dean," the younger Winchester insisted, tone admonishing and a stern look on his face that Dean did not think appropriate in the slightest. He was not the one who should be getting a lecture here. He was not the one playing keep away with their magical-kill-anything gun. "She's not our prisoner. I asked her to stay, but if she wants to leave, that's her choice."

"God damnit, Sammy," Dean swore, physically torn between stomping back to the front of the cars where Azazel's girl was surely not, or giving up on that endeavor since it would obviously be a waste of time, no matter how cathartic stomping would be right now. Ultimately, he tugged open the driver's door, putting it pointedly between himself and his traitorous kid brother, before sliding into the front seat.

Dean leaned across to the passenger side and opened the glove compartment. Four phones tumbled out and the older Winchester scooped up the first one his hand found. Flipping it open revealed a shattered screen and the phone refused to power on no matter how hard Dean pressed the power button.

“Son of a bitch.”

He dug out two more, not even bothering with the last one when they yielded the same shattered, useless result as the first.

“What the hell is this?” he growled, throwing the phones back into the compartment and slamming it shut.

“Thought you said it was a demon,” Sam replied, having leaned down into the doorway so he could see the results of the phones as Dean went through them. Considering Bobby and Dean’s phones were both toast, he wasn’t entirely surprised to find these ones were as well, though he had been hoping otherwise.

“Never seen a demon do anything like that before,” he muttered, straightening back up.

It looked more like what an angel could do. Dean swung his legs out of the car, his brother taking a step back to give him more space, sticking close enough that his arm remained propped on top of the open door. From the driver’s seat, Dean cast a subtle look at the abandoned road around them, the stretches of tall grass and woods stretching into the distance. If an angel had been tossing power around out here in the middle of nowhere, they’d have noticed him for sure. So it must have been the demon.

“Dean’s phone the same?” Bobby’s voice came from the back of the Impala, and both Winchesters turned to see him walking up her side. He stopped next to Sam, eyebrows raised in question beneath his ballcap.

Dean was still staring down the length of the car, where Bobby had come from. His truck, where they’d put Andy. The thought of their kid brother, lifeless on the cold metal, had Dean turning away. He focused his eyes on the ground between his feet until he could trust them not to lose it.

“Yeah, same as yours,” Sam answered and Dean was thankful, even if he couldn’t admit it. “Dad’s too. And all our spares.”

“Balls.” Bobby huffed, pulling his cap off his head and running a hand through his hair. He resettled it and put his hands on his hips. “We oughta get going then.”

When both boys looked at him, Dean raising his eyes from the ground and Sam tilting his head in confusion, Bobby continued, “Ellen said she was on her way here and we got no way of telling her to turn around. Either we sit here on our asses till she shows up, or….”

Dean grimaced immediately at the thought of staying here any longer than they had to. They needed to get back to Bobby’s. Regroup. Figure out what the hell had just happened, and what it all meant Apocalypse-wise. Give Andy a proper funeral.

His eyes dropped straight back to the ground and damnit, they didn’t have time for this right now.

Bobby looked between his boys, one barely on his feet after the closest call any of them had had yet – a devil’s miracle if they’d ever seen one – and the other one so keyed up with emotional energy he didn’t want to acknowledge that he was going to pass out or start vibrating where he sat.

“We’ll find a payphone soon as we get to a town,” Bobby decided, using a tone that suggested it was a decision, not a suggestion. He got no pushback from either kid. “Call Ellen, meet up with her wherever she is.”

Dean nodded, climbing to his feet. Sam stepped back, arm sliding off the top of the door.

“What about Persephone?” the younger Winchester asked, head turned back down the road, where he’d left the goddess. He looked down at the Colt in his hand before tucking it into his waistband. Dean groaned.

“Seriously? She’s a threat, Sammy,” he hissed, gesturing with one hand to the gun his brother should be keeping at the ready. Sam just regarded him with another Bitchface (#7 this time), reading his brother easily.

“It’s not even loaded,” the beanstalk countered brattily, shoulders back and spine straight with moral superiority. At the older Winchester’s pulled-back expression (a Dean bitchface if ever there was one), Sam managed not to roll his eyes, but the desire slipped out in a fed-up, little brother sneer anyway. “I know the weight of a loaded gun, Dean, even a Paterson from the dawn of time. And she’s not a threat, she saved my life!”

“In exchange for a deal,” Dean argued back, conveniently leaving out the part where the woman had, actually, offered to do it for free first. He still didn't trust that, despite her actually holding up her end. Nothing in this life came for free. "Besides, she's new, and new is bad. Ruby saved your life once too. It's how she first got in your head!"

Sam's mouth snapped shut at that, putting an abrupt end to the multiple arguments he had prepared in her defense. Because… well, Dean could be right. At the very least, Sam couldn't prove he was wrong. They didn't know anything about Persephone, even if she had saved his life.

"Alright," he conceded, looking away from his brother and nodding. "You're right. We don't know much about her."

"Not enough to trust her, that's for sure," Bobby put in his two cents, watching his boys with wary eyes.

"But not enough to kill her, either," Sam argued one last time, unable to help himself. (He wasn't wrong about that. Of that much, he was sure.) He raised his hands in a gesture of peace when both men immediately opened their mouths to argue. "I'm not saying we trust her or keep her around. But she did save my life. So we're letting her go."

The silence after that statement stretched until Dean finally swore and looked away, body physically tense with the urge to stomp his feet like a toddler who didn't get his way. He turned back to his brother, glaring at him and raising a finger in warning.

"Fine, we let her go. But only because she saved your life," he added petulantly.

"And because we have no way of killing her," Bobby added most helpfully (more like muttered under his breath a little too loudly). Dean nodded, regardless, because he wasn't technically wrong.

"And Andy?"

Both Bobby and Dean turned sharply to the younger Winchester at that. His name alone was enough to reignite the loss, having been temporarily boxed up and hidden away so they could deal with the next crisis. The men both looked away, heads down, and neither said anything for a moment of grief and anger.

"We can't take him…" Sam swallowed back his next thought and tried a different route. “He deserves a funeral.”

“A real funeral,” Dean corrected waspishly. His glare was a challenge. “A hunter’s funeral.”

Sam was more than a little hurt that his own brother could have thought he meant anything else, but didn’t voice it. Tensions were high right now; they were all a little on edge, rubbed raw by loss. Sam didn’t feel right, himself – too calm, too functional for such a chaotic situation – and was pretty sure he’d just come back from the dead.

“We ain’t burning him here,” Bobby offered up, also in a less than amiable tone. His face was ruddy-red at the very idea of laying the kid to rest in this damned place.

Sam didn’t take it personally, only took a deep breath and nodded. He didn’t disagree, afterall. This was not Andy’s final resting place. If Sam had any say in the matter, there wouldn't be even a memory of the Morton House attached to Andy’s cremation.

“But we can’t take him across state lines,” Sam continued, adamant in a way that felt wrong in this place. Like he was arguing for the wrong side of things. When Dean looked confused and Bobby dubious, Sam tried to explain; “Bobby’s place is a long way to drive with a… with… uh, Andy in the… back.”

Dean was back to looking at the ground, the image of his kid brother on cold metal once more in his head, now beneath a flapping tarp. He felt sick to his stomach. Eventually he had to close his eyes against it just to make it go away and anger flooded his body like a hornet’s nest. It buzzed along his skin and left a flush of heat in its wake.

Suddenly he was angry at everything. This place, this fucking timeline that demanded prices they shouldn’t have to pay. Dean was angry with his anger. Angry with his grief. Angry with himself for being so taken by surprise by it.

They lost people all the time. Or, at least, they did where he came from. You said your goodbyes, you dealt, and you moved on. You had to if you wanted to survive.

But this time had softened him. Had made him vulnerable to the kind of loss he’d shut himself away from years ago.

Dean sniffed and looked back at his brother. He had to harden himself to this, right here, right now. There was a lot of loss coming if Time refused to let them have this, and he wouldn't survive it all if he let it hit each of 'em hit this hard. He had to get over this and deal with the problems at hand. He could cry over the kid later.

"We find a motel," he decided, checking with Bobby for agreement. "Phone or motel, whichever comes first, then we bunk down for the night. Get Ellen to come to us, and tomorrow we'll… tomorrow we give the kid a proper funeral. Somewhere not here."

Both Bobby and Sam agreed with that plan, nodding their consent tiredly.

"We have to take care of the Morton House," Sam said abruptly, head lifting as the thought occurred to him. He looked back the way they'd come – the way he and Andy had come – to the silhouette of a house against the treeline and a midnight sky.

Dean frowned, following his brother's gaze. It took a moment for him to realize what Sam was really getting at.

There were more bodies in there. Dean's eyes shuttered and he looked away. Of course. There had been other kids, not just Sam and Andy, and they were dead now, too. The older Winchester closed his eyes, reminded once more of what he'd failed to save his brother from. Again.

Sam was still staring at the house, looking like he didn't want to leave them, now that he remembered they were in there. That it wasn't just Andy they'd lost (that Sam couldn't save).

Bobby cleared his throat.

"We'll come back tomorrow. In the daylight, after Andy's funeral," the older hunter announced firmly. He could see the state of his kids; Bobby knew it wasn't an option for tonight. They didn't have it in them right now. His eyes drifted over to his truck against his will, and he snapped his gaze away from the kid lying in his truck bed. Truth be told, he didn't have it in him right now, either. "Take care of the bodies and finish the hunt. Or burn it to the ground."

Personally, Dean was all for that second option.

A motel was a good choice, he decided, nodding to the other two. Sam looked exhausted, and Dean wasn't feeling so fresh himself. They could rest, regroup, and tomorrow give Andy the funeral he deserved.

That he'd earned. Then, after Sam gave them a play-by-play so they knew exactly what to expect, they could come back and watch the Morton House burn.

That plan was plenty fine by Dean, who was good with the idea of getting the hell out of here as soon as possible. Sam nodded his agreement as well, the events of the night clearly catching up to him. The kid looked beat.

For plenty good reason, Dean thought around another lump in his throat.

"Come on," he announced, slapping Sam on the bicep with as much big-brother energy as he could muster. "Let's go get rid of your Goal-Magma girl. The non-violent, lame way."

He closed Baby's door and headed back up the line of cars. Sam followed after him.

"My what?"

"Don't worry about it," Dean muttered, deciding that was a conversation for another day. Probably the day after he figured out just what the hell a goal magma girl even was.

End Chapter

Chapter End Notes

Author's Notes:
Say whaaaaaaaaaaat? So much happening!! Sam survived, Dean's distrusting, Bobby's got his back, no one seems to have noticed a friggin' pair of angels lost their shit a hundred feet away (poor Cas), and Persephone's a what?!

The Legacy that is Andy Gallagher:
I know a lot of you were clinging to the last rays of hope that he might be brought back, but this is the physical end of his journey for now. When I set out to write him, I knew he was a character with a lot of unfulfilled potential, but I also knew the Battle Royale was as far as he could go in this story. Still, it sucked writing this chapter (the death itself wasn't hard, but this one made me cry. Friggin' Sam and his stupid puppy eyes and grief) so know that you're not alone in missing him. I have no regrets writing him so damn likable, but sheesh. Probably should have planned that out a little better to save us all some pain

Anyhoo, I have always valued character death in a story if it serves a purpose. Without stakes, a story doesn't carry tension and my favorite stories have always been the ones that jerk your heartstrings and emotions around real good (sorry, everybody). There's something cathartic about being able to feel so much for someone fictional. Just like a good TV show So, I'm definitely #SorryNotSorry for this one, but I felt the pain too.

(Ooh, ooh, there is a small ray of sunshine though!
Forestpelt
, who was not happy about the death either and has been stuck knowing it was coming for months, poked and prodded me towards a future plot idea that gives us Andy one last time)

Persephone is a What?! Just like Dean, you will need something more powerful than Google considering it is a creature of my own creation Her name really is Persephone, though (in her words, the one who named her thinks he's funny) and we have some great things planned!

A little history on Golmagenim: We will get to know more about what they are in future chapters (slowly, of course, because this is me we're talking about). Until then, I will say I came up with them years before I decided to write this story. I enjoy creating characters and creatures for all the shows and stories I watch/ read (it's like a hobby), but Persephone has always been among my favorites. So when I realized I could include her in this story, I was really excited (and incredibly nervous) I have dropped crumbs throughout the story as to what a Golmagen might be, and I am looking forward to theories if you have any! One reviewer got reeeeeal close a long time ago now. I hope you all are as excited as I am about this twist (okay, I may still be a liiiiiiittle nervous. Not much, though, and that's a big improvement compared to just one year ago)

Another Special Thanks to:
Forestpelt and Artemis_101 for giving this chapter a good edit for me. I've been struggling with a tension headache for four days now (ugh!) and couldn't get the edit done on my own. The eye strain is real So thank you both for helping me out so I could get this chapter up!

Hope everyone enjoyed! Please take a moment to comment if you can.

Update: 05/29/24 Sorry for the two week radio silence and disappearance! Turns out the Muse definitely thinks we've done the season finale and it's time for a well-deserved vacation . I suppose it's not her fault the show didn't end the season after the climatic death of Sam. Nope, they had to add a whole nother episode (which, as we all know, means no less than three chapters for us). Unfortunately with the Muse on unapproved leave, I am very, very low on my chapter stockpile. To add insult to injury (cuz why not, alliteration is such fun!) I had a medication mixup which has since been solved but holy crap am I still feeling side effects (mood related, anxiety-riddled, Muse-murdering side effects). So it may be a minute before I can update again. We'll get back to it soon Thanks for hanging in there with me!

Chapter 135: Season 2: Chapter 101

Chapter Notes

Author's Notes: Hey everyone! So sorry for dropping off the face of the earth for a bit. I had a medication mix up that resulted in an emotional roller coaster (I felt just like I did as a teenager 😒 It was terrifying 😱) I'm almost fully recovered and have resumed writing; the Muse absolutely fled when a) she decided we were done with the season finale, who cared about the final episode of season 2, we did the thing, now peace out! And b) she always flees anytime the roller coaster comes back around 😒.

Anyhoo, I have almost fully recovered and the muse is back with me. Only problem now is I have had a family emergency, so I'm at my moms' helping with recovery, support, and morale. Everyone is okay, though there's a lot of stress and more emotional roller-coastering, so I'm pretty wiped out most days. Writing may not happen this week, which means updates will be sporadic until life settles back down. Apologies, but more than anything, thank you for your understanding and patience!

Re-read Recommendation: Due to how long it's been since I last posted and the rapid-fire events of the season finale, I recommend re-reading last chapter if you have the time! If not: Persephone healed Sam, Dean called her out as definitely-not-the-Greek-goddess-of-the-dead, Cas tried to intervene but was whisked back to the apartment by an angry Gabe, Andy (sadly) did not survive the battle royale, and Tom (happily) didn't either.

Chapter Warnings: Let's see, what are we up to this chapter? Well… Persephone is apparently Irish when it comes to goodbyes, the Winchesters have a chat about promises, Dean tries not to keep secrets but Time (cough your author cough) is a bitch, so we spend lots of quarters making lots of phone calls. And when someone doesn't pick up like they should, our boys decide sleep is for the weak: a long distance drive on almost no sleep is totally for the strong.

Oh. And there's a talking dog.

Actual Chapter Warnings: Cliffhanger ahead

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 101

"And she's gone," Dean announced to a noticeably empty road lit by the headlights of the Impala and Bobby's truck. He looked at Sam with an unamused smile that was way too homicidal to be anything but a grimace. "Who here's surprised by that? Anyone?"

Sam wasn't, though he didn't rise to his insufferable brother's bait. He was too tired to even glare back.

"It was her choice, Dean," he replied wearily. The younger Winchester was a little disappointed, he could admit (at least to himself), but not surprised. Particularly not when his version of asking her to stay had been a softly-spoken, 'I'm gonna… follow my brother. We'll be back in a minute,' followed by a less than subtle glance towards the woods behind her and maybe even the slightest of nods towards said treeline that might have, perhaps, been his 'a-okay' to not be around when they got back.

So, no, not surprised. Just a little… disappointed.

"We needed answers, Sam," Dean countered angrily, though his anger wasn't aimed at Sam so much as Sam happened to be there while Dean was being angry. "And she was the only one who could give them."

"Maybe you should have asked for the specifics before making the deal?"

It was a low blow, one that made Dean physically wince, but Sam didn't regret it. Well, mostly.

"You were dying!" The older Winchester's cheeks were turning red, though from guilt at being called out or anger (at feeling guilty for being called out) was anyone's guess.

"And you promised," Sam replied without missing a beat. There wasn't much heat to it, though. Less of an accusation and more of a statement.

His brother froze before deflating like a balloon losing all its hot air.

“Yeah, I did,” Dean muttered, and he sounded so damn angry with himself that Sam realized he’d already forgiven him. “But that’s my fuckup to manage, alright? We don’t even know what she did to you and that’s not-”

“Yeah, we do,” Sam interrupted before his brother could rally a return of that righteous rage, misplaced as it was. At his brother’s wide-eyed, stunned expression, Sam sighed. He was exhausted and wanted to sleep off the whole nightmare. “She told me, Dean. I had to consent to the Bind before she could do it.”

“She did?” Dean echoed, sounding unsure and wary. “What… what did she do?”

“You two done yapping yet?” Bobby hollered from the front of his truck, where he had the driver’s door open. “Or would you like to spend another hour in this hellhole, braiding each other’s hair?”

“Yeah, yeah, we’re coming, Bobby!” Dean shouted back, the two Winchesters exchanging a knowing look. “We’re not done talking about this.”

“Of course we’re not,” Sam sighed in response, but he put his hands in his pockets, already resigned to finishing their conversation once they were in the Impala and back on the road.

Dean surveyed their surroundings one last time, looking at the woods around them with suspicion, before he turned his back on the whole place.

“Good riddance,” he growled as he stalked back to the Impala. “If we never see her again, it’s for the better.”

Sam couldn’t bring himself to agree, at least not about Persephone, but didn’t voice his opinion on the matter. That was a conversation for another day; it could get in line.

Chapter Break

For the second time that night, Persephone emerged from the trees onto an empty road and watched the Impala drive off into the night. Eyes locked on the rapidly disappearing car, she reached behind her back, stretching fingers upwards towards four circles of red spreading across her deep blue blazer.

Persephone withdrew her hand from the wounds identical to Sam Winchester's, staring at the blood coating her fingertips. She licked the tip of one pad, expression a myriad of distaste and consideration. Alongside the foul flavor she had already tasted in Sam Winchester's blood once before, there was now a familiar one as well.

The Bind had taken.

No hell spawn would successfully kill the boy again. Or anything else, for that matter. Whatever Azazel had planned for the Winchesters, it would no longer succeed.

Persephone turned her back to the country road and contemplated what remained of the car Tom had driven here. Despite the shattered windows, the engine was likely to work, given the other vehicles had driven away successfully after taking similar damage. Which meant she would need keys.

She marched towards the demon's empty meatsuit, sprawled in the middle of the road. Time to rifle through a dead man's pockets.

Lucky her.

Chapter Break

They drove in silence for the first twenty minutes. Sam was too tired to talk, consistently on the edge of nightmarish sleep with his head against the passenger window, where he would jerk back awake seconds later. It was like his brain knew what awaited him in the darkness and refused to let him succumb to it.

With every jolt back awake, Dean would glance at him from the driver's seat. But he hadn't asked (yet) and Sam kind of hoped he wouldn't. Not that he was ever that lucky – or Dean that willing to let shit go. But he could always hope.

Signs of civilization were beginning to crop up along the road when Dean finally broke the silence.

"I'm sorry," he said, apropos of nothing, and the unexpected choice of words was enough to wake Sam's exhausted brain up a bit. He turned wide eyes to his brother, eyebrows up. Dean kept his eyes on the road. "For making a deal when I promised I wouldn't."

Sam looked away from his brother and considered his words.

"You promised not to sell your soul and start the end of the world," he said eventually, after a long enough pause for Dean to get twitchy. The older Winchester's head turned his way, equally surprised, and Sam offered a weak, half-smile at the olive branch between them. "You didn't do that."

Dean seemed a little shell-shocked to have gotten out of a lecture so easily and Sam relished in the stunned silence. He was too tired to argue right now, anyway. Dean let a few seconds pass – like he was waiting for the other shoe to drop – before he glanced cautiously at Sam and asked, "You gonna tell me what I did do?"

"Made a deal with an unknown creature so she could save me in an unknown way that will definitely come back to bite us in the ass?"

Sam could practically hear his brother's teeth clench tighter and tighter with guilt as he went on. He certainly saw the same tension in Dean's white-knuckled grip on the steering wheel.

When he spoke, it was obvious how restrained the older man was trying to be. Regardless, the words still came out as a growl, but Sam could see Dean trying. "You wanna make all that a little more known, or you gonna keep rubbing it in?"

"Honestly?" Sam raised his eyebrows at Dean, who shot him one quick glare after another as he drove. "After all your, 'I'm from the future, I know best' preaching for the last year? I kind of want to keep rubbing it in."

The younger Winchester enjoyed the scandalous look his brother shot him. "I do not preach!"

"You totally preach," Sam countered with a laugh that felt good. Too good, really. It felt like ages since he'd had any reason to smile. He relaxed into the familiar comfort of the Impala's backrest, trying to keep the tension from returning with thoughts of why, exactly, that was. Of the precious cargo Bobby carried in the truck following behind. Sam kept his gaze on the windshield, his mirth quieting. "She said the connections that bind my soul to my body were deteriorating, and she could replace them."

Dean's attempts to watch his brother and drive the car were reminiscent of someone at a tennis match. But when Sam left it at that without adding more, he finally huffed out, "That's it?"

"Isn't that enough?" Sam countered, feeling fidgety but too tired to actually fidget. "She replaced the bindings of my soul with her own. That seems kind of… monumental, don't you think?"

As a man sitting with a sliver of angel grace wrapped up in his soul and a head full of knowledge about the lengths two people would go to save each other… no, not really. But Dean didn't want to say that aloud. If only to keep from jinxing their luck that this hadn't already bitten them in the ass.

He thought, instead, of what Persephone had called herself. A Golmag…men.

"And that's… that's everything?" Dean hedged, wondering if she had told his brother the truth about what she was (whatever the hell that was).

"Yeah, pretty much," Sam answered easily enough, rolling his shoulders in a lazy shrug. "She said I had to agree to the Bind or it would kill me and, uh… apparently she's the only thing that can do that, now."

Dean frowned, not following, but well aware that something important had just been said by the way Sam's voice dropped in volume and increased in speed.

"Do what, now?"

It was the younger Winchester's turn to clench his jaw and tapped a finger against his thigh. Not that Dean saw either thing. "She's the, uh… the only thing that can kill me now?"

His older brother managed not to swerve the car, but it was kind of a close thing. His head snapped to the side, staring at Sam with comically wide eyes that should really be on the road.

"What the hell does that mean?"

“Road, Dean. Watch the road!” Sam gripped the door handle as Dean looked back, only to realize they’d been drifting off the asphalt and into the shoulder, which was just a foot of extra cement before it dropped into a drainage ditch that ran parallel to the road. The Impala rocked as Dean swerved her back between the lines. The older Winchester kept his eyes on the road a little more after that, but it was obvious he was expecting an answer. Sam sighed.

“Look, I don’t really know. There wasn’t exactly time for details. But apparently not a lot of things in the universe can make those soul connections, and once she did…” Sam shrugged a little helplessly. “Now she’s the only one that can sever them. So if I die… I guess my soul just sits there, stuck in my body until she finds me and heals me again.”

At Dean’s horrified look, which started off with a slow head turn, then became a rapid snap back-and-forth between his brother (who he’d apparently sold into some sort of eternal death-slavery) and the road, Sam rubbed at his forehead and the headache there that was growing in intensity.

“It’s apparently her part of the Bind,” he tried to add reassuringly, though Dean looked less than reassured. “She’s obligated to fulfill it.”

“Why does that not make me feel any better?” Dean growled lowly, focusing his attention on the road now. He wrung his fingers over the steering wheel, trying to find courage in Baby’s familiar leather. He needed to tell Sam the truth. At least, what he knew about it. “Look, there’s something you need to know. The symbols she was drawing on your chest-”

“She drew symbols on my chest?” Sam looked surprised to hear it. He remembered that red light that had glowed between them in his dream, emanating from his torso. Sam had thought they looked like symbols, but he hadn’t been able to see them clearly enough.

“Yeah, man. In your own blood, by the way,” Dean added, a dark look flitting across his face and Sam was once again glad he’d let Persephone leave. “They were-”

A horn honked behind them and Dean’s gaze snapped to the rear-view mirror, words cut off and forgotten. Bobby honked again, flashing his high beams before triggering his right turn signal. Both Winchester boys looked to the right, where they were passing a gas station. It looked closed – the very beginnings of dawn only just now starting to show on the horizon – but there was a payphone outside the building.

Dean swore, remembering rather suddenly why they'd been driving back towards civilization in the first place, and abruptly swung the wheel to the right. The impala careened into the gas station parking lot at a not-necessarily-safe speed, but it worked well enough. Bobby followed behind in a much more controlled, anticipated turn.

Chapter Break

Blue eyes were locked on him in a fierce, unwavering glare even as he dragged his sister's chair across the linoleum and back to the damn closet next to his front door. He yanked it open, immune to her dumb eyes, and tossed both angel and chair inside.

As four legs teetered then balanced and Castiel continued to glare, this time with jackets crowding either side of her stupid face. She was wrapped in a spanking new straightjacket, a gag (Gabriel thought he'd get at least some kind of reaction out of her when he'd pulled out the BDSM version, but his sister was apparently the biggest fun sucker to ever suck fun from the world, so he'd went with boring, old duct tape in the end), and steel chains, reinforced with inactive grace (and none of it coming in contact with her skin. He had learned his lesson, thank you very much). Despite all of that, she was still fuming.

Castiel didn't have any right to be fuming. He should be the one fuming!

"It's written in Dad damn stone, Castiel. Get that through your thick head!" He was fuming, Gabriel acknowledged, realizing his fingers were white-knuckled around the edge of the closet door. He focused his gaze back on his sister, trying to ignore the bubbling emotions, which felt close to overflowing. He frowned at Castiel so strongly that his whole forehead hurt. He ignored that too. "The Earth is toast. All of it, everything we love, it's gone in two years' time."

Unbidden, Gabriel's breath caught in his chest as the words left his mouth, as if he hadn't fully realized the reality of them, himself, until just then.

It didn't matter which side actually won; half the Earth would get torched in the battle and what was left would be eliminated by the victor. Either of them; Lucifer would wipe it all out of spite and Michael would bring all the humans to Heaven before terminating whatever was left. Everything on Earth that wasn't human or angel was as good as dead. Gabe's Pagan buddies (at least the ones he liked), Jack, Jörmungandr, the twins. Kali.

Gabriel's chest ached particularly hard for her. What they'd had had ended years ago now, but damn, it had been good.

He'd always kinda thought they'd find it again, one day.

"You need to forget about them," Gabriel said in warning, only it came out more like a whisper, a secret filled with mourning shared between just them. Castiel was watching him with very different eyes now, but Gabe refused to acknowledge it, looking away. "They're dead, Cassie. They always were."

Muffled words came through the tape across her mouth, and Gabriel gave her a look. He wasn't stupid. But the sounds repeated, steady and calm, and while she didn't look entirely happy, she didn't look like she wanted to piss him off, either. At least, not on purpose.

Gabe reached forward and tore the tape off.

"So are we," the littlest angel that could said imploringly. Gabriel blinked at her. "We're dead too, unless we pick a side and fight for it."

"Uh… obviously Heaven's, duh," Gabe dismissed with an eye roll. If Hell won, they were all dead. When he settled his gold eyes back on his sister, his face smoothed into something more serious. "But I'm not fighting. And neither are you. Not in that state."

Internally, Gabriel winced at the reminder – emotional and visual – of the damage Castiel had once again done to herself. But he wasn't exactly in the charitable, healing mood. Not at the moment. She'd live, anyway, and Gabe would reassess when he wasn't fuming.

"I'm not on board with this damn prize fight – I never have been – but it is going to happen, Cassie. We can ride it out here, but once it's done, you and me are going home. Whether we want to or not."

Because there'd be nowhere left to go. Which was more than he'd meant to say aloud, but if you'll graciously recall, he's fuming and entitled to it, so fuck off.

Jesus, one week with a single sibling and he was already awash with feelings.

“Not if we-”

“Enough,” Gabriel cut his sister off with a shake of his head. He waved his hand and the tape snapped back into place, sealing her words inside. The glare was back. “I’m done talking about this with you.”

He shut the door (not quite a slam, but maybe still a bit of a temper tantrum move) and turned away. Castiel was ruining everything. Gabriel fisted his hands at his sides and stalked off into the apartment. Jack (who had apparently shifted back into a dog sometime while they were gone) was yipping at his heels, so the archangel scooped the pup into his arms and buried his face in the dog’s neck.

“Hey, good boy,” he mumbled against Jack’s fur, rubbing his nose in the softness. “Did you have a better day than daddy?”

“Considering no captives escaped during my watch and I can lord that over you for at least the next week?” Jack asked right back, pulling his long muzzle away from his father’s chest to give the angel a devastating side-eye crafted from centuries of opportunity.

“I’ll lock you in the closet with her,” Gabriel warned, nonplussed by the dog speaking perfectly clear English in his arms. He tucked Jack under his arm and headed for the Lazy Boy.

It was time for some mindless television and a lot of sinfully sweet alcohol.

“I had a most excellent day,” Jack amended, sniffing along Gabriel’s shoulder at all the grass-grass-beer-bottle-ooh-was-that-a-mouse-grass-grass-cigarette-butt now embedded in his jacket. His dad must have gone for a tussle in someone’s yard. Jack was a little jealous he hadn’t gotten to go with. “I licked my butt. A lot. It was great.”

“All the while in my favorite chair, no doubt.”

With a dramatic eye roll, the archangel collapsed into his favorite chair (which did have a suspicious damp spot, but Gabriel was pretending it didn't exist). Jack settled on his lap, little paws stretched to the edges of Gabe’s knees, eager eyes already locked on the TV. The dog didn’t bother with a response (the ‘of course’ was obvious and had been pretty much ever since sofas had been invented). Gabe stared in thought at the kid he'd made so many millennia ago (although he'd been a bit bigger at the time) even as the screen buzzed with life and a picture replaced its black surface.

Gabriel's eyes locked on Persephone, digging through the pockets of the dead demon sprawled in the middle of the road, before climbing to her feet and heading for a car. The Golmagen got in the vehicle, turned over the engine, and reversed (roughly) down the road away from the Morton House.

The archangel raised the remote but paused without pressing anything. Gold eyes dropped down to Jack again and he stared at the dog with a look of contemplation that bordered on sorrow. Gabriel took a deep breath and changed the channel.

Chapter Break

They called Ellen first. She should only be an hour or two out, at most, and she could meet them at the motel Sam was already searching for in the phonebook attached to the booth. Dean waited against the side of the Impala, leaning against his Baby with arms crossed over his chest and bruises starting to deepen beneath his eyes.

Not that any of them looked (or felt) much better.

Bobby hung up the receiver without a word uttered and Sam looked up, surprised. The old hunter shook his head, confusion and the beginnings of concern pulling at his brow. He glanced at Dean, who caught the look and immediately pushed off the car, crossing over to them in three strides. Bobby was already picking the phone up and inserting another couple quarters.

"Voicemail," he explained, though the look on his face suggested more cause for concern than just Ellen missing a phone call. Not that Dean blamed him. Shitshow that the day had turned into, of course they weren't done yet. "Let's try Ash."

The ex-MIT mullet-rocking tech genius didn't own a cell phone (because of course he didn't. Government can track you on those things, don't you know), so Bobby punched in his own landline.

Sam leaned in slightly as the tinny sound of ringing filled the booth. Payphones didn't have speaker options, so Dean had to make do watching the two as they shared the receiver between them. Which just kept ringing and ringing.

After well past when the sound should have switched over to voicemail, Bobby hung up once more. He pulled another two coins from his pocket and tried again.

"Bobby…"

But the old hunter ignored Sam, slipping the quarters into the slot and dialing once more. He tried the Police landline next, and the FBI one after that. The phone just kept ringing.

"Bobby," Sam tried again, sharing a look of concern with his brother that was returned. Dean was now leaning against the opening of the phone booth, thinking thoughts he didn't want to share about explosions and burned corpses. He swallowed roughly as Sam reached out and stopped Bobby from trying a fourth time. "I don't think any of the other lines are going to work either."

"Maybe the phones are down," Dean offered, aiming for confidence and hope, but missing by a mile if the look Bobby speared him with was any hint. Not that Dean had really believed the words himself. Their luck was never that good.

"Or the power," Sam offered, equally trying to be helpful and hopeful but falling short as well.

"And Ellen?" Bobby snapped, like he was already toeing the cliff's edge and couldn't handle another push. Sam looked to his brother for help, eyes. He'd not seen their surrogate father ever approach 'losing it' before. Sam had never really thought what that might look like, and he definitely didn't like what he was seeing now.

Not that Dean had seen it much, either, even with more years under his belt. Bobby was a rock – their rock – and always was.

"She could have left her cell with Ash," Dean tried again, digging through his brain for a safe reason why Ellen might not be able to answer her cell. Of course, the thought wasn't much comfort when followed up with 'And why isn't Ash answering?' but it was the best he could think of.

Truth was, his gut had tied itself into knots somewhere around the second phone call that had rung and rung, and those knots hadn't loosened since. The man from the future knew, even against all odds and everything he'd done to try and change the past (the present?), what that likely meant.

Death, fire, and the smell of burnt flesh.

"You said demons were after Ash." It wasn't a question, and Dean didn't bother answering, just nodded. Bobby adjusted his ball cap against his forehead and then pushed past his eldest, exiting the phone booth. "We're going."

Neither Winchester argued, despite their exhaustion, and followed the old hunter back towards their vehicles. Ash and Ronald could be in trouble and Ellen was missing. Of course they were going home.

Sam did, however, hesitate on the way back to the Impala. He looked over at Bobby, climbing into his truck. His hazel eyes shifted to the bed of the truck and the blue tarp stretched taut across it, hiding what rested below.

"What about Andy?" he asked, keeping his voice low enough Bobby wouldn't hear. He looked at Dean from across the roof of the Impala. "Dean, we can't drive all the way to South Dakota with a body."

Dean didn't answer immediately, his jaw clenched so tightly that the lower half of his face was turning white from blood loss. He switched to chewing on the inside of his cheek before giving a firm nod - coming to his own conclusion, then - and climbed into the Impala. Sam scrambled to follow suit.

"He's getting a proper funeral," was all Dean said as he started the engine. "Soon as we get back to the Salvage Yard and sort this out."

Sam didn't protest. After all, he didn't disagree with what Dean had actually said: Andy was worth the risk.

Chapter Break

Sam offered to ride with Bobby (an effort to provide the man with some company and comfort that was disguised as an offer to trade off drivers), but was turned down. Bobby opened his truck door, gave Sarge a shove to the passenger's side in order to climb in (but didn't argue when the dog settled in the middle seat instead, pressed against the old man's side), and shut the door on both brothers.

Sam looked at Dean with a level of helplessness his older brother hated, but couldn't do much about.

"They're going to be okay," Dean said through Bobby's rolled down window. He did his best to believe it, for Bobby if not for himself. Ellen would be okay. She had to be. She'd made it out last time.

Of course, that was before Dean had gone and changed things.

Bobby answered by pulling out, Dean taking a step back as the truck took off. He gave Sam a shrug – what else could they do? – and headed for the Impala. They had a long drive ahead of them, filled with hours of uncertainty and no answers.

"You should get some rest," Dean said to Sam as they climbed into the car. He started her up and pulled out after Bobby's truck, which was already a block down the road. Dean wasn't worried about getting separated. They knew the way home.

Sam mumbled something in agreement, all but sagging into the passenger seat, turned inwards a bit so he could wedge his body into the corner of the seat and door. He let his head fall against the cool glass, eyes slipping closed, and tried not to think about anything at all.

"Do you think we did it?" he asked quietly after several moments of silence in which Dean had definitely thought he was asleep. The micro-twitch the car gave side-to-side was enough for Sam to know his brother hadn't been expecting noise that he didn't make himself.

"Did what?"

Sam opened his eyes to the slowly lightening sky revealing an overcast, gray spring morning. "Stopped the Apocalypse."

Dean turned to look at Sam, his brother lifting his head off the glass to meet his eyes. The older Winchester opened his mouth, but nothing came out, and he had to turn away in order to drive. He licked his lips, brain churning, looking for an answer he didn't have.

"I don't know," he admitted, wincing at the slight crack in his voice. He swallowed roughly and reminded himself he had to harden back up if he was gonna make it through this. If the answer to Sam's question ended up being ' no.' "But you apparently can't die, and I didn't sell my soul, so… yeah. Maybe."

It was a hell of a hopeful 'maybe', but it was the first real goalpost they'd crossed since Dean arrived in this timeline.

Chapter Break

It was a long drive to Sioux Falls, filled mostly with the soft snores of first Sam, then Dean once the younger Winchester managed to talk him into swapping. They both offered to trade off with Bobby when they caught up to him at a gas station, all of them taking a minute to refuel cars and bodies alike. The old man declined with a single look and both Winchesters backed off, leaving him to it.

When they finally got to the Salvage Yard, it was immediately apparent something was wrong. There was a cop car parked at the front gate and crime scene tape stretched across the drive. One lone officer sat in the vehicle, looking about five minutes away from nodding off.

Dean and Sam exchanged looks as Bobby pulled his truck alongside the cop car. The officer shook himself more awake and exited the vehicle, leaning in towards Bobby's passenger window. Dean kept Baby idling behind the truck, unsure if they'd have to move fast. They were wanted men, after all, in a town that had been visited all too recently by the FBI. Sam wasn't doing much better, staring a little too intensely at the bed of the vehicle, where Andy's body was wrapped in a sheet beneath a stretched-taut tarp. Dean elbowed him as surreptitiously as possible.

They couldn't hear what was being discussed, but both hunters tensed as Bobby suddenly tore out of there, tires spinning up dirt and gravel as the truck launched itself forward, straight through the crime scene tape. The cop stumbled back from the suddenly-moving vehicle, one hand going for his gun, the other held up, fingers spread wide, as he yelled out a half-formed, shocked demand to stop the vehicle.

"What the hell?" Sam yelled even as Dean likewise swore and followed Bobby's lead. "Dean!"

"Take it up with Bobby!" Dean snapped back as he pressed the gas pedal to the floor, Baby spinning tires in her hasty pursuit of Bobby's truck. They flew past the cop who was now yelling into the radio clipped to his shoulder.

They raced through the Salvage yard, kicking up dirt and rock, but it didn't take long to realize what that cop had told Bobby that had resulted in a high-speed race to the house.

"Oh my god," Sam breathed out, shock stunting the volume of his words to little more than a whisper.

Bobby's truck came to a dead stop, a pillow of dirt surrounding the vehicle and Dean found himself slamming on the brakes to avoid crashing abruptly into the bed.

"Son of a bitch," he swore, both Winchesters immediately throwing open their doors and rushing out of the car. In front of them, Bobby did the same.

"Bobby!" Sam yelled, but the old man didn't seem to hear him. He was staring, slack-jawed, at what used to be his home.

There was nothing left. The house was ground zero for what could only have been a bomb going off. Little of the structure remained, and what did was charred and crumbling. Debris littered the ground around them, some of it marked with crime scene tags. Wood, glass, books burnt beyond recognition, pieces of identifiable furniture. The cars closest to where the house used to be were nothing but burnt out shells. The whole of the salvage yard would have looked more fitting in a war zone than outside Sioux Falls, South Dakota.

Dean looked at Sam, at a complete loss for words.

Bobby's house – and likely everyone who had been in it – was just… gone.

End Chapter

Chapter End Notes

Author's Notes: Say whaaaaaaaaaaat? That's right. I'm a no good dirty rotten author (and so is Time)

Posting Schedule: I'm not sure what schedule I will end up sticking to for posting over the next couple weeks. It really depends on how much writing I get done, which is up in the air. For now I will be reverting back to every two weeks - also because my chapter stockpile is hella low - but I'm really hoping to have some writing time in the next couple weeks too. Not writing is just a recipe for more not-writing! [throws hands up in the air] It's no good! So I'll do what I can to keep up production, but sadly I will need your patience once more as I wander away from weekly posts.

Thanks everyone and hope you enjoyed!

Cheers,
Silence

Chapter 136: Season 2: Chapter 102

Chapter Notes

Author's Notes:
Welcome back everyone! Apologies for the delay. I ended up with a family emergency and traveled to my Moms' to help out. Everyone's okay, though it was a stressful and emotionally exhausting time. My moms are the type who conveniently misplace all relationship-based communication skills in stressful situations and I'm the kind of person who just wants everyone to be happy (despite knowing that is not my responsibility). So needless to say I'm a little worn thin at the moment.

(Although, that being said, I am also very proud of myself. I set and respected my boundaries, I put the load down when I needed a break, and I clearly defined what was and wasn't my work to do/job to fix. Thank you, years of therapy!)

Now, on with the story!!

Chapter Warnings:
Bobby's house is gone, the boys go looking for anything that might have survived, Jody shows up and she is not pleased about the two new strangers in her town, and things get a little… locked up.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 102

Sam was the first to move. He walked up to Bobby's side, but the old hunter didn't seem to notice. He was staring at the remains of his house. The home he'd built a life in, shared that life with Karen, and converted to a hunter's sanctuary after he lost her. Bobby couldn't begin to comprehend the loss he was looking at. All the memories, the few comforts left to an old hunter, the knowledge and artifacts. All of it, burnt to ashes.

"Bobby," Sam started, voice soft as he reached out and placed his hand on the man's shoulder.

He startled at the contact, turning wide, watery eyes towards his kid. Bobby didn't have any words. Didn't even know where to begin.

Sam nodded, both in understanding and sympathy, and then walked into the remains of the house. Following his brother's lead (Sam always had been better with this stuff), Dean walked up to Bobby's side as well and offered the same hand on his shoulder.

"I'm…" He didn't even know what to say. Sorry? For getting your house blown up, for destroying your home and everything in it, for getting their friends killed?

God, Ash. He'd thought he was safe because Dean told him he would be. Instead he'd sent him straight to his death. And Ronald, killed again at the hands of something supernatural. Because he'd wanted to be involved, and Dean didn't have enough friggin' restraint to tell him no.

He hadn't changed anything. He'd just made it worse.

The man from the future was resolutely not thinking about Ellen. She was fine. She hadn't been in the house. She'd been headed for the road, headed their way.

It didn't matter that they hadn't crossed paths with her on their desperate flight back to Bobby's house. That didn't mean anything. They just took different routes, was all.

Time wanted to stay the same, and it hadn't taken her the first time. Not here, not now. So Ellen was fine .

Even if Ash and Ronald weren't.

Dean hung his head, unable to look at his surrogate father or the desolation of the man's home. The home he'd shared with the love of his life. The picture of her, the only one Dean had ever found, tucked away in a box in one of the upstairs bedroom closets. The blanket she'd quilted, the one that two little kids had huddled under together while dad was away fighting monsters. The kitchen, filled with the smell of pie – possibly the best damn pie Dean had ever had – and all the memories of the woman who had spent countless hours baking it.

Gone. Because of him. Because he thought he could change things.

Dean dropped his hand from Bobby's shoulder.

Sorry didn't even begin to cut it. The older Winchester shook his head and followed after Sam, looking for…. He wasn't sure what he was looking for. Anything salvageable. Evidence of what had happened. Hope that maybe, somehow, their friends had made it out.

Dean hadn't thought the demons would follow Ash to the Salvage Yard. It hadn't even occurred to him. The Roadhouse had been their target. Only that wasn't true, was it? It had always been Ash and his information they wanted dead and buried, not some hunters' hangout. Demons weren't going to stop because of a location change.

He should have known better.

"Damnit," he growled to himself as he walked through the remains of Bobby's den. Most of it was unrecognizable, now. Black and charred, as useless as it was lifeless. Sam looked over at him from a few feet away. He was standing in front of the door to the basement. Or, where it had once been. The two brothers shared an entirely different kind of mourning through that look.

Ellen had said Ash and Ronald were headed down to the panic room. If they'd been in there when the house went up…

Dean looked away. Well, they weren't likely to find any bodies anytime soon. Not without some heavy-duty digging equipment.

Noise to their left drew both Winchesters to Bobby, who had joined them in the remains. He bent down, picking up a book. Its cover was blackened with soot, singed and unreadable. Bobby stared at the cover for too long (too long for either brother to know what to say, or if they should say anything at all) before he gingerly cracked the book open. Ash and soot tumbled off the cover, sifting to the floor, but the inside of the book, while damaged, had survived a lot better than the outside.

Bobby tucked the tome under his arm with a silence neither brother knew what to do with. Sam turned away, leaving the man to his grief and however he chose to process it. Instead, he focused on the rubble surrounding them, looking for anything else leftover from Bobby's life that might be salvageable.

The younger Winchester tilted his head as something caught his eye. There was a wooden box a few feet from where Sam stood, almost completely buried in the blackened remains of Bobby's belongings. The younger Winchester only noticed it because unlike everything else around them, it wasn't dark with ash and soot. The wood grain and carvings on the surface stood out among the black and char, seemingly undamaged by the fire.

Sam crossed into the den, bending down to pull a box from the debris. Bobby tracked the kid's movement, coming over to join him as Sam dusted the thing off. It wasn't very big, only six inches long and half that across. It seemed to be a simple but well-crafted box with an elongated star carved into the wood (an Aquarian star, Sam's well-read mind supplied). It had taken no damage in the explosion, which in Bobby's house meant only one thing. Sam looked up at the old hunter, who was staring at it with some surprise.

"Protection spell?" he asked, wondering if whatever was inside the box was important to the man.

"Not mine." Bobby shook his head, still staring at the box but now with growing curiosity and maybe just a touch of apprehension.

"No friggin' way."

Both men turned towards Dean, who was standing a few feet away from them, staring at the box in Sam's hand in wide-eyed astonishment. Before either could ask him what was going on, the man from the future had crossed the distance between them. He took the box right out of Sam's hands, popped open the top of it, slid the side off, and twisted aside a panel underneath with surprising ease and a whole lot of familiarity. Sam had been expecting a more complex mechanism or magic to open it, given the protection spell alone suggested great importance.

Inside was a key, which Dean pulled right out, holding up to stare at in pure amazement. Sam wasn't sure he'd ever seen his brother look so shocked in his life. Or so delighted to be so shocked. A wide grin was spreading across his face.

"No friggin' way," he repeated, only this time with less disbelief and more unbridled hope. "Bobby, where did you-? How did you-?"

Bobby offered a helpless shrug, exchanging an equally confused look with Sam. "Found it in that Pinto you boys left."

Dean's brow pinched sharply. "Pinto?"

"The car you stole?" Bobby offered again, an unimpressed eyebrow joining his confusion. "To go have your little chat with God?"

Oh. Dean blinked. Right. He remembered that. Or, well, no, he didn't, because God had apparently wiped his memory of it (the son of a bitch). But that didn't explain how the god damn bunker key – an item that shouldn't even exist in the timeline yet – had somehow gotten into the stolen car-

Oh.

God.

"Son of a bitch!" Dean swore loudly even as a hazy, vague memory surfaced. 'I'm helping as much as I can, Dean.' He didn't recognize the voice, couldn't picture a face to go with it, but he knew who it was. His gaze shot up to the open sky above them and the time traveler angrily shouted, "Seriously?!"

"Dean." Sam finally got his brother's attention back and, exasperated, threw his arms out. "What is it?"

The grin on Dean's face was nothing short of 100-watt joy. Sam shared another uncertain look with Bobby, who appeared just as clueless.

"The key to the Batcave, Sammy."

Sirens broke the air around them before either Sam or Bobby could ask what the hell that meant. All three men turned, tension back up, as a cop car came screaming down the dirt drive towards them, two more behind it. Sarge started barking from the passenger window of Bobby's truck, and the old man headed out of the remains of his house, towards the flashing lights. The cars came to a hasty stop in a spread-out formation that blocked the men in against the remains of the house.

Sam and Dean exchanged nervous glances as several cops exited the vehicles, hands resting on their gun holsters. Dean hastily stuffed the Bunker key back into its box and tucked it in his jacket pocket before following the older hunter out, Sam beside him.

At the front of the group was Jody Mills, waiting for the three men to exit the damage. Dean had to work extra hard not to stare at one of his closest friends, unsure how he was going to pretend he didn't know her. Lucky for him, her gaze was locked on Bobby, a mix of anger and relief spread across her face.

"Bobby, where the hell have you been?" she began, glaring at him even if her words lacked any real heat. "You weren't answering your phone, we thought-"

Jody cut herself off, took a deep breath, and sighed, closing her eyes briefly and letting go of whatever it was they had thought. Bobby wasn't a corpse beneath the remains of his house. Which meant he just became her prime suspect. She opened her eyes again, switching over to the two men standing on either side of the old mechanic. They were easily recognizable, and Jody swore internally.

She had told him. She had told Bobby Singer what would happen if she saw the Winchesters in her town. And now they show up after a damn bomb had gone off at the Salvage Yard, casualties unknown?

Her hand shifted to her holster, unsnapping the security strap. Dean Winchester – the older of the two brothers if she recalled correctly – honed in on the movement immediately, but he didn't react otherwise.

"What happened?" Bobby asked, voice hoarse. Jody hid a wince. She felt for the man, really. It was clear from his expression – and the fact that he'd gone tearing past her deputy onto an active crime scene – that he hadn't known about the explosion. It didn't clear him as a suspect (a gut impression wasn't evidence, even if Jody trusted her gut with her life), but it went a long way in relaxing Jody's stance.

Her hand, however, stayed on her gun. Those were federal fugitives standing behind Bobby Singer and she wasn't stupid.

"We don't know," she answered, keeping her tone as neutral as possible. "Gas leak, maybe. We haven't been able to start an investigation. An excavator will be here tomorrow. Do you know if anyone was inside?"

They hadn't found any bodies during their preliminary search once the Fire Department had deemed it safe to enter. But Bobby's house had been two stories, and Jody knew there was some sort of basement, as well. They wouldn't be able to confirm or rule out casualties until they could search through and clear out all the debris.

Even as she asked it, praying for a negative from the owner of the property, her eyes scanned across the three men, over to Bobby's truck with Sarge in the front seat and the empty '67 Chevy beside it. Dread filled her stomach as Jody realized a familiar face was missing.

"Where's the kid?" Jody tensed, eyes snapping back to Bobby. Horror stretched across her face, waylaid only by the smallest hope that he just wasn't with them today. "Bobby, where's Andy?"

Sam couldn't help it. His eyes went to Bobby's truck, which was absolutely not the thing to do in front of cops. Luckily, between his grief and guilt-stricken expression, Bobby's look of heartbreak, and Dean averting his eyes completely, Jody's thoughts weren't on the truck.

But they were on the right track, even if she had the wrong cause, location, and motive.

Jody pulled her gun. All three men took a breath, raising their hands or taking a step back. Especially when the other two cops – one of whom was definitely the deputy that had tried to stop them from entering – followed suit.

"Did you two do this?" Jody asked harshly. Her eyes had a sheen of grief to them, but she kept it back valiantly. She had a job to do. One that maybe she should have done earlier. "Damn it, Bobby, I told you to keep them out of my town."

"Hey!" Dean's bark – loud, sharp, and commanding – drew all three guns to him and off of his brother and surrogate father. He was pissed at the accusation (pissed at a lot of things, really) and it helped him forget that he knew this woman. Helped him forget that she should but didn't know him back. He drew himself up under Jody's angry, accusatory glare. "Andy was family. And the people in that house were friends. They didn't deserve to go out like that. You think we would do this? You think we would let this happen? You don't know us."

It hurt like hell to say, but it was easier than he thought it would be. Anger made a lot of things easier for Dean.

"I know you're criminals, wanted by the FBI," Jody responded, gun still trained on the older Winchester. "Which means you're coming with me."

Bobby took a step forward, already opening his mouth to argue (one of the cops retraining his gun on the movement) but Dean grabbed him around the arm to hold him back.

"It's fine, we'll go," he said loudly enough for the Sheriff and her deputies to hear him clearly. Then, lower, he added, "Get to the bunker. Lebanon, Kansas; look for an abandoned power plant on the east side. Take the Colt and don't let it out of your sight."

He hadn't gotten into it with Sam on the drive because the Colt had been safely on his persons at the time and his brother needed sleep, but the next thing they had to do was stop the Fossil Butte Cemetery Hellgate from opening. Hell couldn't make that happen without the Colt, so their top priority was keeping it out of demonic hands. It would be safe in the bunker and then, just maybe, Dean could mean it when he told Sam they stopped the Apocalypse.

As he spoke, Dean passed both box and Colt discretely to Bobby, keeping the objects between their bodies, his own blocking the cops from seeing them. Bobby met his eyes, angry at first, then uncertain, before finally settling on grumpy acceptance. He nodded, items tucked safely out of view in his jacket, and Dean turned back around. He faced Jody Mills, hands up.

"My brother and I will go without a fight," he announced, loud and clear, as Sam diligently stepped up too. "But Bobby had nothing to do with this, so leave him out of it."

"He's not under arrest," Jody confirmed as her two deputies stepped forward to cuff the Winchesters. She kept her gun on them the entire time. "But we will need a statement for all this. So don't skip town."

The last part was directed at Bobby, who just crossed his arms and harrumphed. "Don't know where you think I'd go."

Jody looked less than convinced, leveling an eyebrow his way that said as much. But she grabbed Dean's cuffed hands and hauled him towards the back of one of the deputy's cars. Sam was escorted to the other.

The brothers locked eyes over the hoods of their respective cop cars before hands on their heads guided them into the interiors.

Chapter Break

Jody left the Winchesters in the care of her deputies once they got back to the station, no doubt off to call Special Agent Henriksen. The two officers escorted the brothers to a small block of cells behind the lobby, three in total. Each brother got his own spacious nine by four prison: lucky them.

The first cell was already occupied by a man sprawled across the bench, looking (and smelling) like he was sobering up from one hell of a bender. Dean actually recognized him, having met the man once before: Digger, the town drunk (according to Bobby). Dean, being the lucky winner of the middle cell (it had a window, long but no wider than a foot, running along the top of the wall), left Digger to it and leaned instead against the bars that separated him and his brother. Sam watched, calm and quiet, as the deputies locked his cell then turned and left for the main office just on the other side of the door.

"Look, mine comes with a view," Dean mouthed off immediately, gesturing with his head while waggling eyebrows at Sam. "I musta done something extra special."

The younger Winchester sent him a brief look (annoyed-little-brother in full swing, but not quite Bitchface levels yet). He didn't respond. Instead, Sam settled on his bench, sighing as he leaned his head back against the cinder block wall.

"Don't worry, Sammy. We'll be out of here in no time."

"That so?" Both Winchesters turned at the voice, Sam rising quickly to his feet once more as Jody strolled through the door. She kept one hand on her gun holster, the other on her hip as she came to a stop in front of them. "I'd like to know how you're planning on doing that."

"Ah." Dean offered a winning smile, neck tinged a little red. He felt like a teenager who'd been caught by his mom while talking about dirty mags or cigarettes. The time traveler tried to ignore that chastised feeling and pulled out the old Winchester charm instead. "You know a magician never reveals their secrets."

"Is that what you are?" Sheriff Mills countered with a raised eyebrow. "A magician, Dean Winchester?"

“Something like that,” he offered, though it came out more muttered and self-deprecating than he’d intended. Jody had that effect on him. He hadn’t had a mom for much of his life, but he imagined this is what it felt to let one down.

“And are we talking real magic or David Copperfield?” Both Winchesters tensed at that, straightening to attention in a way they didn't usually bother with around law enforcement. Jody tilted her head, hands still on her hips, and looked unimpressed. “Just want to know if I should be prepping for witches or a Tyrannosaurus Rex?”

Sam glanced nervously at Dean, who honestly had no clue how to respond to that. Jody had always been a witty one, but he honestly couldn’t tell if she was being serious or blowing off their so-called ‘beliefs’. No doubt Henriksen had given her the run-down last time he was in town.

“Hang on a minute,” he said instead, pushing off the bars and taking a few steps towards the front of the cell. Jody didn’t back away or tell him to back off, so he decided that was probably a good sign. He rested his handcuffed wrists on the door, leaning into them with as calm, non-aggressive body language as possible. “Are you on the level?”

Sheriff Mills just stared back at him, unwavering, giving nothing away. When she finally let out a world-weary sigh, it lifted up the hairs that framed her face, too short to stay tucked into her ponytail. “Andy might have said a few things.”

Sam was at the bars now too, puppy dog eyes wide. “ Said?”

Jody sent him a look and yup, definitely what it was like to be scolded by your mother. “Did I stutter?”

“Son of a bitch,” Dean said, though there was a smile across his face. And maybe it was a little sad at the corners, but so long as no one called him out on it, they’d be all good. He looked over at Sam, who didn’t seem to share his mirth, but acknowledged their lost friend with a quiet nod. Dean was still smiling as he shook his head and added, “That kid.”

“I’m sorry,” Sam offered, voice quiet and words sincere. Jody switched her gaze to him and he couldn’t quite meet her eye. “That’s a lot to take in.”

“Yeah, well… it wasn’t my first choice, but it’s done. So, answer the question." Two pairs of identically raised eyebrows – and jeez, they really were brothers – turned her way. Jody, unimpressed, clarified, "T-Rex or witches?"

Dean laughed and even Sam quirked his lips at that one. The older Winchester shook his head, shifting to lean his shoulder against the bars, this time the picture of casual. As if they weren't discussing all this through a jail cell. "Neither. Dinosaurs may be the only thing I haven't seen in this life, and witches are skeevy, fugly sons of bitches. We avoid them whenever possible."

Sam nodded from the other cell, though he seemed far less casual about this experience. Jody chalked it up to him being the younger brother, dragged into all this by the older. Henriksen had been very clear; they were both bad news. But he'd also emphasized that Dean was the more dangerous of the two.

"You won't get any trouble from us," Dean announced just then and darn if he didn't sound like he meant it. "We get out of here using unconventional means, you won't know it till we're already gone."

"And what, exactly, am I going to tell Agent Henriksen if you magically vanish from my holding cell?" Jody asked, still looking entirely unimpressed, but both hands were now on her hips, her gun left in its holster.

Dean still couldn't tell if she really believed them or if she was just playing along. It annoyed him more than it should. He could usually read Jody pretty well but, he supposed, that was a woman who trusted him. Who was a friend to him. This one wasn't and every reminder of that ached.

"The truth," Sam responded when Dean failed to.

The man from the future cleared his throat, looking away from the Sheriff so he could get himself together. When he turned back, it was with a rough smile. "Truth should do it. You've got no clue how we did it, you and your men did everything right, yada yada. He'll be pissed, yeah, but there's nothing Henriksen can do about it."

"You won't have done anything wrong," Sam added with a half-smile that was a lot more convincing than Dean's forced one.

Jody stared at them and the older Winchester immediately recognized her expression. That was Sheriff Mills, standing in front of a suspect expecting answers. It wasn't very far off from Mama Jody when one of the girls had done something stupid and she knew that, if she just waited them out, they'd fold under the weight of her judgmental silence.

It had always worked on Dean Winchester like a damn charm.

"You don't have to trust us," he said eventually, unable to help himself.

"Well, good, because I don't." Her words were sharp, clipped. Dean managed to hide the wince pretty well. Not well enough, given that Sam was side-eyeing him like he knew something was up. "But… Andy believed in you."

Now it was Sam's turn to look away, the grief still so fresh.

"And knowing what's out there…" Jody shifted, clearly uncomfortable with that topic, "maybe I'm a little more inclined to believe him."

Dean's eyebrows rose, surprised by that, though the Sheriff was quick to give him a raised eyebrow right back and a look that said 'don't take too much stock in it, kid, you're still a criminal.' But it was Sam, quiet at the bars, head tucked, hair hanging in his eyes, that spoke up.

"He saved my life." Both Sheriff and time-traveler turned to the younger Winchester. He was sniffing, trying to hide watery eyes even as he raised them back up to their current captor. "It was a ghost that got him. He died giving me a chance to escape."

Dean grit his teeth, turning away. Of course he had, the hunter thought. Sam hadn't shared much of the story on their drive. He hadn't been up for it, and Dean hadn't pushed. But that right there was a hundred percent Andy Gallagher. Dean was no less angry or grieving for his lack of surprise.

"He was a good kid," Jody replied softly, eyes downturned and arms dropping to her side. It was her own little moment of mourning for a boy she hadn't known all that well, but she'd seen that he was special. He should have gotten to live a full life. There would always be sorrow knowing that it hadn't worked out that way. Jody took a deep breath, centering her own grief to be processed later, and waited for both men to meet her eyes again. "You didn't blow up Bobby's house, did you."

It wasn't a question. Not really. Still, Dean immediately answered, “Never.”

“So what did?” Jody didn’t actually want to know. She was pretty damn certain of that. But if these criminals hadn’t, then, as Sheriff, she needed to know what had.

“Demons,” came the immediate response from the older brother and yup, she’d been right. She really hadn’t wanted to know.

“Of course,” Jody muttered, though it wasn’t so much skepticism as inevitability. Because yes, naturally. Demons, armed with rocket launchers, in South Dakota. Why was she even surprised anymore? “Look, between the explosion and the people you say we’ll find in the house… I can’t just walk away from this. Andy was a good kid, and he might have vouched for you-”

“We get it,” Dean interrupted before she could continue, which was great because Jody wasn’t entirely sure what she’d planned to say. “You’re just doing your job. The kid tell you anything else?”

She frowned, uncertain what the man was getting at. “Like what?”

“Like… psychics.”

Sam looked over at his brother, wary of where he was going with this and trying to get a hint out of him. But Dean kept his eyes on the Sheriff.

“I know he was one, but I didn’t ask for more and I don’t want to know,” the woman was quick to reply, hands back on her hips in Mama Sheriff Power Pose. She meant it, too. The little Andy had told her was plenty enough to turn her world upside down. She didn’t need it twisted about any further than it already was.

The older Winchester nodded at that, internally (and externally as well, though he thought he was hiding it better) hemming and hawing.

“Dean?” Sam asked, voice kept low. Of course the Sheriff would hear him, but whatever his brother was thinking, it was clearly bothering him. Sam just didn’t know what was going through his head. He had a feeling, though, that Dean knew this woman where he came from and Sam couldn’t help but wonder how.

His brother glanced over at him, the hesitation and uncertainty in his eyes looking damn close to heartbreak. Sam frowned. He’d seen that look, or similar enough to it, on and off for the last year. Dean knew Jody Mills well and was trying to decide whether or not to tell her something. Something about the future.

"If you had information," he started, looking away from his brother and back to the Sheriff. "Information you knew someone would want, even- even if it might not change anything…. Would you tell them?"

Jody was regarding the older Winchester very warily. "Where did you get this information?"

The bitter smile Dean shared with her was not reassuring. "I'm psychic."

The Sheriff continued to stare at the man from the future, completely unsure where he was going with this or if she should even be listening to him at all. Henriksen had warned her the Winchesters were incredibly successful con artists.

"What kind of information?"

Dean hesitated and Jody wanted to believe that he was just as unsure if he should be sharing this. But what if he was just that good an actor? When he spoke, he sounded damn torn about whatever it was, and Jody so very much wanted to think it was real.

"The possibly life saving kind."

Jody's gut clenched, probably with dread, she acknowledged, but tried to put aside.

"I want to make it perfectly clear," she said slowly, so no misunderstanding could be had between them. "I don't know you and I don't trust you."

The man in front of her flinched, which she didn't know what to make of, but when he recovered from whatever it had been, he nodded. "Smart."

He didn't even sound annoyed by it. Jody eyed him for a good long moment. "According to the FBI, you are one manipulative son of a bitch."

Dean actually laughed at that, startling his younger brother who shot him a look that very clearly asked, 'Are you crazy?' For some reason, it settled Jody's fears more than anything else.

She had no idea what to make of that, either.

If Henriksen was right and Andy wrong… these boys were more than master manipulators. They were unnaturally talented at it.

"I prefer charming," Dean said with a wide grin and a playful wink. Jody's mama-bear glare was a sight for sore eyes and he reveled in it. "But I hear you."

The sheriff gave it another several moments, observing the Winchesters while thinking it over, before she relented. Even though she was certain she didn't want to hear what he had to say… if it could save a life, it was her responsibility to hear it. With the barest of nods, Jody said, "Alright. Lay it on me."

"Take Owen to a doctor."

Dean wasted no time, wrapping his hands around the bars, trying to put every ounce of sincerity and urgency into his voice. There was every chance it would look as much a ploy as saying it with a straight face, but he didn't care. He had to try. For his friend.

"As soon as possible, Jody."

Whatever she had been expecting, that wasn't it. Jody did not react well – not that Dean had expected her to. Between losing most, if not all of the color in her face and fear then anger clouding brown eyes, her hand went to the top of her gun, hovering over it.

"You-"

Sam took a step away from the bars, clearly nervous at the Sheriff's reaction. He didn't know who Owen was, but he was important to her. Dean was playing a dangerous game, even if his intention was only to help.

"I know," Dean said, swallowing roughly. He looked damn near as hurting as Jody was angry, and he didn't get to look like that. Not about her son, God damnit. "And I'm sorry."

Jody hesitated, opening and closing her mouth, rage still clear in her face and body language. After a tense moment, she turned and left the cell block without another word.

Sam looked at Dean for an explanation.

“Leukemia,” his brother said softly, pulling away from the bars only to turn and lean his back against them. He wasn’t looking at his brother, gaze far off in another timeline. “He was four. She lost him long before we crossed paths.”

Still might, Dean thought, but tried to shove that back down. He didn’t know much about Owen, other than the couple of reminiscent stories Jody had shared with them. And he didn’t know shit about the things that killed normal people. Would catching it earlier do anything? Or just draw out the agony?

“You did a good thing.”

Dean raised his head in surprise, staring at his brother. Sam offered him a weak smile.

“Leukemia is treatable. A lot of kids survive it. If they catch it early enough…” He shrugged, like he knew it was only a place of hope he spoke from, but that was better than the other possibility. “Maybe he’ll survive this time.”

“That’d be awesome,” Dean admitted, thinking about Jody and how good a mom she’d been to Claire and Alex. But he wouldn’t get his hopes up. Time hadn’t been particularly forgiving of their meddling so far. Why would it give them this?

But Jody was good. She wasn’t like them; she wasn’t a part of this. She deserved to have this one thing, to keep her family. Maybe Time would finally agree.

“What did you say to Bobby?” Sam asked after several minutes of quiet in which both Winchesters settled into their respective cells. Sam was back on his bench, head tilted back against the cement wall behind him. Nothing about his body language spoke of hope – more like exhaustion and resignation – and Dean tried not to wince at seeing his younger, more innocent brother trussed up in chains for a second time now.

He really wasn’t doing a good job at this time-travel, change-it-all-to-protect-your-brother thing.

“When?” Dean, who’d decided the floor looked pretty good, ended up in the back corner, his shoulder against the bars that separated him from his brother.

“Just before we got arrested,” Sam clarified, though by his tone he clearly didn't think he should have to.

"Oh." Dean leaned his head against the wall, focused more on how they were going to get out of this place rather than the one waiting for them once they did escape. "Gave him the Colt and the key to the bunker, told him where to find it."

"Bunker?" Sam perked up on the bench, staring at his brother. He was becoming increasingly annoyed with Dean treating this like just another Tuesday. "Like the bunker from the Baku dream?"

Dean, who had turned his head at Sammy's surprise, smirked and went back to lounging against the wall. "That's the one."

"You said it was gone." Sam remembered the conversation from the dream. They had appeared somewhere underground and old, somewhere Sam had never been but Dean was familiar with. He had asked then, what the place was, and Dean had been surprisingly honest about it, and then surprisingly dejected when he'd also told him it was nowhere. That it was gone.

Maybe Dean had been talking about a future event that hadn't happened yet. Only, that's not how his brother had sounded at the time. It had been more like… mournful. Grieving the loss of a familiar place, like it was gone forever, even in this time. And the couple of times it had come up before Sam learned the truth of his time travel, well… Dean had clearly been missing it. It had been home.

Between that and his excitement when they found the box… Sam couldn't help but wonder why they hadn't gone to find the bunker sooner.

"It's on lockdown," Dean replied, like that explained everything. "Bigtime lockdown; no way through the warding."

Other than breaking it completely, but that was not something Dean wanted to do to the safest place on earth. Not with a potential Apocalypse around the corner.

"Except," Dean rolled his head over to look at his brother, grin wide across his face, "with that key you found."

Sam frowned. "Which just happened to be in a random, crappy Pinto you stole?"

“Yeah, not likely,” Dean snorted. “It’s not even supposed to exist right now. That key was taken by Henry Winchester in 1958 before he jumped through a time traveling closet.”

Sam’s eyes widened, then bugged entirely out of his head with what Dean said next.

“He was fleeing Abbadon.” Dean winced at even just the name back in his mouth. God, he hated that demonic bitch. He gave Sam a look that should convey just about everything he needed to know about that particular baddie. “Super badass Knight of Hell that we are going to hope to god we don’t meet this time around. Anyway, Henry ended up stumbling out of our motel closet in 2013. Scared the shit out of us. Friggin’ time travel, man.”

Ironic, he knew. Or maybe just hypocritical at this point.

“Wait. Wait, back up,” Sam couldn’t quite keep up with all the revelations. He looked caught between a nerd-gasm and strangling his brother for delivering vital – and what-the-actual-hell level information – like it was the weather report. “Henry Winchester. As in-”

“Our grandfather, yeah.” Dean closed his eyes again, the picture of relaxed. He wasn’t, of course, but the cameras trained on the jail cells didn’t need to see anything more than that. Not while he was secretly working on a way to get them out of this mess. “Dad’s dad.”

“The one who ran off one day and never came back?”

Sam sounded like he didn’t believe what he was hearing (which, fair). They’d heard nothing good about Henry before he’d shown up in their motel room that day. Dean remembered his own anger at the guy. Sam had been the one willing to at least listen. It had taken Dean a lot longer to come around.

The man from the future – talking about a man from the past who had traveled to the future, and how messed up was this getting – sent his brother an understanding look. “Now you know why.”

“Holy shit.”

Dean snorted again. “Yeah. He was a Men of Letters. Which makes us Legacies.”

He raised an invisible glass to his brother, offering a toast. Not that Sam knew what the Men of Letters – and therefore legacies – even were.

"Wow…" Sam looked stunned and maybe a little overwhelmed. He didn't know what to say. It was a hell of a lot of information to process – a big chunk of which he didn't understand. Sometimes, even though it drove him crazy, he got why Dean didn't tell him everything. It was a lot to take in on a good day.

And, since they were sitting in jail awaiting the FBI to take them to federal prison for the rest of their lives… it had not exactly been a good day.

"So wait…" Sam's brain, rapid firing through the new information, snagged on the first gap in Dean's tale. "How did the key end up in that Pinto if it was supposed to be literally lost in time until 2013?"

The silence was more telling than Dean's actual answer. But he did, eventually, spit it out.

"God."

"What?" Sam, damn near breathless, actually scooted to the edge of his seat, eyebrows up and eyes wide.

Dean wanted to roll his, but resisted. He knew Sam had faith, even if he didn't himself. Experience had taught Dean that if he couldn't respect it, he should keep his mouth shut about it. Things tended to go smoother that way.

"Yeah, I know," Dean muttered, aware that his tone was only, like, one step above an eye-roll. "But don't start thinking he's helping. He's not."

Sam huffed, working his jaw and probably going through the same thing Dean was. 'If you don't have anything nice to say…'

"Kinda seems like he is," was the nicest thing he could come up with.

Dean did roll his eyes then. "If he wanted to help, he'd keep his damn kids from starting the friggin' apocalypse!"

A groan from the third cell stopped both of them before they could get into it any further. They eyed the poor, drunken soul sobering up. He twitched, snorted something that sounded contagious, then rolled over and fell silent.

The two brothers followed suit, though neither seemed happy to settle back into their cells. Sam knew his brother had a bad habit of thinking in totalities. All or nothing, black or white. Either God fixed everything or God did nothing, and no action in between registered. But there was a lot of gray that existed in that area, and Sam believed in the little things.

He wasn't even sure it counted as 'belief' anymore. He had been staring at proof that afternoon: an aquarian star that he'd held in his hand. Given to them by God.

"We need to get out of here," Dean declared, a little too loudly and in a tone that definitely said, 'Moving on.'

Sam sniffed, stowing his thoughts on God and belief for another time. Dean was right, they needed to escape before the FBI arrived. Unlike the older Winchester, though, Sam already knew how they were going to do it.

"I've got a way," he said quietly. The cameras in either corner of the room didn't look like they recorded sound, but Sam didn't want to risk it. Not that it would matter in the end. He wasn't going to be able to hide what came next.

Dean turned to his brother expectantly, eyebrows up. At least until the sound of an incoming helicopter broke the silence, way too low to be just passing by. The older Winchester's eyes snapped to the featureless ceiling, some of his color draining.

"Son of a bitch," he muttered, climbing back to his feet. "I remember that sound."

Even Digger snorted awake as the noise of the chopper grew. It sounded like it was right above them and possibly setting down on the damn roof. Exchanging panicked looks with Sam, Dean climbed on top of the bolted-down bench until he could just barely see out of the narrow, rectangular window at the top of his cell.

"Son of a bitch," Dean repeated, louder this time, as he watched a helicopter land in the station parking lot. The figure that climbed out of the chopper was painfully familiar and utterly unsurprising, based on how the last forty-eight hours had gone for them.

Henriksen had arrived and the asshole was early.

End Chapter

Chapter End Notes

Author's Notes:
Aaaahahahaha! There is absolutely no rest for the wicked (well, except for me and the Muse. We've been doing a lot of resting. It's been great. Entirely unproductive, but great.)

That's actually not true. We've been very productive, just not with writing. We spent the last two days planning out all of Season 3!! Up until, like… erm… a couple months ago it was largely blank space waiting to be filled in. And up until… um, a day ago? It was all a jumbled mess of events with no particular timeline. But ohhhh haahahaha, I'm so excited. The muse came back with a friggin' bang. We're making alliances, forming no-strings-attached dalliances (<.< I know. What?! I swear it really works though), and guys. GUYS. There is actual Destiel planned. Like. Omg. It's on paper. By the end of Season 3, we'll have ACTUAL DESTIEL.

Jane Austen, hold my beer.

(No, wait, we already did that part)

Jane Austen, it's time to give me back my beer!

Okay ahem anyway. Hope you all enjoyed the chapter! I'm sure the boys getting arrested and the FBI showing up was probably not on the Season Finale Radar (*glares at the Muse, because we are supposed to be wrapping shit up, not making it more complicated!)

Also, #SorryNotSorry for taking out Ash and Ronald. At this point, I'm blaming it on Time. Some things have to stay the same and I can not keep every character alive or we'd never get anywhere. There's already too many to keep track of 😒

Update Schedule:
I am getting scary low on chapter stockpile because I haven't been writing, but I think all the season 3 planning is a good sign. I just really, really don't feel like dealing with Henriksen being an uptight, self-righteous ass at the moment. He's been a pain to write 😩 But the Muse and I will get through it! (mutters even if I have to strap her to a friggin' chair)

Cheers,
Silence

Chapter 137: Season 2: Chapter 103

Chapter Notes

Author Notes: Oof, so this chapter was something of a labor of love to get up. It was supposed to be posted last weekend. But I've been in a mood funk for two weeks, and I knew the likelihood of me getting it edited and up on my own was low, so I even reached out to my lovely group of editors working on the overhaul and asked them to proof it for me! And they did because they are wonderful people.

And then I didn't get it posted. Ugh. I want to say I'm the worst, but that's depression brain being a lying McLieFace.

Anyway, I had a whole extra week after that to read through the chapter myself, because the first half had been pretty rough - I ended up improving a lot of little things, so it's very likely the second half would need the same amount of nitpicking. Do ya think I did any of it all week long? Or Saturday? NOPE.

Ugh. THE. WORST. (No, I'm not. I'm struggling, and that's an okay thing to be, so deep breaths, grace and understanding, inner peace and zen, yada yada yada (no, not yada, yada, yada, mental health and making room for it is important , Silence. SHEESH))

Sigh. So here we are. It's midnight, I have a load of laundry going that is the only thing keeping me from sleeping (other than the insomnia that's been going for two weeks, yay! -_-) and a jam-packed day tomorrow. But come the end of the dryer cycle, this chapter will be up, whether I get through it or not. Cuz my editors did, and it is okay to lean on other people when you need the help.

[wanders off to check the washer, repeating that like a mantra]

Chapter Warnings: Henriksen's choosing between land and sea, Dean's getting fed up with his hot-shot fed attitude, Sam's pulling tricks (not like that), the boys are role-playing some Winnie the Pooh (still not like that), and Dean is a very calm older brother who is absolutely not freaking out. Oh, and Gabe's got someone he wants Cas to meet (this time it is absolutely like that)

Have fun! XD

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 103

The chopper blades were still whipping up wind in the parking lot, the engine not even powered down yet, when Henriksen stormed into the sheriff's station in a flurry. He was sans folders this time, instead carrying a black duffle bag slung over one shoulder. He was followed by the harried deputy who'd gone out to greet him (only to about-face a handful of feet out the front door as the agent swept right past him). A third man, dressed in a suit and looking like another fed, followed at a more sedate pace behind the other two.

Jody looked up from the front desk where she was currently standing, phone pressed to her ear. She nodded at the approaching men, wrapping up her call with a quick, "Thank you, Dr. Dwight. We'll see you Friday," before turning her full attention to the FBI agents. "Gentlemen."

"So, they showed, after all," Henriksen announced, apropos of any greeting.

"There was an explosion at the Salvage yard," Jody explained after the slightest hesitation. "We couldn't get a hold of Mr. Singer, but he, uh, he was apparently out of town. Showed up this morning with the Winchesters in tow. They seemed genuinely surprised to find the house gone."

She wasn't sure why she added the last part, other than it being the truth.

"Unlikely," Agent Henriksen snorted rudely. "They were involved."

Jody had to admit to herself then that she knew exactly why she'd said it, but instead of voicing any further opinion, the sheriff shrugged in response. It wasn't like the FBI agent would hear it if she did, and that was a can of worms she wanted nothing to do with.

"They in the holding cells?" Henriksen asked, pointing to the door over Jody's right shoulder. The sheriff nodded and, with no further words, Agent Henriksen headed for it.

Jody followed, trying (and only partially succeeding) to tap down her annoyance at a fed walking around her office like he owned the place. Two of her deputies – Kyle, who had 'escorted' the agents into the building, and Paul – the oldest and generally most level-headed of her men – followed her into the holding area behind the FBI agent. The third, yet-to-be-identified-or-introduced gentleman followed leisurely behind them.

When they entered the holding area, the Winchesters were already watching them, their expressions grim and wary. Dean was up once more up against the front bars while Sam remained a more cautious few feet back, by the bench. Jody didn't even spare Digger a glance, sobering up in his usual cell.

Henriksen, apparently, did. Dropping the bag from his shoulder (with a worrying heavy thud of metal that had the Winchesters exchanging glances), he turned to her deputy. "What's he in for?"

"Uh…" Kyle glanced at Jody for direction. She nodded her assent and her man straightened with renewed confidence. "Drunk and disorderly, sir."

"Right then." Henriksen nodded before holding out his hand. "Keys."

Kyle turned now-wide eyes towards the sheriff in complete uncertainty, but was already unclipping the keyring from his belt. He handed them to the agent, who made quick work of the lock, and then was inside and pestering her Drunk-And-Disorderly.

"Alright, up you go, sir," Henriksen was saying as he helped a stumbling, confused Digger to his feet. "It's your lucky day. You may go."

Even as the FBI agent gestured almost sarcastically toward the open cell door, Jody was straightening up, hand held out to stop her deputy from interfering. She placed herself in front of that door.

"Now wait one minute, Agent Henriksen." Jody spoke in a voice that booked no room for agreement. Her deputies had coined it her 'Mom' voice – and one of them was nearly old enough to be her father – with both a flattering level of awe and a real annoying amount of endearment. Didn't stop her from using it, of course. Or stop it from being incredibly effective. "This is my station, my men, my detainees."

Standing behind Digger, and therefore equally stuck in the cell, Agent Henriksen raised an eyebrow at the Sheriff.

"Now, I'm happy to make sure whatever needs doing gets done, but I can't do that if you don't communicate those needs to me." She had her hands on her hips now and, out of the corner of her eye, she could see Dean Winchester smirking. Jody sent a very brief look his way, which only resulted in the criminal trying – and failing – to lessen that grin.

Henriksen let out a huff of air – an admittedly amused scoff – but there was a touch of approval in the appraising look he gave the woman. "Alright, Sheriff. I need all other cells empty, the Winchesters together in one."

"Alright, then," Jody nodded, turning to the deputy on her left. "Paul, start processing Digger's paperwork. He can finish sobering up in my office 'til he's discharged."

Deputy Paul grabbed Digger by the upper arm and guided him, stumbling, out of the holding cells and back into the main room. Once that was done, Jody moved around Agent Henriksen's other man so she could approach the middle cell, pulling her keys from her belt. Within, the older Winchester was regarding her with strangely intense eyes. There was something about him – no doubt what Henriksen had warned her about – that was definitely unnerving. He looked at her like he knew her. For reasons she couldn't fathom – really didn't want to fathom – Jody felt like he did.

Jody furiously pushed aside thoughts of Owen that flooded to the surface. If this man was everything Andy Gallagher had claimed, then her son needed her. Which meant she needed to stay calm and collected. And if it turned out that Dean Winchester was just an amazing conman, one who had learned Owen's name so he could use her son against her…. Well, Jody still needed to stay calm and collected long enough to make sure Dean Winchester never saw the light of day through anything but barred windows ever again.

Standing outside the cell door, keys in hand, Jody gave him a look that Dean immediately (correctly) read as, 'You gonna give me trouble?' He knew that look, even if he'd seen it aimed at Alex and Claire more often than himself (or so he very much liked to think).

"Not you, ma'am," he answered the unvoiced question, polite as a peach with a smile to match.

Jody's expression morphed effortlessly into 'You'll shut the hell up if you know what's good for you.' He knew that one, too. That one he definitely got more often than Claire or Alex. Dean's smile turned positively winning before he exited his cell and willingly entered Sammy's. The door closed behind him, clanging loudly before locking shut with a click, and the Winchesters turned as one to the law enforcement watching them through the bars.

A loud jangling of metal drew their attention directly to Henriksen, who was pulling out a beyond-heavy-duty length of chain from the duffle bag he'd brought with him. The FBI Agent began weaving it through the bars and door, adding an extra layer of security the Winchesters had no chance of breaking through. He held up a lock, which looked like something designed to keep the friggin' Juggernaut at bay.

"Know what this is?" he asked casually as he looped the ends of the chain through the padlock's shackle and closed it with an ominous click. "The SS100 Squire padlock. Dual locking mechanism, twenty millimeter thick shackle, with a level 4 LPCB certification. In other words…"

Henriksen let the enormous padlock fall, clanging against the prison bars in a way that made all occupants – free and prisoner alike – jump.

"The most secure lock in the world." He held up a keyring, two keys dangling from the silver circle. He unhooked one, sliding it along the metal circle, before handing it over to the other man he'd come in with. "It takes two keys to open, gentlemen, and is entirely lock-pick resistant. Now, I'll be keeping one on my person and my partner, Agent Reidy, will be… relocating the other to a safe place."

Oddly enough, the show of containment didn't seem to impact either brother – though the younger was looking a little greener around the gills, Henriksen noted with some glee. Dean, however, didn't tense until he introduced Agent Reidy. His sudden stiffness and wary glance at the other agent caused Sam to tense as well.

Henriksen watched them with narrowed eyes, filing the information away for later.

"Well, that's definitely not legal," Sheriff Mills announced loudly, her eyes on the heavy chain and lock. She gave both agents a side-eye that could wither greater men. "And definitely a fire hazard."

“We’ll have them on the chopper and out of your hair soon as the transfer paperwork is all done,” Henriksen reassured her, as much as anything could. “Until then, I’m not taking any chances.”

Jody just sighed, resigned to the situation. If the Winchesters were the real deal – were the men Andy had spoken so highly about and Bobby had so strongly defended – she kind of doubted an additional lock – no matter how strong or advanced – was going to slow them down.

She honestly didn’t know how to feel about that. So, Sheriff Mills just nodded.

“I’ll get on that paperwork then.”

“Why doesn’t Agent Reidy go with you,” Henriksen offered, a wide smile still on his face that Jody could not exactly call reassuring. “He needs to call the Boss anyway.”

Reidy just nodded, already heading for the door, one of the two necessary keys for the Winchester’s escape still clutched in his hand. Jody just went along with it. The sooner this whole situation was no longer her responsibility, the better. She gestured for Kyle to follow, and the two headed out of the holding cell area behind the other FBI agent.

“So, guys.” Henriksen turned back to his prisoners, grin all teeth. The door closed to the holding cells, and it was just the three of them. “Been a while.”

Chapter Break

Light flooded over Castiel as the closet door finally opened. She looked up at her brother through a curtain of jackets, tape firmly in place across her mouth, and found herself torn between a glare (if she recalled, locking her in a closet had been a ‘dick move’ last time. What was his opinion on it this time, exactly?) and a plea not to be left in the closet again (as an angel, Castiel could be patient for untold lengths of time, but even this was pressing her limits). Gabriel sighed at the sight of her, reaching in and grabbing a leg of the chair so he could haul her out of the confines of coats and forgotten odds and ends.

“Not a word,” he instructed as he got her back into the living room, returning to shut the closet door. Castiel obliged (regardless of the gag, she did not intend to anger her brother further, seeing as it was unlikely to get her anywhere but back in the closet) as Gabriel trudged over to her. He threw himself into the Lazy Boy only to immediately scoot right back to the edge, facing her.

Castiel blinked as her brother grabbed the arms of her chair, rotating and pulling her closer until they were knee-to-knee. The angel of Thursday was unsure what Gabriel intended to do, but him reaching forward to spread a hand across her sternum, infusing her cracked and damaged grace with his own, was not what she expected.

They sat there like that for well over an hour: the archangel infusing his own grace into Castiel, slowly but steadily softening the sharp, shattered edges of her own and Castiel, in turn, regarding him silently. Gabriel focused solely on undoing the damage his sister’s temper tantrum had done, which had obliterated any healing that had been previously acheived. It was tedious, annoying work, in part because Gabriel was not the healer of the family, dammit (and was endlessly annoyed just to be reminded of family), but mostly… Gabe had never liked seeing any of his siblings hurt.

After eons of blessed silence and single-minded concentration, his patient finally made a noise. It was a soft plea, enough of one that the archangel finally looked up, meeting pleading blue eyes. With a sigh, Gabe pulled the tape from Castiel’s mouth.

“I swear to Dad, if you ask about the Winchesters-”

“What happened?”

Gabriel clenched his jaw, but didn’t pull away from his sister. Technically, she hadn’t asked about the Winchesters… though it was a loophole if he’d ever seen one (and he would know; he invented them). With a gigantic eye roll, Gabriel returned his attention to healing the damage his sister had done to herself.

“Sam’s alive, if that’s what you want to know,” he grumbled, still unsure exactly how he felt about how things had gone down. It sure as hell hadn’t been to plan, which he was pissed about. Written in Dad-damn stone . But throw two mule-headed humans, an angel that didn’t know when to quit, and a friggin’ Golmagen against that stone and apparently it crumpled like paper.

Not that it had proven anything yet. Gabe knew how stubborn Fate could be. How stubborn his family could be. The Winchesters hadn't stopped anything; they'd only delayed it – muddled the hell out of it – as far as Gabriel was concerned.

Still… he didn't appreciate his definition of ' written in stone' called into question.

His sister stiffened beneath his care and Gabriel could not help himself. He glanced right back up, meeting intense, fear-filled blue eyes. "And Dean?"

Those stupid eyes, Gabriel thought as he ducked his gaze back to Castiel's grace and chided himself for looking up in the first place. There was something about this stupid little angel that could. Pulling on all those heartstrings Gabe had been so very sure he'd severed centuries ago.

It didn't help that it was a human – and the Righteous Man at that – his sister was so damn caught up in.

The archangel's grumble was not so much audible as it was a physical presence in the room. The apartment darkened, the walls gave a little tremble.

He should kill Dean Winchester for ever getting his little sis's hopes up so damn high.

It was only further insulting, then, that his annoyance actually seemed to relax her. Castiel's fear lessened and the swirls of her grace resumed a slow, steady beat of movement. Like a human finally releasing a held breath.

Gabe was gonna find Dean Winchester and castrate him. That's what he was gonna do.

Later. Right now, he did his best to glare at the littlest angel that could. Cassie at least looked a little repentant. "Fully intact. Soul and all."

At least until Gabe got his hands on him. He was going to ruin the Winchester for so much as looking at his sister, let alone fucking with her mind so thoroughly that she was willing to almost kill herself for him.

The sheer relief that flooded across Castiel was obnoxious , and Gabriel decided it was well past time for a soda. He disentangled himself from her damaged grace, human fingers still tingling with the sheer, Dad-damn happiness that he'd been able to feel as though it was his own . Gabe shook his hand, checking for hives (he was allergic to emotions that weren't his own, thank you very much) and headed for a more-than-earned soda and a Benadryl.

Chapter Break

"You know what I'm trying to decide?" Henriksen was standing outside their little prison cell, pacing like he had a difficult decision on his mind. Dean felt only vaguely nauseous with déjà vu, which meant this was less something-to-be-afraid-of and more like gloating. He settled down on the little bench, Sam still standing beside him. Déjà vu induced nausea like this usually meant only one thing: a monologue. Henriksen confirmed it a moment later with a wide, smug smile. "What to have for dinner tonight. Steak or lobster."

Sam stared at the FBI agent like he had lost it, and Dean resisted the urge to mouth off, instead rolling his eyes towards the ceiling. He vaguely remembered a conversation similar to this, in another jail cell.

Which, when he finally placed it in the timeline of memories, did cause some color loss. The last time Henriksen had monologued, all smug from the other side of a set of bars, they'd been in the middle of a demonic siege.

That was the last time he'd seen the FBI agent alive, actually.

"What the hell," Henriksen was still going on, despite Dean suddenly being a stiff, colorless mess of 'please not again, Time wouldn't screw us over that badly, right?' and Sam was eyeing his brother with increased concern as well. "Surf and Turf. I got a lot to celebrate. I mean, after all, seeing you two in chains…"

"I wouldn't break out the lobster bib just yet," Sam muttered, a little too under his breath to be any real threat, but it was backtalk all the same. The FBI agent raised an eyebrow at him, and the younger Winchester met it with a glower. "You couldn't catch us at that bank, couldn't keep us in custody in Baltimore. You really think one more lock is going to change that?"

Dean actually turned to look up at his kid brother with some surprise and no short amount of encouragement. Sam? Mouthing off to Law Enforcement? Hell must have frozen over and Dean was happy to break out the winter coats and fur boots.

"How'd you do it?" Henriksen asked. For that singular moment, he sounded genuinely curious. At least, enough for that smug cloud of egotistical jackass hovering all over him to recede. "How'd you get out of that bank? Our boys said you got shot, Dean."

The last comment was directed at the older Winchester, who just smiled charmingly. "What can I say? Guess I got an angel watching over me."

Sam choked suddenly, drawing Victor's attention once more. The younger of the brothers cleared his throat several times, coughing through whatever had gone down the wrong pipe.

Henriksen frowned at them both, fairly certain he was the butt of a joke he hadn't heard.

"You're right, Sam. I screwed up. Underestimated you." Victor resumed the small pace along the length of their bars, that cloud of arrogance wrapped back around him like a security blanket. Dean rolled his eyes at its return. And he called them actors. "I didn't count on you being that smart. But now I'm ready."

Dean just snorted. "Ready to lose us again?"

"Ready like a court order to keep you in a supermaximum prison in Nevada till trial," Victor fired back, ready for them this time. "Ready like isolation in a soundproof, windowless cell, that – between you and me – is probably unconstitutional. How's that for ready?"

To his enjoyment, the younger Winchester was back to looking green around the gills, staring straight ahead and not at the agent. Dean looked pissed, but didn't have anything to say to that, apparently. Victor would happily take it as a win.

"Besides. I may not know how you got out of Milwaukee, but I know all about Baltimore. The lawyer? That was Andy Gallagher, right?" The FBI Agent did not miss the way the younger Winchester flinched or the color drained from the older's face. Dean looked away, not meeting his eyes, and Victor knew he'd found something vital with that hit. Now it was time to twist the knife. "Well, his little hypnosis trick won't get you out this time. I heard he's six feet under."

Dean was on his feet in an instant. "You shut your mouth."

Victor snorted. "Forgive me for not mourning a murderer."

"You son of a bitch." The older Winchester came right up to the bars and Henriksen just smirked. He would love nothing more than Dean giving him a reason to use a little excessive force.

"He wasn't a murderer." Both FBI agent and criminal turned at the soft declaration. Sam had sunk down onto the bench, staring at his cuffed hands in his lap. "He was a good kid."

Seconds ticked by before a sudden, loud clap had both brothers jumping. Henriksen slow-clapped two more times, shaking his head. "Wow. You two are good. Even I almost believe you. I can see why so many of your victims get duped."

Dean shoved off the bars with a snarl. "Fuck you."

"No," Victor immediately snapped, with enough ferocity that Dean Winchester blinked in surprise, staring at him. "See, that's not how this works, Dean. You're in there and I'm out here. You're the ones who are fucked."

"You are so full of crap," the older Winchester growled.

"Take a good look at your brother," Henriksen goaded right back, straight at Dean, as he nodded towards the younger Winchester. Sam was warily looking his way from the corner of his eye. "You two will never see each other again."

Dean adamantly refused to look at Sam – he kept his fierce glare on Victor – but the younger of the two was definitely a few shades the wrong color now.

"Aw," the FBI agent practically cooed, leaning into the bars. "Where's that smug smile, Dean? I want to see it."

'Go to hell ,' was on the tip of his tongue, but the man from the future bit it back. Henriksen had been through hell. Only hours after a situation very similar to this. And the worst part was, Dean knew that the guy who existed under the FBI agent exterior was a decent man. One worth saving.

So the older Winchester sighed and shook his head, biting back the anger and going for something… simpler, he supposed. "You got the wrong guys."

Henriksen just snorted, then outright laughed. The younger Winchester startled at the unexpected noise, staring at the agent with wide, hazel eyes. "Oh, yeah, I forgot. You fight monsters. Sorry, Dean. Truth is, your daddy brainwashed you with all that devil talk and no doubt touched you in a bad place."

Sam jolted to his feet, body going rigid with outrage, but Dean grabbed onto his flannel, holding him back from approaching the bars. When Sammy glanced at him, confused, he just shook his head.

"Not worth it," he mumbled beneath his breath. The younger Winchester just stared. Dean wouldn't be surprised if the kid reached out and checked him for a fever, next.

"That's all," Henriksen concluded, smug smirk still in place. "That's reality."

"Why don't you shut the hell up?" Sam barked, whipping his head back towards Henriksen, but staying where he stood.

The FBI agent regarded him coolly. "Guess what? Life sucks. Get a helmet. 'Cause everybody's got a sob story, but not everyone becomes a killer, Sam."

"You don't know shit, Victor," Dean spat, finally releasing his brother but the two remained several feet back in the cell. "You have no idea what you're even talking about. You're so friggin' small, man. If you only knew. You'd be pissed, wasting all that potential on a string of ex-wives and a job that's more paperwork than saving lives."

Henriksen raised an eyebrow at the man and his apparent knowledge of Victor's life. Sure, Dean had caught him by surprise back in Milwaukee, knowing more about him than he'd been prepared for. But this held an air of something… else. Something more than that phone call from the bank. There was an undercurrent to Dean's words – no doubt what multiple witnesses and some victims had claimed about the Winchesters – that was unnerving. Like Dean knew him.

He was going to have to keep an eye on that, Henriksen thought, mentally raising his walls.

"You know what your job is?" Dean kept going. Beside him, Sam's presence was now the only thing that kept him from marching forward. "Your job is frustrating. It's boring . You spend years combing through paperwork for one break so that you can maybe – maybe – catch a bad guy on a good day. You don't even know what saving people is, Henriksen. You are wasting your life when you could be making a goddamn difference, and you don't even know-"

The younger Winchester did have to interfere then, putting out an arm to hold his brother back as Dean started forward. It caught Dean's attention enough that he glanced at Sam, who was shaking his head minutely.

"Not worth it," he grumbled Dean's own words back at him. The older Winchester looked pissed – another thing Henriksen filed away for later – but chewed on the inside of his cheek.

"Just imagine," Dean spoke one more time, making some pretty intense – almost pleading – eye contact. Henriksen had to hand it to him (and rethink several less-than-understanding thoughts he'd had about previous victims of the Winchesters). Dean Winchester was the most talented conman he'd ever had the displeasure of dealing with. "For one second. Just imagine how many people you could be saving – the difference you could be making – if me and my brother aren't crazy."

The FBI agent just raised an eyebrow at them. Internally, he was unnerved. Outwardly, he chuckled, tucking his hands into his pants' pockets. "Are you really trying to, what? Recruit me? Gonna have to try a lot harder than that, Dean."

But so would Henriksen, the FBI agent reasoned. Dean was very good. Henriksen had thought of his job like that, on more than one occasion, in almost those exact terms. But the Winchesters were known for this kind of manipulation and Henriksen would not give them the pleasure of being affected. So, he shoved it aside and maintained his mask of legal and moral superiority.

The older Winchester sneered at the dismissal. "Just remember this conversation, Victor. Cuz one day, I'm gonna owe you the world's biggest 'I told you so.'"

"That'll be the day, Dean." Henriksen let loose another chuckle. With a wide smile and no lack of pride in his work, he added, "By the way, you aren't wrong. My job is boring. But it's important, too. I think I'm making plenty of difference just putting you two away for the rest of your lives. Who knows? Maybe I'll call it quits after this. Enjoy a cozy retirement. But don't worry, I won't forget about you, Dean. I'll raise a beer to you every night, knowing how many people I saved just by locking you up forever."

The agent stepped away from the cell, signaling the end of the conversation even as the door to the holding area opened. Reidy stuck his head through the gap.

"Boss wants to talk to you," he told Henriksen and the other agent nodded. Reidy disappeared and Victor turned back to his prisoners with a shark's smile.

"Surf and Turf time, boys."

Dean snorted again, but Henriksen didn't stick around for more scintillating chatter. He followed Reidy out of the holding cell area, leaving the Winchesters to contemplate their soon-to-be eternity behind bars.

Chapter Break

The moment Victor was out of sight, Dean turned to Sam, who sank onto the bench with less color in his face than was strictly healthy. Dean was probably a shade or two light, himself. There was definitely a feeling of panic buzzing just beneath his skin.

And not just because they were in a holding cell awaiting transfer to a federal prison. There was too much déjà vu going on for Dean not to be at least slightly panicking.

"We've gotta get out of here," he announced, looking around the cell for anything they could use. "You said you had a plan? I'm all ears, Sammy."

"You won't be for long," the other Winchester muttered self-deprecatingly. Dean's brow pulled down quizzically, but since he wasn't sure what Sammy was getting at, he didn't really know how to take that. Sam straightened, meeting his gaze with a serious look that had Dean automatically squaring his shoulders like a soldier coming to attention. "Look, I can get us out of here, but I need you to remember your promise."

The frown was immediately back as Dean tried to think through all the promises he'd made to his brother. First and foremost was definitely the one where he didn't make a deal, sell his soul, go to Hell, and break the first seal. But he'd held up his end on that one. Plus, he wasn't sure what it had to do with escaping county jail.

A bad feeling started to form in his gut. "What promise?"

"The one where I share what's going on with me – no secrets – and you don't freak out or get pissed."

That feeling got much, much worse. Dean swallowed roughly and looked around the cell again like maybe there was another way out (not that he knew what Sammy's way out was, but if it required that promise, it was in no way something he would like). But there wasn't another way out. Not that he could see. At least, not yet.

The man from the future took a frustrated, deep breath, clenched his jaw, and gave a rough nod.

Sam's face was pinched, like he'd been expecting – maybe even wanting – more of a fight. But the younger Winchester nodded back. He rolled his shoulders, then his neck, and visibly braced himself as he locked his eyes on the cell door and that ridiculous padlock and chain Henriksen had added. Slowly, Sam raised a hand, fingers spread wide, and Dean's feeling got much, much, much, much, worse.

There was a crunch of metal followed by a click and then the base of the padlock was falling to the floor, leaving just the U-shaped shackle dangling from the two ends of chain. Dean stared, wide-eyed, between the lightly swinging chain and the heavy-duty lock lying, untouched, on the floor outside the cell.

"Holy shit-"

"You promised you wouldn't freak out," Sam reminded him way too calmly as he stood and crossed to the door. He reached through the bars, pulling the shackle free of the links and sliding the length of chain through the bars. He lowered it to the ground gently with just a quiet jingle of metal on metal.

"I am not freaking out," Dean growled as he came up beside his brother, still staring at the lock lying useless on the floor. In a lower, less approving mumble (like he could hardly believe he was encouraging this,) he mumbled, "Cameras, Sammy."

Dean took over door duty as his brother raised his head to the two cameras, mounted to the ceiling in either corner of the hallway outside their cell. The older Winchester dropped to a crouch, ready to pick the lock with whatever they had on hand, only to jump at a sudden crunch from outside the cell. His head whipped up to find both cameras, now a mangled mess of tech barely clinging to their mounting posts.

“Are you friggin’-”

“You promised,” Sam repeated, voice sharper this time and Dean sent him one hell of a glare. Sam pressed his hand to the locking mechanism built into the cell door; the one Dean was less than a foot from. There was the sound of metal crunching in on itself, followed by a click. Dean stared, wide-eyed and frozen. It hadn’t even taken half as much time as the padlock.

Sam pushed the door open, several interior bits of metal (were those the tumblers ?!) coming loose and clattering to the floor as he did. Dean was still staring at the wrecked lock, horrified (and also maybe a little impressed? No, no, definitely mostly horrified), as Sam strolled right past him. The older Winchester shot to his feet, following after his brother in a jittery mess of anxiety, panic, adrenaline, and fear.

“I am not freaking out,” he whispered harshly in response to Sam’s repeated scolding. He jogged after his brother, both Winchesters pressing themselves to the wall beside the door that led back to the main office. “I am exceedingly calm. See how calm I am?”

Sam gave him a look over his shoulder that had Dean right back to glaring.

“Alright, fine. I’m holding it in right now, and I’ll keep holding it in until we get out of here.” And wasn’t that the next hurdle? How the hell were they going to sneak past a room full of law enforcement and FBI agents? “But once we do-”

“I know, I know,” the younger Winchester cut him off, leaning forward just enough to catch a glimpse of the room through the door’s narrow window. “I’m getting a lecture.”

Dean pulled his head back, affronted. “I don’t lecture .”

Sam pulled away from the door, gesturing Dean to do the same and they moved further down the hallway back towards the cells. There were too many people in the main room for them to have any chance of escaping that way. They’d have to find another exit. But the door was the only one leading into or out of the holding cells. Sam's eyes veered over to the window in the middle cell, the one Dean had climbed up to when Henriksen's helicopter was landing.

"Would you prefer 'yell?'" he asked even as he pulled open the cell door and headed for the back wall.

"Oh, I am going to lecture your ass into tomorrow, Sammy. That's what I'm going to do," Dean hissed, checking the main door again as Sam climbed onto the same bench Dean had used until he could look out the window.

"Can't wait."

It was going to be a tight fit, Sam thought as he looked at the narrow window that ran almost the length of the cell. There were bars mounted to the outside, but he was pretty sure he could handle those. From what he could see, they were affixed with screws, not built into the wall. He could deal with those. It was the size of the window he was really worried about.

Dean followed Sam into the cell while he did his little recon. He rattled his still-cuffed hands for emphasis of how still-very-screwed they were. "Did you have a step two to this escape plan, Chris Angel?"

Sam gave him a look (bitchface #3a, a subset of number three, which pretty much meant, 'You really think that's the priority here, Dean?')

"Just remember your promise," he said for the umpteenth time as he jumped down from the bench and grabbed Dean's cuffed hands. His brother tried to pull away at first (earning him the purest form of Bitchface #3, no subcategory needed), before holding his hands out, realizing he was behaving like a child and that doing so just might be counterproductive to their escape attempt.

Sam pulled open each cuff like they were the kid's version, made of plastic and not reinforced steel designed to keep hardened criminals detained. Dean stared in both awe and horror at his freed hands.

But he kept his mouth shut. He'd promised and he had meant it. (Even if he was utter crap at keeping it and holy shit what the hell had happened to his brother in the Morton House?!)

Sam freed himself of his own handcuffs, tucking them into his pocket (meanwhile Dean chucked his back into the hall as a present for Henriksen to find, only regretting that he didn't have a bow to stick atop them). The younger Winchester turned back to the window, brow pinched.

"You gonna fit through there?" Dean asked, catching on to his brother's plan – and concern – as he eyed the window they would apparently be climbing out of.

Sam had the same worry but voicing them wasn't going to change facts. He kept his voice as calm and neutral as he could, in hopes that it would keep his brother equally calm. "I think so. I just have to get the bars off first."

Sure enough, the mention of that had Dean immediately tensing, arms crossing over his chest. But he just chewed the inside of his cheek harder, adopted an expression more commonly seen on someone sucking a lemon, and nodded jerkily.

Everything about this was bad. So, so bad. But he'd promised, and stopping mid-escape hardly seemed like a better idea. So the man from the future grit his teeth, swallowed the words cutting up his tongue like glass, and managed a mangled, "Best plan we got. Let's get to it."

He left the cell again before Sam could respond (or call him out on his totally-not-freaking-out status yet again (he was fine , he was handling this revelation like a goddamn champ, so everyone could just shut up)), and made his way back to the office door so he could keep an eye on the activity in the main room. When he was sure no one had noticed their little escape attempt yet, he nodded to his brother, who raised his hand once more, concentrating on the window.

The younger Winchester took a deep breath and closed his eyes. He let out that breath slowly, envisioning the world he'd seen back at the Morton House. The one where Ava's soul, dripping black, had been as easy to see as a neon sign. When Sam opened his eyes again, he could see the bars. Well, sort of. He could see an impression of them. A dozen straight lines of hazy nothingness – grayish voids where the energy of the world was forced to move around the bars – confined by a box of similar nothingness. A metal frame and twelve bars.

The cell wall was a void all its own, but that just made seeing through it to the world beyond all the easier. Sam wouldn't have been able to describe what he was seeing if asked. It was sort of like viewing the world through a scale of light to absolute dark. Kind of like x-ray vision, only it was souls that were white and clear-to-see as bone. Living things like flesh and muscle were a hazier, diffused gray, leaving inanimate objects as a transparent black, like background noise in an x-ray image.

Evil, though, that was like sludge. Ava's soul had been dripping in an opaque and oily mud that Sam hadn't been able to see through at all.

But he could see right through his own brother's chest now (which totally wasn't unsettling at all, and Sam wasn't thinking nonstop about that or anything.) Dean's skin, muscles, and organs were all a diffused gray that Sam could right through, straight to his brother's soul, which was so blindingly bright Sam couldn't stare at it for long. He could see other similar orbs (though none so blinding) inside gray bodies walking around the main office two dozen feet from where the Winchesters stood. Though those were further muffled by walls and objects in between him and them. Lifeless objects like those tended to be darker, though no less transparent.

Sam turned his attention back to the cell wall and the bars securely fastened to the other side. Those were his priority. All he had to do was unscrew eight bolts, pull the bars off the window, and lower them to the ground without making any noise. Easy, he told himself.

Outside, the screws began to spin in their threads, slowly but surely freeing themselves from the frame they held in place. Sam raised his other hand as the screws fell loose one by one, ready to catch the bars. Once all eight screws had fallen to the pavement below, he gave the frame a little push with his first hand. Sam manipulated the energy that he could now physically see: a malleable force that could be shaped and wielded. The bars jolted free with a shove of the battering ram he'd all but created and Sam quickly scooped them up with his other hand. He made a hammock of energy to cushion and catch the heavy structure before it could clatter to the ground.

The psychic took in a deep breath, releasing it once he'd managed to keep the bars floating in the air outside the cell. To be honest, he was thrilled. Surprised, but pleasantly so. He may have opened a door to some insane abilities, but the truth was he barely knew how to use them. He'd definitely approached this escape with far more confidence than he actually had. But Dean didn't need to know that.

Sam lowered the heavy metal bars to the ground outside and then stepped back, shoulders sagging. There was a headache building behind his eyes, but he quickly swiped at his nose, confirming he wasn't bleeding.

"Okay," he said, voice a little hoarse. He cleared his throat, stripping out of his flannel and wrapping it firmly around his clenched fist to protect his skin and muffle the noise that was about to follow. "I don't know how quiet I can keep this next part. Keep an eye out?"

Dean nodded, his eyes locked on the people moving about the other side of the door. He was trying very hard not to watch his brother just casually dismantle a jail cell with his brain. Instead, he reminded himself of his promise and trusted his kid brother to get them out. They'd discuss the means afterward.

The older Winchester kept watch through the small window, staying as far back as he could with a hand up to signal his brother. When the timing lined up – the deputies and Jody were as far from the door as they were ever going to get, the civilians in the office weren't paying any attention, and Henriksen and his partner were doing paperwork at a deputy's desk – Dean gave his brother the signal to go.

Sam combined physical force with some energy manipulation and punched the thick glass clear out of the frame, shattering it in three places. He scrambled to catch the pieces telekinetically (not having expected it to give that easily) before they could hit the ground outside and shatter.

He managed to catch most of them – the big ones at least – while the others hit the ground without too much fanfare. Sam still winced, checking the parking lot for movement before glancing at Dean, who gave him a thumbs up. No one had noticed.

The younger Winchester let out a breath he hadn't even realized he was holding, sinking back onto the bench for a minute just to breathe.

Dean moved quickly from the hallway back into the middle cell, hopping up on the bench beside his brother. He grabbed the edge of the window and hauled himself up, hooking a foot first since he knew it was going to be a tight fit for his chest. Not to mention he really didn't want to drop from that height headfirst.

But Sam was going to be the one with the real squeeze. At least if Dean went first, he could help pull his brother through from the other side.

He slipped his legs and hips through easily but, sure enough, Dean's chest protested the tight fit. Luckily, a little wiggling and a little more sucking-it-in saw him through the narrow space, and Dean dropped to the ground below. He quickly scanned the parking lot to make sure no one had seen him before whistling for Sam to follow.

Beanstalk legs dangled out of the window seconds later, followed by an ass and Dean checked the parking lot again. It was ninety percent to make sure they were still in the clear, ten percent a misplaced, desperate hope that if someone was around, they were at least getting this on camera. Because Sam's giant legs and butt flopping around like a fish lodged halfway through a wall was priceless. Even stuck in prison, Dean could get years of blackmail out of that one.

But back to escaping jail so they didn't spend a future in federal lockup.

Sure enough, when Sam had all but his upper torso dangling out of the window, all progress stopped. Dean kept a nervous eye out for anyone wandering by or going to their car – they'd gotten incredibly lucky so far – as Sam wiggled and jerked his body. It was like watching a worm stuck in a vice instead of on a hook. Growing increasingly anxious, Dean darted forward, grabbing onto Sam's ankles.

"Look at us. We're a friggin' scene from Winnie the Pooh," he complained, digging his heels into the cement and leaning back, pulling as hard as he could on his brother's legs. "Remember that book I used to read to you? Back before you ate too many Wheaties and became a god damn giant."

"You're… seriously… bringing that up… now ?" Sam grunted between trapped ribs, aware that every breath in made the job harder. He poured his focus into pushing all the air out of his lungs. If he could shrink his ribcage down just another inch, maybe between that and his brother trying to dislocate his legs from the rest of his body, he could slip past the window frame.

When something did finally give, it was sudden. With no warning, the younger Winchester slipped straight through the window and crashed to the ground.

Luckily, Dean was there to break his fall.

"Oh my god, you're a thousand pounds," came the muffled groan from beneath him.

Sam rolled his eyes before climbing off his brother. He held out a hand and hauled Dean up from the ground. "Really? You wanna talk dietary choices, Dean?"

Dean grumbled and grumped as he got back on his feet and shook off the dirt from his jeans and jacket. "Let's just find Baby and get the hell out of here."

Sam couldn't agree more, so he dropped the bickering and the two brothers took up a cautious jog across the parking lot towards the Impala. Sheriff Mills had arranged for a tow truck to bring the vehicle to the station as evidence. She hadn't been hard to spot from the cell window, still hooked up to the tow truck, awaiting relocation to wherever the FBI wanted.

When he got to her, Dean did a quick circle around Baby, muttering under his breath the entire while about how the tow operator better not have done any damage, plus all the things he'd do to them if they had. Sam just shook his head, ignoring his brother (and his priorities) to start unhooking the Impala.

It was quick work for the two Winchesters. It was hardly the first time they'd snagged Baby back from a tow. Once she was safely back on the ground, Sam went for the passenger door, only to find it locked.

"Shit," he mumbled, looking up at his brother. "Can you pick it?"

He figured every version of Dean – extra ten years of life experience or not – would be adept at breaking into his own car. It wasn't the first time they'd had to do that, either. And if half the stuff Dean mentioned offhand ended up happening in this timeline, it wouldn't be the last.

"Sure can, but I'm not going to," Dean answered, rapid fire. Instead of heading for the driver side door, the man from the future headed for the engine. He squatted in front of the grill, reaching beneath the front bumper to pull out a long, flathead screwdriver which had magnets duct-taped to it. With a wink at his kid brother, Dean slid the tool through the grill, fiddled for only half a minute to get it propped against something inside the engine compartment, and then gave the butt of the screwdriver a hardy tap with his palm.

Metal clicked and the hood popped open. Dean lifted it the rest of the way and slid the prop rod into place so he could root around the insides of his Baby. It only took another half a minute to pop the top off the air filter compartment and dig around for the spare key he'd kept there since Dad had given him the car (it only took one time losing the keys on a hunt to learn that valuable lesson). All in all, they were inside the car, engine turning over and Baby peeling away from the Sheriff's station, in less than three minutes.

Sam refused to be outwardly impressed, knowing he was still in for one hell of a 'lecture'.

Chapter Break

When Gabriel plopped back into his recliner, loopty-loop straw between his lips, Castiel had composed herself, thank Dad.

"So," he started, swirling the can of pop and watching the straw twist in a lazy circle with the motion. "Why exactly is Dean pronoun-challenged when it comes to you?"

By Castiel's expression, that was not what she'd been expecting her brother to come back with. It wasn't clear if the confusion was from the question itself or the choice of topic. Gabriel decided to take pity on her.

"He referred to you as 'he' multiple times," the archangel explained while trying to grab onto his straw with his tongue alone. When he finally managed it, Gabe took a long, slurping sip, eyeing Cassie the whole time. "Pretty sure he got it wrong more than he got it right."

His sister's face – and grace – scrunched up like she couldn't decide what to say in response to that. She looked part constipated to be discussing it, part annoyed Gabriel had noticed (or perhaps annoyed that Dean did it?) and part resigned, which is what her expression – and grace – finally settled on.

It was… an interesting experience to watch. Gabe took another long, loud slurp through his straw.

"In the timeline that Dean came from, I possessed a male vessel." Castiel was glaring at him by the time she replied, as if she knew it was material Gabe wouldn't be able to resist poking at.

"Hmmm." The archangel reached down and pulled the lever attached to his chair, enjoying the way it dropped back with a flop. "Do you have a preference? Obviously, I enjoy the male form of the species. Of course, back when I chose a vessel, being a woman suuuuucked. So the pick was pretty easy."

Gabe rocked back and forth like a third grader in his grandpa's chair. It kept that glare on Cassie's face though, which was the entire goal.

"I do not have a preference."

"Really?" Gabe propped himself up for a moment to regard his sister with genuine interest.

Castiel looked uncomfortable under the attention, glancing away with the sluggish, disorganized movement of self-consciousness sliding through her grace. "I do not see a difference."

"Huh." Gabe laid back. Interesting. "I'd have figured Dean wasn't much into guys, given the whole…" he waved his hand half-heartedly, "macho thing."

But what did he know? Other than everything, of course. Gabriel offered a shrug, glancing back at Castiel only to find his sister staring at him in confusion. The archangel raised his eyebrows, realizing that maybe he'd misinterpreted some things.

"With the way he talked about you – practically wrung my neck just for saying your name, for Dad's sake – I was sure you two were…" he gestured emphatically with both hands, only somewhat hampered by the soda can. Cassie followed his movements, head tilting as she did, but the confusion remained on her face. "You know. Banging."

The head tilt got tilt-y-er and Gabriel's eyebrows got raise-y-er.

"Bumping uglies? Making the beast with two backs? Doing what they do on the discovery channel? Seriously?!"

It had only taken about half of that list before Cassie was looking away, stoically and staunchly staring at the wall. Stiff as a board, she finally responded with, "You are referring to sexual intercourse."

Gabriel groaned, throwing a leg up over the armrest and placing the back of his wrist dramatically to his forehead. "How does he do it? That's it. I'm educating you right here, right now."

The archangel bounded up and out of the chair, much to his sister's alarm. Castiel physically withdrew into her seat – as much as she was able while still tied to it – as Gabriel marched right up to her side.

"Educating…?"

He plopped down next to her, the smaller angel suddenly on a couch instead of a kitchen chair, restraints gone and brother slinging an arm over her shoulders. Somehow, the situation felt far more perilous than being bound to a chair.

"I'm going to introduce you to the wide world of porn, little sis." Gabriel reached over to the abandoned recliner and snagged the remote off the armrest. Castiel remained rigid under his arm, grace churning with reds and yellows and pinks. If a vessel could blush without an angel's express permission, his little sister would be beet red.

"I fail to see how erotic cinema is going to educate me on-"

"Oh, ho, ho, no , Cassie," Gabriel corrected, raising the remote like it was his pointer finger and he had an academic argument to win. "Downloaded material is for the masses, and I don't do masses. Unless it's an orgy, then we can talk. Oh no, I present to you…"

He clicked a button on the remote and two of his constructs entered the room dressed in silky, short-cut robes tied loosely around their perfect, gorgeous, creamy bodies. They were followed shortly by a man dressed as a pizza delivery guy.

"The live show. Everything you need to know, little sister, you can learn from the pizza man."

Cassie's eyes were about three times wider than normal and she was still stiff as a board beneath his arm. Oh, Gabriel was going to enjoy this.

"I-I do not require nourishment."

The archangel almost spat soda from his nose with that one, bursting out laughing. This was going to be the best thing ever.

"Oh, I promise you, Cassie. He's here for an entirely different kind of hunger."

End Chapter

Chapter End Notes

Author's Notes: See? It's legitimately a good chapter! Why on earth could I not get it edited?

(I know why. It's because writing out the visualization of Sam's psychic powers was kind of a 'wing it' situation that I never actually came to terms with (aka I never read back through it and concluded yes, good, carry on). So now every time I try to read it, I get, like, super bogged down and heavy (only way I can think to describe it) and I want to do just about anything else.)

((Brains are dumb, guys.))

(((Depression brains are dumber, still.)))

Henriksen : A lot of commenters have mentioned their excitement over potentially seeing Henriksen join the boys' side and I am happy to confirm, though it will take time, that is absolutely where I'm headed. I struggle writing him as the arrogant fed, so I can not wait to give that boy a reality check and bring him over to the right side of things I mean, no promise he doesn't end up getting himself killed in the end, because this is me we're talking about, but if he does, it won't be immediately after he becomes an awesome character and a fantastic asset/ally to the boys.

Jus in Bello: Oh man, I looooved how many readers were worried I was about to pull a demonic siege! Not gonna lie, I would have loved to do that to you all (and the boys), but the timing wasn't right. Of course, that's not to say Jus in Bello won't repeat itself later on It's one of my favorite episodes, after all (and we all know what I do with my favorite episodes)

Hope you enjoyed, especially that end bit ;)

Cheers,

Silence

Chapter 138: Season 2: Chapter 104

Chapter Notes

Author's Notes: Surprisingly, I don't have much to say tonight

Chapters Warnings: Henriksen is predictably pissed but making unpredictable choices (note: pretty sure I spelled "stupid" wrong just now), Sam's talking about doors and walls and darksides, Dean's having a panic attack instead of the lecture he was promised, Cas is receiving further education at the hands of her brother, and Jack is a happy, vibrating clam.

(Yup, you read that right)

Actual Chapter Warnings: Beware, we have actual character growth happening below!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 104

Henriksen stared at the SS100 Squire padlock and accompanying 80 grade, steel alloy chain sitting in a useless pile on the cell block floor. Each link of the industrial grade, heavy-duty chain was intact and the padlock – his dual locking, level 4 LPCB certified, professional-grade lock – was sitting in the middle of it all, untouched. The first of two required keys was still sitting pretty in Victor's pocket, and Agent Reidy had immediately checked and confirmed the safe location of the second. Yet here they were. A Federal agent staring at the most secure lock on the market, laying on the ground like it had sprung open by the grace of God, Himself.

Henriksen's hands curled into fists at his side as he stared down his latest failure.

Again.

The Winchesters had escaped from under his goddamn nose hairs.

Again .

One of the sheriff's men was retrieving the video surveillance of the cell block, lot of good it would do them. The cameras had gone a couple rounds with what had to have been a sledgehammer. The answer to how the Winchester had managed that one should be fun, if any of the data survived.

The rest of Sheriff Mills' men, along with the sheriff herself, had taken off after the Winchesters, who had appropriated that damn '67 Chevy Impala right out of the parking lot. They'd had to unhook her from the tow truck and break into – and hotwire – the car. Which meant they'd managed to escape in record-breaking time, considering the brothers had been left without supervision for all of fifteen minutes. In a fucking jail cell .

Henriksen felt like he was losing his mind. Gone crazy, right along with the psychos he was chasing.

"Well."

If that was the case, there was only one thing left to do. Henriksen straightened, looking up at the narrow, previously barred window the Winchesters had somehow escaped through.

"If you can't beat 'em, join 'em."

It was time to pay Gordon Walker another visit.

Chapter Break

The Winchesters tore out of Sioux Falls at the fastest speeds Baby could carry them. They almost collided with a car turning into the Sheriff's office as they peeled out of there, but Dean didn't let it slow him down.

He was absolutely breaking every speed limit in the book and a handful of unwritten ones too. Calling attention to themselves and breaking the law wasn't exactly a concern at the moment. They'd just broken out of jail. Every cop in the county would be on their tail soon enough, and it wouldn't be long before every other cop in every other county was as well. So they might as well break all the laws until they were far enough away that maybe someone hadn't heard of them.

That didn't stop the older Winchester from keeping an almost obsessive eye on the rear-view mirror, even two towns later when he finally started driving like a sane, law-abiding citizen again.

"Alright," Dean announced loudly once he finally felt safe enough to turn his attention to something other than escaping federal custody. "Spill."

The sigh that came from the passenger seat was so dramatically world-weary Dean almost launched into that lecture a little early.

Sam shifted in his seat, really not looking forward to the conversation they were about to have. But he'd promised he'd explain and Dean had actually done a fairly decent job not losing his shit during their escape. Sam decided to bite the bullet, get through it the best he could. And hope his brother did the same.

"It was something Ava said," he started, unsure of where to begin.

"Ava?" Dean interrupted sharply, gaze whipping between the road and his brother. "Ava Wilson?"

Sam found himself sighting again, this time in exhaustion. God, so much had happened in the last twenty-four hours. He'd almost forgotten that for Dean, he'd gone missing from that gas station and that was all the man knew for once. Dean wouldn't know what had happened in the Morton House – an entirely new set of events from his brother's timeline – and that would only complicate this conversation.

"Yeah," Sam replied, voice softer than he'd meant it to be. The younger Winchester cleared his throat. "She, uh, she was at the Morton House. Apparently had been for months."

Beside him, Dean sucked in a breath of air, realizing what that must have meant the same as Sam had back in that murder house.

"What…" Dean cleared his throat, trying his best to let go of past horrors he couldn't change. "What did she say? That, uh… started it?"

It being his brother's apparent embrace of demonic blood powers like it was no big thing.

“That all I had to do was accept what I was.” Sam’s voice was earnest, but also resigned, and Dean immediately picked up on both. There was something there, something niggling at Dean’s conscience. But he didn’t know what it was yet.

The older Winchester swallowed past a quickly tightening throat. “And what are you, Sam?”

His brother shifted, uncomfortable, and Dean only braced further for words he wouldn’t like. When Sam spoke, he didn’t disappoint.

“Powerful.”

The way that Dean tensed immediately had Sam turning to him, finally looking at his older brother for the first time since this conversation had started.

“Remember your promise,” the younger Winchester was quick to say. Dean’s mouth snapped closed with an audible snap. “This isn’t what you think, Dean.”

“And what am I thinking, Sam?” Dean growled back, knowing his anger was misplaced but unable to pour it out in any other direction.

“That I’m going to go darkside.”

If anything, Dean went even more rigid. His knuckles turned white on Baby’s wheel, her leather squeaking in protest under his punishing grip.

“And you’re not wrong for thinking it,” Sam added, calm as could be, staring out the windshield as the world flew past. He saw none of it, eyes a hundred miles away, inside the basement of a hell house. Meanwhile, Dean’s stomach was tying itself into knots beside him and Sam knew it. But he didn’t have the bandwidth to process Dean’s emotions along with his own. His brother would just have to do it himself for once. “It’s like there was a wall separating me from those abilities. And I broke that wall.”

Dean sucked in another panicked breath as memories flooded his brain, blinding him to anything else. Another wall from another time, scratched at by his brother and felled by his angelic best friend turned betrayer. A broken brother he couldn't fix and the world falling apart around them. Dean's breath started coming faster and he couldn't slow down his pounding heart, no matter how much he yelled at the thing to cool it.

Sam turned to look at him once more, already knowing Dean was thinking of this all wrong. Thinking of it like Sam was the brother he'd once known, the one from his timeline that broke the world.

But he wasn't. And he wasn't going to be. Sam knew that now.

"I did it to save Andy," he confessed softly. Gently. "Even if I was too late, I had to try."

In the driver's seat, the tension holding Dean rigidly upright all but deflated. He sunk into the seat like a puppet whose strings had all been cut. Sam was pretty sure there was water gathering in his brother's eyes but he didn't mention it.

He missed Andy too. The loss was still too raw, for the both of them. They'd had no time to properly mourn him, to process their grief. Sam turned his own tear-blurred gaze back out the windshield.

"I can't close those doors now," he admitted, voice still soft. "But everything I did – back in that house and just now – I did without demon blood, Dean." He twisted in his seat to look at his brother head on, eyes alight with an excitement that only worsened Dean's knotted gut. "Don't you get it? I don't need it. I never did. I just had to accept what I was."

"Powerful," Dean echoed, staring at Sammy for what was likely an unsafe amount of time, considering he was still driving. He didn't sound nearly as confident nor reassured by that word as Sam had been. Not that it had been an easy-as-that acceptance for the younger Winchester. He'd just had more time to process it and move on.

"Yeah," Sam agreed with a single shoulder shrug. "And I don't plan to go darkside, by the way-" he sent his brother a knowing look, which had Dean turning back to the road guiltily, "-but you should still be watching for it. I want you to watch out for it, Dean."

The older Winchester glanced sidelong at him, eyebrows up, clearly surprised. Sam offered a weak grin.

"I'm not going to pretend it can't happen," he admitted, "but I can't change what I am, either. I don't think I could, even if I wanted to. And trying… I think trying might have been what took me down the wrong path where you come from."

Baby's leather creaked and groaned beneath Dean's white-knuckled grip, but he couldn't manage to relax his hold. The man from the future swallowed roughly, throat filled with jagged shards of glass that tore more at his soul than actual flesh. His cheat ached, and he wasn't sure if it was him, Cas, or the looming panic attack, just waiting in the wings.

He had no response to that. None he could force out through the tension taking over his entire body.

“Which is why I need you to trust me,” Sam continued.

Somehow that tightness in Dean’s throat only got worse and he didn’t know why. Only he did. Of course he did. He just didn’t want to own up to it.

“At least until I give you a reason not to, okay? A real reason,” Sam was quick to clarify, already seeing Dean opening his mouth to argue. “Not just something you’re afraid of.”

Which damn . Dean was flooded with equal parts guilt and defensive anger. But… he couldn’t really argue, could he? Sam wasn’t wrong and ouch , it hurt like a bitch, but it was damn accurate. Painfully, painfully accurate. Because Dean was afraid. He was so, so very afraid of something that hadn’t happened yet but still could. And Sam was asking him, genuinely asking him not to be afraid. To stand by and trust it wouldn’t come to pass.

As someone who had been sent back in time to avert the Apocalypse, standing by wasn’t exactly in the job description.

Dean gritted his teeth. Words were still a foreign concept to him, apparently, as his mouth stayed stubbornly glued shut. It was something he would obviously have to think about, because Sam’s accusation wasn’t wrong. Dean knew he had a habit of jumping to conclusions, especially where his kid brother was concerned. And yeah, he’d been given plenty of reasons for that distrust, at least in his timeline, but he didn’t have those here. This wasn’t that world and he knew, he knew, that treating Sam as someone he wasn’t – someone he might never become – wasn’t fair to the kid.

They’d talked, more than once since his time travel reveal, about trust. And yeah, Dean sucked at it, but he also knew Sam – every version of him, but particularly this one – deserved to be trusted.

Dean just wasn’t sure he knew how to at this point.

“I’m not afraid of these powers.” Despite the very one-sided conversation (Dean having trouble getting anything past the vice grip on his throat at the moment), Sam kept talking with a quiet confidence that left the older Winchester clueless as to how to respond. And concerned. Terrified, actually. But mostly clueless.

"I'm not evil. I know I'm not," the younger Winchester continued, finally able to speak a truth he'd struggled with his entire life. Especially since Dean had shown back up in it and Sam learned the origins of that feeling. His 'destined' role to literally destroy the world. He dropped his eyes down to his hands, steady in his lap, veins pumping the faintest traces of demon blood through his body, even now. "I was terrified of what I could do when I was on the demon blood, because I felt powerful , Dean. But I didn't feel like me ."

He had felt intoxicated. High on power and scared of what he might do because of it. Things he didn't want to do, but could. And, somewhere deep down, he'd instinctually known he could and because of that, he eventually would. That feeling of wrongness would eat at him until he wasn't himself anymore. Until he'd want to do those things just because he could .

He'd known it was wrong – he could feel that wrongness. But right now?

"I don't feel powerful," he admitted, slowly curling his hands into fists and watching those veins stand out beneath his skin. "Even though I know I am. I don't feel different. I just feel… like me."

And the difference was everything.

The demon blood had never been about accessing or increasing his abilities. It had been about control. A form of manipulation for the Yellow Eyed demon. Sam should have seen it earlier. None of the other psychic kids had needed an amplifier. None of them had needed control. Now Sam knew why. None of the other kids had his potential to fulfill Azazel's apocalyptic plans. None of them had been viable vessels for the Devil. The demon had needed a way to control him because, left unchecked, Sam was powerful .

On the demon blood, Sam lost that control. Not over his powers, but over his values. He could see it so clearly now, how he would have ended the world so very easily. On the amount of blood Dean's notes talked about, Sam would have justified any action to use those powers, just to let the building itch out before it overwhelmed him.

To feel, for even the briefest of moments, back in control.

But now, he didn't feel any of that. He just felt like himself. More so, perhaps, than ever before. Because the truth was, Sam had always been this, whatever this was. He'd always been powerful and fought against it, endlessly. Feared it, enough to bury it deep within and forget it existed. He'd exhausted himself hiding what he was until he never could have accessed that power without an aid. Without demon blood.

Sam's own self-hatred and fear had set himself up perfectly to be controlled.

Well, no more.

"I'm not evil," Sam repeated, more for himself than his brother, but Dean needed to hear it, too.

Which was why he needed his big brother to keep an eye on him, the younger Winchester knew. Because Sam felt more confident in his path than ever before, but that didn't mean he couldn't still make mistakes. Couldn't still he controlled.

"No. No, you're not, Sammy," Dean agreed, voice hoarse and words forced through an abused throat. He still had his own hesitations. His own worries and fears. Boy, did he have them in spades. But if there was one thing they could both agree on, it was that Sam Winchester was many things, but evil wasn't one of them.

Chapter Break

"Soooo."

Castiel looked away from the television screen, currently showing the Winchesters having a much-needed heart-to-heart after escaping police custody. Gabriel was fully reclined in his chair, arms tucked beneath his head, not a care in the world. He was regarding her with intense hazel eyes, though she couldn't place the emotion there.

"You actually enjoy this crap?"

Castiel tilted her head, considering the question. Enjoy was not the right word, she identified immediately. Enjoy implied want, and what Castiel wanted was to be free of her confines and with the Winchesters, not serving as an observer to their story.

Which was… somewhat of a startling revelation. Castiel had not wanted much throughout her long life, and what she had wanted was tempered by duty. Repressed at worst, if the want was unacceptable for an angel, and ignored at best, as angels were not meant to want much at all.

But she wanted, very badly, in that moment to be with the Winchesters.

An odd sensation, Castiel decided, fidgeting in her seat as she tried to get comfortable with the new emotion.

“I am grateful to know what is happening with the Winchesters,” she finally decided on admitting, glancing between her brother and the brothers on his television screen.

Movement across her thighs pulled Castiel’s attention away from the hunters, who had lapsed into silence, and down to the black cat curled in her lap. Jack had once more shifted to a feline – something he only seemed to do when he wanted to snooze atop the angel’s legs – and was currently balled up, forepaws wrapped around his elongated back legs in a contortionist move that seemed paradoxically comfortable for the creature.

“Why can your dog shapeshift?” Castiel asked, both for a change of subject away from unwanted emotions she had yet to properly process, and to satiate a curiosity that had been bothering her ever since Jack had first shifted unexpectedly.

“Because I made him that way,” Gabe answered nonchalantly, as though having a shapeshifting pet was an exceedingly uninteresting, normal occurrence.

Castiel continued to stare at the cat sleeping quite peacefully in her lap for some time more. Gabriel got bored fairly quickly (which Castiel had learned was very much a normal occurrence for the archangel), and dug around in the cushions for the remote. Cas quickly checked up at the screen once more, confirming the Winchesters were merely driving, before returning her gaze to the cat. Gabriel changed the channel and Castiel found herself immensely relieved when cartoons appeared on the screen rather than more erotic entertainment.

“Would I be correct in assuming his true name is Fenrir?”

Gabe turned his head a little sharper than necessary to regard Castiel with yet another intense gaze she couldn’t read. Those hazel eyes slid down to his dog- er, cat, for a brief moment before going back to his sister.

“He’s had lots of names,” Gabe answered with a carefully calculated shrug, going back to the episode of Foster's Home for Imaginary Friends . The archangel had taken a very quick liking to the show. He and Blooregard Q. Kazoo shared a similar sense of humor and emotional maturity, after all. “But yeah, that’s one of ‘em.”

He could sense Cassie’s gaze on him, so he mustered up his most unabashed grin and turned to those curious blue eyes. She was searching for something and, while Gabriel didn’t know what, he was determined not to give it to her.

“What? I can’t get bizz-ay as a pagan?”

The implication of where Jack had come from was enough for his sister to blush bright red – recent educational experiences clearly coming to mind – and she tore her gaze away quickly. Gabriel just grinned and returned to his show.

After several moments of Castiel taking in none of Bloo’s antics or Frankie’s lecturing, her eyes dropped back down to the cat in her lap. Gabriel’s son, apparently. She would need to stop referring to him as a pet. Castiel considered herself lucky no reference to the dynamic had yet bothered the archangel.

Angel’s didn’t have children, she thought absently, staring down at Jack. How… interesting it was, then, that Gabriel did.

“May I have my arms free?” Castiel asked, apropos of nothing, looking over at her brother earnestly.

Surprised by the sudden request, Gabriel regarded his sister very carefully. He hadn’t resumed healing the angel yet, so she was unlikely to be able to escape, even with freed limbs. But he hadn’t exactly forgotten how fiercely she’d tried to get away in the past, heedless of any injury it caused.

As the silence stretched between them, Castiel eventually took his lack of response as answer enough and turned back to the television.

It was another few moments of imaginary friends bouncing about on the screen before the grace binding her left wrist suddenly dissolved, freeing her forearm to the elbow. The angel blinked in surprise, turning back to her brother, but Gabe was watching the TV as though he had not done a thing.

Hesitantly, Castiel flexed and rotated her freed wrist. Then, cautiously, she ran her fingers through the black fur in her lap. Jack instantly extended his limbs, causing the angel to freeze, unsure if the touch was welcome. But the cat merely unfolded from his pretzeled position, stretching across her thighs before resettling in an open sprawl. It seemed an invitation to the angel, so Castiel resumed her cautious pets.

Within minutes, Jack was purring contently. Gabriel glanced sidelong at his sister, finding the lesser angel inordinately pleased with the development. She returned her gaze to the show she did not understand, but her gentle strokes became more confident. Jack slept on, happy as a vibrating clam.

Gabe turned away from the scene, trying and failing not to be similarly pleased.

Chapter Break

Dean was pretty sure they were being followed.

A blue Ford Bronco had been in and out of the rearview since Sioux Falls. It could just be a coincidence; they were heading due south on I29, which was a decently large interstate and the only major route south from Sioux Falls. Plenty of people took it every day. So there was no guarantee their Bronco buddy wasn't just driving south.

Except Dean had turned off at Junction city and the SUV had popped up in his rearview mirror again not five minutes later.

"We've got company," Dean finally said aloud. Even keeping his voice low – he wasn't a hundred percent sure, after all – was enough to rouse Sammy beside him. The kid hadn't slept in who knew how long, but given the shallow breathing and frequent jolts and twitches, he wasn't managing it now, either.

“Who?” Sam asked, immediately sitting up and eyeing the side mirror. There were multiple cars following behind them on the two-lane road heading West.

“Blue Bronco,” Dean supplied, keeping an eye on the larger vehicle that was hanging far enough back to fall in and out of view. “Can’t be sure, but they’ve been with us since Sioux Falls.”

“Take the bypass,” Sam suggested, eyeing the vehicle several cars behind them. “See if they follow or if they’re just going into town.”

Cherry St, more commonly known as State Highway 50 (or old 50 to the locals), split into two as it approached the city of Vermillion. One way went straight through the city while the other wrapped around to bypass the more traffic- and stoplight-heavy streets of downtown. A car coincidentally on the same road as them, having turned off I29, was more than likely going into town. Which meant they’d find out pretty shortly if the vehicle was following them, or if it was just another innocent, oblivious traveler on the road.

Dean took the bypass, wrapped around the town to the North, then abruptly cut South to merge onto the 19.

The Bronco matched them move for move.

“Shit,” Sam grumbled as the blue SUV pulled onto the state highway behind them once more. He looked around the Impala for easily accessible weapons, but everything was safely stored in the trunk. Which had definitely been for the best when they’d been arrested and the vehicle towed. Now, though, it was decidedly inconvenient.

“What’s our play?” Sam asked after he confirmed what he already knew; they’d have to pull over to get to any of their guns.

Dean must have realized the same thing because, even as he continuously checked the rear-view mirror, he said, “We can try to outrun them-”

“And call unnecessary attention to ourselves,” the younger Winchester countered quietly.

“ Or we confront them,” Dean finished, ignoring his brother’s interruption. Sam wasn’t wrong. Outrunning them would likely require some crafty moves and breaking at least one (probably more) speed limits. They weren’t exactly in the middle of nowhere, either. They’d just left a pretty major town center.

He could stall, maybe, until they got to the Nebraska border. It was less populated there, as the road took a turn along a wash and wound its way through some hills. But there weren't any real turnoffs that he could recall. No tree cover or terrain rocky enough to hide the Impala as the Bronco sped past. They could maybe get away with speed alone – Baby certainly had more horsepower than that blue beast – but it would be a risk.

Of course, so would a confrontation.

Dean glanced at Sam, eyebrows up, but his brother only shrugged. He'd back whatever play Dean went with.

The older Winchester abruptly pulled the Impala off to the side of the road, spraying a cloud of dirt into the air as they hit the shoulder at inappropriate speeds. Both brothers were out of the car, Sam going for the trunk and throwing Dean a handgun even as the Bronco pulled off the road, brakes screaming to a halt only a handful of feet from Baby's bumper.

Dean raised his gun and approached the driver's door, Sam doing the same on the passenger side.

Chapter Break

"Here."

Castiel tore her attention away from the most recent cinematic education Gabriel had settled on (which was no longer mindless cartoons that hardly made sense and was, thankfully, not porn, either. However, as the angel quickly realized, the new content was equally as baffling as all previous) and focused on the can of soda her brother was holding out to her. She accepted it with her free hand, setting it down on the table between them, next to the other two cans he had brought to her already. The newest, like all the others, remained unopened.

"I don't understand," she confessed, blue eyes immediately back on the screen.

"What don't you understand?" Gabriel asked, amusement in his voice as he plopped down into his recliner.

“This movie…” Castiel shook her head as a creature appeared on the screen, silhouetted by the brightly lit, sin-filled city. “It is grossly inaccurate. The hunters are armed with silver weapons and garlic. Neither of these things would harm a vampire down or even slow it down.”

Gabriel choked on a laugh, coughing through it and covering with a long sip of his own soda. “That’s because it’s fiction, Cassie.”

Castiel was getting better at not flinching at the nickname. No one had called her that except Balthazar. It was a painful reminder of the loss of her brother. However, Castiel was growing more used to the flare of grief that accompanied the annoying name. She’d had to adjust to it, seeing as repeated attempts to stop Gabriel from using it had not been remotely successful.

Another thing that reminded her of Balthazar, though that one hurt significantly less.

“You ready for me to heal you some more?” Gabriel asked out of nowhere, drawing Cassie’s attention back to him with those wide, penetrating eyes.

“Do I have a choice?”

Gabe sputtered against his loopty-loop straw, taking some pop down the wrong pipe. He cleared it with a wave of his hand and instead focused on his confusing-as-all-get-out sister. He rubbed the back of his neck, actually contemplating the merit of her question.

“I mean… yeah, uh, I guess.” His brow furled over his eyes. “Of course you have a choice. But why wouldn’t you want healing?”

Whatever Castiel had been looking for in an answer, she clearly found it. The littlest angel that could nodded and turned her gaze back to Blade . It only left Gabriel feeling all the more like he’d missed something.

“I will accept your assistance. Thank you, brother.”

The archangel was lucky he wasn’t trying for a second sip of soda, because he definitely would have choked that time. Gabriel immediately poured his all into ignoring the spark of… something in his chest that had flared at Castiel calling him ‘brother’ and instead focused on the task of healing his stubborn, befuddling sister.

Chapter Break

“Hands up, get out of the car!” Dean yelled even as he approached the driver’s side door of the Bronco. The cloud of dust from both cars pulling onto the dirt shoulder was only just starting to settle. Through it, he saw two hands appear out the open window of the Bronco.

The hunter kept his gun raised as he approached but it wasn’t until he was damn near on top of the car that he recognized the figure sitting in the driver’s seat. He lowered his gun, arms instantly numb with shock.

“Ellen?”

Sam was rounding the car, tucking his gun into his waistline, before Dean managed to get the driver’s side door opened. Ellen Harvelle stumbled out of the Bronco and promptly swayed. The younger Winchester caught her before her legs gave out beneath her. She sagged in his grip, shaking like a leaf.

The two brothers exchanged surprised, worried looks over Ellen’s shoulder as she clung to Sam, face buried in his chest, and he hugged her all the tighter for it.

End Chapter

Chapter End Notes

Author Notes: Omg, Dean refused to talk during that whole conversation with Sam. Maybe because when I planned it out, I only wrote down Sam’s side but omg. It was so, sooo weird having a conversation where Dean didn’t talk, like… at all. I’m still half convinced it’s terrible, out of character, and makes no sense

Up Next: Guys. Guys guys guys. It’s time. We’ve made it. Next chapter is the last of Season 2 💀💀💀💀💀💀💀💀💀💀 Can you even believe it?!?

Hope you enjoyed the chapter and see you all again soon for the final post of Season 2!!

Cheers,

Silence

Chapter 139: Season 2: Chapter 105

Chapter Notes

Author's Notes: Season. Fucking. Finale. Y'ALL!!!!!

And, befittingly, it's thirty friggin' pages long. I think it may be the longest post yet. The longest in a while, for sure!

Chapter Warnings: Omg, so much happening. We're wrapping up season 2 with multiple bangs! But only after some somber moments first. We've got a bunker to find, a prophet to catch up on, a wayward angel to try and understand, a funeral to hold, some episodes of Star Trek to watch, a party to have, and then those promised booms! Big baaada booms!

Actual Chapter Warnings: Cliffffffhaaaaanger! Like only a season finale can offer. Y'all are gonna screeeeeeeam 😬 I'm so excited.

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Chapter 105

Ellen Harvelle had not been having a good day. Granted, she had nothing on the Winchesters or Bobby (God, Bobby's house) and her thirty hours of hell, while still ongoing, couldn't be compared to Ash or Ronald, who would never have another day again, good or otherwise. But nothing about her day had been a cakewalk, either.

She'd shown up at the Morton House in the early hours of the morning after hours of driving without rest. Dawn had just been climbing over the treetops when she parked her car in front of a dead body, sprawled in the middle of the road. He'd been shot through the head. Other than that, there wasn't much else. The house itself was empty, though dried pools of blood and overturned furniture in the basement suggested she hadn't missed the action by more than a couple hours.

Ellen left the house as it was. Something had clearly gone down, but she didn't know what and she wouldn't find answers there. So she headed for Bobby's, the next logical place the boys would have gone.

Finding a phone along the way to call them – any of them, including her own cell phone that she'd left with Ash, and Bobby's landline – had gotten her nowhere.

Which was when she actually started to worry.

When she arrived to torn police tape and smoking ruins, Ellen sunk to her knees in the debris, unsure what to do next. Bobby's house was gone . She'd left Ash and Ronald in that house. And she was certain the Winchesters and Bobby would have come back here…

Dean's voice had been nothing short of panicked when he'd told them to get out of the Roadhouse. He hadn't hung around to explain why, but now Ellen knew.

Ellen clasped a hand over her mouth, viciously biting back the sob that tore at her throat. They weren't gone: not yet, not for sure. Until she knew for sure…. There weren't answers here, that much was certain. So she'd have to find them somewhere else.

Ellen Harvelle would be damned if she broke down before she got them.

Her hand was shaking when she finally lowered it back to her side and climbed to her feet. An explosion big enough to raze the salvage yard to the ground wouldn't have gone unnoticed. Which meant the nearest police station was her next best bet for finding out what the hell had happened while she'd been busy crisscrossing the damn country.

It took some time to find the sheriff's station, since she had no way of looking up its location. But when she did, Ellen almost couldn't believe the coincidence as a '67 Chevy Impala came tearing out of the parking lot just as she was turning in, damn near hitting her in the process.

It was undoubtedly her boys – alive – in that car that went racing down the road at speeds suggesting either another crisis or a damn prison break. Ellen could hazard a guess at which one it was, especially when, not twenty minutes of tailing the boys later, she spotted sirens in her rear view.

The cops never caught up, thankfully, as Dean wove his way through side streets and back alleys until he got onto the I29 and took off like a bat outta Hell. Ellen had struggled to keep up, making some educated guesses when did she lose them to the backways.

And then she'd struggled not to run headlong into them an hour later when they abruptly pulled off the road and she followed suit in a truly mad maneuver.

Ellen was shaking – for reasons she didn't understand beyond adrenaline – as she stumbled out of the car. Her legs gave out from under her unexpectedly, but Sam was there to catch her, pulling her into his broad chest. Ellen couldn't stop shaking as she sagged against him, burying her head in his shirt.

"Shit," she whispered, then repeated it again. Sam only held her tighter. She could feel Dean at her back. " Shit . I thought-"

"I know," Dean was quick to say, a hand settling on her shoulder with a reassuring grip. Ellen pulled away from the younger brother to meet his guilt-ridden green eyes. "I'm sorry."

"Bobby?" Her voice was a hoarse, cracking thing and she hated it. Hated the way her hands still shook.

"He's okay," Sam hurriedly reassured her, rubbing at her arms even as she found her footing and drew back from the man's chest. The younger Winchester smiled sadly at her, eyes rimmed with unshed tears. "Bobby's okay, Ellen. He wasn't there."

"Ash and Ronald?" she followed up, wiping at her eyes and the relief that dampened her cheeks. She already knew the answer before Sam's head dropped. Behind her, Dean cleared his throat.

"I'm sorry," he said gently, voice as guilt laden as his gaze had been. He withdrew his hand as she turned to him. "I… I didn't know they'd follow them to Bobby's."

"Who was it?" Ellen asked fiercely, strength building in tandem with the anger at whoever had dared go after her people.

"Demons," Dean replied, still struggling to keep her gaze but trying valiantly. She appreciated the effort. This was hardly his fault. "I should have known they'd follow Ash for the information he had."

Ellen nodded. "The Hellgates."

Ash had told her, hurriedly and with more technical jargon than she could keep up with, about the demons' plan that he had stumbled over. She'd understood the sensitivity of the information. What Hell could do to stop that knowledge from getting out. It just hadn't occurred to her they'd know Ash was running. Just like it hadn't occurred to the man from the future standing in front of her.

The older Winchester nodded, eyes downcast, but he offered a weak smile. "It's okay, though. They can't open it without the Colt, and Bobby has it, safe at the bunker."

Ellen frowned, glancing between the two brothers. "Bunker?"

Chapter Break

When Monday morning came, Chuck found himself staring at a blinking cursor and wondering how he was going to come up with a plausible background for a secret, magical bunker in Kansas. Perhaps whatever inspiration had given him the idea in the first place would be so kind as to follow it up with the backstory.

He rubbed at his stubbled jaw, contemplating how nice it would be to come up with ideas for the story before he was actively writing it.

A solid, familiar knock startled the writer from his morose thoughts and left Chuck staring, wide-eyed, at his front door. He knew that knock. He stared for far longer than was appropriate for his poor, computer-strained eyes.

Or his apparent guest. The knock repeated.

Chuck sprang out of his chair, very nearly tipping it over in his rush and having to take all the more time to catch and right it. He hurried over to his door, immediately reaching for the knob before hesitating. The prophet pulled back and adjusted his robe, only to realize he was once again wearing nothing but boxers and a dirty t-shirt several days old beneath.

Oh well, that was nothing new.

He reached for the knob but, again, pulled back at the last second. Maybe he had time to change. A quick shower, even?

A third knock, this one far less patient (and somehow all the more familiar), ended his internal debate. Chuck opened the door fast enough to nearly tip himself over.

There was Stephanie, standing on his front porch. It was a familiar sight he really hadn't been expecting this morning. Well, sort of, because Steph looked completely different than she usually did. Gone was the professional assistant and in its place was a pair of black leggings, sneakers, and a cotton tank top with some band name Chuck didn't know. It was the most… human she'd ever looked, if the terrified writer was being honest.

And, for some reason, she was staring at the ceiling.

"Steph?"

Blue eyes snapped down to him. The look of cautious trepidation, like she was waiting for something to happen, vanished in the blink of an eye and before him once more stood his stoically confident, incredibly intimidating, utterly unimpressed editorial assistant, Freaky Friday outfit aside.

"Chuck."

"Uhm…" The writer blinked several times, standing there, holding his door wide open. They both stood there, staring at one another. "You're here."

"Yes," Stephanie answered, brow furling as she regarded the writer with something akin to confusion. "I told you I would be."

She had told him that, hadn't she? Chuck wasn't quite able to wrap his head around that fact, though, because he'd known she wasn't coming back. He didn't know why he'd been so sure of that. Couldn't remember his reasoning, actually. It was just… something he'd known. As if she'd told him her contract was up and she'd never see him again.

But that's not what she had said. She'd said she'd be back on Monday. Today was Monday.

Huh.

"Did you… wanna come in?" he wondered aloud more than asked her, realizing he was blocking the door. Chuck hastily stepped to the side, gesturing her in with his arm.

Steph was looking particularly unimpressed as she walked past and somehow that made the writer feel immediately better. Still… rather than close the door behind her, Chuck took a hesitant step out onto the porch and twisted to look up at the ceiling.

Well… there was a rather unimpressive cobweb in the corner, the writer supposed. Maybe Steph was arachnophobic.

As Chuck pulled back inside, he spotted a car parked (if you could call it that) in the wrong direction along the curb (and on top of it), which drew him up short. It had no windows. Chuck squinted, trying to make out if it was a trick of the light, but no. All the windows – or at least the ones he could see – were gone. He was pretty sure the windshield was blown out rather than missing.

Okay…. That wasn't something you saw every day.

Chuck pulled back inside, closing the door. He'd known the house a couple doors down had two boys approaching the rougher teenage years but yeeeesh.

Chapter Break

"Welcome to the Batcave, Sammy," Dean announced with a grin as wide as his face and arms spread out before him.

Despite the terrible introduction, Sam stared at the room below them – identified as the 'War Room' by his brother (and yeah, they were not keeping that name, Sam thought) – with a dropped jaw and genuine awe.

It was just like the Baku dream. Sam almost couldn't believe it was real.

"And Ellen, too, of course," Dean added hastily, glancing sheepishly at the woman as she came up beside Sam, wrapping her hand around the railing. She was a lot less expressive than his brother but Dean knew her well enough. She was similarly impressed.

"Took you two long enough."

Bobby came from an adjoining room, wiping his hands on a rag as he entered the War Room. Sam couldn't see much of the room he'd come from but given the end of a conference table and some old leather chairs, Sam hazarded a guess it was the library. He recalled the shelves and shelves of books he'd started on in a dream, looking for a way to defeat a Baku.

He hoped all those books weren't just part of the dream. Sam was practically salivating at the thought of all that knowledge, just feet away.

Sudden, joyful barking announced Sarge well ahead of the dog charging into the room, mouth open and tongue flopping.

"Some guard dog you are," Bobby grouched down at the Shepherd as he came to a stop beside the older hunter, panting and staring up at the newcomers, oblivious to the critique.

Dean eyed the mutt with distaste, muttering to himself that his bunker didn't come with a dog, before sidelining the thought of a dirty furball running around his home. Nothing was gonna dim his spirits. He was home.

He grinned down at their surrogate father as Sam headed for the stairs (no doubt to jubilantly greet said furball). Bobby had clearly found the place and gotten the lights up and air running, something Dean hadn't had time to explain before getting arrested.

"We had to break outta jail first."

"And what? You stop for coffee afterwards?" the old hunter complained, though he was grinning as the group descended. Sam reached the bottom of the stairs first, crouching down to an enthusiastic Sarge. Ellen reached the bottom next and Bobby only had eyes for her.

"Ellen."

If those eyes were a little watery, no one seemed to notice.

The barkeep enveloped the man in a fierce hug, pressing her cheek into his neck. "I saw the house," she whispered against his neck. "I thought-"

"Don't matter what you thought. I'm alright," Bobby said gruffly, squeezing her before he pulled away. He offered a shrug, both abashed and full of relief. "We thought the same for you."

Dean had just set foot off the stairs when the lights flickered and everything suddenly powered down. The older Winchester yelped, though he was the only one, as the generators kicked in, lighting the War Room momentarily red with lockdown protocol. The subtle hum of air rattling through old vents died out as the fans stopped.

Then, with another electric hum, it all started back up again. The red lights switched off, replaced with the normal white, the air started flowing once more with a heavy hum, and the hunters were left looking warily around the bunker.

"Yeah," Bobby said with a one-shouldered shrug. "It's still a work in progress."

"Did anyone else feel that?" Dean asked, rubbing at his chest. There'd been a second, just before the lights cut out, when pressure had wrapped around him, like the air itself was trying to squash him. Just as it had gotten uncomfortable, it – whatever it was – had just… snapped. Like a rubber band drawn taut and slapped against some tender, unsuspecting skin. It had hurt like a bitch, however brief. Dean was still rubbing away the sting, even though it had kinda been everywhere. "Must have been the wards."

Sam stood from his crouch, eyes locked on his brother's chest. Dean immediately disliked the look of contemplation there and dropped his hand, adopting a glare. His brother at least looked a little sheepish before shrugging.

"Cas did say there could be consequences-"

Dean cut him off before they could have this conversation, yet again . "It's fine," he argued back, waving off his brother's concern. "Just the wards getting used to the new and improved me. I'll fix 'em later."

And he would. They'd have to make some adjustments anyway to make sure Cas could get in when she made it back to them.

Sam shrugged again. He and Bobby had both taken turns trying to get Dean to at least acknowledge the possible drawbacks of having a sliver of angelic grace merged with his soul, but the man from the future refused to hear any of it. At this point, the younger Winchester wasn't sure what else they could do. It was ultimately Dean's decision.

So Sam would just have to trust his brother to know more about slivers of grace and bunker security systems than the rest of them. Instead, he turned to Ellen, settling a hand on the barkeep's shoulder and smiling gently when she looked over and up at him. "We're really glad you're alright, Ellen."

It wasn't the first time he'd said it since they'd found her, Sam riding with Ellen for the remainder of the trip, but it might have been the first time Ellen really heard it. She sniffed again, refusing to let her eyes tear up, and nodded gratefully at the taller hunter.

"I'm glad you boys are alright, too." The woman rose to her full height – the equivalent of dusting herself off and standing back up – and leveled an intense stare at each of them in turn. "Now. Tell me everything that happened."

Chapter Break

Chuck watched his editorial assistant nervously, chewing on the end of his pen, as she flipped to the last page of the chapter. The last page of the whole book, actually. She'd had several chapters to catch up on, since she'd left before finishing the setup for the climax. Stephanie was a fairly fast reader but she'd paused several times, long enough to leave the writer twitchy.

"So?" he asked the second she flipped the final page to the bottom of the stack. Stephanie was staring at the top page with an expression Chuck couldn't fully decipher. It was looking disastrously close to indignation, though. He twisted and wrung his hands nervously. "What did you think?"

Blue eyes – nothing like the green he'd described in the book – locked onto his, and Chuck swallowed with some difficulty.

"Is it… uh… too- too much?" he stammered, pulling at the neckline of his t-shirt. It was suddenly feeling awfully tight. "She sort of came out of nowhere, if I'm being honest. But when I pictured her, she looked like you! Well… kinda."

Chuck scratched at his chin, still jiggling his leg nervously. Stephanie opened her mouth to reply, but the writer was already rambling on, climbing to his feet to begin nervously pacing.

"So you get a character in the story! She's even named after you. Sorta. It rhymes, anyway." Chuck suddenly drew up short, eyes wide as he whipped around to face her. His expression was slack with horror. “Is that, uh… bad? Too forward? Did I make this awkward?”

Steph held up a hand, mouth once again parted to reply, but Chuck resumed his pacing.

“I mean, I’m pretty sure she’s a bad guy, so there is that.” He tapped his finger against his chin, already thinking through how to correct the blunder he’d definitely just stepped right into with his editorial assistant. Of course she wouldn’t want a character named after her. Especially not a villain! What had he been thinking? “B-but who knows, right? Maybe the boys will win her over to their side. She’s definitely got a thing for Sam. Maybe we can use that. He can persuade her-”

Chuck spun away from his editorial assistant, who was now staring at him with wide eyes, jaw snapped closed. He’d have to get writing pretty quickly to fix this. He had maybe, sort of promised Sera he was almost done with the book.

“Chuck.”

The writer froze, halfway to sitting at his desk, pen already back in his mouth, mindless chewing resumed. “Hm?”

The look Steph gave him could almost be called fond, if Stephanie was ever fond and Chuck wasn’t completely delusional (and knew it).

“The character is fine,” she assured him, offering up something of a smile, but it didn’t quite seem right. “I’m honored.”

“Oh. Oh!” The writer was momentarily surprised, then found himself grinning. “Ah, that’s, uh, great. I mean, no stress if you don’t end up liking her.”

“I’m sure I will-”

“I don’t even know her role yet,” Chuck continued babbling, plopping into his desk chair rather ungracefully. He was already reaching for his laptop.

“Let’s not worry about that right now-”

“Or what she has planned for this whole Bind-thing with Sam.” Chuck wasn’t really listening as his editorial assistant attempted to steer him towards any other topic. “I mean, worst case, if she turns out evil, I can just kill her off!”

The silence that followed that statement took several painfully long moments to register, but when it did, Chuck was instantly back on edge. His head whipped up, eyes seeking out Stephanie, who had a strained smile that stretched her face in really weird ways. Chuck blinked. Had he made things worse again? He was only trying to reassure her that if she didn't like being a character, he could easily erase her from ever existing. That was all!

Upon telling her as much, the smile got so, so much worse and Steph's voice made a weird, strangled noise as she tried to assure him it was fine.

Chuck spent the next thirty minutes panic-rambling about the new character until his editorial assistant gave up trying to console (or distract) him and just put in her headphones to tune him out.

(Well, his headphones actually. She'd sort of claimed them, along with his iPod, as her own since day one. It was fine, he didn't use them all that often anyway.)

Chapter Break

The sun was getting low in the sky, setting the horizon afire with intense reds and yellows that drifted upwards into softer pinks and purples. Stars were just beginning to dot the sky as a once vibrant blue faded towards deep indigo. The tree line was a silhouette against the setting sun, casting long, haunting shadows across the meadow. Birdsong was still the primary competition against the crackling fire, but soon they would settle down and the crickets would start up.

It was a peaceful spot, really. Located behind the bunker, close enough to the river to hear the rush of water over rock, it was a little chunk of nature tucked away from a world of blood and violence and things that went bump in the night. Dean had even seen a couple deer wander through the field on the rare mornings he spent out there with a cup of coffee and his dead guy robe. Sam swore there were foxes and rabbits, too, but he'd stopped recapping his morning wildlife encounters once Dean started calling him a Disney princess.

Cas had once marveled at the bees. A couple months from now, the meadow would be a field of wildflowers, quite literally abuzz with insects, and the angel would just plop himself down in the middle of it and sit for hours. Sammy had helped him set up a little garden back there and together filled it with plants that would attract honeybees.

Dean had made fun of the two of them out loud, but secretly he'd been warmed to see Cas follow the younger Winchester so intently, parodying his moves as Sam dug a hole and plopped a seed inside.

("You want a hole about twice as deep as the seed is wide," Sam had said, using his thumb to make the smallest of holes in the dirt. Dean had just harrumphed – might as well toss the damn things onto the ground and see what happened – but the angel had studiously followed the younger Winchester's actions with attentiveness and care. Dean had hidden the warm fuzzies behind a sip of coffee.)

So yeah, it was a peaceful place full of peaceful memories.

This wasn't one of them.

Dean watched the pyre burn with forced numbness. The pain was there, he could feel it, eating away at his chest like those flames were eating wood and flesh and bone. But he refused to let it surface.

They'd laid too many friends to rest here.

Kevin.

Charlie.

Now Andy.

It was a good spot, at least, if there had to be a spot (and they were Winchesters; there would always have to be a spot). Charlie would have liked it. Dean wasn't so sure about Kevin – he didn't usually like anything that had to do with the Winchesters in general, let alone death.

And Andy… well, Andy would have loved the spot and hated the somber affair.

It was just the two Winchesters still standing watch now. Well, and the dog. Ellen had helped build the funeral pyre and stayed a respectable amount of time before making her way back inside. She had barely known the kid, so what she grieved was the loss of a good hunter and her daughter's friend. Bobby had stayed until just a few minutes ago, when too much 'dust and smoke' had gotten in his eyes to stay on.

Which left Dean and Sam. And Sarge, who'd sat down between Sam and Bobby when they first lit the fire and hadn't moved since.

'Like a friggin' poster for a hallmark movie called a Boy and his Dog', Dean thought, both bitter and full of grief. Mostly bitter to be so full of grief.

"Andy would hate this," Sam said from beside him, arms crossed over his chest against the chill creeping in around them as the sun went down. Dean grunted what might have been a laugh under better circumstances. The corner of Sam's mouth twitched upward. "There isn't even beer."

"Or chips," Dean agreed with a nod, shoving his hands in his pockets.

Sam fell quiet beside him once more, the mood trying to pull them back under. "We should make a run after this. To a store. Get some supplies."

Dean nodded again, but didn't say anything. The bunker was predictably empty of anything that wasn't canned and meant to survive an apocalypse (go figure). It wasn't much of a hunter's funeral without a drink to pour out, but none of the hunters had wanted to wait any longer.

"We'll throw him the party he would have wanted," Sam added, shifting from foot to foot. Dean glanced sidelong at his brother. He was trying to make small talk, the older Winchester noted, frowning.

The question was why? Whatever the answer, Dean knew he wouldn't like it. Otherwise, Sam would just come out and say it. Well, he wasn't going to help. With any luck, Sam would lose whatever courage he was building and never bring it up again for the rest of their lives.

The birds faded out and the crickets did, indeed, start up around them, along with a stronger breeze. It got quieter. Stiller. Dean almost thought he'd gotten away with it.

"Dean-"

"You're gonna love the bunker," the older Winchester interrupted, unsure what had prompted him to but suddenly dreading whatever it was his brother had to say.

Beside him, Sam huffed. "Yeah, I bet I will. But-"

“We get our own rooms,” the older Winchester tacked on, tone edging towards desperate but eyes locked on the fire. “Are memory foam mattresses a thing yet? If they are, we have got to get a couple of those. They are amazing , let me tell you.”

“Dean.”

There was something in Sam’s voice. Chiding, sure. Annoyed, of course. But mainly it was the slight ring of disappointment that finally shut Dean up. Hesitantly, he looked over at his kid brother, who was regarding him with sympathetic, knowing eyes. Dean hated it, because it confirmed that the tight ball of anxiety in his gut wasn’t misplaced. He wasn’t going to like this.

“I can’t wait to see all of it,” Sam said with genuine interest once he had his brother’s attention. “But I can’t stay.”

Yup, there it was.

Dean closed his eyes, turning back to the fire. It was truly cold out now, even standing as close to the blaze as the brothers were. March nights in Kansas weren’t exactly warm. Dean shoved his hands deeper into the pockets of his jacket.

“I need to figure out how to… use these powers,” Sam explained cautiously, turning his gaze back to the pyre as well. He knew Dean didn’t want to hear it – about his powers or the fact that he had to leave. But that didn’t change either thing. He had powers and he had to figure out how to safely use them. “I can’t do that here.”

“Why the hell not?” Dean snapped back, anger clear in his voice and posture. “The bunker’s a friggin’ treasure trove of knowledge.”

“And I want to learn all of it,” Sam said earnestly, stuffing his hands in his jacket pockets as he turned to his brother. Dean refused to follow suit, stiffly staring at the fire, but Sam didn’t let that deter him. “But books can only take you so far.”

As intended, that finally got Dean to look at him, shooting Sam an affronted frown. “Who the hell are you and what have you done with my brother?”

“I’m still him, Dean.”

And if there was a little too much underlying that statement… well. That had been intended too. Dean was staring at him with eyes a little too wide now. A little wounded and a little more understanding.

That was his brother's called-out face. He looked away again and Sam couldn't help the soft smile.

"I will always be your brother. I'm just… a Jedi, now, too. And I need training."

"Padawan. If you need training, you're a friggin' padawan," Dean grumbled beside him but Sam's smile only grew.

He knew when Dean stopped arguing, he'd usually won. Oh, his brother was still pissed. It was visible in every line of his body and the square of his very clenched jaw. But he wasn't going to fight Sam on it.

"I'll be here. You need me, call and I'll be here," Sam promised fiercely, and Dean's gaze slid his way, sidelong. Green eyes were suspiciously wet – scared Sam correctly identified – but after several long seconds of crackling wood and flame, his older brother nodded roughly.

They lapsed back into silence as Andy's pyre began to die down. It was Dean's turn to awkwardly shift his weight from foot to foot. He was pissed. And grumpy as hell. Talk about a mood killer – and your surrogate little brother's funeral wasn't exactly a great starting place. But he'd told Sam he'd let him make his own decisions. He'd made his bed and now he had to lie, fuming, in it.

"You know where you're gonna go?" he asked, trying to sound neutral and failing miserably. What came out was a garbled mess of disinterest and anger. But Sam didn't hold it against him, at least.

"I thought I'd start with Missouri Mosely," he answered, the corner of his mouth quirked upward. It was sardonic and possibly self-deprecating, but at least it wasn't the frown plastered all over his brother's face. "She's the only psychic I know."

Dean grunted, thoughts drifting his significantly fuller little black hunter's book. He should offer the kid some names. Dean didn't know how Psychic Padawans worked, whether it was the one Jedi Master Sam was looking for or a more well-rounded education from multiple 'masters'.

He idly wondered if Pamela Barnes would be happy to see them, not knowing what associating with them would cost her, or if she'd somehow know they were bad news. She was, after all, the best damn psychic in the state.

Dean thought about it as they lapsed back into the surrounding stillness. It didn't take long to shelve it for later. There'd be time and, as much as he didn't care for her, Missouri would be a good place for Sammy to start. He could bring it up later if Missouri didn't work out. Tonight had had enough depressing shit, already. Dean was done thinking about it.

"Guess I better go to town and get those party supplies," the older Winchester said moodily, turning away from the diminishing fire. After a second – no doubt a silent prayer (a final farewell) for their fallen brother – Sam turned and joined him.

"I'll come with. Your idea of party food is microwavable burritos."

Dean shoved his giant of a brother hard in the shoulder, taking some comfort in the offended huff of laughter he got once the man righted. "And yours is vegetables ."

Sam quickened his pace to catch back up, lest Dean leave without him (which he wouldn't put past his grumpy brother, who'd 'just want a drive' and some unhealthy alone time that probably started and ended at a bar). "It's called a party platter, Dean. Party is literally in the name. You're not going to win this one."

"And you are not bringing vegetables into my Baby, no matter what the label calls 'em."

Chapter Break

Gabriel was watching his sister with no amount of subtly. Straight up staring at her, that's what he was doing. If she noticed or cared, Cassie didn't show it. Her eyes were locked on the TV once more (and he was going to have to have a word with lil' sis about getting addicted to the idiot box pretty soon). While no emotion showed on her host's face, her grace was teeming .

The archangel couldn't stop staring if he tried. An angel, openly exhibiting emotions. Well, open for an angel, he supposed.

An errant thought flitted along the peripheral of his consciousness. He couldn't let Castiel return to heaven. They wouldn't abide such an attachment to a pair of humans, let alone the true vessels. And there was no way his sister could hide it. She wasn't even trying .

Gabriel had no idea how to stop the avalanche that was coming her way.

"Why do you care?" He hadn't meant to say it aloud. Hadn't even been conscious of his mouth moving or his tongue shaping the words. Castiel didn't so much as blink.

"Andy Gallagher was my…" She paused, hesitating on her next word and Gabriel wondered what it would have been if she hadn't started thinking. Friend? Family ? God, she was so screwed and the archangel didn't know why it mattered so much to him. "He was a good person."

He snorted.

"Good people die all the time, Cassie."

Blue eyes finally turned his way, wide as ever but so intense. Gabe didn't know what it was about his sister's eyes – borrowed eyes, though the grace behind them echoed the intensity in a way that was just… not angelic – but they carried a severity to them, a challenge that no other sibling had ever managed.

Gabe had never once been called on his shit by any of his family members. Not even Mike or Luci. At best he'd faced their disappointment or disdain. But no one ever actually called him out. The painful truth was none of his siblings had ever really known him – or cared – enough to try.

Cassie didn't know him either. But her stupid eyes still said, 'I'm gonna call you out, regardless.'

"So," she began, voice grave in a way that made Gabriel's gut clench. He felt like a kid with his hand stuck in a cookie jar and he had no idea why . "Because death is common, it does not deserve to be mourned?"

Turned out, being called on your shit kinda sucked.

"… Touché," Gabriel conceded with a tilt of his head. Castiel turned back to the television, but Gabe wasn't done yet. He hadn't gotten an answer. At least, not a satisfying one. "Why do you care so much ?"

"I don't know," came the honest, immediate reply. He could tell by the swirls of her grace, an array of vibrant blues: from the icy cerulean of sorrow to the deep midnight of acceptance. They blurred with eddies of affectionate rose and nostalgic mauve. She was not unlike the sunset on the screen, and Gabriel was back to staring.

Castiel wasn't hiding the movement of her grace and Gabriel felt oddly… honored to be trusted like that. Or maybe his sister just didn't care what he thought.

The archangel looked away, bothered by that and deciding not to look further into it. He had done enough introspection already to fill that quota for the next three centuries. Instead, he reached for his soda, determined to stop letting his sister get to him so much. He'd spent thousands of years so far unmoved, doing whatever he wanted regardless of the consequences.

One little angel that could was not going to change that now.

"I just do," Cassie continued, oblivious to her brother's internal struggle. "I know I am not supposed to."

Gabe snorted so hard he took a dose of soda straight to his sinus cavities and boy, a bump of cocaine had nothing on carbonation. Holy shit did that sting.

Castiel was regarding him with what looked like cautious concern as he coughed and sputtered. He flapped a hand at her as if to say, 'no need, I'm fine ,' and managed to get himself back under control in admirable time.

"Please," he scoffed, voice still rough but tone making up for it. He leveled his sister with a look. "Angels have emotions. We get scared, and happy, and angry. We grieve when one of us is wronged, mourn when one of us is killed. We have emotions aplenty , sis. We just got real damn good at hiding them and then pretending we don't."

Cassie was regarding him with those stupid, wide eyes again and once more Gabriel had stuck his hand into that damn cookie jar. And once more, he didn't know why .

"…Like Vulcans."

This time the soda didn't go up the wrong set of tubes, but it sure went down the wrong one. Gabe was stuck coughing and hacking until Castiel – hesitantly as all get out – reached over and hit him several times on the back with her one free hand.

It really didn't help, but the archangel figured he could give her that one. Thought that counts, and all that.

"I'm sorry," he said as he finally got air back into his lungs with a choked gasp. There were tears in his eyes from the trauma he was putting his poor vessel through. "You've seen Star Trek!? "

Castiel just blinked.

Chapter Break

"I can't believe Dean taught you about Star Trek and didn't show you any of it. What a total douchebag." Gabriel slurped at his loopty-loop straw, eyes on the screen. McCoy was running rampant around 19 th century New York, high off his mind, and Kirk and Spock were trying to find him without falling maddeningly in love with a dead girl. Well, one of them was fighting the good fight. The other one was Vulcan.

"We were rather pressed for time." Castiel hadn't taken her eyes off the screen since the opening credits of the first episode. Turned out, his sister was a total sci-fi junkie. Gabe was so proud (and already creating a list of what they'd watch next.)

"Terrible excuse," Gabe shot back, settling into his recliner. He was watching Cassie again, this time from his peripheral. He still hadn't gotten his answer. "I didn't ask if you care. You obviously do. You totally suck at hiding your emotions, by the way. You'd make a terrible Vulcan."

"I was not trying to hide them," Cassie answered without missing a beat or taking her eyes from the screen as Spock and Kirk finally located Doctor McCoy. "Perhaps I am like Spock. A hybrid."

Gabriel frowned at that, wondering what the littlest angel that could even meant by that. Hopefully nothing remotely close to the creation of a species from, erm, reproductive means. They already had those; they were called Nephilim. And if there was one thing he was sure his sister wasn't (even if he was still figuring out just what the hell she was) it was a nephilim.

"Don't even joke about that," he grumbled, thinking back to a towering dung heap and a city full of people who couldn't understand one another. As far as cosmic jokes went, the tower of Babel had been hilarious. Gabe almost wished he'd been responsible for it.

The genocide of the Nephilim that followed… not so much.

"I am told I lie like a Vulcan quite well," Castiel continued, once more oblivious to the internal turmoil she was causing in her brother.

"Now that, I believe." Gabe said with a snort, tucking his legs under him as Edith Keeler ran into the street. He wondered how his sentimental sister would handle the death of a fictional character. "But I asked you why you care so much ."

Cassie turned her attention to the archangel even as the car struck Ms. Keeler, answering Gabe's curiosity. Either she didn't care, or she deemed his question more important. Gabriel didn't know which of those was less satisfactory, but they both kind of sucked.

"I don't know," she repeated from before and Gabriel's open curiosity morphed into annoyance. But the littlest angel that could wasn't done yet. "There is… something about Dean Winchester-"

A shadow crossed over the archangel's face, taking it from annoyed to something a lot more dangerous. Castiel was quick to move on.

"It's not just them, Gabriel. It's everything. Earth is beautiful."

The archangel looked away, still frowning. "Earth is a mess."

"Maybe, but it's interesting."

Well, he couldn't argue against that. Gabe wouldn't say he'd gotten attached (he'd been real damn careful not to, or so he'd thought), but Earth had been a pretty entertaining roommate for the last six thousand years.

"It doesn't deserve to be wiped out by our feuding."

"It will literally be paradise for all of them, Cassie," Gabe countered, but even as he said the words, they felt hollow. Like they were someone else's words and he was just parroting them because… well, because he'd been told to.

"Even if paradise did exist-"

Gabriel's head snapped back to his sister with a sharp look. "You're saying Heaven isn't paradise?"

Castiel returned the look with one of her own, even if her face barely moved. Her grace said it all.

"If it was, why did you leave?"

Gabe fought the urge to shrink back. To think, an archangel , being schooled by a power. Ridiculous. Laughable. And yet, Gabriel felt called out once more.

What the hell was it with this angel?

He cleared his throat and looked away, the 'touché' remained silent this time.

"Even if Heaven was paradise – was the incorruptible, happy ending that everyone deserved," Castiel continued on her earlier train of thought and Gabriel could do nothing but sit and listen, a captive audience. Her eyes were a fierce and blazing blue that Gabe, for all his effort, kept coming back to. "Wouldn't that be boring?"

Castiel's thoughts were of her days in the archives, sorting battle plans. Tasks that had once seemed vital, now meaningless. Busy work and nothing more.

"Earth may be a mess," she admitted, unable to deny it. There was disease, death, and violence. But there was also good. Pancakes that tasted like molecules, brothers that loved one another, a boy that found a dog just to bring an old man some comfort. "Humans may be flawed, and their imperfection is chaotic, sometimes deadly but… is that not life? From the dinosaurs to the first fish that walked upon the land. All of it was born from chaos. Who are we to end that? It's beautiful and fascinating. We should be nurturing it, not heralding its destruction."

The angel turned back to the television. They were on a new episode, but Castiel wasn't really watching it.

"We were created to nurture it."

Gabriel stared at the screen, ignoring his sister. She wasn't wrong. He'd never thought of it in those terms, sure, but they weren't wrong. A little overly poetic and sickeningly cheesy, sure. Annoying, but not wrong.

Then again, neither was he.

"We were also created to destroy it. It's written in stone , Castiel."

And it was. It was . If there was anything Gabriel had learned, anything he still believed in, it was that. He had to, because if that wasn't true…

What the hell was?

What had it all been for , if none of God's plans actually mattered?

"That is not a good enough reason to stand by while something worthwhile is annihilated." Those blue eyes were back on him again but Gabriel refused to turn to be taken in by them again.

"I don't understand you."

He really didn't, despite all attempts. He couldn't. How could an angel – a creation of God – have such faith in the very idea of faithlessness?

Gabe shoved the footrest of his recliner back into a seated position and made to stand. Castiel was still watching him (and he was adamantly refusing to return the not-favor), but her thoughts were elsewhere, with a human she'd only known for a short time. Someone who had explained it to her, when she didn't understand either.

"Gabriel," she began slowly, still finding the words that had once helped her. "Have you heard of The Charge of the Light Brigade ?"

Chapter Break

It was a good night. Maybe a little somber for a 'party', but even a celebration of life could afford some sorrow. They drank and ate – Bobby put chips on everyone's sandwiches, pressing down the bread with a crunch Andy would have appreciated – and they told stories. Most of 'em were about Andy, but Ellen threw in her fair share of Ash and his newfound friendship with Ronald ("two peas in a paranoid pod," she'd called them).

And if some bouts of laughter faded into silence or ended in tears… well, that was life, after all. What the hell else were they celebrating, if not that.

"So wait," Ellen interrupted the latest story with a wave of her hand, beer bottle included. Luckily it was almost empty. There was lingering water in her eyes, but this round was from ab-abusing laughter. "You're telling me Jo – my Jo – helped dig up H.H. Holmes? The H.H. Holmes?"

"Well, Andy did most of it," Sam corrected, though he was grinning too.

"The city did most of it," Dean corrected his brother's correction. "Andy just told them what to do."

"But Jo helped," Sam added impishly, recalling how the young blonde had spent half that night by Andy's side, giggling and whispering things to him until he was laughing too. Well, cackling was a better descriptor. Ten minutes later, enough pizza had shown up to feed the half of the city working the dig. Thirty minutes after that had been a delivery guy with a lot of beer and red bull. At around three in the morning, masseuses had shown up.

Those two together had been damn dangerous.

"Shouldn'ta spent the whole night pouting in the car," Bobby piped in, eyebrows raised at Ellen, who glared right back.

"Excuse me," she started, reaching forward to steal the glass of whisky in front of the old hunter. She downed it in one gulp, slamming it down on the table. A clear indication that she'd have another, thank you very much. "Did your daughter go and get herself kidnapped by America's most famous serial killer without telling you?"

Dean twisted the top off the bottle of Bobby's rot gut and poured her a full glass.

"And I do not pout ," she added petulantly.

Bobby snorted, swiping his now full glass back before she could take another swig.

“Hey!” Ellen snarled at him, but there was zero heat in it and a whole lot of played-up outrage.

Dean tilted his chair onto its back legs, leaning back until he could stretch out his arm and reach the nearest bookshelf behind him. He slid two books to the side, revealing four upside-down whiskey glasses. The man from the future snagged one, flipped it around and offered it to Ellen as he settled his chair back on all four legs.

The other three hunters were staring, conversation fully paused. Dean just continued holding out the glass, looking at them innocently. With a huff and a smirk, Ellen reached out and took the glass.

“Might be dusty,” Dean offered with a half-cocked grin.

Ellen just got to pouring, unconcerned. “Finally, some future knowledge that’s actually useful.”

The library fell horribly, painfully silent. Dean had sucked in a single breath, loud in the abrupt silence, and hadn’t let it back out. His expression was carefully blank – too much so – but he was noticeably a shade paler than he ought to be.

“Didn’t mean nothin’ by it, kid” Ellen said immediately, tone firm as she set the bottle of whiskey back down. She kept her eyes on the boy until he met them and he let out that shaky breath. An equally shaky nod followed.

“It’s alright,” Dean said, tone muted but expression open. He nodded at Sam and Bobby and the two men relaxed as well. The older Winchester offered a weak smile Ellen’s way. “I know you didn’t, Ellen.”

Harvelle women were tough by nature and Ellen was the toughest of ‘em all. She got that way through loss and a hundred punches that took her to the ground before she clawed her way back up. She was steel and sometimes just as cold as it. But she was never, ever cruel.

It was only after Dean’s words that Ellen herself relaxed. Her fierce expression shifted into something softer, hurt and apologetic. Hell of a woman, Ellen Harvelle.

“Still,” Dean drawled, trying to put some more strength into that smile and mostly succeeding. He rolled the base of his near empty beer bottle in a circle on the table, staring at it. “Would be nice if some of this future crap I got stuck in my head actually did shit for a change.”

He tilted his head back to chug the remains of his beer.

“What the hell do you call having an intact soul, you idjit!” Bobby barked, reaching across the table to smack Dean as surely as he would have smacked Ellen were she not a woman (and one that he was terrified of (and rightly so)).

“Ow!” Dean balked once he didn’t have a mouthful of beer (that had almost gone everywhere, thank you very much, Bobby). He rubbed at the back of his head and glared grumpily at his surrogate father. “Well, I don’t call it grounds for hitting me!”

In the chair beside him, Sam rolled his eyes and stood, collecting his empty beer bottle from the table and grabbing Dean’s from his hand. He headed out of the room in the direction of the kitchen.

“What happened where you came from?” Ellen interrupted what was mounting to be a bicker-fest. The group could probably use the banter, but a thought had settled in her gut, too heavy and obtrusive to ignore. And she wouldn’t bring it up later, not after they returned to festivities and happy memories. Best to get it out now. “They get the Roadhouse?”

The mood immediately came crashing back down. Ellen regretted it, but not enough to take her question back.

Dean swallowed, the motion visibly difficult, and nodded. “Yeah.”

“While we were open?”

It wasn’t the first time the thought had nagged at her while she was driving across the country searching for someone to tell her what the hell was happening. Dean had only mentioned her and Ash when he’d told the MIT mutt to get the hell out of the bar in a damn near panic. Ash hadn’t been able to say more and there hadn’t been time to ask. But Ellen had her suspicions. Call her a glass half-empty pessimist, but if anything had taught her to be that way, it was this life.

Dean clenched his jaw, staring directly at her with a gaze that questioned where she was going with this. Unfortunately, he already knew the answer. The hunter didn’t respond other than to nod.

“How many?”

The man from the future was already shaking his head. “Ellen, don’t.”

“How. Many.”

Sam walked back in, hesitating for only a moment at the charged tension in the room. He set the beer down in front of his brother before retaking his seat, eyeing the others cautiously.

Dean sighed, rubbing at the back of his neck and refusing to make eye contact. With anyone. “Eleven. Including Ash.”

“Jo?”

“No. God, no ,” Dean insisted fervently, involuntarily jerking forward at the question. “I would have told you.”

“Me?”

The man from the future hesitated, glancing first at Bobby before shaking his head. When Ellen immediately raised a challenging brow, he shook his head again. “No. I mean it, Ellen. You were out getting, uh… pretzels, I think. Dumb luck, you called it.”

Across from him, Ellen huffed. She leaned back in her chair, crossing her arms over her chest. “Sounds about right…. Eleven hunters.”

“Don’t, Ellen. Don't do that to yourself,” Dean repeated, practically begging her. But the woman just shook her head.

“You saved eleven people with that phone call, Dean,” she said, voice once again firm but no longer hard. Her gaze was difficult to meet, but too intense to look away from either. “Good people.”

Dean swallowed roughly once more. He was getting damn annoyed of the feeling of glass shards in his throat.

‘Harden up ,’ he thought viciously at himself.

“Yeah,” the older Winchester agreed bitterly, leaning back in his chair, but his shoulders unconsciously hunched in on himself. “Just not enough of ‘em.”

“Don’t do that to yourself, Dean,” Ellen warned him, throwing his own words back at him. She wasn’t unkind about it, but it didn’t leave him with much of an argument. At least, not without being a hypocrite (which he already knew he was, it just wasn’t something he was used to acknowledging aloud).

“We can’t save everyone, boy. You know that,” Bobby added, eyeing him with the same challenging look as Ellen, daring him to somehow name himself the exception to self-flagellation and blame.

The man from the future opted for silence as his best response, not agreeing with them but dropping it since he wasn't going to win either. Bobby gave him the stink eye, knowing exactly what he was doing, but turned to Ellen.

"Did Ash tell you what he'd found that the demons wanted so bad?"

"Uh, yeah, here." Ellen set down her glass to reach into her back pocket. Dean had already known about the Hellgates, so it didn't seem like important information anymore. At least not time-sensitive information.

She pulled out a folded up piece of paper and set it on the library table between the four of them, starting to unfold it. Ellen used her hand to flatten it out and Bobby's whiskey glass in the top corner to keep it that way. It was indeed a map of Wyoming, with five x's marked in the lower left hand corner. Dean knew if he drew lines connecting all of them – lines that matched the placement of the railroads – it would form a devil's trap.

"A Hellgate, in Fossil Butte," Dean identified, deciding it was safe to participate again so long as the conversation remained on this new, safe topic. He traced those iron lines with a finger, clearly creating a star with his invisible drawing. "Samuel Colt built an eighty mile devil's trap around it with iron railroads. Demons can't cross."

"And the only way to open it is with the Colt," Sam added, though it sounded enough like a question aimed Dean's way that the older Winchester nodded.

He'd wondered, ever so briefly, if they should go to Fossil Butte anyway. Not to keep the Hellgate closed – there was nothing demons could do to open it without the Colt. Which would make bringing it there a damn stupid thing to do.

But John Winchester had escaped Hell through that gate. What would happen if they didn't open it?

Of course, about thirty seconds of self-deprecating and apocalyptically suicidal thoughts later, Dean had realized (in a voice that sounded a lot like his dad) that John Winchester would have kicked both his sons' asses for even thinking about unleashing hundreds of demons onto Earth just to get his butt out of Hell.

So, as difficult and as painful as it had been to acknowledge that he was sealing his own father's fate, Dean had let go of the thought. No point bringing it up to Sam or Bobby. He could carry the weight of that knowledge on his own.

"Ash found it by tracking demonic omens. Same ones we had him tracking to find Yellow Eyes." Dean's gaze was still on the map, though his thoughts were in a different timeline.

"Yeah," Ellen confirmed, though she was eyeing the older Winchester in a way that pulled him immediately back to the present. She tugged a second map out from under the first, the two having been folded together. "That one, and the one in Arizona."

Dean sat straight up. "What?"

Just then, an ear-piercing alarm started to ring. Ellen and Sam clapped hands to their ears even as Bobby sprang from his chair, knocking over the bottle of whiskey in the meantime. Dean was already up and headed for the War Room, heart pounding.

The consoles there were lighting up like fireflies on steroids. The bunker lights switched, casting the four hunters in an ominous red. And Dean, staring at the console, was pretty sure all hell had just broken loose.

Chapter Break

The men were working tirelessly, around the clock, to dig out the old mineshaft. No one had told them why they were doing it and most hadn't asked. They were getting pretty hefty paychecks for this one, so they went where the work took 'em and did what they were told.

Andrew McCormick – the overnight crew chief – wiped at his sweat and grime-covered forehead, staring at the tunnel entrance.

It had taken them months to excavate the old shaft, rebuild the necessary supports and reinforcements, to get down to the mine below. They were very nearly there. The crew had made it through the last collapsed section safely, only to come across a pretty damn solid wall of stone. That hadn't been no collapsed tunnel – it was a damn dead end.

A dead end the bosses said they were busting through.

Which seemed dumb as all get out to McCormick, along with quite a few of his men. Whoever had first dug this thing obviously gave up when they ran into the wall, and likely for a reason. Although they'd estimated its thickness and planned accordingly, it was a wall . You didn't get this deep underground, encounter a rockface, and find something on the other side. You only found more wall.

Whoever stumbled across it eons ago doodled all over it too. Thing was covered in funky symbols and nonsense. Jeffries had mentioned then that the whole area was old Indian ground, so they were probably petroglyphs.

McCormick told the men he'd try to get them some extra cash for digging up an old burial ground – some of 'em were suspicious while others just had a conscience that upper management clearly didn't – but no one had gotten back to him about it yet.

Didn't matter either way; the bosses had told them to blast through it, so that was what they were going to do. Or, at least, it had been up till an hour ago. The dynamite was all lined up, switches were primed, and McCormick and his men were all at a safe distance back up top.

It should have been time to get paid. Which meant, of course, the men in the white hats had told them to stop.

Now they were all just sitting around, waiting for the word to proceed. McCormick cast some serious side-eye at the white hats just a few feet away. They were waiting around doing nothing as well.

Bureaucratic bullshit, McCormick thought with a shake of his head. Some pencil pusher in some city somewhere was probably waiting on the word of a politician or government official, who had to confirm they were good to go destroying what was very likely an indigenous peoples' holy ground.

Whatever was on the other side better be worth the paycheck.

One of the white hats checked his watch, muttering to the other. McCormick strained an ear to listen in.

"It's fifteen past," Mr. Seivers was saying. McCormick never much liked Seivers. Slimy weasel of a man who'd spent the last three months looking down his nose at the crew. The rat had probably never worked a real day in his life. White dress shirt always pristine and pressed in the middle of the fuckin' desert. Hell, he'd probably popped outta his mama wearing it just like that.

"I'm aware," Mr. Javier replied, eyes on the silent dig site. "Patience."

McCormick didn't much care for Mr. Javier, either, but that was more on principle than a general dislike of the man. He was a straight shooter. Serious, stern, no nonsense. He told you what he wanted and expected it to get done. McCormick could respect that well enough, even if he thought the work he wanted done was a waste of his men's time.

But as long as the checks cleared, they could go about digging up whatever the hell they wanted wherever the hell they wanted to do it.

A ringtone broke the relative silence of the camp and Mr. Javier unclipped his cellphone from his belt to hold up to his ear.

"Yes. Confirmed. We're on it." A man of few words, that Mr. Javier. Another thing McCormick liked about the man. He hung up the phone and replaced it in its hip holster. He turned to Seivers. "It's time."

Seivers grinned and his eyes slid over to McCormick. In the dim light of the site – new moon, Andrew thought errantly – his eyes almost looked black. McCormick shivered and blamed it on the chilly desert night.

"You heard him, McCormick. Knock it down."

The crew chief hesitated for only a moment – something about Seivers smile giving him the damn creeps – before he shook it off and held up his walkie talkie. He pressed and held the button on the side. "We are good to go, Jeffries. Blow it."

"Copy," came the crackled reply. "Detonation in three. Two. One."

The camp fell eerily silent, Jeffrie's countdown echoing from a multitude of walkies throughout the crowd of men. A distant sound, like muffled thunder, rumbled through the ground beneath them. A shockwave hit a second later, nothing more than a minor quake but enough to rattle the tent poles and lighter equipment. Harris's thermos rolled off a cooler and clanked loudly on the ground. The kid righted it without looking, eyes locked on the tunnel.

It fell over again a second later.

McCormick stared at the canister as it trembled atop the dirt. He could feel the same vibration beneath his own feet. Something wasn't right.

A second jolt hit them all and it wasn't no minor quake. Several of the crew were knocked off their feet.

"Cave in!" McCormick yelled at the same time as several others. He was already pulling out his walkie talkie when he heard screams. McCormick whipped back to the tunnel, stunned into frozen silence.

Black smoke was pouring out of the tunnel entrance. At first he thought they'd ignited an oil fire, sending an immediate prayer up for the three men that had been stationed just inside the entrance to ignite the switches. But then he saw his crew running.

And the smoke, chasing after them.

"What in God's name-"

McCormick stumbled back as his men were taken to the ground, one by one, by the black smoke. It was thick, slithering, and alive. Andrew turned in horror to the bosses and froze at what he saw.

They were watching it with smiles on their faces. And it was no trick of the light. Their damn eyes were black.

It was the last thing Andrew McCormick saw – surrounded by the horrified screams of his men – before the smoke was on him, too, forcing its way down his throat.

Andrew hit the ground from the force of impact, struggling and choking as the black, slithering essence plowed into him. He went still shortly after it disappeared down his throat. It took him a moment to climb back to his feet, to dust the Arizona dirt off his already filthy jeans and adjust his heavy jacket around his shoulders.

He cracked his neck side to side and took in a deep breath. When he opened his eyes, they were yellow.

"Welcome to earth, my Prince," Mr. Javier said, a wicked smile stretched across his usually reserved face.

The newly possessed McCormick just smiled. "It's good to be back."

Chapter Break

It was too damn cold to be walking around without mittens, Adam Milligan thought as he shoved his hands deep inside his winter coat. Sure, it was March and sure, maybe in other places that meant it was springtime. And yes, a daytime temperature above thirty was such a nice change that everyone broke out their lighter coats and started skimping on scarves and accessories. But in Minnesota, the truth was March was not springtime, no matter what it said on the calendar.

Somehow, he (and everyone else in town) always seemed to forget that once the thermometer reached forty.

The fifteen-year-old found himself digging his hat out of his school backpack and shoving it over his ears as he made the walk from Rose's house to his own. He really needed to start looking for a car. He didn't quite have the money saved up yet, but he still had seven months before he could get his license anyway. Maybe if he found the right one, the seller would hold it for him.

Or maybe he could talk his mom into helping out and he could pay her back once he had it.

'No,' he thought immediately, shaking his beanie-covered head. 'Mom works hard enough as is. You want a car, you'll pay for it yourself.'

And he definitely wanted a car. Walking to and from school this past winter, plus the times he'd trekked to and from his girlfriend's house, had been unpleasant . With his mom picking up extra shifts at the hospital, he'd been forced to hoof it more often than not. He may be Minnesota born and raised, so he knew cold, but that didn't mean he wanted to spend so much time walking out in it.

But come next winter, he'd have a car with a working heater. He'd be the king of the world.

Adam jogged the last block to his house, both to get some blood flowing and his temperature up, but mainly because he wanted to get out of the cold and into the heated interior as quickly as possible. He fumbled with his keys – stupid fingers were so cold they looked blue – so it took two tries before he actually managed to unlock the front door and slip inside.

“Mom, I’m home!” he hollered in case she was there. She didn’t have a shift tonight, he didn’t think, but sometimes she picked others’ up last minute as a favor to her coworkers. With living costs on the rise, she’d been picking up a lot of shifts. Adam tried not to feel guilty about his own expenses, covering as much of them as he could on his own. Of course, his mom always told him not to worry about that but, well. He did worry. Mostly about her.

“Mom?” he called again, shucking his backpack and jacket and kicking off his heavy boots. He glanced up the stairwell as he passed, wondering if she was asleep.

It wasn’t until he headed for the kitchen, hoping for leftovers in the fridge, that he realized something was wrong. There weren’t any lights on in the house. On its own, it wasn’t that unusual. It probably meant his mom had picked up that shift, after all.

But her purse was sitting on the kitchen table.

Adam swallowed roughly, a shiver running down his spine. “Mom?”

He moved cautiously from the little dinette nook, staring at his mother’s purse and trying to tell himself he was panicking for no reason. She was upstairs, asleep. That was all. But as he rounded the half wall dividing the dinette from the main kitchen, Adam came to an abrupt halt.

It was the blood more than the body that tipped him off. It was… it was everywhere.

Adam Milligan stumbled back, away from his mother’s lifeless form lying facedown on the tile, until he hit the kitchen table. He reached back to grab onto it, supporting himself on arms that were shaking as badly as his legs. He couldn’t make a sound, not that there were words to speak, even if he could.

Fear more than panic broke him out of his shock and he ran forward.

“Mom!” Adam slid to his knees in the blood, hands slipping on wet tile and slippery skin as he searched for a pulse somewhere there wasn’t damage. He knew it was hopeless, but he couldn’t just stand there doing nothing. He had to try. “No, no, no, mom, please!”

The fifteen-year-old sagged, a sob wrenching its way from his throat as his bloodied fingers found nothing but cold skin and silence.

“Shame, that.”

Adam shot upright, spinning so fast he fell onto his butt and, in a panic, scrambled back from the sudden, unfamiliar voice. A man stepped out of the shadows of the kitchen doorway. He was kind of short, average all around really, clean-shaven with a receding hairline. Whoever he was, he was dressed in an expensive looking, all black, three-piece suit. Except for his tie. It was bright red.

Just like his eyes.

“Of course, if you’d like me to fix it,” he continued with a British accent and the smile of a snake oil salesman. “I’m sure we can come to some sort of… arrangement.”

End of Season 2

Author’s notes: I TOLD YOU I WOULDN’T FORGET ADAM 😁😁😁

Also, WE FUCKING DID IT!!!!!! Omg guys. We made it. SEASON 2 – that 105 chapter little bitch of a season – is FINISHED!!!!!!

Not gonna lie, there were days when I started questioning if I’d make it. 70 extra chapters, five years (I blame three of those on Covid), 728k words, and four Word documents to hold it all. Sweet cheese and crackers, but WE GOT THERE.

Man, I am so glad you all like verbosity because holy shit.

Alright, time for some quick chapter notes!

Ellen Harvelle : She’s such an odd one to me, but I always found her gruff demeanor fascinating. Then again, I’m a people pleaser with anxiety; if I so much as think I insulted someone, I am immediately overdoing it trying to apologize. Ellen, on the other hand, seems to stare down emotional fuck ups the same way she stares down monsters. I will look you in the eye until I convince you I didn’t mean nothing by it and you will believe me because I wouldn’t lie about shit like this. Sheesh. She’s, like, terrifying but also… so badass?

[grumbles] Still, would it kill hunters to learn how to pronounce the words “I’m” and “sorry” and then occasionally use them in that order?

Gender Studies : Okay, so about the comment where Bobby wouldn't hit Ellen cuz she's a woman. First and foremost, opinions expressed by the characters in this story do not reflect my opinions. Otherwise Dean wouldn't sound like Dean when it came to feminism and any form of emoting. Second, we all know Bobby would hit a woman if he needed to (he killed the love of his life when he had to, after all). The point of that sentence was that he would never headslap Ellen like he would Dean (and not because she's a woman, but because she's 1. His age (and kinda therefore an equal), 2. Not his kid, and 3. yes, terrifying)

I wanted to state it because sometimes things I write in Bobby or Dean's voice make me squirm a little. Not enough to stray from character, but anytime I have Dean putting down healthy emotional expression as "growing a vagina" there is always a frown on my face. But that's our boy, and we love him, flaws and all.

(I swear, we are slowly pushing that boy out of those dumb flaws and towards emotional growth. We. Will. Get there. XD)

What's Next? Why, Season 3 of course!! But first, an intermission that explains what on earth your author is thinking dragging poor Adam Milligan to Hell (that poor boy) :D

How many of you requested I remember Adam if I was going to steal away Andy? Tee-hee-hee [insert dramatic bow here] Your wish is my command.

And no, Adam will not be like Andy, but, yes, I will make you all fall in love with him and then mistreat him so, so badly. Whump is my JAM.

(I actually really do think y'all are gonna love where I take Adam's story. Like… a lot.)

((If Dean's emotional constipation and relationship hangups are the biggest fix-it in this little rewrite of mine, redemption for Adam is the second. It just took 900,000 words to get there 😓))

When, Silence? Soon.

How Soon? Okay, the next line in the quote is obviously "very soon" buuuuut that probably won't be reality. Sooo, I'm going to take a little break (I know, I know, so many breaks lately!) But I am smack dab in the middle of crunch time and it's a big one, so I'm not gonna have a huge amount of writing time for the next two months. Luckily, whenever I get busy at work, writing is usually all I wanna do XD So writing will happen, just not enough to continue posting right away. Give me August and September to get out of crunch (and hopefully build up a little bit of a stockpile) and then I will resume posting!!

What do we have to look forward to? : Oh man, so much. Let's see… Sam's getting himself trained up to proper Jedi status, Dean's carrying on hunting and dreaming of a world without an apocalypse, Bobby's adjusting to life in the Bunker (and trying to find someone who can bring that place into the twenty first century) Henriksen is resorting to last resorts, Gordan's getting some vacation time, Cole is still on the hunt, and Cas and Gabe spend some more quality bro time together. Oh, and Loki's going to go make a new friend out of a certain Golmagen :D

What else?: What do you mean, what else? That's not enough?!? Alright, alright, fine. How about a mounting civil war in Heaven, Azazel and Lilith topside causing all sorts of shit that Time is not going to like, Sam decides summoning Persephone for some answers is a smart choice, Chuck's kinda wishing he hadn't given up that whole see-the-future-and-write-the-story thing, we can't forget about Bela Talbot, a rabbit's foot, and a hangman's right hand (that sounds like a joke. All we need is a bar…), the Roadhouse in working order (Hey, there it is!), we'll celebrate a very Supernatural Winchester Christmas, and, of course, all the while we'll be building up to one hell of a season ending, as always! ;}

Excited yet? I sure am! Now… I just have to write it.

(Let's aim for 500k words this time and only 50 chapters. We can manage that, don't you think?)

[insert sound of Author snorting here]

Cheers,

Silence

(and, yes, my author's notes were too long for A03. Because of course they were 😂)

Chapter 140: Season 2: Interlude I

Chapter Notes

Author's Notes: Hello everyone!!! I've got the first of two interludes locked and loaded for y'all in an effort to span the break between seasons! I am finally finished with two months of insane crunch time and eager to get writing (although a ton of planning has happened for season 3, sadly the crazy hours have left me too brain dead to actually write 😴 Hopefully that's all behind me now!)

Chapter Warnings: Ruby's on a mission, Alistair's got a juicy tip, Crowley is a smarmy asshole, Rose Parnell is a bitch, and Adam Milligan is a masochist. Let's go!

Actual Chapter Warnings: None, really, but this is our first real foray into Adam's personality when he's not a ghoul, not been lied to by angels and therefore defensive and aggressive, and not spent centuries in Hell abandoned by his family. I'm always a little nervous finding my footing with new characters (especially ones without a lot of real screen time, let alone screen time as a 15-year old-innocent high schooler 😳) so hopefully I've landed on my feet and y'all enjoy my take on Adam Milligan!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Interlude I

Ruby walked with swift, confident strides through the rocky corridors of Hell. Demons got out of her way, not the other way around, and that was just the way she liked it. She strode into Lilith's office, expression making it clear to anyone around that she was expected and they'd best not delay her.

"Lilith," she greeted the small girl standing behind a desk, pouring over maps. Ruby stood at attention, hands clasped behind her leather-clad back, awaiting orders.

She'd been expecting a summons for the last forty years. Lilith had been testing her, training her, for centuries now. Ruby was certain of it. Which meant Hell's Princess had a task in mind and Ruby was ready . She would prove her worth.

"Ruby," the young girl smiled, sweet and wide, like a child getting a visit from their favorite aunt. "I'm glad you're here. I have a special assignment for you."

Ruby bit back her grin. Best not to appear too smug. A little was alright, of course; a demon could be proud of their work. But too much and Lilith might feel upstaged. Like Ruby was reaching beyond her station. She'd learned that lesson the hard way. It had taken decades to climb back into a position of regard in the Princess's eyes.

"Whatever it is, I'm your girl," Ruby assured her with rigid posture, ready to obey. Lilith smiled sweetly again and hopped down from the stool she'd been standing on. She came around the other side, baby-pink dress swishing and dress shoes tap-tap-tapping against the boiling rock.

"Good, that's what I want to hear." Lilith crossed her arms over her flat chest and leaned back against the edge of the table. She tapped her foot idly, a thoughtful expression on her face. "We have a problem, Ruby, and I'm putting you in charge of fixing it. Azazel may believe we can get Dean Winchester's soul into Hell while it's infested with angel grace, but I'm not risking this war on faith ."

Ruby nodded. The Prince, while a formidable and admirable demon, was wholly confident in the plan he had devised. Twice now, that had very nearly proven disastrous. Unlike herself and Lilith, Azazel was not adaptable. And those who did not adapt, died.

They could not allow the Plan to become a casualty of Azazel's undue confidence.

"What would you have me do?"

Lilith's childlike smile turned unpleasant as she stared at her top demon. Soon to be her top spy. "You will get me a Righteous Man on Alistair's table by the end of next year."

Ruby did not allow a single thing to show. She had been waiting for this: an assignment only she could complete. A chance to prove herself, to prove she was the best.

“Consider it done.”

Chapter Break

Finding an alternate way to ensure Dean Winchester’s soul went to Hell – and sooner rather than later – was no small ask. But Ruby tackled it with calm determination and vigor. Her first stop was Alistair’s tower to see if their rough draft of a Righteous Man had anything to offer.

“He’s a tough one,” Hell’s top torturer said, wiping his brow with a blood-soaked hand. John Winchester was strapped to his table, breathing raggedly in the break between sessions. Ruby knew from personal experience his next round would be all the worse for it. “Hasn’t broken yet. Might not ever.”

Ruby’s eyes slid to the man, staring up at the ceiling with deadened eyes. Some souls never picked up the blade. They were rare – most would do just about anything to stop the pain at that point – but some held out. They broke in a different way, their souls shattering beyond what could be put back together. It would take centuries, but eventually they withered away into nothingness.

“But he might have something of use,” Alistair continued and Ruby’s eyes snapped back to him. “Keeps moaning and groaning for his sons.”

Annoyance flared at the false hope and she rolled her eyes at the sadist. “How is that helpful?”

They knew everything there was to know about the man’s brats. Unless he could explain what was going on with his eldest, something that was enabling Dean Winchester to fuck up all their plans. Ruby sincerely doubted it. Alistair had been tasked with finding those answers decades ago. If anything had come of it, he’d have reported it to Lilith already.

But Hell’s top torturer just smiled serenely in response and, despite herself, Ruby felt a shiver run down her spine.

“All three of them.”

Chapter Break

Crowley was her next stop, as much as Ruby would prefer he wasn't. The man was a snake, and that was saying something. She, like most of her kind, had a healthy fear of demons such as Alistair and Lilith. They were straightforward. You mess up, you will experience pain. But Crowley? He was a salesman , and one that had risen through the ranks incredibly fast. It wasn't that he couldn't be trusted – no demon could be, so the very idea was laughable – it was that everything with him came at a price and, if not a price, then a game.

He was obnoxious to deal with.

But, he was the man with the resources and the contacts she needed. As King of the Crossroads, Crowley had access to Earth and information there. More than that, though, Crowley believed that information was power. And he wasn't wrong, though he was overly confident about it in Ruby's opinion. A healthy balance of blackmail and brawn was important to any demon's survival. The problem with Crowley was that he never got his own hands dirty.

However, his network was more expansive than any other demon she knew, which was one of the things that made him so annoying. He always knew everything (and never failed to remind you of it, either. Obnoxious .) It was also one of the reasons she was stuck dealing with him now.

"I need information," Ruby announced as she strolled into what was largely regarded as Crowley's office. It wasn't an official location – no one in Hell was assigned space – so much as a small, secluded area in the bowels of Hell that he'd claimed as his own and filled with leather chairs and a large desk. He could often be found lurking there with a glass of liquor.

Today was no exception. Crowley, in his chosen meatsuit and swirling something amber in a fancy glass, raised an eyebrow at her unannounced entrance.

"By all means, come in," he drawled, turning away from her to finish whatever he'd been looking over at the desk. He signed something, then tucked the pen inside his suit jacket, disappeared the contract with a wave of his hand, and turned his attention her way. Crowley settled against the edge of his desk with crossed his ankles and an air of boredom. “Information is one of the many things I sell, love. So, what are we interested in today? The latest gossip? This week's top contenders on Hell’s social ladder? Which belly button ring would suit you best?”

Ruby ignored the demon’s pointless quips, walking around the rocky walls of the ‘office.’ She feigned her own disinterest in the finer things among Crowley’s collection of objects and slowly lollygagged her way over to one of the leather armchairs. Ruby traced the seam that ran along the top of the chair with a single finger. “You’re aware of the Plan, I assume?”

The look Crowley sent her way was properly offended. “ Please .”

She nodded. Crowley was King of the Crossroads, one of the three heads of Hell. The lesser of those three spots, but a head all the same. No one thought much of his position because, well… sales . He was certainly the best at it, no point denying that. But comparing Crowley to Lilith? Or Azazel? As if he were even in the same league. She’d be throwing that sarcastic ‘ please’ right back at him.

But the Plan couldn’t happen without a crossroads deal, so…

“I need to know what constitutes a Righteous Man.”

Crowley’s eyebrows went right up to his receding hairline and Ruby speared him with another look. One that said no matter what he asked, she would not be answering.

“And why, I wonder, do you need to know that?”

She resisted an irritated sigh. This was the problem with salesmen. They spoke a different language. You gave them a look that said don’t ask and they asked anyway, just for the hell of it. Which meant additional time wasted on rephrasing her intimidation into something Crowley might actually care about.

“I’m writing a book report,” Ruby replied with a pout and the fakest expression of innocence she could summon as she placed an arm along the back of the lounge chair and leaned in. The King of the Crossroads snorted.

“I was under the impression we already had a plan to get the Righteous Man’s soul in Hell,” Crowley drawled again, keeping an air of nonchalance that Ruby knew was complete bullshit. He was fishing and they both knew it.

“Lilith likes to hedge her bets,” the spy answered honestly enough because she didn’t need to lie. Besides, sometimes a demon telling the truth was the best lie because no one would believe it anyway. Crowley hummed in response and Ruby wondered which way he was leaning. Not that it mattered, of course.

“Well,” the crossroads demon swirled his drink, ice clinking. Such a showoff; he always had to have ice in Hell . Ruby didn’t know how he actually managed that – or how it didn’t melt instantly – but refused to ask. Not knowing was a weakness in her world. And it was especially a weakness in Crowley’s. “The Canon only has two stipulations that must be met for the First Seal to break. First, a Righteous Man must shed blood in Hell.”

Ruby barely bit back a growl. Crowley had purposefully avoided answering her question directly. The King of the Crossroads held up a hand when Ruby opened her mouth to tell him so. He took a long sip of his Glencraig whiskey, savoring the flavor before swallowing and expressing a noise of pure enjoyment.

“Second, he or she must also be able to serve as the Michael Sword.”

God wasn’t stupid, after all. His lock and key were an exact match – a one in a million. Not easy to find. The Righteous Man had to not only be one of the true vessels (of which there were only four available bloodlines on the planet), he had to be self-sacrificing enough to make the deal, then dumb enough to tack on a ‘yes’ after all that.

In short, Dean Winchester was the Apocalypse’s best – and only – bet. If only Crowley could figure out how to eliminate him entirely, then he’d be sipping Glencraig and smelling roses for the rest of eternity. He downed the last of his drink, ice clinking against the glass. If only.

Ruby, ignoring the theatrics (like she had mentioned before: obnoxious to deal with) and tapped one manicured finger against the top of the leather chair. “So, in order to get the Michael Sword in Hell, he-”

“Or she,” Crowley interrupted helpfully.

“Or she-“ Ruby sent him a look that stated her annoyance in not so many words- “has to make a deal first. But how can a deal with a demon ever be righteous?” she pondered aloud, playing up the dumb blonde (even if she knew Crowley wouldn’t fall for it) as well as her need for information that surely only a King of the Crossroads could supply (an ego stroke that Crowley absolutely would fall for, even if he tried not to).

Indeed, the King puffed his chest out that much more, looking both inordinately pleased and annoyed at her play. Poor little weasel, Ruby thought.

"It would have to be a selfless act," Crowley explained with a good deal more self-importance than Ruby thought fitting. "Pure sacrifice for the greater good."

"Like Dean selling his soul to save Sam," Ruby once more thought aloud, now tapping her cheek with that blood-red nail. "But why didn't that work with John?"

Daddy dearest had sold his soul to save Dean, but Alistair and Lilith had both been fairly certain he wasn't their Righteous Man. Even though he could serve as the Michael Sword.

Crowley just snorted. "That wasn't selfless. That was a desperate man bringing his kid back to do his dirty work for him."

Namely taking out the Moose if he proved to be less human than Daddy Winchester could stomach. Crowley's spies had kept him well appraised of that developing family drama right up until its nasty end. No, John Winchester was never going to fit the bill. The only way he fit the term 'righteous' was by putting 'self' in front of it.

"No, what you need is someone who's self-esteem is so low, who's so insecure about his own worth, that his existence means nothing in a world that doesn't have a certain someone else in it." Crowley offered her a look of his own.

"Sam Winchester," Ruby supplied easily enough. She, like the crossroads demon, knew the Plan. Kill Sam and poor little abused Dean, who'd never been worth anything in his life if Sam wasn't succeeding, would sell his soul without a second thought to bring the boy back.

John Winchester had done all the work for them. All they had to do was kill Sam.

"Bingo." Crowley crossed behind his desk, pulling out a large carafe filled with that amber liquid from a drawer. He poured himself another drink without offering his guest one. "So, I suppose what you're here for is finding out what else Dean Winchester would sell his soul for without a scrap of selfishness. Not sure there is another way, love."

"Hmm," Ruby just hummed, allowing the demon to keep guessing. She pushed off the chair, having gotten what she needed from this conversation. She had no need to linger and spend any more time than necessary with the King of the Crossroads. "You may be right, Crowley. I guess I'll just have to keep working on it."

Chapter Break

Ruby strolled back into Lilith's office not even a full month of Hell-time later, a sly grin in place. She'd spent that time well, cultivating her own little network of spies that had gotten her the information she needed topside.

She'd have to kill them all later, she suspected, if Lilith's plan came to fruition. Not a problem, they'd served their purpose.

The little girl looked up from her desk, spotted her top spy's wicked smile, and developed one of her own. "You found something."

Ruby crossed her arms, jutted her hip out, and smirked with every ounce of confidence and pride she'd damn well earned. She was awesome and now Lilith was about to know it, too. "Did you mean the Righteous man or a Righteous man?"

Lilith's eyes lit with a truly evil amount of anticipation. "There's another option."

Ruby's face broke into a horrendous expression of pleasure. "There's another option. And the best part is, the Winchesters don't even know he exists."

Chapter Break

Getting topside was not as easy as opening a door and popping up on the surface. For starters, those doors were rare and carefully guarded. Escaping Hell without one was difficult. It had been designed that way, after all. And unfortunately for Ruby, despite being top brass in Lilith's good graces, she didn't get to use one of the easy ways out.

For their plan to work, Ruby couldn't be in Lilith's good graces. Which meant escaping the hard way.

It took time. More than she was comfortable with, given the ever approaching deadline Lilith had set, but Ruby reminded herself this was part of the plan. Escaping Hell wasn't supposed to be easy. She had to earn her place by Lilith's side, and this was part of that journey.

When she finally did make it, singed and banged up and tired but free , Ruby took a full twenty-four hours to recover from the flight. Then she went shopping.

A blonde was too cliché for this. She couldn't afford to stand out; she needed to blend in. Of course, she'd never settle for average. Just something a little less average than her normal picks.

She found Rose Parnell on her third walk-around of the mall (the nearest one had been in a different state, for fuck's sake . Little pissant town didn't even have a mall for proper meatsuit shopping). Ruby hadn't even seen her the first two times, which was even better. Rose was a quiet thing, tucked away in the bookshop's cafe, nose in a novel. She was nice enough looking, for a nerd. Unremarkable auburn hair that would do just fine (though the bangs would have to go). Big-frame glasses, but not heavy enough to detract from her pretty-in-a-plain-way face. And a shit ton of freckles.

She was perfect. Adam Milligan would love her. Ruby would make sure of it.

Chapter Break

She waited for the right moment. Kids were walking through the crowded hallways of the high school, chatting loudly with friends, being obnoxious as teenagers were wont to do. Ruby waited until she spotted her target, walking alongside two other boys, before she dropped one of the books in her arms and bent to pick it up.

As planned, she collided with Adam, causing the boy to trip over her as she went for the textbook. Adam managed to save himself from a complete crash to the floor, but Ruby allowed herself to hit the ground with a startled gasp.

"Whoa, sorry!" Adam said, righting himself and holding out a hand for her. "Didn't see you there."

"Oh, uh… that's okay," Rose said with a soft, embarrassed smile. She'd practiced in the mirror that morning until it had been perfect . She reached up, accepting his hand. "Thanks."

"Sure thing." Adam pulled her to her feet, then he bent back down to collect the multitude of books and folders she'd lost in the fall. He handed them back to her with an easy smile. Too easy. The boy turned his back on her, starting down the hallway again with his friends already making fun of him. He shoved playfully at the closest one.

"Um, I- wait!"

The group of boys – and several others in the hallway – turned at her sudden exclamation. Rose tucked her shoulders up around her ears, cheeks flushing red. "I- oh god, this is embarrassing. Um, do you know where room 224 is?"

She held up a piece of crumpled paper, having taken some damage in the tussle. It had her first class of the day listed on it.

Adam Milligan looked genuinely surprised she was talking to him, standing there in the hallway without an immediate response. One of his friends snorted a poorly concealed joke and gave him a push back towards her. The Milligan boy stumbled a step forward before he waved them both off with a 'shooing' motion and an eye roll. Adam walked the couple of feet back to Rose and plucked the paper from her outstretched hand.

"New student, huh?" he asked, looking over the class schedule.

Rose grimaced, doing her best to look optimistic. She didn't try very hard, shouldering her bag a little more securely. "Unfortunately."

"Well, you are in luck." Adam folded her class schedule in two. She watched with a curious frown in place, wondering when he planned on handing that back. Then he offered her his elbow. "Care to follow me?"

Rose conveyed just what she thought of that with a look, eyeing both kid and arm. She walked right up to him, purposefully ignoring the proffered elbow. With a grin (that she had no need to practice that morning), she swiped her class schedule from his other hand. "Not as your arm candy."

"Oh, ouch," Adam laughed out, dropping his elbow but grinning ear to ear. He started down the hallway, Rose by his side. "That's hurtful, you know. Thinking you'd be the candy."

A genuine laugh escaped her before she could contain it, hand over her mouth. The bell rang throughout the halls and students started moving with more purpose. They fell in with the crowd.

"I'm cute too, you know," Adam Milligan continued as he took a left. Rose adjusted her books, eyeing him purposefully up and down from the side. "Real catch, you should know."

"I guess," she offered, keeping it purposefully nonchalant. The boy beside her made a noise of mock-offense. "In a scruffy, Han Solo sort of way. If Han Solo was severely atrophied."

This time he flat out squawked.

"Atrophied?!" Even as he led them towards a propped-open door and a sign that very clearly read 224 , he was looking at his arms, flexing almost non-existent muscles. "These guns?"

"Yes, those peashooters were the ones I was referring to."

"That's it," the boy said, stepping back so a kid could pass between them and into the classroom. Adam's grin was infectious. "We're no longer friends. After all I've done for you, letting you speak to me like this. The betrayal."

Rose just smiled and turned into the classroom without so much as a thank you. Adam followed her a half-second later, purpesefully choosing the same aisle of desks and sliding into the seat behind her. When she turned around to raise an eyebrow at him, he just grinned.

"What? This is my first class too." He waggled his eyebrows even as he dug a book out of his backpack. "Told you I knew where I was going."

She rolled her eyes and turned back to the front of the classroom, but her amused smile turned a lot more sinister once Adam Milligan could no longer see it.

Chapter Break

It took less than a month before Adam asked her out. Ruby might have been insulted, only once she got to know the kid it became very obvious that he did not inherit the same suave as his father or eldest brother. Oh, he had the potential. He had it in spades.

The problem was, he was a dork .

It made him adorable, Ruby could admit (in a way that gave her hives shortly afterward). Better yet, it made him very manipulatable. Adam was the kid who had potential to be just about anything he wanted to be. He was smart, witty, cunning when he wanted to be, and genuinely sweet (when he wanted to be).

He just didn't seem to know any of that. Which meant all Ruby had to do to make him putty in his hand was point it out.

"I don't know why you let them make fun of you," she said offhand in the middle of a conversation about two asshole boys who liked to shove Adam in a locker. Unfortunately for them, Adam was tall for a fifteen-year-old. They'd yet to actually make him fit.

"For the same reason you let Shelly Sutton call you four-eyes in front of the whole school," Adam shot back. They were far from the social outcasts of the town, but they certainly weren't among the popular crowd. They were the kids that got picked on when the real nerds stayed home sick.

Rose shrugged, adjusting her glasses. "I'll put a stop to it when she finally comes up with an insult worth my effort."

Adam chuckled, staring at the ceiling of her bedroom from his sprawled spot on her bed. Rose sat at her desk, writing out math equations for that night's homework. He rolled over onto his stomach so he could stare at her. She glanced over when several moments of observation had passed without comment.

"We're really not nerdy enough to suffer these guys' poorly conceived insults," he commented, almost offhandedly and she laughed, closing the textbook. "You'd think they'd make a rule about it. Your IQ must be this high-" he held his hand over the edge of the bed, raising it as high as he could- "to merit attention from someone with an IQ this low."

He dropped his hand almost to the floor, and Rose laughed.

"The rest of us in the middle can just muddle our way through with average, uninspired insults to one another."

"A bell curve," Rose said with a head bob that suggested she was considering it. Adam snapped upright, hopping up on his knees and pointing at her like she'd solved cold fusion.

"A bell curve. A bell curve of the teenage experience." After a prolonged moment of eureka, he flopped onto his butt, hanging his legs off the side of the bed, then fell back onto the mattress once more. "I would gladly take on the average stupidity of my peers if it meant the exceptionally stupid ones left me alone."

Rose chuckled, closing her textbook and setting her pencil aside. She rested her cheek in her hand, propped up on the desk as she gazed at her boyfriend. "You're making some pretty bold assumptions about where you fall on that curve."

Adam's jaw dropped and he sat upright. He didn't manage a straight face long enough to get out, "Oh my god, you are such a bitch !"

Rose only grinned. "And you love it."

The boy could only sigh. "I kinda do. I'm such a masochist."

With that, Adam put in some effort to climb to his feet, groaning the entire time (which earned him another 'atrophy' comment, and he repeated what his girlfriend had just accused him of loving). The teenager grabbed his jacket – the nights were just getting cold enough to need it – and backpack. "I gotta go. See you tomorrow?"

Rose glanced at the analogue clock sitting on the desk with some surprise and no lack of teasing. "It's, like, 8 o'clock. What, do you have a curfew?"

"No," Adam said with a light blush before swooping in to kiss the side of her cheek. "But my mom's home early on Thursdays and she always cooks dinner."

Rose straightened as he pulled away, rubbing at her cheek with a blush of her own. "Wow, that's really… sweet."

Adam rolled his eyes. "What can I say, I'm a sweet guy." He shouldered his backpack with a grin. "One who loves free food."

"That's my guy," Rose added with a chuckle, but as she relaxed back into her desk chair, she adopted a thoughtful look on her face. "I wish I had that kind of relationship with my mom."

Adam paused on his way towards the door, looking over at her with a curious frown. "What? You and your perfect white-picket-fence family don't do dinners together?"

"Sure we do," Rose said with a shrug. There was something on her face that gave Adam pause, like she was missing out on something and only just now realizing it. "It's just not, like, a weekly thing."

"Huh." Adam wasn't sure what to say to that, so he offered a one-shouldered shrug. "So make it. Your parents are downstairs. Go cook dinner and invite them to eat with you."

Rose blinked at him, then drew her head back with mock-offense. She crossed her arms over her chest. "Cook? I thought I was supposed to get free food out of this arrangement?"

Adam grinned, making his way back over to her. He bent down, giving her pouting lips a quick peck. "I cook dinner for my mom every Tuesday. What's your excuse?"

He dodged the pencil she threw at him on his way out, cackling.

"You are a squishy soft marshmallow, Adam Milligan!" she yelled at his retreating back.

"And you love it!" he hollered back as he bounded down the stairs.

She could hear him saying goodnight to her parents on his way out the front door. Ruby settled back into her chair, a grin slowly overtaking her face.

"I really do," she admitted, eyes slipping black. "It makes you so very easy to manipulate."

With a wave of her hand, the pencil flew back across the room and snapped into her waiting grip. She used the eraser end to enter her password into her laptop before pulling up a chat program. Adam would get it when he checked his computer after he got home. Probably after he had dinner with Mommy dearest.

'Say hi to ur mom for me, marshmallow.'

Chapter Break

"Thank you so much for dinner, Mrs. Milligan," Rose said, red high on her cheeks. "It was lovely."

Adam's mom reached out and pulled her hat down further around her ears. "You can stop thanking me, Rose. It was a pleasure to have you. Now stay warm, it's cold tonight."

Rose giggled as Adam told his mom to stop fussing, already pulling on his own hat. Kate turned and adjusted his as well, leaving him to roll his eyes, huff and sigh and fidget, while she took her time. Rose gave him such side-eye.

And then they were out the door, Adam agreeing to walk Rose home. The second the door closed behind them – with one more thank you from Rose – she punched him in the arm.

"Youch!" he yelped, rubbing at his bicep through his heavy coat. "What did I do!"

"You didn't warn me how nice she was!" Rose accused, giving him another hit which he managed to dodge this time.

"Why would I warn you about that?" he laughed, almost sliding on a patch of ice and righting himself. He shoved his hands in his pockets even as his girlfriend had herself a fit. She was pretty cute when she got like that, he thought.

"I was so off my game in there," Rose said, fretting with her hands before Adam had to grab one so she'd stop. She slid the other into her pocket, happy blush taking over her cheeks. Despite that, she still glared at him. "This is your fault."

Adam just laughed again. "You did great. It's really not a big deal, you know. See how I didn't freak out when I met your parents? Let's try that, for a moment. Let me be your inspiration."

She tried to hit him again, but with his hand holding hers, it didn't really work.

"Please, you're a ruffian who gets off on the bad boy image," she sniffed, turning them onto the sidewalk and towards her house. "Parental approval would just ruin your game."

"Wait," Adam suddenly drew up short, staring at her. "I thought your parents liked me! You said they did!"

She couldn't help the evil laugh. "Oh, they do, Marshmallow. Don't fret."

"Oh my god," he muttered, catching back up to her and they resumed their walk. "Bitch."

She giggled into her scarf. "Masochist. For real, though. I'm jealous."

"Jealous?"

"Of the relationship you have with your mom. I mean, she's wonderful," Rose continued, glancing at her boyfriend with a soft smile. "You're really lucky."

Adam was silent for another few feet, eyes far away as he thought over what she'd said. She squeezed his hand and he looked over at her, offering her a sweet smile. "Yeah. Yeah, I am."

Chapter Break

"Good night," Rose said sweetly from the foyer of her house, leaning in to steal one more kiss. Adam tried to deepen it, but she pulled away with a grin. "Go home, marshmallow. It's Thursday and you're already late."

For a second, something sad passed over his face, but he hid it with a weak smile. "Mom's been picking up more shifts lately. She may not be home yet."

Rose shrugged one thin shoulder, pressing against the doorframe with a soft, understanding expression. The outside air fought against the heated interior of her house. Adam already looked cold, despite the warmer weather lately.

(Of course, warmer was relative in this place. Ruby almost missed Hell.)

“But she could be,” Rose offered up, leaning her head against the doorframe as well. The picture of besotten innocence. “And if she is, then you have a dinner date to make, mister.”

“Yeah. Yeah, you’re right,” Adam agreed with a grin, pulling his backpack up higher on his shoulder. He stole one quick peck on her cheek before pulling away from the front door. “Good night.”

“You’re a lucky man, Adam Milligan!” she yelled after him, laughing. “And put on your hat! It’s not spring yet!”

He waved without turning around. Ruby watched him walk down the snowy street. She knew what awaited him when he arrived home and she was confident that she had primed the boy perfectly. The last six months had been nothing but gentle reminders and quiet needling of how lucky he was. How wonderful his mom was. How much she meant to him. How much he loved her. Appreciated her. Needed her.

How, if she were him, she’d do anything for his mom.

Ruby smiled at Adam Milligan’s retreating back, watching him root through his backpack for his hat before walking off into the night. She closed her door and went to her bedroom to await word that their new Righteous Man had made a deal.

End Interlude I

Chapter End Notes

Author’s Notes: And now we know what Ruby was up to in Windom! 😈

Up Next: Crowley does (his best not to do) what he does best (with very little success because Winchesters). Next interlude will be up in a month!

Cheers,
Silence

Chapter 141: Season 2: Interlude II

Chapter Notes

Author's Notes: Welcome to our second Interlude!

Chapter Warnings: Crowley's doing his best work, Adam Milligan is the bunny of Caerbannog, and Time, unfortunately, bows to no demon Actual Chapter Warnings: Several (mild) descriptions of a dead body.

And on that cheerful note, enjoy!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 2: Interlude II

Crowley stood in the shadows of the Milligan household, concealed by their protective shroud, and watched the new, potential Righteous Man as he sobbed over his brutalized mother's body. Ruby had really done a number on the woman. Spared no expense and all that.

So this is what Ruby had been about, coming to him in Hell a century ago, asking questions about what made a Righteous Man. Clever little fox, keeping the secret of a third Winchester all to herself.

More like a real thorn in his side, Crowley bemoaned. Lilith hadn't even told him why he was traveling to the Devil-forsaken town in this Devil-forsaken state. Just that his talents specifically were needed and Ruby would meet him there.

A potential alternative for the Righteous Soul, ready to sell his goods to bring Mommy dearest back, and for no other reason than the world deserved to have her. Ruby had been watching him. According to that little hell-skank, the kid was a real contender; a decent boy with a good heart and a mommy complex. Which, of course, Ruby had spent the last six months exploiting.

Adam Milligan was the closest thing to a replacement Dean Winchester that you could ever expect to get from a half-brother. If he ended up selling his soul for his mother out of self-sacrifice and a noble cause, he could absolutely break the first seal. Even better, he'd likely break well before a trained hunter ever would.

And Crowley had been hand-picked to make the deal.

Bollocks. He should be preening, but instead the demon was stuck dealing with a real speed bump in an otherwise brilliant plan of not helping the Apocalypse right along.

Now he was going to have to improvise. Luckily, the King of the Crossroads was damn good at winging it. All he had to do was offer the kid a deal he'd never take. Then he could go back to headquarters, innocent arms held out in his best, 'I tried ' posture, and tell them he did what he could, but the kid just wouldn't bite.

Dean Winchester was going to owe him the best damn blowjob of his life . And Crowley would be collecting.

"Shame, that," the King announced his presence, stepping into the light and watching the little kitten scramble away.

Kitten? Hmm. Seemed more like a skittish little bunny, really. Moose, Squirrel, and… Bunny? No bunny in Rocky and Bullwinkle. No kitten, either, for that matter. He supposed Peachfuzz could be a fit, of a sort; the kid looked like he might not even be able to grow a proper beard even after puberty hit in another… Crowley was going to say six-to-eight years. He had been rather enjoying the animal theme with the brothers….

He might just have to keep workshopping this one and find a proper fit.

"She was quite the looker for a woman of forty-something," Crowley continued his disinterested drawl, coming closer to the mutilated body and tilting his head to take it all in.

The kid spun around fast – must be Daddy's hunting blood – and threw open a kitchen drawer. He had a knife in his hand and had put himself between his mother and the intruder in the blink of an eye. Protecting her even though there was so very little left to protect. Of course, he wielded that blade like someone who had never been in a knife fight in his life, but the kid had balls, Crowley would grant him that. Definitely a Winchester.

The demon raised his hands in a mock offering of peace, taking a gracious step back. "Easy, Bunny FooFoo, I'm here to help."

Apparently, he was going with Bunny. So much for workshopping.

"Help? How?" It wasn't exactly a question as much as it was an accusation. Anger radiated off the boy more than fear or grief.

Definitely a Winchester. Perhaps Moose was the half-brother in this little Brady Bunch rehash, because this one was a dead ringer for Squirrel if he'd ever seen one.

"Who the hell are you?" Adam continued, keeping his eyes trained on Crowley and, despite his inexperienced grip on that knife, everything else spoke of an intention to use it. His gaze broke only once, shifting to his mother and then snapping back to the intruder. "A-are you- Did you-!"

"Wasn't me, Thumper," Crowley answered honestly, switching his palms from upright to outward, the picture of innocence. Well, as much as he could manage while still rightly calling himself a demon. "But I can bring her back."

"You… what ?" Adam shook his head, like he hadn't quite heard right. He raised the weapon higher, a physical sign of his waning patience. But his grip was a little less steady. A little less certain.

The King of the Crossroads let his eyes shift red once more, smile spreading across his face. He made sure it was well past the right side of creepy. "I can bring her back, if that's what you want. But… everything comes at a price. The question is, are you willing to pay?"

And here was where Crowley really worked his magic. By the time he was done telling this kid what it would cost to revive mother dearest – on the sly, of course: subtext was everything – of the tortures he would endure in Hell, of the guilt mommy would feel knowing he'd sold his soul to save her… Well, after he heard all that, there was no way the kid was ever going to agree to-

"Yes."

Crowley blinked. He pressed his palm against his ear, giving it a couple hearty taps. "Sorry, kid, must have heard you wrong-"

"I said yes."

The King of the Crossroads stared at the little upstart and tried, really tried, to reign in the flare of immediate, all-encompassing rage.

“You haven’t even heard what it’s going to cost you, Bun Bun,” he tried, using that same raised hand to stop the kid from interrupting him again.

“I don’t care,” Adam bit out before the demon was even done speaking. “She’s my mom. Bring her back.”

Crowley took a deep, absolutely not-calming breath, and tried again. He plastered as much of a let’s-begin-again smile as he could across his face (which was to say, not very much at all), and decided a different plan of attack was needed.

“I’m not talking small stuff here, kid. I’m going to ask for your soul, and you won’t even get the standard ten year contract-”

“Done.”

“No, NOT done!” Crowley hollered, finally losing his carefully crafted, endless patience. “Are you insane? At least hear the contract out, you insufferable BRAT, because it’s not a good one. I’m going to screw you right over.”

“I don’t care. Do it.”

“Well- You- You bloody well SHOULD, damnit!” The demon tried taking another deep breath, even gestured with his hands to calm the tense discussion back down to workable levels. “Let’s think about this a moment, kid. Maybe mull it over until you come to your senses and realize it’s bloody crazy. I mean, your soul and one year with your mom is a crap deal-”

“Deal.”

“No, NO DEAL. STOP SAYING THAT,” Crowley screamed, forgoing any pretense of patience or calm. His fingers were curling into knuckle-aching claws at his sides in a desperate attempt not to pull his own hair out. What the hell was wrong with this damn kid?

“You said you could bring her back,” Adam practically growled, raising his knife once more, as if he might make good on that threat when he couldn’t even back it with a decent fighting stance. “So bring her back!”

“I also said I’m going to take your soul , you impatient little INGRATE.”

The kid didn’t even bat a damn eye. Just met his glare with one of his own and snapped out, “And I said do it .”

Crowley could only stare. And stare and stare and stare.

“SERIOUSLY?”

And roar.

Adam held out his hands in open challenge. “I’m waiting.”

The nerve of this little-

Crowley tried more deep breathing. He tried a lot of it. And then he gave up when his cheeks were bright red and he was certain he was dizzy with rage.

“Fine,” he hissed, waving his hand. A contract unfurled from nowhere, spilling to the ground and over the corpse of Kate Milligan. Crowley all but threw a pen at the boy, who fumbled to catch it without dropping his knife.

Adam knelt without hesitation, not even trying to read the incredibly tiny print of the eight-foot contract. Just signed his name in the messy scrawl of a fifteen-year-old boy and offered the pen back to the King of the Crossroads.

Crowley swiped it with a terrifying growl and disappeared the contract and himself with a flourish.

Fucking Winchesters!

End Interlude II

Chapter End Notes

Author's Notes: Poor Crowley. He gave it his best shot, but nothing beats the hard-headedness of a Winchester.

Peachfuzz: Captain Peachfuzz is a character in Rocky and Bullwinkle, but I like Crowley's animal theme more than the R&B theme, so we're going with Bunny! (Honestly, kitten might be more fitting but we can't have him giving away Cas's nickname unknowingly! So bunny it will be)

Up Next: So that was our last intermission but I am way, way behind in my writing. Like waaay behind. Damn Muse, only wants to plan Season 3, apparently does not want to write it The planning is a great thing, no complaining there, but the lack of writing means I will be taking a longer break than expected before posting. I'm going to try and resume as soon as I have at least 5 chapters written. I currently have…. Erm…. less than five pages So I can't really provide an ETA for when posting will resume, but I shall do my best to kick that Muse's writing butt into gear.

Hang in there, everyone, we'll get going again soon enough!

Cheers,
Silence

12/01/2024 - Update Delayed: Hey guys, I'm not going to make this weekend's update like I'd hoped. I ended up with a slammed Thanksgiving week and have had no time for the story I should have some time this week to get the first chapter properly edited and, hopefully, I'll post this upcoming weekend. Sorry to get everyone prepped for a chapter and then drop the ball, but I'll get it up just as soon as I am able!

Chapter 142: Season 3: Chapter 1

Chapter Notes

Welcome Back: Hello good people! Welcome to Season 3! please take a moment and read the author's notes

Author's Notes (TRIGGER WARNING for pets and end of life care): Okay, so Real Life is a lot at the moment. My dog, Kodak, ended up in the ER this week and I'm really, really sad to announce that the prognosis is not good. He's home now and doing okay, but I'm afraid it's temporary. He's 12 and a cancer survivor, so we knew this time was coming, but of course that doesn't make it easy. I've had him since he was 6 months old, he's my first dog and my baby boy, so I'm hurting pretty badly right now. My creative energy has flatlined and will probably remain that way for a bit. (Honestly, at this point, I'm hoping to channel the grief into writing genius in the coming weeks but I don't actually know if that's a thing Dear Chuck, let it be a thing.)

So, here's the deal! I wanted to post this chapter because I am already a week behind my anticipated Season 3 start date, which was already a month behind the original plans. And I actually am really hoping the story will help with the grieving process (or serve as a distraction when I need one, if nothing else) I'll keep posting as long as I have chapters to post (which is… 4 currently because I was already way waaaay behind schedule before this happened) so I'm going to use a two week posting schedule to buy myself some time. But don't worry, I won't push myself too hard - my grief is gonna process itself on its own time and I can't actually rush it, I know (even if daaaaamn do I want to, cuz feeling things suuuuuuucks)

Thank you all so much for your understanding and patience. So many of you have told me you're in this for the long haul, no matter how long I need for Real Life things and I appreciate knowing it. This will pass and then our little beast of a tale will continue!

Right now, for starters

Edit: Aw shit, I just realized it's been months since the last post and the Shortcut to this story isn't up to date. Damn, sorry folks!

The Road So Far: Sam won the battle Royale but Tom killed him anyway. However, he didn't die and Dean didn't sell his soul because he made a deal with Persephone to heal Sam. Persephone turns out to be something called a Golmagen, Bobby's house got blown up by demons, they found the bunker key, and they had all moved in when a hellgate opened in Arizona.

Okay. Now you're ready to start!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 3: Chapter 1

It turned out, memory foam was a thing in 2007, but it was a prohibitively expensive thing. So Dean had settled for an average spring mattress but sprung a little extra on a nice, cushioned topper. It wasn't quite the sleeping-on-a-cloud experience that was memory foam, but it was as close as he could get for the current year. And Dean was just fine with that.

In fact, even on a century-old mattress (which needed a good dusting and a solid toss right into the dumpster) that first night back in the bunker had been the best night's sleep he'd gotten since landing in 2005. The subsequent nights after he acquired his as-close-as-possible-to-memory-foam mattress had been pure bliss. He'd slept like a goddamn baby.

It was friggin' Heaven on Earth, man. If he ever made it to Heaven and actually stayed there, sleeping in the bunker was going to be one of his top memory replays, he knew it.

That morning, five weeks after they'd finally found home , Dean threw on his dead guy robe and shuffled in the general direction of the kitchen. He might have slept a little too heavily, given the groggy haze clinging to his brain. Or maybe he'd had one drink too many with Bobby. He couldn't actually recall, which was pretty much a neon sign pointing right that way.

Either way, coffee was a must.

The kitchen door was closed when he got there, which wasn't the oddest thing in the world. He was going to have to tell Bobby he could just leave it propped open. The man was still getting used to his new home (with all the grump of someone who hadn't wanted a new home, no matter how awesome new said home was), and Dean kinda thought it was a privacy thing.

The man had lived alone for as long as Dean had been alive. Well, at least till Andy.

He immediately pushed the emotion that came with thoughts of the kid right back down, to stew somewhere below his diaphragm until he was ready to deal with it. It had been weeks since the funeral. Going on two months, actually. Whenever Sam pressed, Dean would insist he was fine. And he was. But he still missed that kid.

It was too early in the morning for grieving, Dean decided with another firm push against the swell of grief that just thinking about Andy brought up.

"Not before coffee," he grumbled to himself and gave the door a hardy shove – it had been sticking lately – only to meet a solid wall of resistance. The door didn't even rattle in its frame.

What the hell. It was too early for this, damnit.

Dean looked down with squinty eyes still full of morning grit. He could see light through the crack under the door, shifting as a shadow moved across it, confirming Bobby was in there. He banged on the door with the side of a fist. "Yo, Bobby! Did you lock the door?"

The shadow moved, getting closer, and the next thing he knew the door was swinging open. It wasn't Bobby on the other side.

"It was not locked," Castiel said, staring along the edge of the door, as though looking for the source of Dean's incompetence. "Perhaps the hinges need to be tightened. They do appear a little loose."

"Cas!" The man from the future could only stare, wide-eyed, at the angel standing in his kitchen doorway. "You're back!"

The expression that overtook the angel's face did not match the level of surprise or elation in Dean's. She tilted her head, first confused then, as clarity settled, she looked much more admonishing than pleased.

Dean immediately wondered what the hell he could have done to piss off a hot nerd angel this early in the morning. And also how , seeing as this was the first time he'd seen her in two months.

"How hard did you hit your head yesterday?" she asked, voice ever so barely tinged with concern (which was as loud as a blowhorn for Dean, but then, he knew Cas). The relief at not being in trouble was short lived; her tone immediately shifted into that of an irritated Warrior of God who did not put up with Dean Winchester's shit. "You said you were fine."

Well, that explained the groggy haze and lack of memory.

She reached up with two fingers, prepared to heal him, but Dean grabbed her wrist before she could make contact. "Whoa, hey, I'm fine, Cas! See?"

He patted his own head, only to let out a yelp of pain when he encountered one hell of a lump on the right side of his scalp, just above his ear. "Jesus, what did I do to myself?"

Cas did not appear amused. She sighed – seemingly at Fate itself for pairing her with such a hopeless human – and pushed forward, despite Dean's grip still on her wrist. Her eyes glowed blue as the healing wave washed over him and the hunter closed his eyes beneath the cool, spreading relief of it.

He instantly felt better. Felt more at home.

"Thanks," he said with a smile once the angel had pulled away. He must have had a concussion after all, given how much better he felt now.

"You should have told me it was that bad," Cas admonished, but there was a gleam of fondness in her eye as she turned from the door and headed back into the kitchen. Dean followed, rubbing at his now flat, undamaged skull. "What's the last thing you remember?"

"Uh…."

Trailing after Cas, Dean settled his hip against the edge of the counter a couple feet from her as the angel took up her previous position, watching the brewing coffee pot with a completely unnecessary level of concentration. At least, that was what she had been doing before her human forgot how to open a door. Dean tried and failed not to grin at the sight.

“I arrived at the bunker two days ago.”

He jolted so suddenly his elbow slipped and he hit the edge of the counter with his hip hard enough to bruise. “ Two days ?!”

Jesus, how hard a hit had he taken last night?

The look Castiel sent his way suggested she was thinking something similar, only with a greater mix of concern and scolding, in equal parts. “You were on a hunt, alone. Bobby told me where to find you. I arrived in the middle of the fight.”

The hunter could only stare in befuddled amazement. He had no memory of any of that. Well, maybe the hunt. He remembered finding a case, telling Bobby, ignoring Bobby when the old hunter told him to call Sam, then heading out alone.

But he didn’t remember the fight or Cas showing up to save his ass.

“Aaaaaaand?” he drew out, grin taking over his face despite all that. He knew what she had left out and that Cas was sure to be thinking it too. She was just too uptight to say it aloud without prompting (for now , Dean thought with a goofy smile Sam would absolutely make fun of him for, were he there).

Sure enough, Cas flashed him an annoyed side-eye worthy of a Warrior of God. “And I ended it.”

The grin only grew. “That’s my girl.”

Cas sent him another look, though this one was far more affectionate than the previous, and Dean couldn’t help himself. His angel was back, he had his home and his dead guy robe and his almost-memory-foam mattress. Life was almost friggin’ perfect.

Almost. The only thing missing was Sam.

(Because his brother had, of course, had to run off on his own again, just when they’d finally found themselves a home.)

“I did not arrive in time to save you from an apparently far-more-severe head injury than you suggested last night,” Castiel reminded him, not letting Dean enjoy himself too much (or get too stuck in the thoughts that would stop him from enjoying himself too much.)

Well, Dean was nothing if not a fighter. And he did not like to lose.

So he sent her a wink, feeling truly good – almost light on his feet – for the first time since they'd buried Andy and saw Sam off. "That's me, Cas. Concussion Dean's always fine."

It wasn't the first time, after all, that he'd woken up the day after a hunt with some spotty memories – or no memories at all – of the day before. Workplace hazard, he acknowledged with a shrug.

The angel did not appear to share his cavalier opinion. The deadpan look was damn near perfect on her Jimmy-adjacent face. The only real difference was the feminine curve of her cheeks instead of Jimmy's more angular jaw.

"I will remember that the next time I am speaking with Concussion Dean," the angel answered in monotone and a burst of laughter escaped the hunter.

The coffeemaker beeped, spewing and spitting out the last of its brew, and Dean reached up to the cupboard next to him to fetch two mugs. He set them down as Cas withdrew the pot and poured one of the mugs, leaving enough room for cream. Dean reached out and tilted her hand, continuing the pour until it was almost to the brim. Those blue eyes were intensely locked on him, questioning, but he didn't look away from the mug – or pull away from the angel – until the cup was full.

"I take it black. Don't need room for milk," he explained with another wink, swiping the mug off the counter. He gestured with his chin and eyebrows at the second mug, hoping Cas would pour herself a cup as well. She did not. "Where'd you learn to make coffee?"

"Gabriel," came the offhand reply, and Dean probably should have guessed that.

"He teach you any other human stuff?" the man from the future asked out of curiosity as he sipped at the too-hot-to-chug brew. She'd done a good job. It was good and strong.

Cas sent him a look he had no idea what to do with: part contemplation, part what he would have sworn was mischief (she had spent two months as the sole captive of a Trickster, so that was an absolute possibility now, he reckoned), and part something entirely unidentifiable. It was all wrapped up in a side-eye for the ages. She looked away, replacing the coffee pot on the heating disc.

"Some."

Dean's eyebrows went up and he had no idea what to do with that answer. Or what the hell it meant. He stared for a couple extra moments of silence, awaiting further detail, but the angel stayed stubbornly silent. He had no idea what to make of that, either.

"You should not work such dangerous cases alone," Cas said, pivoting back to the previous topic and her interrupted scolding. "Where is Sam?"

Dean groaned, setting his coffee down. He didn't want to talk about that, damnit. "Off with Missouri Mosely – a psychic dad knew – to learn how to master his Sith powers."

There was a pause, one just long enough for Dean to start groaning well ahead of Cas's reply.

"I do not understand that reference."

"You know what? That's it," Dean announced suddenly, grabbing his coffee off the counter like a decision had been made and it was time to execute it. Cas had just given him the perfect excuse not to think about his brother, who'd rather be gallivanting off with psychics, practicing spoon bending and other bullshit, then in their kickass new home with his own brother. "We're fixing that, right now. What are you up to today?"

The angel seemed taken aback, blinking in surprise at the hunter. The abrupt switch of both topic and mood caused her to hesitate, like she thought this might be a test she was supposed to pass. "Whatever you are."

Well, it hadn't been a test but if it had, she'd have aced it. Dean grinned charmingly. "Great. I'm watching Star Wars."

Chapter Break

They started with Four instead of One. Dean had decided, no matter what Chest-Cas thought, that you just had to start with the originals. Unfortunately, they had to settle for watching in the library on a laptop; the Dean Cave had yet to be set up, though it was high on his list of Bunker-Fixing priorities. He'd learned the hard way the first time around that the Men of Letters had not believed in couches or lounging when they'd built the place.

They had no excuse, Dean thought for the second time in his life. Television sets had existed in the fifties, even if they'd been in black and white back then.

Cas made it through A New Hope , asking a thousand questions which Dean diligently answered (when he thought they were decent asks) or told her to shaddup and watch (when the answer would come up later on in the film and the angel was just being impatient). She enjoyed watching the first film enough that they started the next and eventually the third after a break for lunch and a switch from coffee to something stronger.

It wasn't until the credits were rolling, the day turning towards night with Dean nursing a beer, that Cas turned her gaze away from the screen and back to him.

"Why does Sam need training for Sith Powers?" she asked, her curiosity and proper reference helping to keep the question innocent enough that it didn't immediately raise Dean's hackles. "And why does he have Sith Powers, specifically?"

Dean sighed into the mouth of his beer, having almost forgotten all about what led them to a Star Wars marathon in the first place. "Sam… opened a door in his head, or so he says. Let all that psychic, demon blood stuff come flooding out at the Battle Royale, and now he can't put it back."

Despite attempting at least a modicum of effort not to sound grumpy as hell about it, he still sounded like a pouting child. Which, he supposed, he kinda was. He understood Sam's reasoning, about not being able to change who and what he was, and how trying to wouldn't go well. Dean understood, he really did. He just didn't like it.

"If he cannot undo what was done, then learning control is the next best thing," Cas offered her perspective calmly, all the while staring at him intently with those stupidly blue eyes. Dean did his best not to notice. Her words weren't anything Dean hadn't already thought himself.

"The Sith and the Jedi appear to have the same powers," the angel continued, her voice softening in a way only the man from the future would pick up. "How they use them separates them into good and evil."

The hunter sighed. He'd been kind of hoping Cas would have a magical fix to stuff that psychic cat back in the bag, even though he'd known it was wishful thinking. Now he was biting back a whole bunch of guilt at having called Sam's abilities Sith Powers in the first place.

Suddenly the Star Wars marathon wasn't so fun. Dean shifted in his chair, practically squirming with the uncomfortable emotions roiling around his gut and chest.

The truth was, Dean was still scared shitless of Sam going darkside. He just didn't know how not to be. How did you trust someone not to do what time and destiny and all of Heaven and Hell wanted them to do? Time alone was proving to be one hell of a stubborn, unchangeable bitch. Dean just didn't know if Sam would overcome her now when he'd failed so spectacularly the first time around.

"I know, I just… shit, Cas, am I breaking the damn timeline here? Should I be?" His angel tilted her head, but Dean carried on. "Sam's got demon-blood-based superpowers that he says are permanent, Bobby's house is gone and he's living in the bunker, which we shouldn't even have access to, and you're…"

Dean cut himself off, burying his gaze in his beer. The theme to Star Wars was still going in the background as the credits continued scrolling by. "Just tell me all that was worth it. Tell me it worked . That we stopped the Apocalypse."

"You stopped the Apocalypse."

Dean's head snapped back up. Because, what?

"You and Sam stopped the Apocalypse," Cas repeated in the face of his disbelieving, baffled gaze. "As far as I can tell, the first seal remains intact and Hell does not have a Righteous Soul under contract. The Apocalypse cannot occur with these two things as they are."

He couldn't breathe. His lungs kept trying, but all they managed was to lose what little air was left in there in staggered exhales of shock.

"Hell may find another way," the angel amended, head tilting every so slightly Dean's direction, as if acknowledging his not-unfounded disbelief. But she didn't think that was likely to happen, at least not anytime soon. Dean could tell, just by her eyes. "However, that will take time. For the moment, the world is safe. Sam is safe."

'You are safe ,' hung in the air between them, but Dean told himself it was just what he wanted to hear. He wasn't the priority here.

"Well, shit," the man from the future finally breathed out, managing to get enough air to reinflate lungs and vibrate some vocal cords. He let out a disbelieving huff, wiping a hand over his mouth.

He wasn't quite ready to believe it, if he was being honest. Life had taught him that being a Winchester meant not just constantly waiting for that other shoe to drop; it was a god damn guarantee that it would . So, no, he wasn't ready to believe it.

But, he supposed, it was a nice pipe dream. Just for a little while, of course At least until Hell figured out their next plan, Dean could pretend. Like taking a vacation, he thought, perking up a little. He could enjoy the peace while it lasted, until shit hit the fan again, as it inevitably would. Might even be nice, for a while.

"So… you just saved the world. What are you going to do next?" Dean leaned back in the definitely-not-a-theatre-seat-but-oh-well library chair and sent a smirk Cas's way. The angel, of course, did not get the reference. No, she took it literally and with all seriousness.

"You mentioned there were more films associated with this storyline," she replied with the heaviness of someone discussing next moves in a war.

Dean's grin grew more genuine and he sat up, grabbing the computer and pulling it to the edge of the table so he could find the next film. "You're supposed to want to go to Disneyland, Cas. But Star Wars is a pretty good backup."

"Why would I want to go to Disneyland?" Castiel asked with genuine curiosity. "Are you going?"

"Nah," Dean dismissed immediately without giving it much thought. He grabbed for his beer, taking a long-overdue sip. "Disneyland's for kids."

The angel nodded, as though she understood. "We will have to acquire a child, then, so that we can go one day."

The man from the future very nearly spewed beer all over the keys, managing to choke and hack it back with a rough cough. Cas sat upright in mild alarm, hand twitching on the table, itching to heal. Dean waved her off.

He was fine . Even if his brain was currently rebooting from Cas suggesting they kidnap a kid so they could go to Disneyland. Okay, that's not exactly what the angel had said. But the other way Dean's brain went – that the two of them would one day have a kid – was way more ludicrous.

No, no, it was far more likely that Cas meant a kid could eventually come into their midst. Which really wasn't that far of a stretch.

Between Clair, Alex, Krissy, that one baby monster he and Sam had spent a week taking care of….

Yeah, Dean supposed. They did occasionally run into kids. Some of which needed parents or, at the very least, guidance. Hell, maybe they could properly befriend Jody this time (once she stopped thinking of them as possible murderers) and go with her and Owen.

Dean had never been to Disneyland. He'd never really let himself think about it as a place he could go. Huh. Now that he was thinking about it, it could be fun. They could get Sam one of those ridiculous Goofy hats.

He was grinning at the thought, contemplating how he and Cas might find themselves a kid to borrow, when Bobby walked into the library. He came up short at the two of them camped out, leftover popcorn bowl and empty cans on the table suggesting they'd been there for some time.

"Well, don't you two look cozy," he started, a judgmental eyebrow climbing up towards his cap. Dean immediately blushed (though he wasn't sure what the hell for) and straightened up in his chair like he'd been caught doing something wrong. But the old hunter's gruff was aimed at the angel, not him. "Thought you said you were going to tell Dean about the case."

"Case?" Dean echoed, immediately alert and switching his gaze between Cas and Bobby. "What case?"

"You said it was not urgent," Cas parried, looking wholly unmoved by Bobby's grouchiness. She turned towards Dean. "And you wanted to watch Star Wars."

"Yeah, but not if we have a case," Dean immediately argued, glancing at Bobby and looking away just as quickly. The day of movies and light drinking was now taking on an aftertaste of guilt and slacking off.

At the same time, Bobby answered the angel with, “It’s not, but you said you’d tell Dean…” he twisted his wrist to look at his watch and then resisted rolling his eyes, instead sending the angel the stink eye, “twelve hours ago, Feathers.”

“ Twelve -” Dean was already climbing to his feet.

“Eleven hours and fourteen minutes,” Castiel corrected, still calm. Bobby just glared and Dean felt like a referee caught between the two of them.

“What case?” he asked again, putting more stress in his words.

“Couple of ghost sightings,” Bobby finally answered, looking at Dean. “Nothin’ much.”

The older Winchester felt himself deflate, though not entirely certain as to why. A case was a case. Still. With the Hellgate having opened less than two months ago, every hunt that wasn’t a demon felt like… not quite that he was wasting time, but there were more important things he should be doing. Like hunting down the mass of demons that had escaped Hell.

“What about demonic omens?” Dean couldn’t help but ask, already knowing the look Bobby would give him. And yup, sure enough, there it was. That searing, fatherly look that said, ‘I know what you’re doing, now stop it.’

“The computers are doing their thing,” Bobby answered with the narrowed eyes of a challenge but the nonchalant shrug of ‘whatcha gonna do.’

They’d brought in Frank Devereaux – who was thankfully still alive in this timeline, or they’d have been shit out of luck – to bring the bunker into the twenty-first century. It had been a hell of a job, one he’d bitched about the entire damn time, of course, but he’d gotten the ‘central nerve’ of the system (or whatever he and Sam had called it) back up and working. The alert and early warning systems in the War Room were fully functional and, most important of all, they had bunker-wide wifi.

Granted, it was only 2007 so the signal sucked and the internet was dial up levels slow, but Dean couldn’t do anything about that except wait.

Despite having their system up and running, they’d only had two hits so far. That was piddly squat in the face of a Hellgate opening and flooding the Earth with demons. It had stayed disquietingly quiet these past five weeks and Dean didn't like it.

"You know I'll tell you when a bigger fish pops up," Bobby added.

"Yeah." He did know that. The older Winchester sank back into his chair, still feeling deflated in the face of a nothing ghost hunt. "Yeah, alright, what's this case you found?"

Bobby huffed and walked up to the table, snagging the laptop which still had the Star Wars title page up, awaiting input. He exited the program and pulled up the internet, typing something into the search bar before swiveling the screen towards Dean.

"Like I said, it's not much."

"You should have told me we had a case," Dean scolded Cas, though there wasn't much heat in it as he started reading about the possible paranormal activity happening a couple hours away in an old mining town just south of the Canadian border.

"If Bobby made a point of mentioning the case was not time sensitive, should we not take time to do things we enjoy?" Cas was watching him carefully, blue eyes bright, and Dean wondered if she was testing him or checking if he was testing her. "Isn't that the human experience we are trying to preserve?"

The man from the future winced, remembering telling the angel that there were things worth saving, and he would show her all of them. Namely pancakes, at the time, but yeah, he supposed Star Wars counted too. Movies in general, actually. And a pop culture education for the angel was on his timeline-fixing To-Do list.

He looked at Bobby, guilt still gnawing at him for picking leisure over a case. But the old hunter just shrugged, looking fairly nonplussed about it.

"We did save the damn planet. At least far as we know," he offered, scratching at his beard. "A little R&R isn't much of an ask."

Dean tried to relax at what felt like permission – forgiveness at the bare minimum – but the tension remained in his muscles. There was a building itch he couldn't scratch, like he needed to be up and doing something. So he stood, closing the laptop, and turned to Cas.

“Well, now I want to work a case,” he declared. The angel merely nodded in acceptance and stood as well.

“I will join you,” she announced, much to Dean’s pleasure.

“Good,” Bobby groused with a nod of his own. He crossed his arms over his chest, stink-eye leveled Dean’s way this time. “Then I won’t have to call your brother for you.”

The hunter rolled his eyes, tucking the laptop under his arm. “It’s a standard ghost hunt, Bobby, if that. I don’t need a babysitter.”

“It wasn’t standard last time,” the old hunter grumbled back, stink-eye shifting into an outright glare. “Taking on the Seven Sins on your own. Damn idjit is what you are.”

The way that Castiel’s head whipped around to Dean, glare fierce, had the hunter immediately raising his hands. “In my defense… I ran away real quick once I realized who they were.”

And he had. He had booked it out of that town, calling Bobby in a damn panic because he needed backup. A lot of backup. How the hell the same seven demons found their way out of an entirely different Hellgate was a mystery to Dean and one he really hadn’t cared about when he was busy running for his life.

The admission hardly settled either friend, so Dean rolled his eyes and added, “And yes, I should have called Sam. Are you two mother hens happy now?”

“Hardly,” came Bobby’s immediate, growled reply. Cas, on the other hand, looked down at herself as if to check she had not sprouted feathers or laid an egg. Dean moved on before she could say as much.

“Well, with Cas on my six, you’ve got nothing to worry about. Right Cas?” the older Winchester said proudly, clasping a hand on Cas’s shoulder. She blinked at him.

“I don’t believe I am on any of your numbers.” She tilted her head. “Nor do I know how to be.”

Dean shuttered his eyes, trying his best not to roll them again. “I mean you have my back.”

Cas stared again. Then she opened her mouth.

“It means you’ll protect me, Cas,” Dean blurted out as quickly as he could, before Cas could get any more lost in idioms.

She closed her mouth, blinked once, then nodded solemnly. “Yes, Dean. I will always protect you.”

Great. Now he was back to blushing.

“Let’s just go.”

He turned on his heel and aimed for anywhere but there, walking right past Bobby’s raised eyebrow and not-so-subtle smirk.

Chapter Break

It was a seven-hour drive to the old mining town just beneath the Canadian border, and Dean spent most of that time with the windows down, the music up, and Castiel in his passenger seat. It felt good. Damn good. With Sam off training his new powers and Bobby still dealing with the fallout of losing his home, Dean had largely been on his own these past couple weeks.

He’d gone solo before, of course – the longest stretch being while Sam was at school – but Dean had disliked each and every time. A shrink would probably call it codependence, but he’d never liked being on his own. Dean Winchester was always a better version of himself when someone was around to count on him.

So, of course, it was nice having a passenger riding shotgun with him once more. The fact that said passenger was Cas, finally free from Heaven’s influence – all of his brothers’ influence, actually – and there to stay was just the cherry on top.

“So tell me about this hunt,” Dean probed the angel after about an hour of comfortable silence between the two of them. Cas had been observing the world passing by her window, sun streamed across her upturned face, with something that seemed dangerously close to human contentment. It made Dean warm and fuzzy in ways he wasn’t going to acknowledge with a ten-foot pole.

Now Castiel turned towards him, that peaceful observation shifting to the more familiar seriousness of a Warrior of God. “There have been multiple sightings of ghosts in the Livingston area. They are clustered in one area of town. The cause is unknown, but the phenomenon is recent. The sightings began three months ago."

Dean nodded along with the information. "What kind of sightings?"

"Benign, mostly." Castiel picked up Bobby's folder. Dean had tossed it on the seat between them when they'd first climbed in. The angel flipped it open now, combing the information inside. "An old woman whose clothing suggested she died in the early 1900s, a young boy from the 40s or 50s looking for someone to play ball with him. There have been nine individual sightings. Only one has been violent."

" Nine ?" Dean echoed incredulously, glancing between the angel and the road. He'd never heard of nine different ghosts manifesting in the same town. Not without it being a violent, haunted shit show like Cold Oak.

"That is what the article said," Castiel replied dryly, as if Dean was calling her a liar when the proof was right there in her hand.

"Which article?"

Cas glanced down at the folder in her lap. "The local newspaper: Rolette Weekly News."

At the side-eye she received and (correctly) interpreted, Castiel added dryly, "It is an exceedingly small publication, as the town population is less than five hundred." She further assumed the snort from Dean and his focus returning to the road was permission to continue on. "The writer indicated that none of the reports were taken seriously by the authorities and believes the town is being drugged as an experiment, likely by the government."

"Yeah, that's one of the go-to conspiracy theories when weird shit starts happening," Dean offered with a shrug. "Civilians will convince themselves of just about anything if it makes them feel better."

"The concept of a town being subjected to experimental drugging by their own government is more comforting than a supernatural occurrence?" Cas sounded doubtful and Dean just snorted.

"You bet it is." He grinned over at his angel. "Normal people, man. They're the real freaks."

"Noted," Cas clipped with such a deadpan expression that Dean ended up laughing.

It felt good to laugh. Felt good to have a partner again. Hunting solo sucked in more ways than one.

Something brushed against Dean's senses, a feather-light tickle just behind his ear and the hunter suddenly wanted to rub that side of his head against his shoulder to dislodge the feeling.

"Did you say something?" he asked Cas, the right side of his skull and neck tingling.

Cas glanced at him, head tilted and expression puzzled. "No."

Huh. Weird. Dean dismissed it immediately and instead focused on the road. "So what's our theory?"

"The author believes the drugging is coming from a central location. 'Ground zero' is what he called it." Dean was nodding along again, so Castiel assumed he understood what the writer of the article was referring to. She certainly did not. "He believes each sighting started shortly after the victim purchased an object from a 'pawn shop.'"

Dean raised an eyebrow at the finger quotes, but didn't bother saying anything. He'd given up trying to get Cas to stop with those. Either the angel truly thought they were an important part of human communication, or she liked them enough to use them regardless of what he said. Either way, it was a losing battle and one not worth fighting. At least until she started using them with law enforcement.

"Pawn shop, huh?" Dean scratched at his cheek, thinking it over. It sounded like the article's author had done some pretty solid research for them. "That actually makes sense. This guy would make a decent hunter. Did he name the shop?"

Or researcher, at least. Sure, he thought someone was releasing some biological weapon inside a pawn store and that's how so many different people were experiencing the same hallucination, but the base idea was a solid one.

Someone was probably offloading haunted shit at a pawn shop, not even knowing the chaos it would cause. Meanwhile innocent people were purchasing the items and taking ghosts home with them.

"No, he merely suggested the theory," Cas amended but Dean shrugged. Finding it wouldn't be that hard, they'd just have to interview a couple of the victims of the recent ghost activity, get the name of the store they bought the haunted object from.

Easy peasy, Dean thought. They'd be in and out for this one in a jiffy.

"Sounds like a solid lead. Let's check it out."

Chapter Break

They had the name of the pawn shop confirmed by the third witness. Two had named it right out, with the third having been unsure since the item had been a gift. However, since the two hunters had managed to bribe, buy, or lie their way into gathering each item, they decided to follow up with the rest of the nine sightings. They spent the whole morning and several hours of the afternoon visiting the rest of the witnesses, confirming it was just the one store selling haunted objects, and convincing the civilians to part with the item.

Most of them were pretty happy to hand over the necklace, earrings, engagement ring, money clip, or, in one case, a gaudy broach in the shape of a bejeweled peacock. Especially once Dean mentioned a possible biochemical component.

The whole thing actually went pretty smoothly, except for the mother who had bought her daughter a simple gold necklace with a heart locket. She had gone into detail of how her nine year old had sworn she'd seen an old lady while at school, dressed funny and able to walk through walls. Her teachers had called her a liar (in nicer words) and her mother had told her not to tell stories.

Which was when Cas had interrupted to defend the young girl, who had indeed seen a ghost due to the necklace being stolen from a cemetery and very likely linked to the ghost of its previous owner. She had also scolded both mother and teachers for failing to believe the young lady.

At that point, Dean had grabbed his 'partner' by the elbow, apologized profusely to the slowly reddening mother (he could see mama bear raising to her full height, getting ready to roar) and quickly left the house. The drive to the next witness was spent discussing why we don't tell civilians about the supernatural. Cas still wasn't quite onboard, but did promise not to go telling any more people about ghosts for the duration of the case.

They made it to the pawn shop just before it closed up for the day. The guy at the register was less than helpful in naming his supplier until Dean pulled out his wallet. With the right monetary incentive, the shop owner pulled out a big binder of receipts and started flipping through it. They had the guy's name and address within twenty minutes of entering the shop.

Another thirty minutes after that, they were standing on the front step of Gary Willemsen, gardener and groundskeeper at the Nordland Cemetery just up the road. Which explained where he was getting haunted items, and why the majority of those sightings had been benign. They weren't angry spirits lingering, just ghosts of people who'd had their shit stolen before going into the ground.

Normal people were the worst, Dean thought as he introduced himself to the sleazeball as Insurance agents.

"I don't know what you're talking about," Gary insisted, despite Dean holding up several of the items while wearing a deadpan face that said 'yeah right, pal .' "I've never seen any of that stuff before."

"Funny," the hunter replied with a tight smile. "It was your name on the receipt of purchase at the pawn shop. Beaver Al's Pawnbroker, wasn't it?"

He turned as if confirming the question with his partner, though his tone said there was no doubt that was the right name. Beside him, Cas dutifully nodded, regarding their thief with a less than friendly expression. Dean turned back to Gary.

"Sound familiar?"

"Alright, look," the guy hedged, now shifting from one foot to the other. He crossed his arms over his chest defensively. "I might have come into some… stuff. Jewelry and things. I sold 'em to Al, but that's all."

"Sure, pal. You came into it." Dean tucked the necklace and ring back into his inner suit pocket. "Tell you what, we'll buy that. If you give us the rest of this 'stuff' and stop selling stolen shit to Al, or any other pawnbroker. Deal?"

Gary hesitated, eying the two of them with a look Dean knew well. The guy was considering rabbiting. Not that he'd get far, but it was a look all liars got when they knew they were caught. Their only options were to dig in deeper or flee. Few ever actually confessed.

Mr. Willemsen was no exception.

"I sold it all, I swear," he said, eventually raising his hands up. "That's all I had. You can keep it and I, uh, I won't do it again."

Castiel took a step forward, crowding the man against his own door frame. Gary leaned back, unsure what was happening, but the angel still managed to get uncomfortably close. "You will not. Or we will be back."

Dean could see the guy's Adams apple bob as he swallowed roughly. He took an unsteady step back, as much as he could without retreating into his own house, and nodded.

"Sure. You got it, ma'am. I'll, uh, I won't do it again. Swear."

"And you're sure that's all you came into ?" Dean looked down at the little pad he was holding and the notes he'd taken. He'd found from experience that the stupid little notebook was an important prop. One pad of paper and civilians took you more seriously. "One gold locket, one set of emerald earrings, one set of gold hoop earrings, one silver money clip, one bird broach, one engagement ring, two wedding band, and-"

A partridge in a pear tree.

"Sixteen grams of silver." Dean looked back up with the kind of smile that suggested he was close to murder. Luckily, this wasn't the first time he'd come across recovered metal that had once been someone's fillings. The truth was, as fucked up as it could be, bodies went into the crematorium and sometimes there were… leftovers. This guy had poached those leftovers and sold them to Al who, thank fuck, had not resold them.

(Most civilians weren't interested in owning a dead person's fillings . At least not until someone melted 'em down and made something significantly less disturbing out of them.)

"That's everything I sold to Al," the guy confirmed, conveniently not answering the question he'd been asked. "I won't, uh, sell anything I come into again."

"See that you don't," Dean said sternly, easily falling into the professional authority that could rain down consequences if not heeded. Gary glanced warily between the two of them, but it was obvious he found Cas far more unnerving than Dean. The hunter couldn't really blame him. "We'll be informing your boss of the recovered items. I'm sure he'll be interested in how they got from his client's coffins to a pawnshop."

The glare Mr. Willemsen sent his way told Dean they'd finally gotten the message through. The two left the thief staring after them as they headed down the walkway back to Baby, sitting at the curb.

"He's definitely hiding something," Dean said at the same time Cas announced, "That man is lying."

They glanced at each other over the roof of the Impala and Dean couldn't contain his grin as he opened the driver's side door.

"We'll stake out the house," he said to Cas, nodding. Mr. Willemsen was still staring at them from his front door and Dean made no attempt to avoid eye contact. Cas glanced over her shoulder at the man, who closed the front door closed shortly thereafter. The angel turned her gaze back to Dean as the hunter continued, "Once he leaves, we'll get inside and find whatever else that moron ' came into' ."

As they climbed into the car, Cas turned to him with a very serious expression. "Angela would like to tell you something."

Dean bit back the groan, staring at the angel and trying to decide how anything Dragon Lady had to say could be vital to a case. When they sat there in an extended silence, just staring at one another, Dean finally realized Cas was waiting for acknowledgement. He rolled his eyes. "And that would be…?"

Cas raised her hands, curling all but two fingers into a now painfully familiar bunny-eared shape and Dean was groaning before the angel even relayed the message. Which was delivered in a voice even deeper and more gravely than usual.

"She finds your lack of air quotes disturbing."

End Chapter

Chapter End Notes

Author's Notes: Poor Dean and those damn air quotes.

Alright, I know that wasn't the most exciting introduction to Season 3 but I promise, it's about to heat up 😈

Quality: Apologies if the writing and editing are off. The Muse and I are having words about Season 3 (she is not cooperating, let me tell you) and I haven't had a lot of energy to do things (like edit), so this chapter only got a rough pass. I'll do another later when I'm feeling better.

Disney: Let's make this very clear. Disneyland is not just for kids! (Says the Disney adult with waaaay too much paraphernalia, multiple bounding outfits, and matching ears hanging in her nerd cave) Also, I had way too much fun imagining our three boys at Disney XD

Bunker Systems: Frank restored the bunker systems to the Standby Mode that pre-season 15 Dean knows. No comment on whether we'll see Mrs. Butters in this story, but Dean is unaware of her existence, so his goal is to restore the Bunker the same way they did the first time they found it :)

Next Up: Reminder for anyone who skipped the beginning A/N's, I will be on a two week posting schedule while I deal with some real life things. Thank you all for your patience and understanding and WELCOME TO SEASON 3!

Cheers,
Silence

Chapter 143: Season 3: Chapter 2

Chapter Notes

Author's Notes: Oh Chuck, guys, I am so tired I don't think I'll get much down for author's notes today. I'm on three hours of sleep and a whole day spent at Disneyland with friends. I was supposed to edit this chapter in lines but I couldn't get my eyes to focus on my tiny phone screen I can't keep my eyes open now! I'm so tired I'm starting to feel sick Which means it's definitely time for bed, even if this chapter didn't get a thorough edit from me.

Big Thanks to forestpelt for her edit of this chapter today so I could get it posted when I got home. Additional thank yous to green kittens and Lyeundu for their help editing, sanity-checking me, and read throughs as well.

Chapter Warnings: Things are gonna heat up on this little ghost hunt of ours.

Actual Chapter Warnings: Um…I legit can't think of how to warn for what's ahead without spoiling what's ahead. So. Uh…. enjoy?

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 3: Chapter 2

Gary Willemsen didn't leave for three long, boring hours. Dean and Cas passed the time with a food run, idle chatter, and a beer, all while parked down the street. When the guy did finally emerge, he strutted out of his house in a pair of dark blue jeans, a bright dress shirt, and an unbuttoned blazer. His hair had been gelled back and styled, and Dean could tell, even three houses away, that the man positively reeked of cologne.

"Looks like someone's hoping to get lucky," the hunter commented with a smirk before remembering it wasn't his brother riding passenger. It was Castiel, an angel famously bad at picking up on colloquialisms.

“He intends to have sexual intercourse this evening?”

Dean choked on the last of his beer, coughing back what wanted to be spewed, and wiped at his mouth with the back of his hand. He shot Cas an amused – albeit surprised – look. He managed to keep most of the sarcasm out of his voice as he asked, “You know about getting lucky?”

“Yes. Gabriel taught me about the Pizza Man,” Cas replied with a thoughtful nod, still watching their thief as he climbed into his car and backed out of the driveway. Dean was still staring at his angel, both brain and mouth having malfunctioned spectacularly at that statement and currently rebooting. Blue eyes darted towards him then away almost shyly. The human found himself unconsciously wetting his lips as Cas continued, “He said everything I ever needed to know I can learn from him. Is Gary going to meet the Pizza Man?”

Dean forced himself to turn away from the angel so he could instead stare out the windshield. The safe, blank, non-sexual windshield. “I’m not touching this one with a ten-foot pole.”

“I was not aware they came that long.”

This time Dean did choke, which was all the more ridiculous because he wasn’t drinking anything .

“Angela says poles are often much shorter than that. Although she also says it’s not about length so much as girth.” The look Cas adopted could be called adorably perplexed. At least, it might have been, had Dean been able to look her way at all. Instead, he was busy turning tomato red in the driver’s seat and staring so intensely out the windshield it was a wonder the glass didn’t crack under pressure. Castiel carried on, oblivious to the internal crisis that currently was Dean Winchester. “I am unsure how thickness would matter when the intent is to touch something with your pole, however.”

“And I’m out.” Dean climbed out of the Impala about as fast as he could manage without looking like he was bodily running away. He crossed the street at a similar pace, hopping up onto the curb and continuing the four blocks to the Willemsen residence. Cas followed behind at a more sedate stroll, most likely unaware of the awkwardness Dean was all but running from.

Probably for the best.

By the time the angel caught up to him at the front door, Dean already had his lockpicks out and was jimmying them around the keyhole. He kept his movements subtle and hidden by the bulk of his frame, in case any onlookers spotted the strange couple at Mr. Willemsen's door. The lock gave with a click and the two hunters slipped inside and closed the door before any curious neighbors could become suspicious.

The inside of the house was pretty standard. Gary lived within his means but had some sense of taste. There was a spattering of art on the walls, photos peppered amongst books and knickknacks, and a nice sized TV Dean could appreciate. Guy didn't really look like he needed the extra income that came from stealing from the dead.

Dean pulled an EMF meter from his jacket pocket, turning it on. It reared up for a moment – all four lights blinking – before they dropped back down and the device fell silent. Cas walked up beside him, also idly observing the dwelling they'd broken into.

"I'd say we should split up, but I only have one EMF," Dean started to say, but Cas was tilting her head before he'd finished.

"I should be able to sense any spiritual attachment if I am close enough to the possessed object," she announced and Dean blinked. He hadn't known angels could do that. Though, really, it wasn't a surprising talent, given their other additional senses.

"You're a walking EMF. I dig it," he replied with a grin, though Cas's head tilt got tilt-y-er. "You take upstairs, then, and I'll look down here."

The downstairs seemed larger, with Dean estimating a living room, kitchen, and at least two rooms (one of which was probably a bathroom) so he figured he'd take that. Which left Cas whatever bedrooms were upstairs. Most of the stolen items had been jewelry of some sort, and Dean figured most people kept jewelry in the master bedroom. So hopefully Cas would find what they were looking for while Dean cleared the downstairs.

Cas nodded at his suggestion and headed for the carpeted stairs that led to the second floor. Dean left her to it, pulling out the extendable antenna on his EMF and walking the perimeter of the living room. He moved the device up and down as he passed furniture and shelves. The four lights stayed annoyingly dead, the device silent, but Dean wasn't all that surprised. If he'd stolen a bunch of shit, he probably wouldn't leave it lying around in his living room. Regardless, he opened drawers and cabinets, just to be sure their thief hadn't stashed something out of sight.

It took about twenty minutes for him to declare the downstairs possessed-object free. It wasn't surprising, but it was disappointing. Dean headed for the stairs, hoping that a lack of Cas coming back down was a good sign.

She was in the master bedroom, standing by a long dresser that lined one wall, hand held out and hovering above the surface.

"Any luck?" Dean asked as he entered the room, crossing over to the angel. Blue eyes turned his way, but Cas was already shaking her head.

"I do not believe the item is here," she intoned, but tilted her head towards her outstretched hand, "but it was, not very long ago."

"Think it's just one piece we're looking for?" There was nothing on the dresser's surface to suggest what the item was that Cas could sense.

"Yes," she replied, finally lowering her arm back to her trench-coated side. "This is the only residual spiritual energy I have sensed in the house. Gary Willemsen must have taken it with him when he left."

Dean blew out a huff of air, hands resting at his hips. "Well shit. He's probably selling it. Damnit, Gary."

"If he fails to do so and returns with the item, he will likely be in danger," Cas said with a grave tone. "The residual energy is that of an angry spirit."

"Of course it is." Because that was their kind of luck (not to mention that some dickhead had gone and stolen it from its rightful place. Dean would be ticked off too) and now they had to go find whatever it was their graverobber had taken before it hurt someone else.

"We should ward the room," Cas suggested, looking around. Dean raised an eyebrow and Cas shrugged one well-defined shoulder. "If Gary returns with the possessed item and returns it to this spot," she gestured to the blank surface of the dresser, "the ghost will likely attack while he sleeps."

Which also sounded like their kind of luck. Shit always did attack in the bedroom, so warding it would solve their problem until they could get back in tomorrow. Assuming they didn't find the piece – or that piece of crap, Gary – first.

Dean looked around. The room was nothing fancy, though it kind of reminded Dean of Lisa's bedroom back in Cicero. Nice queen bed in the center of the room with a blue duvet and white pillows (colors Lisa definitely would have had in her house). There was the long dresser they were standing in front of, some sorta wardrobe thing in the corner, and some fancy floor lamp that arched over a single armchair currently covered in tossed-aside clothes.

There was a door to their left that Dean assumed was an attached bathroom. There was a robe hanging off the back of it. They could carve a warding sigil into that easily enough and hide it behind the clothing, and they could hide the other three sigils behind the available furniture. The only real problem would be the bedroom door itself. If their thief slept with it open, there could be a weak spot in the warding.

"Probably better than nothing," Dean said more to himself than to Cas, but nodded his approval of the plan.

Cas was already moving closer to the dresser, thighs pressing against the piece of furniture in her stretch forward towards the wall. Her blade was in hand and Dean had to catch her wrist before she could start carving into the wall.

"Dude's definitely gonna freak if he walks into his bedroom tonight and there's a bunch of symbols dug into the walls, man." He shook his head even as Cas lowered her arm and Dean released her wrist. He grabbed the edge of the dresser and pulled it away from the wall with ease. "Here, draw it back here and we'll move the dresser back when you're done."

Cas nodded her approval, moving around the edge and crouching down near the wall. Dean watched as she finished the symbol. It wasn't a ward he was familiar with, so he studied it for a moment more till he'd committed it to memory. Then he pulled a knife from his boot and got to work on the wall behind the bed. He pulled the artwork down and set it aside, confident it would hide the sigil nicely.

Between the two of them, they had all four sides of the room sigiled up in under five minutes. Dean didn't even ask, he trusted her knowledge. His angel had always been the best at wards.

A flash in his peripheral – something tannish that made Dean immediately think of Cas – caused the hunter to turn towards the bedroom door. When nothing was there, he took the few steps necessary to stick his head out into the hall. But there was nothing there, either.

"Huh." Dean pulled back inside the bedroom, but the sound of the front door opening and closing had his head whipping back to the hallway. Voices were filtering up the stairs followed shortly by footsteps. A woman's laugh followed and Dean spun back to Cas only to find her eyes wide and locked on him.

"Shit!" he swore, ducking further into the room. The voices had reached the top of the stairs and were now headed their way. Gary had a lady friend and Cas and Dean were in his bedroom . He had gotten lucky after all. Or, he would in a minute, so long as he didn't walk into the room and see two strangers standing smack dab in the middle of it. " Shit !"

He grabbed Cas by the wrist, frantically searching for a place to hide. He pulled the angel towards the door they'd warded earlier. A bathroom was not exactly a good hiding spot, but it would give them a few more seconds to figure out what to do next. Dean opened the door and pulled Cas inside. Gary and his date tumbled into the room, all over each other already, the woman giggling, before Dean could shut the door completely. He released the handle, afraid to try his luck at closing it completely without making any noise, and backed away from the cracked door.

Right into Cas.

"Wha-" Dean managed to cut himself off, keeping the exclamation fairly quiet despite his surprise. Cas was at his back. Not just at his back but pressed right up against him. Keeping his voice way lower than before, he hissed, "What the hell, Cas?"

"There is nowhere to go," came her calm response. Her breath was warm against the base of his neck and Dean fought off a shiver, inching forward as much as he dared. Beyond the door, the couple had already made it to the bed and certain, erm, sounds were making it through the not-nearly-thick-enough-or-closed-enough closet door.

Because that's what Dean had shoved them into. The closet. The surprisingly small closet. Dean's left shoulder was brushing wall, but his right was buried at least an inch deep in hanging clothes. If the human pressed as close to the door as he dared, he and Cas had about two inches of space between them.

Not ideal. Especially not with the activity currently underway – loudly underway – on the other side of that door.

"What are you waiting for?" Dean hissed over his shoulder, but he couldn't make out much more than the angel's silhouette in the darkness. "Zap us out of here!"

He could just make out the blue of her eyes in the darkness, faintly lit. "We warded the room, Dean. I cannot ' zap' us anywhere."

The hunter's eyes widened in disbelief. "Why the hell did we do that? We just needed to keep a murderous ghost out, Cas, not angels !"

Her eyes narrowed in the darkness and when she replied, it was with the tone of a Warrior of God. The one that threatened to throw rescued souls back in Hell.

Another shiver raced up Dean's spine and he started thinking real hard about baseball stats and cold showers. He closed his eyes and tried to do the same thing with his ears, to no avail.

"The sigil we used wards against all harm."

Dean's eyes snapped back open and he whipped his head to the side, turning into Cas as much as he could manage in the small space. His bicep ended up pressed against her chest and he was not thinking about it.

"What the hell do you mean, 'all harm'?" he whispered furiously, Cas making a soft shushing noise as his voice grew precariously loud. Still wasn't loud enough to drown out what was happening just outside their little hidey hole, damnit. "How the hell are we harming him? We're trying to get away from him!"

"We are intruders in his home intending to steal from him," Castiel explained like this should be obvious and Dean was being foolish. "Harm is not limited to the physical plane, Dean."

The man from the future slid his eyes shut, turning back towards the door so his back was once more flat against Cas's chest (which he was not thinking about) and groaned. Cas shushed him again.

How was this his life?

A particularly loud moan had Dean shifting his weight awkwardly, trying once more to put some distance between him and his angel. At least they weren't pressed face to face. God, Dean might just die from embarrassment.

"Oh, I see," Cas whispered behind him, and Dean startled at the warm breath puffing against his neck once more. She had moved closer. If he turned his head, he could just see her in his periphery, pressed close enough to almost lay her chin on his shoulder. Her eyes were locked on the sliver of space left by the door. "Gary found a Pizza Woman ."

If he'd had the room, Dean would have buried his head in his hands. How was this his life?

"Stop watching them," is what he snapped instead, body tense from the close proximity. Jesus, Cas smelled good.

"Look at the woman."

Dean closed his eyes all the tighter. "Really don't wanna see two strangers getting it on, Cas."

He felt the angel shake her head. Silk-smooth hair brushed across his skin with each toss and Dean thought about ghouls and witches and shooting Adolf Hitler.

"No, Dean," Cas whispered, this time incredibly close to his ear and how was this his life?! How did he have the one angel in the universe who didn't know what she was doing? "Look at her neck."

'I don't want to look at the woman-who's-currently-having-sex's neck right now, Cas, ' he thought snappishly. Green eyes cracked open anyway and Dean leaned forward – putting some blessed space between himself and the angel – to squint past the sliver of space.

He got himself an eyeful, which he tried desperately to ignore (entirely unsuccessfully. Gary hadn't just gotten lucky, he'd scored), but after a very confusing moment for his body, Dean spotted what Cas was talking about. Around the woman's neck was a simple but stunning diamond and ruby necklace set in gold. Wearing nothing but that necklace and straddling (what Dean now assumed was) her boyfriend, she was absolutely gorgeous.

Dean shut his eyes again quickly. "I see it. That's gotta be our missing ghost object."

He felt Cas nod against his back, still pressed entirely too close to him. Another glance over his shoulder – and why was this when Cas forgot about that personal space talk they'd had? – revealed that intense gaze still locked on the crack and the activity happening beyond.

There was curiosity in those blue depths, Dean could see it before he forced himself to look away. Instead, he focused on some of those breathing techniques Sam was always trying to get him to do.

The next eighteen minutes were the longest of Dean's life, but finally the room fell silent – the satiated lovers having passed the hell out – and Dean could breathe again. He tumbled out of the closet as fast as he could without waking the bastards up. Cas followed behind far more calmly, giving Dean plenty of time to get himself presentable again. He was friggin' sweating for christ's sake.

"Make sure they stay asleep," was the only sentence he managed to get out, voice embarrassingly rough. Dean didn't dare clear his throat to fix it until Cas had knocked the two out. She did so with no fanfare, just two fingers pressed to their foreheads, the two lovers a tangle of limbs and sweat-slicked skin.

Dean very purposefully avoided looking at them. Cas unclasped the necklace and drew it off the woman's neck as the hunter stood at the foot of the bed, looking just about anywhere else.

"We good?" he asked, glaring at the bedroom door and his soon-to-be escape from this nightmare.

'At least he came home with a lady ,' Dean thought before he realized why he'd thought it and then turned tomato red all over again. 'Don't think about it. Don't think about it.'

He still blamed Andy for the amount of times he'd caught himself thinking about it. One day when he got up to Heaven and saw the kid again, he was gonna shoot him. Somewhere non-vital, of course. Just a flesh wound. But damnit, he was gonna shoot Andy Gallagher next time he saw him.

"We're good," Cas responded and Dean risked glancing at her. She gave a firm nod. If she was aware of the hell Dean had just spent twenty minutes enduring, she made no mention of it.

And Dean was fairly certain he'd only imagined those blue eyes drop down the length of his body right before he'd turned for the door. Pretty sure.

They made it downstairs and out the door without the couple stirring, not that they really had to worry. One dose of angelic Ambien kept a normal person out for at least an hour. Dean held the front door open for Cas, closing it behind them and taking a couple moments to relock it with his lock picks. He hurried after his angel, who was already at the curb and crossing the street towards the Impala.

Once Dean was safely back inside Baby, he allowed himself to breathe. Damn, that had sucked . He let out a literal sigh of relief, eyes darting to the rear view mirror as he turned the key and Baby's engine roared to life.

Blue eyes locked on his through the rearview mirror reflection. Cas – Jimmy – was sitting in the backseat of the Impala. Dean spun around, startled, only to find the backseat completely empty. He snapped back around to the rearview mirror, but it revealed a similarly empty car.

'What the hell?'

Dean jumped as the passenger side door opened with a creak of metal and Cas – Angela's Cas – slid into the seat next to him.

'No, seriously, what the hell?'

He stared at the angel, then glanced at the rearview mirror again. Then the backseat. And the angel in a very female vessel once more.

"Something wrong?" Cas asked, cute frown firmly pinching her eyebrows together. Dean stared at that furled brow and wondered if he was losing it.

"I… don't know," he stammered out. Something felt off, but he didn't know what. Could it be something to do with the case? A- a ghost or something? "You got the necklace?"

"Yes," Cas confirmed, though she was watching him carefully. There was worry in her voice (for an angel, that is) when she asked, "Did you injure yourself in the house?"

Her arm crossed the distance between them, the long flash of tan from her coat startling Dean for a second. He was definitely losing it, he decided as two fingers pressed to his forehead. He didn't have time – or desire, which was odd in and of itself – to tell Cas he was fine before the cool blue of her magic was washing over him.

It was a calming wave washing over him, like water rushing over sand. Or maybe river rocks. Clear and cool, it took all the tension and confusion with it as it retreated and Dean found himself relaxing into the touch. Curious, but in a detached way Dean couldn't say he was particularly fond of, he glanced over at his angel. Those blue eyes were so damn blue.

Dean stiffened slightly, realizing he was all but leaning into Cas's hand against his forehead, those two fingers holding his head up while he stared at the angel. Once again fighting off a blush, the hunter eased away from the warmth of her touch.

"I'm good," Dean declared, then had to clear his throat and repeat the words in a sturdier voice. "Uh, thanks."

"You are welcome, Dean." Cas lowered her arm, turning back into her seat and looking out the windshield at the dark street stretched out before them. As if nothing weird had just happened. Maybe it hadn't. Dean blinked slowly, his thoughts a haze of confused serenity. What an odd feeling to have, he thought. Cas was talking again, and the hunter had to actually focus to tune back in. "We should burn the necklace as quickly as possible."

Right. The job. Dean cleared his throat again and some of the fog lifted. The hunter shook himself free of whatever the hell was going on in his head and put Baby in gear, pulling away from the curb. They needed to burn the necklace. Dean was definitely starting to think it was doing something to them.

Hell, maybe it had done something to that couple and that was the reason for all the… you know. Not that Dean was thinking about that. Or Cas. In relation to that.

Definitely not.

"We passed the cemetery the dude worked at on our way here," he said instead. Focus on the job . He could practically hear Dad's voice in his head and Dean's shoulders squared up like a soldier coming to attention. He had a job to do. "We can find a quiet corner there to burn it."

Castiel nodded her agreement and Dean turned the Impala that way. He couldn't help but check the rear view mirror several times on the way, but there was never anything there.

Chapter Break

They got back to the bunker well after midnight. The necklace had burned without fanfare, though Dean hadn't been able to let go of the residual apprehension – muscles bunched and tension coiled, just waiting for something to go wrong – until he'd climbed back into the Impala and checked the rearview. No flash of tan, no ghost of Cas sitting in his back seat. It had taken another minute after that, but as the real Cas slid into the car beside him, Dean felt the last of his unease slip away.

The drive back had been quiet but not uncomfortable. Dean even rolled the windows down to enjoy the pleasant May night and turned the music up. Unlike Sam, Castiel had no complaints about the selection, even bopping her head along to one song (the movement had been so minuscule that it took three glances to even confirm Dean wasn't just seeing things, but it had been there).

Bobby was already asleep by the time they made it in. Or at least, the door to the room he'd picked as his own, room 15. It had been a little more tucked away from the other bedrooms, and Dean figured the old hunter had wanted the additional privacy. He probably already felt like the only chaperone at an overnight camp, and neither of the Winchesters had pushed him towards increased socialization or participation.

Guy was mourning the loss of his house, after all. And while it did Dean's heart damn good to see Bobby in the Bunker, something he'd have killed to see the first time around, he wanted to respect the guy's need for privacy and independence.

It was weird having the tables turned, and Bobby relying on their hospitality (not that Dean thought of the bunker as his and Sam's specifically. In his mind it was as much for Bobby as it was for them, but he was sure that's not how Bobby saw it).

Dean stopped by his room first, dropping his duffel bag and trading it for his shower basket. Sam had given him so much shit the first time

(and the second first time) he'd seen Dean making his way to the communal bathroom with his little white basket of toiletries, slippers sticking out of the side and his robe neatly folded on top. But Sam could fuck right off, because this was the life.

Cas was lingering in his doorway when he turned right back around, shower supplies in hand, and ran straight into the angel.

"Whoa, hey, uh… I was thinking I'd go take a shower," Dean stammered awkwardly, feeling completely unbalanced and once more in way too close proximity. He hadn't realized Cas had been trailing him to his room. "You know, uh, wash off the hunt."

Awwwkward.

Castiel just nodded, not moving out of the way. After a moment, Dean decided maybe she didn't realize she was in the way. So he kinda reached out and laid a hand on either shoulder, guiding her a couple steps to the side. Castiel followed his prodding until there was enough room for the hunter to squeeze past. Dean did so, only hesitating once he was fully in the hall and Cas was still just standing there, watching him.

"So, uh… I'm pretty beat," he said, once again feeling both awkward and incredibly self-conscious.

'What is going on with me tonight?' he thought, only to quickly amend that thought to 'I was stuck pressed up against a friggin' angel of the lord for an eternity while two horndogs got it on vocally ten friggin' feet away.' When put that way, Dean decided feeling 'off' really wasn't all that odd. Which wasn't a cure for the brain-to-mouth disconnect he was currently experiencing, but everyone around him (which, yeah, was only Cas, but that's so not the point) could forgive some residual awkwardness on his part, alright?

Cas still hadn't moved, those penetrating eyes locked on his. Dean was starting to feel twitchy under that gaze, like the angel wanted something from him but he had no idea what. Jeez, he was seriously off his game tonight if he was having this much trouble reading the angel.

"Night?" he offered weakly.

"Goodnight, Dean," the angel replied, but neither of the two actually moved.

'Oh for fuck's sake, ' he thought, done with the Hallmark Movie that currently was his life. He spun on his heel and double-timed it down the hall towards the showers. He refused to look back to see if Cas was still standing just outside his door, watching his retreat.

(Which meant he only looked at the very last possible moment as he rounded the corner. She was gone. Dean did not know what to do with the twist of something in his gut. Couldn't even figure out if it was relief or disappointment.)

(Not that it could be disappointment, of course. Why would he be disappointed that Cas had stopped being a stalker-y weirdo with no personal space boundaries? He wouldn't. Being disappointed by that would be weird.)

Dean might have been a little aggressive turning on the shower, if such a thing was possible. He had to dial back the hot water several times after cranking the knob as hard as he could into the 'on' position. Just what the hell was going on with him?

He ducked under the still scorching stream, trying to force tight muscles to relax. There was something… off about the whole day. Ever since they'd gotten to that mining town and started on the case. But Dean couldn't put his finger on what. He just knew it was something.

As much as he wanted to sweep it under the rug of 'Awkward Cas Things I don't Think About ,' he couldn't quite manage it. Because yeah, getting stuck pressed up against Cas for half an hour while listening to the live rendition of (what had arguably been damn good) porn was awkward as all get out and did belong under that rug. But there was something else. Something… underlying the normal rug stuff.

Usually, Dean didn't go looking. Not when Cas was involved. Yeah, yeah, everyone else wanted to call it denial or homophobia (Dean was not homophobic, thank you very much, he just wasn't… well, he wasn't- It wasn't homophobia, okay! It was just… homo… not… interested. Yeah. That.) but this was different. Dean didn't know how it was different, just that it was.

A heady and less-self-critical part of his brain suggested turning that shower a little colder, but the man from the future couldn't bring himself to turn the knob. He was tense and he didn't understand why, and the heat and the steam seemed to be helping. At least until he started thinking again and then he was coiled right back up like a boxer waiting to jab.

That was it, he thought begrudgingly. It felt like he was rearing for a fight. But the case was over (at least until that dipshit went and stole more crap) so all that was left was the 'Awkward Cas Stuff We Don't Think About .' Which, as the name might suggest, Dean was not thinking about.

Despite the Awkward with a capital 'A' – and their long relationship had plenty of Awkward, even if this most recent example was particularly ridiculous – Dean never tensed up about that shit. Not like this.

"So why am I now?" he muttered aloud, scrubbing shampoo into his scalp like he might be able to find the answers if he worked at his head enough.

No answers came, however. Dean didn't get it.

"Maybe cuz Cas's a girl now," he muttered half-heartedly, already knowing as he said it that there was no truth to that.

Dean was a Ladies Man. Always had been; he'd never shied away from that before or felt even the slightest shame in it. Getting turned on by a hot chick could be embarrassing at times, sure.

(Try all the time when that hot chick was your best friend slash Angel of the Lord. Dean was pretty sure that was covered somewhere in the ten commandments: thou shalt not get a boner when talking to a messenger of God. Not like he was all that good at following the other nine, though, so suck it.)

But Dean had already done plenty of that around Cas since she'd become a she – both the getting turned on and the embarrassment – and they'd managed through it just fine. Mostly with Cas cornering him and telling him to get his shit together, and Dean taking lots and lots of cold showers and private time.

That was the routine and they'd been doing fine. He hardly even popped a stiffy around her anymore (the events of that evening notwithstanding. Those didn't count: there were extenuating circumstances , damnit.)

Dean shut off the shower, snagging one of the fluffy towels he'd splurged on in the same shopping trip as his mattress and foam topper. There were a couple things Dean had learned were worth the money and now he'd never go back. He draped the damp towel over his shoulders and grabbed his dead guy robe, taking a moment to appreciate the small things in life. Like fluffy towels, mattress toppers, and dead guy robes.

Life was good, he thought with a grin, heading back through the maze of halls in his slippers, shower basket swinging at his side. Confusing as fuck, sure. Awkward and sometimes still tense (seriously, what the hell was going on with him?) But overall, life was good.

Dean returned to his room still toweling off his head and short hair, but drew up short as he realized he wasn't alone. Castiel was in his room, sitting on the edge of his bed. Dean stared at the angel, brain not quite computing her presence, and dropped the towel back around his neck with a flush of embarrassment he still didn't understand.

"Uh…"

He should have taken that cold shower, damnit.

Dean nervously fisted his hands around the ends of his towel, pulling it tight against his neck for lack of anything else to do with them. Cas was in his room. Still. She was on his bed.

'Not thinking about it, ' Dean reminded himself. 'Just a normal night in the bunker. Nothing more.'

Cas's eyes were once again locked on him with a level of intensity that was always unnerving, no matter how frequently it was aimed his way.

'This is normal ,' Dean repeated again to himself. Totally normal. Even if it didn't feel normal at all.

"Did you pick a room yet?" he managed to ask, wondering if maybe that was the reason she was in his. She may not know where else to be. Cas was new to Bunker Life, after all.

"I was not aware I was supposed to," the angel answered easily enough, voice deep and even just like always.

See? Totally normal.

"Well, you can have any of 'em 'cept number Seven. That one's Sammy's." And the younger Winchester would be back to use it. He would. Dean just had to be patient. And understanding. And patient.

Dean awkwardly came to a stop in front of the seated angel. There wasn't really anywhere else to go in the small room, except to sit at the desk. Which Dean really didn't want. What he wanted was his bed, which he now eyed enviously. He hadn't been lying earlier; he really was beat.

"So… uh…" Dean kinda flapped his elbows like a chicken, hands still wrapped around the ends of his damp towel.

Which turned out to be an unfortunate choice, as he was suddenly very aware of just how little clothing he was wearing. He only had the dead guy robe and a towel around his neck. Not a lick of coverage underneath. Dean hadn't needed to bring anything more to the showers; he'd planned on passing out afterward and since he rather liked sleeping in the nude now that he had his own room back…

Well. That was a habit he was seriously rethinking.

"The offer is appreciated, but I do not need a room as I do not sleep," Cas said, startling Dean back to the present, where he was standing, naked beneath his robe, in his bedroom with an angel sitting on his bed.

'Not thinking about it ,' warred in his head with the simultaneous reminder of, 'This is totally normal.'

Dean had no idea how to respond to that. He was caught between irritation – he just wanted to go to sleep, damnit – and irrational hurt. Cas was supposed to want a room. This was supposed to be her home, too, and homes came with a space that was yours, just yours. A space to belong, that made it yours. She should want that. Rationally, Dean knew it was a little early to expect everyone else to consider the bunker their home, but it was . They just didn't know it yet.

For Cas, too. Dean would make sure of it this time.

"Uh…" None of that actually helped his current dilemma. Dean gave up any attempt at subtly and said, "Well, I do. And it'd be nice to get some, Cas."

That intense gaze, locked on him as it always was, followed Dean's as the hunter glanced very purposefully at the bed and back to the angel. A little frown pinched her brow as she looked back down at the bed again, and Dean thought maybe she'd finally gotten it.

'Totally normal.'

Then Cas scooted a whole foot and a half further down the bed, now perched near the foot of the mattress. There was space for Dean, uh, technically , and she stared expectantly up at him, as though he couldn't possibly have any complaints about the compromise. Dean fought the urge to pinch the bridge of his nose and instead just gave up entirely. He sat on the bed next to his angel, perched as awkwardly on the edge as Cas was.

Before he could figure out if he was really going to climb under the covers with an angel sitting right there like a parent waiting to tuck their kiddo in for bedtime, Cas moved. Dean had barely settled his ass on the mattress when Cas was turning towards him. She tucked one leg up onto the mattress so she could square her torso fully towards the hunter. Taken aback by the (frankly human) move, Dean scooted a little further away before, rather naturally, resettling himself against the headboard. Mirroring Cas's legs, they were now facing one another.

'So normal. So completely and utterly normal .'

"What's on your mind?" he asked mostly satirically, wondering if they'd start braiding each other's hair next. He didn't say any of that, though. Not when Cas was looking at him like she was.

"There is something else Gabriel showed me," Cas announced out of nowhere and Dean was suddenly all new levels of tense. "A human thing."

The man from the future could only nod, completely unsure where the angel was going with this or what the right response could possibly be.

'Normal. Normal, normal, normalnormalnormal. Perfectly normal, no need to freak out.'

"It is something I would like to try now." Cas almost seemed hesitant, which was not normal, and Dean realized with a jolt of surprise that she was uncertain about whatever it is she wanted to try. Cas was never uncertain.

Except about human stuff, he reasoned. That would make sense. Maybe she needed help with something embarrassing. Something…

er… maybe lady… related?

Dean's eyes darted down without his permission before snapping immediately back up, a sense of pure panic welling in his stomach.

Those blue, blue eyes weren't quite meeting his own anymore now. At least until they were. And then Dean's lungs forgot how to function.

"With your permission," Cas added and Dean's mouth went completely dry. Sahara Desert in a drought dry. He swallowed reflexively but it was work.

He had no – none, zip, zero – idea why he was reacting so weirdly. This was totally normal, right? So he should be reacting normally .

'Be normal! '

Dean tried to swallow past a mouth full of sand that tasted like exhilarating terror. Like that second just before you dropped on a roller coaster. The hunter managed to nod – again, just about the only thing he could do – before he realized that Cas was still staring at him imploringly. She was expecting a verbal acknowledgement.

"S-Sure," Dean stammered out. He tried to shape his mouth into a smile, wondering if it was as shaky as he felt. What the hell was going on with him? Cas probably wanted to practice, like, sleeping or something. This was going to be so normal and then he'd feel real stupid. Way more stupid than he already felt now. "You know I'm all for practicing the human stuff."

His heart was friggin' pounding but why?! Maybe he had taken too hot a shower. That could be it. Had to be. Unfortunately, thinking of the shower left Dean once again ridiculously aware of his current level of dress. As inconspicuous as possible, the hunter tugged together the two sides of his robe, which had split apart dangerously high up on his bare thighs.

Cas's eyes flickered down at the movement and Dean froze. He waited for his angel to look back up but it didn't happen. The blue lingered and holy shit what was happening?

'Not normal! Not Normal!'

Dean was completely and utterly incapable of movement or response, which was a problem because Cas took his words as the permission it (probably) was (without Dean knowing, in so many words, what he'd just agreed to) and closed the distance between them. Dean reared back in startled disbelief, but with the headboard at his back, there was nowhere to go. His eyes widened – probably bulged right out of their sockets – but that was all Dean managed before Castiel's mouth was on his.

It was a chaste thing, really. More the kind of first kiss a thirteen-year-old would find exciting – there wasn't even tongue – and yet Dean was sure his heart would pound right out of his chest, Alien style, any second now. Cas's lips were full and soft against his, her skin hot to the touch. Or maybe that was all him. He certainly felt like he had a fever right now. Maybe he was hallucinating all this. If he was, it was detailed . He could feel the light chapping of Cas's bottom lip as it dragged across his own, the angel finally pulling back.

The sound that left Dean's throat, chasing after her, was a damn near whimper.

'What is happening ?!'

Cas retreated slowly, settling her weight back on the bed but still bent forward at the waist, as though she was reluctant to withdraw entirely from Dean's personal space. For his part, Dean could only stare.

And stare.

As his lack of a reaction stretched into a less-than-comfortable silence between them, Cas sagged with resigned defeat. Her body language barely shifted by human standards but, for Dean, someone might as well have been screaming it from the rooftops. The way her shoulders drooped, the slight pinch of those depthless eyes, the devastated slant of her lips.

"Holy shit," Dean breathed out, still only capable of staring at his best friend who had most definitely just kissed him.

"I… apologize," Cas stated, but her words were hesitant, like she wanted to say the right thing but didn't know what that was.

'Why? ' Dean thought, unsure if he said it aloud or not. His brain must be broken. Cas had completely broken him this time because, for the life of him, he did not know what the angel was apologizing for.

"Perhaps I should not have…" Cas struggled for another moment, the weight of her failure pulling down at her like an increase of gravity. Dean wanted to make it stop, he didn't like seeing his angel that way, but he still hadn't figured out the whole movement thing.

Then she was visibly pulling herself back together, that Angel of the Lord descending over her features like a suit of armor, cloaking any trace of the friend he knew. Dean blinked at the shift and his brain – his poor, abused, three-steps-behind brain that would really like to know what was going on right now – cried out at the change.

"I misread the situation," Cas acknowledged with a nod, as though confirming it as fact more for herself than for him, and something in Dean's head finally clicked.

He managed to breathe out one more, "Holy shit !" and then Dean's mouth was on Castiel's.

Unlike the angel, Dean kept absolutely nothing chaste. It was clear this was Cas's first time (and thank fuck for that, because for a minute back there, Dean had been fighting off a god-awful vision of Cas getting it on with Gabriel's constructs while his sleazy brother gave notes and Dean was so not onboard with that mental image). But that was okay, because Dean was nothing if not a good teacher and this had always been his favorite subject.

First lesson: self-restraint was overrated. No Pizza Man in the history of porn had ever kept it chaste .

He slid a hand up the length of Castiel's neck till he was cupping her cheek, brushing his thumb across her skin. Dean trailed the back of his fingers down the length of her jaw, curling beneath her chin and lifting to slot her mouth against his all the better. With the pad of his thumb pressed to her chin, Dean applied a little pressure, just a playful tug, and Cas, realizing his request, opened her mouth.

His angel made a breathy little sound as he slipped inside, unlocking a whole new level to the kiss, one now open for exploration, and Dean struggled not to grin against her lips.

That same hand slid down her neck, wrapping around to the back so he could bury his fingers in that damn taunting hair he'd wanted to touch since Cas first came back wearing Miss Fucking Hawaii. He curled his fingers at the base of her scalp and felt his angel turn to putty in his hand. This time, he couldn't resist the smile that pressed against Cas's lips.

Everyone loved the nape. It was one of the most popular erogenous zones, actually. He'd learned that courtesy of Susie Nickols in the ninth grade. She'd been a senior with dreams of dropping out and becoming a masseuse, while Dean had been a newly minted enthusiast of the human form and had the benefit of looking a good two years older than he actually was. He hadn't had a single note about her technique; girl had had real potential.

Cas was a quick learner, taking some of the best tricks Dean had up his lengthy sleeve and turning them immediately back on the older Winchester. Dean had never quite had a make out session like it. The angel was a blank slate, eager to learn and reciprocate.

Real eager.

It wasn't until his back started to hurt that Dean realized they were both still sitting a full foot apart, leaning towards each other, connected only at the mouth. Like preteens who'd been told touching was a no-no so this was their solution. With a thrilled noise, Dean curled his hands around the lapels of that damn trench coat and pulled Cas towards him. It took a moment for the angel to get her knees beneath her without face-planting right into Dean's crotch (which wouldn't exactly garner complaint from him, but he was trying to keep this classy, man). Then she was shimmying forward until Dean could wrap his arms more thoroughly around her hips. As soon as she was close enough, he bodily hauled the angel into his lap. There was a sexy-as-hell little hiccup in her breathing as she settled her weight across Dean's thighs, legs pressed tight to either side of him, and Dean could only beam up at her with lecherous delight.

"That's better."

Cas's returning smile, tentative and still finding itself, went straight to his loins.

The following however-long-it-was that they sat there making out – could have been only a handful of minutes, could have been an hour – found Dean re-evaluating Cas from fast learner to very fast learner. It took all of one hand on her hip, thumb slipping beneath the hem of her shirt to brush circles over her skin, and the other pressed to the small of her back, for Cas to realize she had hands of her own that could be participating too.

At first, she only mirrored whatever Dean did, absorbing his ministrations like a sponge. Her hands settled on his waist first, which was an awkward stretch, so she shifted to his shoulders instead. She clung to his robe, tried slipping her hands beneath, then back on top, fisting the fabric. She trailed her hands up his neck, burying them in his hair. Most of it was clumsy and exploratory, but as Dean nipped at her bottom lip, catching it between his teeth and pulling playfully, Cas curled her fingers right into his scalp, gripping at the short hairs, and Dean let out a moan that came all the way from his toes.

Cas pulled away, lips red and kiss-abused, chest rising and falling with heavy pants, to stare at the hunter. The grin that slowly lit up her face as she hovered just inches from his lips spelled nothing but absolute trouble for Dean. He knew, right then, that he was so screwed. So very happily screwed.

From that moment on, Cas took it as a challenge to find every other spot on Dean's body that would result in a similar noise. The human was a pile of putty beneath her hands in a frankly embarrassingly short amount of time.

Which was when Dean's brain, that little bit of him that still had a functioning brain cell, realized that Cas was totally topping this train. Which, hot , but he was supposed to be the one showing her the ropes. There'd be time later for Cas to get her Dom on (which, again hot . There was definitely a secretive part of Dean – the same part of him that had liked Rhonda Hurley's satin pink panties – that was more than just a little excited about that), but this was Castiel's first time and Dean wanted to make sure it was all about her.

With an impish smile all his own, Dean rolled them. Cas let him, which was something of a privilege, since he knew an angel that didn't want to move wasn't going anywhere . But she let him roll them until she was spread out beneath him, one wrist pinned next to her grinning face, the other wrapped around Dean's wrist as he slid his palm up her stomach, dragging her shirt up with it.

Cas's eyes were so blue. So, so very blue.

Dean hesitated, unable to move as he stared at those glowing irises.

'Not normal ,' a distant little voice whispered from deep in his mind and Dean's head twitched, as though to be rid of it. But still he remained frozen.

Beneath him, Cas's smile started to fade, worry taking over her expression. "Dean?"

“Should we be doing this?” The question came out of his mouth before he’d had time to actually process it. But now that he’d said it, Dean couldn’t shake the feeling in his gut. Something about this wasn’t right. Something was weird, but he didn’t know what. He didn’t really want to stop, though.

“Is this… bad?”

The confusion in Cas’s voice immediately pulled Dean’s attention back to the angel beneath him. His angel, who was looking up at him with such resigned disappointment that Dean’s stomach tightened so suddenly it felt like a cramp.

“What? No! No, uh, sorry,” Dean offered up a rough, apologetic smile and shook his head. The worry – the wrongness – remained, but he tried to push it back. There was nothing wrong with two consenting adults having a good time. Nothing . Even if one of those adults was actually an Angel of the Lord. “I’m uh, just wondering if we should, you know… slow down. A bit.”

Even as he said it, the majority of Dean’s very invested body screamed back in resounding and avid disagreement. He tried not to listen – wouldn’t be the first time he’d had to shove little Dean back where he belonged to respect it not being the right time or place – and focused on the angel beneath him.

Cas blinked owlishly up at him before a frown overtook her face that could only be described as pouting . Everything about that expression said she thought slowing down was a terrible idea.

God, Dean wanted to kiss her so badly.

So he did. With giddy abandon, because he’d just realized he could . He kissed her and grinned against her lips and holy shit , was he happy.

“Dean.”

The deep and gravelly voice – not just familiar but so ingrained in his memory, in his being , that Dean would know it anywhere – did not come from below him, but the other side of the room. Cas was standing in the bedroom doorway, in his usual tax accountant getup: crumpled shirt, blue tie askew, black hair a windblown mess. His ocean blue eyes were ablaze with such righteous fury that Dean scrambled off the angel beneath him. The speed at which he tried to disentangle himself from Cas resulted in very nearly rolling off the mattress altogether. Managing to get his feet under him in time, Dean stumbled upright beside the bed, hands already raised in protested innocence.

"It's not what it looks like," he insisted, because he definitely wasn't taking advantage of Cas without Cas's approval. And he definitely wasn't cheating on Cas with… Cas. Which is somehow what this felt like?

Which… what ?

Slowly, Dean looked from the angel in his doorway to the debauched one leveraging herself upright on his tousled bed. What did this look like, exactly? Because suddenly, Dean didn't have a damn clue. Lady Cas was watching her future self, face unsettling blank. Chest Cas, on the other hand, was staring her down, every inch the avenging Warrior of God.

Dean felt like he was stuck in the middle.

The man from the future slowly turned back to Cas – his Cas – standing in the doorway. That was Chest Cas; he knew it with complete certainty. But he had only ever been with both Chest Cas and Lady Cas in the same room once.

When they'd been in his head.

The first wave of realization was like a hit of Novocain to his bloodstream. It spread across his body like a paralytic wave, leaving nothing but numbness in its wake. It was followed by a second surge of pure ice, carrying with it the dread of a man who knew the deep ache splitting his chest in two was just the beginning.

"None of this is real, is it?"

Cas shook his head slowly, eyes trailing away from his counterpart and to the hunter standing in the middle of the room. "I believe you are under the power of a djinn, and it is feeding on you. You must wake up, Dean."

"Or you could come back to bed."

Dean closed his eyes, fighting off the shudder of shame and wrong now flooding his bloodstream. It came with the distinct taste of failure and John Winchester's voice in his head.

Worse yet, the voice wasn't wrong. Because he… he wanted to stay. Wanted it to be real. All of it. No apocalypse, Cas at his side. Even…

Dean opened his eyes. It didn't matter what he wanted.

"You're not real," he said to the angel sitting on the bed, legs folded beneath her and hands folded in her lap. She was leaning back against the headboard, expression perfectly befitting a rejected lover.

"But I could be." She drew up to her knees before sitting back on her calves, regarding Dean imploringly. And damn but did he want to hear her out. He'd hurt Cas enough times in real life to know what it looked like on his face, no matter who's skin he was wearing.

Dean looked away. This wasn't real. Her hurt wasn't real. And he couldn't have this .

"You could stay here, with me," she continued, voice soft and filled with a longing Dean now knew had been pulled straight from his own damn head. "For as long as you wanted. You could be happy. We could be happy."

"We could be a family."

Dean spun at the sudden addition of his brother's voice, coming from the bedroom door. Chest Cas stepped into the room and away from the door at the sudden appearance of Sam. Or a djinn's construct of him, at least. The sasquatch of a man smiled at his older brother as a second figure joined them from the hall.

"Jess," Dean breathed out, heart aching for an imaginary brother as Sam curled his hand in hers.

"Don't we deserve to be happy?" Sam asked, looking over at the love of his life. "Don't I deserve to go back to school and have a family of my own?"

Dean staggered back a step, looking around at the faint sound of children laughing that seemed carried on a non-existent wind. He'd make a damn good uncle.

"We'd be together, all of us," Jess said sweetly, smiling at him like they were family. They might have been, one day. In another life. "We know that's what you want, Dean."

"It's all you've ever wanted," Sam added, his eyes in full puppy dog mode. Like he was telling Dean he could have this.

Dean turned his head away, staring at the floor beneath his feet, not trusting himself to look anywhere else. A hand on his forearm, nothing more than the brush of fingertips, drew him back to the angel on the bed.

"We could be a family, Dean."

Through blurry vision he watched as that same hand retreated to her own belly, sliding beneath the telltale sign of a developing bump.

"We could have a family."

The hunter stumbled away from the bed with a painful gasp, putting as much distance as he could between himself and the fake angel. But he couldn't stop himself from looking down at that hand, curled protectively beneath her belly. He was simultaneously horrified and so, so crushed. Because for half a single, solitary second, before the rest of him caught up, Dean had believed it was real.

I'm going to be a father. I'm going to be a dad, and this time, I'll do it right.

Her blue eyes (and now he could see it so clearly; they were the wrong color blue) tracked his movement with such understanding – acceptance – and Dean realized he couldn't be here. He had to get out, get away, find a place he could breathe . But there was nowhere to go.

"You're so tired, Dean. So tired, and all you want is just a sliver of happy. A slice of apple pie. Don't you deserve that?"

"It wouldn't be real," he managed to whisper, the words nothing on his lips but razor blades to his soul. He spun away from the illusion of an angel that wanted a kid with him – the illusion that he'd make a good dad when he knew he wouldn't – and found Cas, his Cas standing less than a foot away.

His eyes had the same understanding, the same acceptance, but they didn't make Dean want to run away. Instead, he was overwhelmed with relief, so much so that he could feel his legs shaking beneath him, turning to Jello.

Cas held out his hand and Dean's eyes dropped to his gun, the one Dad had given him with the ivory inlaid handle, resting in Castiel's palm. Gabriel had broken that gun in his pocket dimension and Dean hadn't seen it since.

Now he knew for certain he was in a dream and Dean was all the worse for it.

Cas nodded at him, as if he knew. As if he understood. He probably did. He was in Dean's head too, after all.

The hunter lifted his chin, uniquely heartbroken for the second time in his life, and took the gun. Without hesitation, he raised it and aimed directly for his angel, who met his harsh gaze with steadfast blue. The right color blue.

When Dean killed himself to leave this place, he couldn't risk leaving Chest Cas behind in the dream. If his mind was poisoned by the djinn's magic, that meant Cas's sliver of grace could be too. And Dean wasn't taking any chances leaving the angel behind.

He shot Cas in the head, watching the angel's body crumple with the sort of detachment only a dream could provide, then tucked the gun to his temple.

"Dean, don't."

He ignored his brother, he ignored Bobby, who appeared behind what could have once been his sister-in-law, and he ignored the devastated cry of a false angel just behind him.

"I'm sorry," he whispered anyway, unsure why he was apologizing to a family that wasn't real. To a life and a hope and a dream he couldn't have. A dream he had to let go of.

He pulled the trigger and woke up.

End Chapter

Chapter End Notes

Author's Notes: Told you it would heat up real quick XD I just didn't mention the bucket of ice water that was coming right after. (Say it with me: No good, dirty rotten)

Djinn Wish: That's right, it was all a dream!! None of that destiel ACTUALLY happened! (please repeat: no good, dirty rotten)

(Omg, guys, it felt so out of character. Dean's not there yet. Cas isn't there yet! They will be, I promise, I will get them there, but if I've spent this much time and effort building them up, I'm not gonna just blow it all so they can have a friggin' makeout session Only, apparently, yes I am because that's exactly what I just did. The Muse kept waving destiel-colored pom poms in my face while I had a damn panic attack while purposefully writing OOC characters. Good god, it nearly killed me.)

But back to that Djinn dream! I love djinns in the Supernatural universe and had to get it into this story and in a way that wasn't obvious at first. Also, I loved hte idea of using a Djinn wish to get Dean to finally accept that he wants something (which he would only acknowledge if he thought he could actually have it). Now we've taken it away, but it's too late for Dean to shove the 'I want that' back in the closet. Oh, how the Muse and I love to torture that poor, poor boy.

(Don't worry, Sam's got our back. He's gonna get Dean through his emotional constipation. It might take another 300,000 words but he'll get him there!)

If you all enjoy djinn dream fics, you should check out one of my favorites, Ruination by Aini NuFire. After Dean kicks Cas out of the bunker, the newly humanized angel walks right into a djinn den. The angst is lovely Relationship Content Rating: While I did purposefully lean hard into the cliche of explicit shower time, this story is going to stay at PG-13, maybe venturing into R territory, but it will not get Explicit. There will be no sexy shower times, I'm afraid. As I am mirroring the show as closely as possible, all content will remain within the limits of what TV can show.

Dean Shooting Chest Cas: I am sure a lot of people are gonna be like "Wait, what?" at this, so I'm gonna take a minute more to explain the reasoning behind it. I have a slightly obsessive love of the movie Inception, and there's this moment in the first dream sequence where Dom gets a hold of a gun and shoots Arthur, the dreamer, in the head in order to wake him up and dissolve the dream. But I don't think that was his only motivation. Arthur is in pain at the time, with a heavy threat of more pain to come, and this scene is the only time in the entire movie that we see Dom actually care about Arthur, a man who is willing to follow him to the ends of the earth. It's one of my favorite scenes, so the minute I had Dean taking a gun off of Cas, the Muse popped up over my shoulder with a damn megaphone and demanded we recreate it □

Season 3: Okay, now that we're actually into Season 3 and I can admit the 'off' writing last chapter and this chapter were completely on purpose, WELCOME!! (well, like, 90% on purpose. 10% really was pure panicking chaos at the OOCness, then trying to lean into that OOCness, then panicking because how far does one leave before one topples over?!?) Anyway, I hope you all enjoyed starting off the season with a djinn-shaped bang

Update Next: It's Sam to the rescue, since Dean may have killed himself to escape the dream, but he's just gonna wake up chained to a ceiling and seriously weak. Lucky for him, little brother is on the way!

I am going to stick to my two-week posting schedule for now. I have not written at all in the last two weeks (it's been a rough two weeks), so the stockpile is pitifully low. Hopefully this extra long and fun chapter (fun? Is that the right word? I think it was fun, but maybe it was just cruel) tides everyone over. Thanks everyone for your understanding, see you in two weeks. Happy holidays!

Cheers,
Silence

Chapter 144: Season 3: Chapter 3

Chapter Notes

Author's Notes: Oh. My. Effing. CHUCK, guys. This last month has sucked. It had some amazing roller coaster highs in between some of the worst weeks ever. Lemme recap. I look forward to imagining your 😱 expressions. (I promise, it's predictably verbose but worth the read 😁)

My first dog and best friend, Kodak, passed on Dec 14th. Dec 21st I got Norovirus (it's the sickest I think I've ever been) and was in quarentine, alone for the whole week of Christmas. Jan 7th, we could see flames from my front yard and had to evacuate for a week. I've been doing toxic ash/soot yard cleanup ever since.

It has been a hell of a month. I will now enjoy envisioning your 😱 faces.

(On a more serious note, since not everyone is quite as comfortable as I am using humor as a coping mechanism: many, many, many people have lost their homes this week and it has been an absolutely horrifying, terrifying, astounding natural disaster that is still ongoing. If you are able to donate, please consider doing so to the Red Cross, Animal Shelters in the affected areas, World Kitchen which is feeding evacuees completely for free, and gofundme pages for those who have lost everything.)

Last Chapter: Alright, back to the far-less-depressing stuff. Emotionally traumatizing Dean Winchester (and possibly my readers)! I am so proud of all of us for making it through the Djinn dream! One of the reasons I was panicking the entire time I wrote it was that it was so not my normal writing, it was purposefully off, and what if people thought I'd lost my damn mind (or my talent). I initially wanted the dream to be one chapter, so no one had to wait through two weeks of "wtf is going on" but it just got too long (because of course it did 😁). So thank you all for trusting me long enough to find out what was really going on!! There's something so special in knowing you've built up that kind of relationship with your audience □ And, of course, the reward is now all the angst 😈 Because that, my friends, is my jam and we all know it □

(It'll take a couple chapters to resolve, because this is me and Dean has to be in "I'm fine, back off Sam" denial first, but the resolution is coming)

Chapter Warnings: Off-screen violence. No graphic descriptions, but there's no beating around the bush for what's happening, either.

Translator Warning: For those using translator's to read the story, none of what Dean tries to say in the first part of the chapter will translate properly. Honestly, I think that's just fine and I'm not gonna write it out correctly in A/N's because he's not supposed to be particularly intelligible anyway 🧢 If it bothers anyone, let me know and I'll add the full sentences to the end notes.

UPDATE 05/01/2025: Due to a chronological error on my part (math is hard, y'all), I have gone back and adjusted Sam's time at Missouri to 3 weeks. Just in case anyone catches the change and is confuzzled cuz they remember different :)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 3: Chapter 3

"Dean!"

A slap to his face had the hunter coming to, gasping for air. His chest was tight - too tight - pulled taught by arms strung up over his head for far, far too many hours. He could just scrape the ground beneath him with the tips of his toes. Not that he'd have the strength to stand even if he could reach the ground.

"Oh, thank God," Sammy was saying, voice flooded with panic.

There were hands cupping Dean's face, tilting his head back, tapping his cheeks, and Dean wanted to tell his baby brother to back the hell off. Only, his tongue was too fat in his mouth. There wasn't any room to form the words. His throat was so parched that just swallowing hurt – like trying to drink glass shards – and he couldn't peel his stupid, fat tongue off the roof of his mouth.

“S’mmy,” he managed, the barely legible sounds tumbling past chapped lips.

“I’m here,” his brother replied frantically, reaching above him to where Dean’s wrists were tied together painfully tight with old, dried out rope that bit into his skin. Sam was tall (no one anywhere denied that fact) but even he couldn’t reach the hook his brother hung from. “Hang on, I’ve gotta find something I can stand on.”

“S’a sh’n,” Dean mumbled in warning, hoping his brother knew he’d been hunting a djinn before he went off grid. Like the idiot Bobby had been accusing him of being for weeks now, he’d left on a solo hunt without calling Sam for backup. Bobby must have done it for him when Dean hadn’t come back or picked up his phone.

Shit, how long had he been strung up? He couldn’t feel his arms, he could barely breathe. His chest muscles were pulled tight by his raised shoulders and the weight of his body hanging useless, the combination compressing his lungs and his breaths painfully shallow. Given his thirst and the general weakness of his body, not to mention the pounding in his skull, he’d guess it had been a whole lot longer than a couple hours. He’d probably been hanging there, being sucked dry by a djinn, for days.

Sam came back with a rickety wooden crate, which he hastily placed at Dean’s dangling feet. The older Winchester managed to crack his bleary, aching eyes open to slits as his brother climbed up, quickly blocking any view of his captivity. Not that he needed to see the decrepit barn to know where he was; he remembered checking every abandoned building in the area, suspecting a djinn.

He’d been such a damn idiot to let the thing get the jump on him.

“S’mmy, s’a sh’n,” Dean tried again, speaking into his brother's stupidly broad chest. Did Sam know how much danger he was in? Maybe the djinn wasn’t around right now. Dean couldn’t possibly have much blood left in him to drink. Maybe the monster was on the hunt for his next victim.

“What?” Sam asked, but he was distracted trying to get Dean’s bound wrists off the rusted hook he hung from. It was a futile endeavor and Sam quickly switched tactics, pulling a hunting knife from his boot instead. He started sawing into the thick, crusty rope.

“S’a shin !” Dean repeated emphatically, straining to form the words with his fat, dehydrated tongue as he hung there.

Sam pulled away suddenly, arms still above his head, knife poised between the ropes, to stare at his brother who was struggling just to meet his eyes, head lolling back. “Djinn? Dean, it’s a djinn? ”

“ Y’s! ”

The younger Winchester immediately looked around, a new fear gripping him, just in time to see a tattooed humanoid charging from just a few feet away. His eyes were glowing an electric blue. Sammy swore, turning into the charge as the creature tackled him around the waist. The hit toppled Sam off the crate and the two fell into Dean, who had not seen the attack coming. The ropes holding him up, almost cut through by Sammy’s knife, snapped and the three hit the hard ground in a pile of limbs.

Dean’s breath, what little he was getting at the moment, was fully knocked out of him and his head cracked against the hard cement. The world spun, stars danced across his vision, and his stomach twisted towards rebellion. As much as he needed to be in this fight, he already knew he was out. Sam was on top of him, struggling with the djinn. He’d had to drop the knife to grab both of the creature’s wrists, keeping those glowing hands from closing in on his face and neck.

Sam didn’t know much about djinn; he had never hunted one before. He’d read about them, heard they granted a wish as they fed on you, but there’d been scarce details on what that actually meant. Lucky for him, the fact that the monster was desperately trying to make physical contact with glowing hands was a pretty good indication of how it had gotten Dean.

It was also immediately obvious that djinn were a lot stronger than humans, as Sam struggled with all his not-inconsiderate strength to keep the creature’s hands off his face. He was not going to win a physical fight with this thing. So Sam kneed the djinn in the groin, breathing out pure relief when it went down with a groan, stiffly rolling off the hunter. Thank God monsters had dangly bits just like humans. Sam scrambled to his feet, immediately going for his knife, several feet away.

“S’mmy!”

Dean’s slurred cry was the only warning Sam had before the djinn was on him. Apparently, they recovered from a kick to the dick faster than humans, too. Thanks to his brother's warning, Sam managed to turn into the tackle, knife in hand, when the djinn collided with him a second time. Sam buried his knife deep into the creature's guts, but the djinn just kept charging. The younger Winchester caught the wrist aiming for his face once more, just barely keeping out of reach as they wrestled across the barn floor. He was lucky he was wearing long sleeves because the djinn's hand circled his wrist and pushed his arm back, removing the knife from its stomach through sheer strength.

It was really strong , Sam realized with a flash of panic as the bones in his wrist ground together beneath that glowing hand. With a cry, the knife fell from his grip, fingers spasming and losing function. Desperate, Sam threw himself away as much as he could, releasing the djinn's wrist so he could turn his body away from the creature slowly crushing his bones in its grip. He managed to put a couple feet between them, though the monster refused to release his right arm, so Sam utilized his long legs to deliver a vicious kick to the djinn's knee.

Bone crunched beneath his boot, the monster howling in pain as it went down. He tried to take the hunter down too, refusing to loosen his grip, so Sam struggled out of his jacket. Throwing himself back as hard as he could, Sam slipped out of the fabric and just barely slid out from under the punishing hold on his arm.

"How do I kill it?" he yelled frantically to his brother as he delivered another kick, this time to the monster's face while he was down. The djinn's neck snapped to the side, body toppling back with the force of Sam's hit.

"Br'n. Sm'sh h's br'n in," Dean managed from a couple feet away, still slumped over on his side, trying and failing to get his arms under him. Despite Sam fighting for his life just feet away, Dean was stuck breathing through the nausea, eyes shut tight against the pounding in his head. It was so fierce and all-consuming that he couldn't keep his eyes open. Even the dim light of the barn was too much. The floor and walls were swimming, with or without the visual. Dean was pretty sure he was going to be sick.

He needed to help his brother. The kid had never fought a djinn; the creature was way too likely to get the upper hand regardless of how competent a hunter Sammy was. And Dean didn't exactly have the time or capability to explain that somewhere in the barn was a silver knife dipped in lamb's blood. He'd had it when he first came in, the djinn probably still had it stashed somewhere.

But Dean wasn't getting any of that across anytime soon. Not in his current state. Which meant bashing the thing's head in was their next best option.

Luckily, Sam spoke beat-up-and-possibly-concussed-hunter. Understanding what he needed to do, the hunter turned and fled from the djinn, who would likely be back on his feet before Sam managed to smash his head in with just a foot. He needed a weapon, something that could do significant damage with one hit.

Sam frantically searched through the scattered objects littering the floor, abandoned stalls, and straw-strewn corners of the abandoned barn. He spotted an old shovel leaning against an empty barrel just a dozen feet away and took off for it. He heard the djinn stumble back to its feet, charging after him with rushed steps.

The younger Winchester had just gotten his non-dominant hand around the metal handle when the djinn collided with him from behind. He felt the hand wrap around his bare neck, cold immediately seeping into his skin everywhere those fingers contacted. Sam turned and swung in one frantic move, putting a little extra, inhuman strength into the hit.

The djinn went down hard from a shovel to the face and Sam stumbled back, immediately grabbing the back of his neck with the panic of someone quite certain he'd just been poisoned. Sam could feel it under his skin like a pool of ice water in his veins, but it didn't seem to be spreading. The hunter took a moment – hoping he had the time to do so without the djinn getting back up – and closed his eyes. His hands curled into fists at his sides, one still tight around the shovel. He put all his focus into that feeling swirling just under the skin at the base of his neck.

It was a frigid sensation that came without the associated temperature, but Sam could almost visualize the eddies of glacial-blue power working their way into his blood. It was trying to spread through his body through his veins, but Sam's inherent abilities seemed to be holding it at bay. The feeling was already fading.

Taking out the djinn must have kept him from getting a full dose, and what little had seeped through his skin was held in place, isolated just below his skull.

Sam couldn't have said how he did it – he and Missouri hadn't gotten much further than visualization of his psychic abilities and some basic practice exercises – but Sam knew it had something to do with permission. His own intrinsic ability to fight the invasion of another's, like white blood cells attacking a foreign substance. Now he pushed a little more of that power towards the infected area, as much as he could with the limited control he'd learned so far. He wanted to make sure that ice didn't spread any further. Even though he was fairly confident the djinn's power was fading, the young psychic couldn't afford to take any chances. Not with Dean out for the count and needing help.

When Sam didn't go down – which was a good sign, seeing as Dean had been unconscious when he'd finally found him, a likely side effect of the djinn's poison – the young psychic tentatively approached the unmoving creature. It was sprawled out across the barn floor, blood dripping from its mouth and lower jaw no longer lined up right. Sam swallowed heavily, raised the shovel, and brought it back down on the creature's head.

Delivering extreme brain damage to any living being was an unpleasant job. Sam did his best to block out what he was actually doing until the deed was done, letting the fear and worry for his brother fuel his actions until he was pretty sure the djinn wasn't getting back up ever again. Once he was certain, Sam dropped the bloodied shovel and stumbled away from the downed monster. His jeans and shoes were splattered with the creature's blood, but Sam fiercely ignored that fact as he turned back towards his brother.

Dean was still conscious, thank God, but he was in bad shape. He'd been missing for almost three days, which meant dehydration, starvation, not to mention whatever damage was caused by a djinn feeding on a human. From the IV setup he'd pulled out of the backside of his brother's hand when he'd first found him, Sam suspected it was human blood the creature consumed. Which meant he could add hypovolemia to the list, too.

They always had a couple of IV bags in the trunk for hunts-gone-bad, but Sam would have to make a run for blood bags. That stuff had to be refrigerated, so they couldn't just have it on hand in the Impala. Fortunately (or not, depending how you looked at it), Sam was well-versed in breaking into hospitals and blood banks.

"Okay, up you go," he muttered as encouragingly as possible once he got his arms under his brother. The younger Winchester had to be careful of his own wrist, which was swelling up and turning ugly shades of blue and purple. He didn't think it was broken, but it sure as hell hurt. Probably a hairline fracture. Maybe two. Keeping most of Dean's weight on his left side, Sam hauled the injured man to his feet. Dean managed to keep his legs beneath him, but only just barely. He had to lean heavily on Sam as the two stumbled for the exit.

"Sh'n dead?" Dean asked, still slurring, but he did seem a little more lucid.

"Djinn's dead," Sam confirmed, taking a moment to give his brother a more thorough once-over. He was weak, filthy and in need of a shower, but Sam didn't think he had a concussion. Dean clearly didn't want to open his eyes, but once Sam got him to, his pupils dilated with the change in light. So probably just extreme dehydration, which was encouraging. It probably came with one hell of a headache, though.

He wrapped an arm beneath his brother's once more and started them towards the barn door. "Let's get out of here."

"T'k w'rds r't o'ta m'th," Dean mumbled and, while Sam only got every other word, he was pretty sure he'd just taken the words out of his brother's mouth.

Chapter Break

Three Weeks Ago

Sam hadn't quite known what to expect, seeking out Missouri Mosely. Showing up on her front stoop, duffle slung over one shoulder, still trying to decide what he was going to say, had been as far as his plan had gone. Missouri had opened the door before he'd built up the nerve to knock, looking at him warmly through the screen.

"Come on in, honey," she said with no preamble, opening the screen door and standing to the side so he could slide past her into the house. "Took you longer to get here than I expected. Bad traffic?"

Sam grimaced but nodded. He'd forgotten what being around Missouri was like. It would take a while to get used to his every move being predicted again. "Yeah, accident on 75 south. It was a bad one."

“Well, you’re here now,” she said with a warm pat to his bicep. She guided them to her sitting room, the same one they’d filled the last time the Winchesters had shown up on her doorstep. Missouri settled into the sofa with a soft sigh of satisfaction to be off her feet. “So, Sam. What can I do for you, dear?”

It took the better half of an hour for Sam to explain everything that had happened, both to him and to the world at large, along with everything that could still be coming. Missouri took it all in with quiet contemplation, the occasional hum that followed a pause in Sam’s speech, or a gentle pat to his forearm when he got to their father’s death.

“A good man,” she muttered quietly, full of respectful mourning. “Taken from us too soon. He was so proud of you, Sam. You and your brother. So very proud of you both.”

Sam swallowed through a throat full of glass, mouth dry and empty of anything to say in response. So he just nodded and resumed his story. Missouri’s only other reaction, much to Sam’s surprise considering he was describing the potential end of the world, was Dean’s time traveling.

“I knew something was different about him,” she’d mused aloud after Sam had explained, briefly, about Castiel and the hopefully-averted-apocalypse. “I didn’t have the words to put to it, but that sounds about right.”

Sam just shook his head, quietly amused that this woman had sensed a man out of time and just didn’t have the context to understand it. He was glad they’d met her, glad he came to her for help. She was powerful in a way so very different from him.

Once Sam had finished his tale, ending it lamely with a sort of shrug and the ‘here I am’ expression of a lost puppy, Missouri leaned back against the sofa, crossing her arms over her stomach, hands folded together.

“Well,” she started with a couple of blinks and an air of amused awe, “you’ve certainly been through a lot, Sam.”

The younger Winchester offered a half-hearted chuckle to go along with his weak smile. That was an understatement. Hopefully, the worst was behind them but, really, Sam didn’t quite believe it.

“To be honest, I’m not sure how much help I can be,” Missouri admitted not unkindly. "From the sound of it, your abilities are quite a bit different from anything I know, dear. But let's see what we can do. Tell me what you want to achieve here."

Sam opened his mouth, but didn't have an answer readily available. He honestly hadn't known what to expect, seeking out another psychic to learn from. Meditation, maybe? Practicing lifting things with telekinesis? Bending spoons? He really didn't know. It sounded stupid now, but he'd kind of been picturing a Rocky montage full of psychic training.

"I guess…" Sam started, but he still wasn't sure what the right answer was. "I want to be able to control my abilities."

Missouri hummed in contemplation, eyeing the younger Winchester in a way that made him immediately nervous. Sounding far more apologetic than the disappointment he expected, she mused aloud, "Control isn't much of a failsafe, Sam."

"Yeah, I know," the young hunter replied, head hung with a bitter grimace. "Control is an illusion."

"It is not," Missouri shot back immediately, the tone of her voice chiding. "Control is possible. But if you believe that you will always be in control, it might as well be that illusion."

Sam blinked, taken aback. But he nodded slowly, running what she'd said through his head and applying it to Missouri's original question. "So, I guess… I do want to be able to control my powers, but, um…. It's more than that. I don't want to… lose control of them?"

He didn't know if that made any sense. It felt poorly worded for what he was actually feeling.

"And you think you will?"

Yet again, Sam found himself blinking in surprise. Of course he would lose control. Hadn't she been listening?

Azazel was still out there. He might even be on Earth right this second if he'd made it through that hellgate in Arizona. Knowing their luck when it came to the yellow-eyed demon, Sam was betting that he had. Which meant they would be dealing with him - and demon blood - again.

Even if Sam and Dean had actually managed to stop the apocalypse by skirting a deal, or at least stalled it for a good long while, Sam doubted Azazel would just give up his favorite boy king so easily.

"It's going to happen," he managed to get out, though it was about as painful and arduous as actually pulling teeth. The young hunter closed his eyes for a moment, taking deep breaths against the building panic. When he opened them again, Missouri was watching him closely but not unkindly. "Hell isn't going to just let me go. They're going to try to get me on the demon blood again. So they can control me."

Missouri nodded thoughtfully. "And how do you stop that from happening?"

Sam shook his head because he just didn't know.

The psychic across from him hummed. Then she vocalized Sam's biggest fear like they were discussing the weather. " Can you stop it from happening?"

He curled his hands into fists against his thighs to hide the way they trembled, the panic now threatening to overwhelm.

'PTSD,' his brain supplied. Which was helpful and needed to be acknowledged, but not in this exact moment.

"I don't know."

She nodded again, somehow still so calm and Sam wanted to ask her how she did it. This was the end of the world they were talking about. The end of him , for certain. But nothing about the psychic sitting across from him suggested fear.

"Well, despairing about the future certainly won't get us anywhere," Missouri announced firmly, and that was that. Sam almost laughed – like it could really be that simple – but didn't dare. "So what can we do about it today?"

Chapter Break

Present

Sam bodily dragged his brother's barely conscious body into the first motel that had a lit vacancy sign. At that point, he wasn't entirely sure Dean would make it through the night without a trip to the hospital. But Sam could start by getting some fluids into his brother's dehydrated system, patch up what he could, and go from there.

He hauled Dean to the nearest bed, grunting as the shorter man flopped onto the firm mattress. His brother groaned at the sudden jostling, the sound muffled by the pillow smushed against half his face. Sam took that as a good sign and straightened him out on the bed. Next was the real fun part: wrangling Dean's dead weight out of his jacket and flannel so Sam could get at his elbow for the IV.

He'd managed half of one arm before Dean was awake enough to mumble, "Buy me dinner first, S'mmy."

The younger Winchester huffed out his most put-upon, kid-brother sigh but still ended up smiling. "Even unconscious, you're ridiculous."

"Not unconch'shush," Dean muttered with enough attitude to stay Sam's worrying when his eyes remained closed and he was absolutely no help whatsoever getting his shirts off. At least he was somewhat more intelligible than he had been at the barn.

"Sure you aren't." Sam shook his head, finally freeing his brother from his many layers, leaving him in just a t-shirt. He'd have to check him over for further wounds, but first: liquids. "Stay here."

"Not goin' anywhere."

Sam huffed again as he headed for the door. He popped the trunk of the Impala, quickly stashing the weapons he hadn't had time to store properly back at that barn. He'd left the car he'd 'borrowed' to find Dean back there too. Cleanup would be on his list after fixing up his brother and then finding him a couple bags of blood.

It was going to be a long night.

Sam had to dig to the back of the trunk for their duffle filled with medical supplies. Not the first aid kit, which he also swiped from its standard spot beneath the trick door; the duffel he slung over his shoulder was meant for times when a first aid kit alone wasn't going to cut it. It had IV lines, saline bags, and splints. Pretty much anything that was too big to fit in the normal kit.

Dean was unresponsive when Sam came back into the room, but the younger Winchester wasn't worried – well, at least not any more worried. His brother had been in and out of consciousness the entire car ride over. Sam had already checked for signs of a concussion, and each time Dean came back to he was lucid (enough) for Sam not to worry about anything more than pure exhaustion as the cause.

He set the IV up, hanging the bag off a curtain rod near the bed, and stayed at Dean's side until he was certain his brother was getting liquids. Then he stripped the older Winchester down to his boxers and started checking for injuries.

There were surprisingly few for a hunt gone bad. Mostly scrapes and bumps and bruises, all minor. The spot on his left arm where the djinn's needle had stayed for two days was red and irritated, the vein a discolored mess of subdermal bruising, but it didn't look infected. Apparently, djinn took decent care of their victims. Probably wanted them alive for as long as possible.

Dean's wrists were the only major injury outside of blood loss and dehydration. After two days holding up his entire weight, they were a real piece of work. There were disturbingly deep gouges where the rope had dug into flesh, leaving behind an upsetting blend of purples, blues, and greys. Sam did what he could, cleaning and wrapping the damaged area. They'd heal, but he was sure they'd hurt like a bitch in the meantime.

The younger Winchester added some morphine to that IV drip, hoping it would help his brother sleep.

With nothing else he could do for Dean at the moment, Sam hovered, uncertain. Despite having already done it just a few minutes earlier, Sam impulsively checked Dean's temperature, peeled open one eye for pupil response, and pinched the skin on the back of his brother's hand. It sluggishly settled back into place, indicating dehydration but it was better than it had been when they'd first gotten to the motel.

Dean was getting fluids and was on track to recover. A blood transfusion was the only other thing Sam could do aside from wait.

Still, he hovered.

He should have been there. He should have been with Dean on that hunt. He was supposed to be there. Supposed to be hunting, supposed to be with his family. Not that he'd ever been very good at family. At least, not his.

The younger Winchester procrastinated another few minutes, repeating his checks. Guilt wouldn't do anything for the situation but make Sam feel worse than he already did. He needed to leave, find his brother some blood, which was the only thing left he could do for the situation.

Still. The fear that had flooded him when he'd finally found Dean, strung up in that barn, was as paralyzing now as it had been then. Sam had been horrifically sure, for just a moment, that he'd been too late. Dean had looked like death warmed over. Even now, Sam knew how close it had been. How lucky they were that he'd gotten there as fast as he had.

The younger Winchester watched his brother sleep on for another minute before finally convincing himself to leave. Dean would be alright without him for the hour or so it would take to find some blood. He wasn't going to die while Sam was gone. The younger Winchester was at least pretty confident about that.

Chapter Break

Three Weeks Ago

"I want you to train me."

The answer was immediate. Sam knew what he wanted out of this , right here, with Missouri. Even if he didn't know if it could stop everything to come, he knew what he wanted today, and that was to learn. "I want to get better with these powers. If I can get strong enough… maybe I can stop it."

Missouri's face fell into something soft and sad. "Oh honey, what you're up against can't be taken on by one man. Not if he wants to stay a man."

The breath left Sam's lungs like he was suddenly in the vacuum of space. He couldn't breathe. The floor had dropped out from under him into an abyss of horror.

She was right. Missouri was right and Sam's entire line of thought, his assuredness of what he could do, what he had come here to learn to do…. It was all wrong.

He'd been thinking he could stop Azazel, stop Hell and Lilith and everything that could still be coming. He would protect himself and Dean and Bobby, like he hadn't been able to protect Andy.

If only he was strong enough.

But that… that sounded like the Sam from Dean's future, didn't it. That was everything Sam was trying to avoid becoming. Yes, it was Azazel and the demon blood and releasing Lucifer upon the world, but all of those things had happened because Sam had wanted to be powerful.

A chill ran through him, followed by a very visceral shiver of pure fear.

He couldn't become that man. He couldn't. But he had to be stronger to survive. Didn't he? Sam was already powerful, he knew that. It wasn't just a thought or belief, it was fact. He knew what he was, what he could be with a simple thought. He could lift the couch he was sitting on, he could throw anything in this house with a jerk of his head, he could command people with his voice alone.

'More like control people. Like Webber.'

Andy's voice filtered up from a memory and Sam closed his eyes against the familiar swell of grief that memories of the man always brought these days. But his memory had supplied those words for a reason, so the younger Winchester focused on that.

'Maybe it's not about control .' Sam had said that to Andy back when the kid had been so worried his powers would turn him into his evil twin. Ultimately, Andy had found a way to balance what he could do with what he was comfortable doing.

"Maybe that's it," Sam muttered aloud.

"What is, honey?"

Sam looked up to Missouri, who was sitting patiently across from him.

"I think…. Maybe control isn't possible for everything I can do." The younger Winchester shook his head, feeling like that was explaining it poorly once again. "The different abilities, they're not all… mine."

At Missouri's furrowed brow, Sam chewed on the inside of his cheek, trying to put words to what he was feeling.

“When my powers first developed, I could only see things. Deaths before they happened. But ever since the fight with Ava…” Sam shook his head and shrugged, unsure how else to say it. “I think some of the stuff I can do isn’t natural. It’s like… I’m pulling on the demon blood in me to use those powers.”

“But that’s not how you feel when you’re having visions?”

Sam shook his head. “No. My visions come without trying.”

He hadn’t had a vision since the Morton House and his additional power developments, but he knew he still could, like one would be waiting just around the corner if he went looking for it. He could feel it, that buzz under his skin that had always been there. The demon blood brought it out, made it so strong he could no longer ignore it. But it hadn’t been until he’d been running on empty that Sam had realized that buzz had always been there, his whole life, just a whole lot quieter.

Something in Sam’s gut told him he could push that. He could have a vision, right now, if he wanted. Not that he had any idea how to actually do that, but he knew he could.

The other powers though, they didn’t feel like that.

“I think…” he reasoned aloud, leaning forward, elbows resting atop his knees. “I think that accessing those other abilities would be like… taking a debt out of a power pool. A debt I would have to pay back.”

“With what?”

Sam didn’t know, not for sure. But he had a pretty good idea. Well. Not a good idea.

“My humanity.”

Chapter Break

Present

It took him longer to find an accessible blood supply than he hoped. The djinn had been camped out pretty much in the middle of nowhere. The nearest town was decently sized, but a good twenty-minute drive from the old barn. It was big enough to have a hospital, but not much else. Unfortunately, it was way more difficult to steal blood from a hospital than it was a blood bank or a doctor's office. Even an Urgent Care was easier to sneak into than a hospital.

So it took a while longer to get the supplies he needed, but Sam was nothing if not determined and he had learned from the best. So a little over three and a half hours after he'd left his brother in the motel, Sam walked back into the room, two bags of type-O blood in his arms and a splinted wrist. Dean was still passed out on the closest mattress. At least until the door clicked shut behind Sam. Then he was bolting upright, eyes wide and unseeing, hand frantically searching under his pillow then his persons for a weapon.

"Whoa, Dean!" Sam tossed the blood bags on the little kitchenette table beside the door and hurried to his brother's side. "You're okay, you're safe."

Green eyes frantically searched the room, taking a moment too long to focus on Sam's face. "Did we make it out?"

"Yeah, the djinn is dead," Sam reassured him. "You're okay. You're safe."

"This is real?"

Something cracked in Sam's heart at that question, sounding more like a scared kid than an experienced, hardened hunter. He didn't know what Dean had seen under the djinn's influence. They were supposed to grant wishes, so he must have been in some sort of… perfect dream world. Which probably made determining reality from that place unnervingly difficult. So Sam nodded quickly, wrapping a hand around Dean's forearm, trying to anchor him back to reality.

"This is real. I'm real, I got you out. You're safe, Dean," he repeated, trying to recall what he knew about speaking to trauma victims. Dean would tear him limb from limb if he was aware enough to realize Sam had pulled out the puppy eyes. Luckily, he wasn't and he actually let Sam talk him off the edge.

The tension started to slip out of his stiff form, Dean all but collapsing back into the bed, at least until he bolted up again, or tried to. Sam had to catch him as he all but toppled onto his side, body lacking the energy for the panic his mind was supplying. "Cas? Did Cas make it out?"

Righting his brother, Sam hesitated to respond, unsure what to say. Cas hadn't been in that barn. Hadn't been seen since Gabriel took her away. So Dean must be referring to the wish-world. But he didn't know which way to play it.

He didn't want to tell Dean that he didn't know if Cas was okay. At least, not any more okay than they'd had to assume she was in her brother's captivity. But how would Dean handle that reminder right now? Not well, Sam guessed.

On the other hand, if he lied and Dean caught him in it, would his brother question if this was all real or if he was still stuck in his dream world? The younger Winchester hesitated before nodding reassuringly again, giving his brother's arm an encouraging squeeze.

"Cas is safe, okay? She's not here right now, but she's safe, Dean."

They were the older Winchester's words echoed back at him. That's what they'd believed before Dean had gone missing. There was nothing to suggest that had changed and, if Dean was just confused, there was no reason to complicate the matter.

He was doing better than he had been a couple hours ago, that was for sure, even if he wasn't completely lucid. Some color had returned to his face and his eyes were focusing, pupils properly dilating. He was more or less with Sam. Just… confused.

Finally, the man from the future relaxed. He started to slump towards the mattress once more, so Sam caught him by the shoulder and helped lower him down slowly.

"What happened to your wrist?"

Sam glanced at his dominant hand, now splinted from forearm to palm and bandaged professionally. It had been the fastest and easiest way into the hospital: become a patient. He'd let them probe at his wrist, declined an X-ray, and went for a pretty simple splint-and-wrap, 'hoping,' as he'd told the E.R. staff, that it would heal on its own. They hadn't exactly approved, but it was his choice, and Sam used that system to his advantage.

Getting into the rest of the hospital from there had been significantly easier than starting in the lobby. Most people didn't stop to question the guy with a clear injury, wandering some halls. Especially one behaving like he belonged there.

The younger Winchester shrugged at the injury, remembering the feeling of his bones grinding together beneath the djinn's powerful grip. He clenched his jaw against a flash of pain that followed. Phantom pain, he told himself, because he refused to be any more injured than the hairline fracture he suspected. "Djinn banged it up. Might be sprained. Nothing worth worrying about."

Dean seemed to accept that, already closing his eyes. Face half-smushed by the pillow, he mumbled an apologetic, "Sorry you had to rescue my ass."

Sam just grinned, not that his brother could see it. Which was probably for the best, as it was way shakier than he had been going for. "I'll always rescue your ass, Jerk. Next time, call me first so it doesn't take two days."

Dean groaned something of an agreement, clearly already falling asleep. He managed to get in a final, "Bitch," before he was once more out.

Chapter Break

Three Weeks Ago

"Hmm." Missouri sank back into her chair once more, nodding slowly as she thought through everything he'd told her. "Knowing that…. You said you wanted to be more powerful. Does this make you less powerful?"

It did, technically, Sam reasoned. If he couldn't access those other abilities, then he was weaker. Wasn't he?

The funny thing was he didn't feel weaker, because utilizing those powers would change him. Like they had changed Ava. She had surrendered herself to them, to all of them so she could use whatever she needed to survive, but it had cost her soul. He could still see that darkness - that oily sludge - that had coveted her once bright light.

If he continued accessing those abilities, it would cost him too.

"No," Sam finally answered Missouri's question with a light head shake. "It doesn't make me less powerful, because accessing them would change me. Make me less human. So I can't access them."

Not unless the situation was dire, Sam thought. He knew that there was a little wiggle room there. He'd used them back at the Morton House and didn't feel less human. Not yet, at least. He was pretty sure he'd be able to tell. Just like Ava, he'd start craving those powers.

No, he would crave power .

'I want to be powerful .'

That was what he'd thought, how many times? Facing down Azazel, trying to save Andy, fighting Ava.

'I need to be more powerful .'

It was Ava who had acknowledged that they already were . They just had to stop fighting it.

"I want…" Sam hesitated, knowing what he needed to say but still lacking the words. "I want to protect my family. It's not that I want to be more powerful… I just want to be powerful enough to protect the people I love. To protect them and… and not let them down."

"What does that mean for your abilities?" Missouri asked without much of a pause. Sam wondered if she'd had that question primed, ready for the right opportunity. "What does not letting Dean down mean for your power, Sam?"

He didn't even question her naming Dean specifically. That was pretty much a given. Didn't stop his hackles from immediately rising, of course.

"Dean doesn't want me to have any powers," Sam said through gritted teeth, despite his best attempts not to get defensive. "But that's not an option, not anymore."

He'd unlocked that door, opened the floodgates, and now he couldn't put back what had come out.

"That's not what I asked, dear," Missouri replied calmly, nonplussed by his anger. Then again, she knew it wasn't aimed at her. "What does not letting Dean down mean for the abilities you have?"

The younger Winchester tried to let go of the anger coiling his shoulders like springs up around his ears. He took in and let out a calming breath and reminded himself that neither Missouri nor Dean were the enemy here.

"I don't want to be ashamed," he worked out, realizing with a jolt of shock that it was true. Deep-down kinda true. "I want to be able to use these powers and not be judged."

"Judged by who, hun?"

Sam resisted snapping out the obvious answer – ' my brother, that's who' – and instead thought it over, giving the question some actual consideration. Missouri wasn't dumb; she'd asked it for a reason, so Sam would take the time to find that reason.

"It's not just Dean," he realized. "It's everyone. You, Ellen and Bobby, Jo… I don't want to be judged for having these powers, period."

Missouri nodded with an approving smile. "Good. But as you know, you can't please everyone, Sam."

He did know that. Unfortunately.

"Some people won't ever want you to have these gifts at all. Like your brother." Missouri was still regarding him kindly (proudly , Sam realized and had to shove down a surge of warmth). "What then?"

That happy little feeling went right the hell away as all the tension returned to his body. His hands, having ceased trembling some time ago, were curling into fists once more.

Alright, they'd found another sore spot, apparently.

She was right, though. Dean was never going to want him pursuing these powers. If his brother could, he'd probably strip Sam of those abilities entirely. He'd think he was doing the right thing, too.

'No one can make you feel inferior without your consent .'

The quote popped into his mind without conscious thought. Eleanor Roosevelt, he was pretty sure. They taught that one in school a lot. Sam had never really gotten it as a kid, and given it no further thought as an adult. His family had made him feel inferior throughout his entire childhood and he'd never felt like he had any say in that, at all. He sure as hell hadn't consented to it. That had been one of the primary reasons he'd wanted to get away from them. He never figured out how to stop feeling that way around them, so why would he stay if it meant subjecting himself to more?

But for the first time, Sam was almost comfortable in his own skin. It was the closest he'd ever been to feeling good about himself without denying where he came from, be it a hunting family or a yellow-eyed demon. That was the consent, wasn't it?

Sam had spent his whole life feeling inferior, all on his own without anyone helping him. He'd always been different from everyone else: from his classmates because he was smart and interested in learning and also hunted monsters as an extracurricular. From his family because he had no interest in hunting. From humanity because he had a buzz under his skin that he had never understood. That wrongness had fueled his own insecurities, his own feeling of never fitting in. So of course others adding to it only ever rang as truth.

Not anymore. For the first time in his life, save his four years at Stanford, Sam felt right . More than that, he was starting to like who he was. His powers were a part of that, no matter what Dean had to say.

Sam suddenly felt lighter than he had in… well, maybe ever, but definitely the last two years. Developing these powers was entirely his choice, and he wanted to. So he would, without shame.

"I don't want to go darkside," Sam announced at the same time his brain drew the conclusion. Before Missouri could further prod (he was starting to recognize her pattern), he continued, "I need to be able to use my powers, my… gifts-" it was harder to call them that than he'd hoped, but changing the way he thought about those abilities was a good first step forward- "without being manipulated by them. That's what I think I mean by learning to control them."

Missouri nodded encouragingly. "Learning to control them so they don't control you. Well alright, then, we have our heading. But first, lunch."

For a moment, Sam thought she was joking, but she hauled herself off the sofa, pausing in the doorway to the kitchen when he didn't follow.

"Boy, if you want food you'd best come help. I'm not feeding you for free."

Sam's eyes bulged at the implication of impertinence and couldn't scramble to his feet fast enough.

Chapter Break

Present

Sam watched his sleeping brother, on edge in a way he couldn't seem to release. This whole ordeal had scared the crap out of him and, just like his brother, he was still pretty jumpy. Dean was going to pull through, Sam was confident of that now, but he really hadn't been sure when he'd first found him strung up in that barn.

Who knew what the djinn had actually done to him. Knowing Dean, he wasn't going to talk about or ever deal with whatever had gone down in that wish dream.

Suddenly weary and exhausted, Sam dragged himself to the bathroom and a hot shower. Dean needed one as well – two days strung up and being snacked on would do that to you – but it could wait till morning. He wasn't so bad off that he needed an assist with personal hygiene tonight. Besides, Sam was pretty sure Dean would be improved enough come morning to handle things on his own, and they'd both prefer that scenario.

The water felt good on his muscles as he stepped under the stream. Sam knew he would have his own aches and bruises come morning; he could already feel them stiffening up. His dominant hand was swollen beneath the bandage (which he was careful to keep out of the spray) and his wrist ached fiercely, despite the splint. It was definitely a break, he was sure of it, regardless of what he'd told Dean. Sam just hoped it wasn't more than a fracture. He really didn't want his dominant hand out of commission for a month or two.

There was nothing he could do to change that injury or speed up the healing process, though. Hopefully the hot water would help ease some of his other tensions, at least. The better he'd sleep and the less he'd hurt tomorrow.

The hospital had given him a prescription for some mild painkillers, the kind that more knocked you out than actually blocked the pain. But no hunter ever passed up an opportunity to restock on painkillers, so Sam had swung by a pharmacy on his way back to the motel. Popping one of those before bed probably wasn't a bad idea, either.

He was exhausted, bone-tired, with sleep loudly calling, but as Sam shut off the shower and toweled off, he decided to grab his laptop on the way to bed. Maybe a little research before passing out would help him deal with Dean's emotional constipation in the morning. The more armed Sam was going into that conversation, the more likely he was to get through to his thick-skulled brother.

If Sam was busy working on himself with Missouri Mosely, then Dean could do the same. Of course, the older WInchester was never going to do any emotional processing on his own, not without kicking and screaming. Luckily, Sam was a master class in and of himself at getting Dean to do things he didn't want to do, usually without realizing he was doing them.

With pain pill in hand, a glass of water from the tap, and his computer tucked under his arm, Sam settled in for at least an hour's worth of research. Or however long it took the meds to kick in.

End Chapter

Chapter End Notes

Author's Notes: Sammy to the rescue! And also Missouri Mosely is just your friendly neighborhood psychic therapist 😁 I always loved her as more of a guiding character than an influencing one. Meanwhile poor Dean's going to have some lingering Reality-vs-TheDream PTSD (he's so lucky he gets to sort it out without Cas around. Oooh, if I coulda had Cas around for it…)

Up Next: In case you skipped the opening author's notes, life is just a teensy bit chaotic at the moment. I don't know when I'll get the next chapter up, and it is the last chapter I have written (sigh). So I may end up delaying if I don't get writing soon (I'm not even gonna give the Muse a hard time for this one. It's been a shit couple weeks 😞) Hopefully I'll be back sooner rather than later, but I'll keep my profile, this chapter's end notes, my tumblr, and the discord server up to date with progress posts.

Speaking of:

DISCORD SERVER: The wonderful GreenKittens has set up a server for anyone on Discord that wants to chat. There are rooms for discussing TRSF(tta), SPN, fanart and fanfics, and chatting with me. Hope to see you all there! https://discord.gg/sDB7ZAwMAS

TUMBLR: https://www.tumblr.com/8yearsofsilence

Cheers,
Silence

Chapter 145: Season 3: Chapter 4

Chapter Notes

A/Ns: Hello again, dear readers! Life is just starting to settle back into something resembling normalcy (it sucks. It still sucks so much But it's getting better) and the good news is that I've been writing a ton (FRIGGIN' FINALLY!!!) Not enough to resume weekly posts, unfortunately, but now next chapter isn't the only thing I have written

Chapter Warnings: We're still jumping between Now and Then, learning what Jedi Sam was up to with Master Missouri while also tackling Dean Winchester and his Emotional Trauma that Never Ends (yes, you should have read that in song form)

Actual Chapter Warnings: More mind fuckery. Be prepared to question everything your dirty rotten author is throwing at you (or don't question it all, and maybe you'll be all the better for it! [insert maniacal cackle here])

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 3: Chapter 4

The room was dark when he came to. At least, Sam was pretty sure he came to. He was groggy as hell, brain swimming in a thick fog, eyelids almost too heavy to keep open. But something had woken him, his sluggish mind supplied, and in his line of work it could be something deadly.

It took a moment to get his senses together into something resembling functionality, but once he managed it, Sam realized there was someone next to him, sitting on the edge of the bed. He turned his head lazily to the side, taking in the silhouette of long hair and soft curves in somewhat of a drunken stupor.

“Jess?” Sam mumbled, smile lifting the corners of his mouth. Which was dry as a desert, he now noticed. Cotton mouth. A pretty normal side effect of pain meds. He licked his lips, which didn't feel dry, but he didn't know how they weren't. Man, he was thirsty.

Jess hummed in acknowledgement, and then there was a glass of water at his lips. Sam drank greedily, tilting his head up as much as he could to get at the thirst-quenching liquid. He collapsed back down with a relieved sigh.

"Is this a dream?" he asked sleepily, still smiling up at her silhouette in the darkness.

Jess didn't answer, just ran her hand through his hair in response. That was okay, Sam thought, closing his eyes and enjoying the touch. Damn, it had been a long time. They weren't really like that, anymore, but this was nice. A nice memory.

"Miss you," he mumbled, the call of sleep already dragging him back towards its depths.

The hand paused for a moment and the small part of Sam's brain that was still functioning worried he'd blown it, crossed a line they'd never completely discussed but both knew needed to exist. But the bed gently rocked beneath him in a drug-induced sway and, since Sam was convinced this was all a dream anyway, he let it go and drifted.

"Go to sleep, Sam," she whispered, soft and sweet and everything he missed.

"Going," he whispered back, words slurred by that very thing. Sam slipped back into the darkness and a different dream.

Chapter Break

Two Days Ago

Sam pulled the eggs off the stove just as Missouri shuffled into the kitchen and the toaster popped, right on time. He used the spatula in hand to gesture to the coffee pot, which had finished its first brew of the day ten minutes earlier. Her favorite mug (that read, 'Best Grandma Ever' in bold, pink letters) was already waiting beside it.

"Earning your keep, I see," Missouri announced with an approving nod as she shuffled over to the counter in a fuzzy pink robe and matching slippers, which had seen better days.

“Trying,” Sam replied with a grin as he brought two plates of eggs, breakfast sausage, and toast over to the kitchenette table.

Missouri followed in her poor, flattened slippers, coffee in hand. They tucked into breakfast in content silence. Missouri had made it clear the first day he was there, after they’d made sandwiches for lunch, that there would be no psychic talk at the table. Meals were for conversations about your day, not your work.

Sam had fallen into quite the little domestic routine over the past three weeks staying with Missouri. He cooked breakfast, they ate together while he did the crossword and any other puzzles the paper offered, and she mentally prepared for her day. Then he would do the dishes and spend the rest of the morning practicing the things he and Missouri had worked on so far, while she saw to clients and appointments.

Today he had decided to practice the Other Vision. Missouri had been surprised to learn he could change his physical sight to another plane. It had come up that first afternoon, after lunch, as they’d discussed what abilities came naturally to him, felt like him, and which ones didn’t.

They had actually gone through them one by one, Sam demonstrating the ability and Missouri asking him to hold that power as long as he could. It had proven invaluable. It wasn’t just that Jake’s strength or Max’s telekinesis felt borrowed at best, stolen at worst; the longer he held onto them, the harder they became to control. After just six minutes of holding up furniture as Missouri vacuumed beneath (she was nothing if not opportunistic), Sam found himself shaking under the weight, head pounding and fingers itching for a boost of power, like the kind that demon blood would provide.

He'd dropped the psychic’s hutch on top of the vacuum the second that thought registered and he’d had to scramble to access Jake’s strength again to pick it back up. He had been shaking as he set it back down – gently, this time. He’d gotten quite the look from Missouri for that and, though not the sort to hold it against him, Sam had found himself taking the next twenty minutes righting everything inside the hutch. Luckily, nothing had broken, including the vacuum.

Conversely, Sam had kept his vision switched over to the other plane for almost fifteen minutes before he'd started to get a headache. Even when his vision had whited out entirely and he'd had to release the ability due to head pain, there hadn't been a craving for demon blood. Missouri handed him an ice pack from the freezer and said they'd found their baseline.

Since then, Sam spent each morning practicing his Other Vision (a name that had stuck for lack of anything better to call it) until the headache overtook him. He was up to almost thirty minutes. Twenty-seven was the current record. At least, without a nosebleed and a headache bad enough that he blacked out for thirteen seconds.

Missouri had made it very clear he was not to push that hard again. If there was one thing Sam had learned staying with the psychic for three weeks, it was that when Missouri spoke, you listened.

Today he managed twenty-six minutes before he had white spots dancing around the edges. Sam released the hold he had over his eyesight, sagging into the couch cushions with relief as his vision switched back to the normal plane. It hadn't been as long as he'd hoped, but he also knew now not to keep going. Missouri had been right. Pushing beyond his limits caused damage, like pulling a muscle during a workout. He had time, time to build that muscle, gradually, so it wouldn't tear.

It was methodical and boring and not at all what Sam had imagined, but there was something cathartic to be found in the tedium. He enjoyed the routine, enjoyed having a to-do list to go through each day, crossing items off the list, a visual promise of progress when there otherwise wasn't any to track. He'd missed that since leaving Stanford. Traveling the country with Dean, averting the end of the world wasn't exactly boring, but it lacked structure. The nomadic hunting life always had. It was one of the reasons Sam had always excelled in academia.

The younger Winchester wiped the back of his hand beneath his nose, relieved when he didn't find any blood. He could hear the muffled words of Missouri and a client on the other side of the living room wall. She would probably be another half hour at least before joining him. That was plenty of time to try something new.

Sam climbed off the couch and circled the coffee table to settle cross-legged on the carpet in front of it. It was his usual spot for anything that required serious concentration or, generally, meditation. They'd discovered fairly quickly that Sam's control peaked when he was calm. His powers might spike when he was emotional, but his control was scrapped. So meditation had become a large part of his new routine.

Unfortunately, no amount of meditation so far had allowed Sam access to a death vision. Despite numerous attempts, the younger Winchester had yet to find a way to trigger one. Still, the feeling in his gut that said he should be able to did not abate. The younger Winchester was convinced he could control the visions, he just wasn't sure how to do it. Yet.

Most of his visions had happened while he was asleep, which meant the logical step was to try to control one while sleeping. He hadn't had a waking vision since they'd sent Azazel back to Hell, but he hadn't dreamt since Castiel gave him the Persian sleep coin. Even after he'd given it to Andy to keep.

Hazel eyes dropped to his open palms, lying face up in his lap. Andy had put that coin in his hand and afterward… Sam hadn't wanted it. It was Andy's, it belonged with the kid. So that's where it had remained.

"Focus," Sam said aloud, closing his eyes and straightening his back with a long, deep inhale. He let it out slowly, counting as he did and releasing the grief and distraction with it. "Visions."

Sam had a theory about why he hadn't been able to force a vision so far. For starters, he'd had two different types of visions to date. All previous premonitions had been death omens, all linked to Azazel's psychic kids.

In his own timeline, Dean and his Sam hypothesized that Yellow Eyes was the cause of the visions, leading Sam from hunt to hunt like a damn pet on a leash. But the younger Winchester didn't think they were all on purpose. At least, not in this timeline and version of events.

For one, he was pretty sure that vision of Persephone in Gomorrah hadn't been part of Azazel's plan.

Which led Sam to the realization that there was a second type of vision. The trip to Gomorrah hadn't been a premonition. At least, Sam didn't think it was. Persephone had been able to sense him, which suggested it had been in real time. He'd been seeing what Azazel was doing at that moment. A sort of… observational vision.

Spying, if you would.

So back to his theory: he couldn't force a death vision because those were only going to happen if someone was, you know, about to die. He couldn't control when that happened (and wouldn't want to, considering the two people he'd been trying to have visions of were Dean and Bobby. Sam had stopped pretty damn quickly when he realized what having a death vision of them would mean). Those visions, he figured, would come when they came and that was about all he could do about it.

(Figuring out how to open himself to them so maybe they hurt a little less, or block himself from them if the need arose for some reason…. Well, figuring out both of those things were on his new to-do list, just further down.)

Which now took Sam in the direction of observational visions (he really needed to figure out a less cumbersome name for it. And Other Vision, too). The majority of all his visions had happened while he was asleep. The only problem was, trying to control something while out for the count had proven particularly difficult for the younger Winchester.

There was a lot of debate about why sleep either heightened psychic awareness or actually increased it. Some said it was the loss of mental control, opening your mind to let things in you would otherwise fight to keep out, consciously or not. Others thought it had to do with the changes in brain waves as you slept, tuning in to frequencies not as accessible when awake.

(That same crowd were big advocates for meditation.)

All of which had led to extensive research, as only Sam Winchester could get into, on lucid dreaming. So far, no luck. He hadn't gotten to try, since he never seemed to dream anymore.

Castiel had warned him that using the sleep coin for too long could cause him not to dream. So far, Sam didn't see that as much of a consequence. Unfortunately, it meant he couldn't use lucid dreaming to experiment with his visions since there was never a dream to take control of.

Now, though, the burgeoning psychic had a new idea to try. There was a state that existed between awake and asleep, a transition from one to the other. The scientific term for it was hypnagogia, known for vivid sensory perceptions, like auditory hallucinations or the sensation of falling. Those in the psychic world, however, considered the state to be somewhat of a doorway, opening your mind to the world beyond, much like sleep.

The theory was that in a hypnagogic state, one should be more vulnerable to psychic perceptions but still conscious enough to direct them. Sam was hoping to slip into that state and, from there, seek out Dean, just like his brain had subconsciously sought Azazel and followed him to Gomorrah. Of course, he had no clue how to do that on purpose and no idea if he'd be able to figure it out in the moment, but it was the next thing to try in a long list of psychic experiments.

The hunter closed his eyes and began a fifteen-minute meditation that he had practiced enough times he could now do it almost automatically. The first half-dozen times he'd tried, he'd had to use a guided version. But meditation was coming more easily now.

(Every day he went without seeing trackable progress with his powers, he had to remind himself that he was making some progress in other places, at least. It wasn't much, but it was something.)

As his breathing grew deep – slow and steady – his body began to disappear from his awareness. Sam could feel the space around him – not the physical space, but dimensional – expand. He let go of his connection to the world, of all somatic awareness. He could no longer feel the carpet beneath him or the coffee table at his back, smell the traces of Missouri's perfume or the bowl of potpourri she kept by the door to the living room. Sam wouldn't call it drifting; he still felt entirely rooted within his own perception, but that perception had expanded.

Now it was time to narrow it.

'Dean.'

Chapter Break

Present

Sam woke gradually, a beam of sunlight slipping past the motel curtains and nailing him right in the eye. He blinked a couple of times before blocking the offensive light with a raised hand and an annoyed groan. His arm obscured more of the sun than he'd been expecting and Sam blinked at the extra wide silhouette of his forearm.

A splint. Oh, right, he'd gotten his bones ground together by a djinn the night before.

The younger Winchester let his arm fall to his chest with another groan, that one more dismayed than frustrated. He'd had a couple broken bones in his life and they were always a pain. This time it was his dominant hand. Hunting was going to be a bitch.

It didn't hurt much, which surprised him. The sun was high enough off the horizon for it to be at least eight. The pain meds should have well worn off by then. Sam held his hand back up and, expecting at least an ache if not outright pain, flexed his fingers gently.

Nothing.

"Huh." Sam lowered his arm back to his chest and stared at the ceiling. It must not have been as bad as he thought. He rolled his head to the side to check on his brother.

Dean was still asleep, but he'd rolled onto his stomach in the middle of the night, a sign that he was feeling at least marginally better. Luckily, he hadn't pulled the IV out in his sleep. Sam should get up and remove it, bandage his now-abused elbow, and check his other wounds.

He looked okay from Sam's distance. Still rough - the bags under his eyes had bags of their own - but his color had improved. His breathing was even. His sleep seemed restful enough. Until it wasn't.

Sam frowned as his brother bodily twitched, brow furrowing, fingers spasming against the mattress. The younger Winchester pushed himself up to his elbows as Dean made a noise. Sam didn't hear it clearly, but he was pretty sure it hadn't been a good sound.

"Dean?"

The older hunter didn't wake, but twitched again, harder this time. His chin jerked against the mattress and Sam sat all the way up. Dean let out a whimper and the younger Winchester was swinging his legs off the bed and moving to wake his brother.

Chapter Break

Two Days Ago

Careful not to regain control of his breathing, a surefire way to pull himself out of the hypnagogic state too soon, Sam drew his focus into a tight ball, then tapered that down even further until he was thinking of nothing, aware of nothing, but his brother. The sound of his breathing, the way that he moved, the reassuring presence in the driver's seat of the Impala.

Sam opened his eyes and found himself staring at the back of Dean's head and beyond that, the passing road through the windshield of the Impala.

"Dean," he breathed out, shocked and amazed.

Sam looked around almost frantically, already worrying that whatever connection he'd managed to achieve would be broken if he brought any real awareness to it. The young hunter stilled himself, recognizing the panic as a surefire way to break right back out of this dream state. Sam relaxed his body into the backseat, closing his eyes and allowing his breathing to return to the relaxed, rhythmic push and pull of a natural, unconscious state.

Once he was calm, the hunter opened his eyes again. He was in the backseat of the Impala, Dean was driving, and a woman – Cas! – was sitting in the front seat.

'Castiel is back!' Sam thought with a swell of relief and joy.

"So, tell me about this hunt," Dean said, reaching over to turn the music down enough so the two could talk. Sam grinned, not just at seeing his brother – and that's what this was, he was seeing his brother! – but at the elation of having successfully slipped into a vision.

He glanced out the back windows, looking for any identifying features or signs that would tell him where Dean was. They were in the middle of nowhere, far as Sam could tell. Lots of woodland, trees largely barren, so probably the northern half of the country. The scenery made Sam think Midwest, but that still left a lot of ground to cover.

“Nine?” Dean questioned loudly, his incredulity pulling Sam’s attention back to his brother. The older Winchester was glancing between the road and his angel, a look on his face that had Sam immediately more interested in the conversation they were having.

Sam leaned over the front seat to see one of Bobby’s files spread out in Castiel’s lap. The handwritten, meticulous notes easily gave away who had put the case together. Sam scanned what he could over the angel’s shoulder.

“That is what the article said,” Castiel replied dryly and, still scanning the file, Sam found himself grinning. He’d missed the angel.

Dean was laughing, too, and Sam could only imagine he echoed the sentiment (multiplied by a factor of, oh, the younger Winchester would say at least a hundred).

“So, someone’s pawning possessed items,” Sam announced as he finished reading the case file in Cas’s lap. He was surprised to realize that he’d missed hunting with Dean these past three weeks. There was an adrenaline rush to solving a puzzle, something he didn’t get much of at Missouri Moseley’s house.

“Did you say something?”

Still leaning over the front seat, elbows practically brushing both driver and passenger’s shoulders, the younger Winchester froze, staring at the side of Dean’s head. The older Winchester was glancing at Cas, but Sam got the distinct impression his gaze wanted to go further. To check the back seat as well. Like he might have heard something coming from back there.

Sam surged forward, gripping the back of the seat in front of him. “Dean? Dean, can you hear me?”

“No,” Castiel answered curtly and Dean shrugged off whatever it had been, just like that.

“So, what’s our theory?” he asked instead, eyes back on Cas.

Sam sunk back into his own seat, the thill of excitement running through him despite Dean not being able to hear him directly. He had, for just a second. Sam was sure of it. That opened up a whole world of potential and Sam was more than eager to explore it.

“You’re pushing too hard, Sam.”

Sam startled at the sudden grip on his arm, real in a world that he knew wasn't. Suddenly Missouri was sitting next to him in the back seat, hand curled over his forearm, eyes locked on his. There was a look in her eye that told him to stop. So he did.

Sam came back to Missouri's living room with a gasp of air, like he hadn't been breathing for way too long. He nearly toppled over as the physical world crashed down on top of him like a tidal wave. Missouri was there, kneeling on the carpet just in front of him, steadying him with a firm grip on a shoulder and forearm.

"Holy shit," Sam breathed out, still shocked that he'd done it. He'd had a vision - on purposе - of Dean.

Chapter Break

Present

"Dean, wake up!"

Sam shook his brother by the shoulder almost violently, still keeping his distance in case Dean woke up swinging. Whatever dream had a hold of the older WInchester, he was deep in it and worry started clawing its way through Sam's insides. Could whatever magic the djinn have used on his brother still be in his system?

"Dean!"

The older hunter bolted upright, eyes wide, and Sam quickly stepped back, giving him space. Dean's gaze was wild, searching frantically for things that weren't there, before finally landing on his brother.

"Sammy?"

"Yeah, it's me." The younger Winchester hesitated to move closer, despite his own protective instincts telling him he should. He took a shuffling step forward, watching Dean closely for any reaction. But his brother was more dazed and unsettled than coiled for an attack. "You're okay, Dean, you're safe. I got you out, the djinn is dead. We're in a motel. Do you remember?"

Green eyes flickered around the room, his breathing still too fast but starting to come down. He nodded.

“This is… this is real?”

His gaze locked on Sam and the younger Winchester gave up caution and reached out, curling his fingers over his brother’s shoulder. Dean looked down at the physical contact, then back up.

“It’s real,” Sam confirmed with as much confidence and comfort as he could fit into two words. He looked around for anything that could solidify that promise. “I’m not sure how to prove it but… this is real.”

Another moment of uncertainty passed before Dean’s eyes hardened. He looked up at his brother, a challenge in that gaze, and Sam straightened expectantly. “Give me my gun.”

Confusion hit first, but the tight coil of apprehension in his gut told Sam he absolutely should not hand his brother a weapon right now. But Dean was testing him and he did not know the right answer. “Uh, okay. But… why?”

Biding time to figure out which way he should play it, Sam started to walk away, heading for the bag on the kitchenette table, which had a gun inside. He still didn’t want to give Dean a firearm, but maybe if the older man thought he would, he’d relax.

“The colt, the ivory one,” Dean clarified from the bed, watching Sam closely. “The one dad gave us.”

Sam paused, frowning. He looked back at his brother with a grimace. “Um, that gun… it, uh… We don’t have it anymore, Dean. The Trickster broke it. I can get you mine, if you want.”

That one was in the trunk of the Impala, but Sam would fetch it if that would somehow convince Dean this was real and he was no longer dreaming. He still didn’t want to hand over a weapon, not when the tight knot in his stomach had yet to release, but he’d show Dean that they had it.

Sam was about to head for the door to do just that when his brother visibly relaxed. Sam didn’t know what he’d been expecting, but all the tension draining out of his brother, a look of relief flooding his face, had not been it.

“Nah, it’s alright,” Dean said with a shake of his head, leaning back against the headboard and looking absolutely exhausted. “I’m good.”

Sam hesitated, unsure what to do next other than nod and stand down. What the hell had that djinn done to his brother?

Chapter Break

Two Days Ago

"Your nose is bleeding, dear."

Sam wiped at his face with the tea towel Missouri held out to him. It came back with a smear of red. Not too bad, but probably further than he should have pushed. Not that he'd meant to push. The young psychic had no idea he could reach out to someone in one of his visions and actually interact with them.

Well, sort of. With practice he probably could. It lent credence to his theory that these visions were happening in real time, though.

"Didn't mean to," Sam replied, words slurring together enough to surprise him. He felt okay. Well, mostly. Missouri righted him against the coffee table and Sam clasped her arms in return as his balance reestablished itself. He shook his head, clearing the rest of the dizziness. Yeah, mostly okay. "But I did it."

"You saw your brother, honey?" Missouri helped Sam get to his feet. He swayed unexpectedly, pain lancing through his head. He must have stood up too quickly.

"Yeah. Yeah, I saw Dean." Sam hissed as another lightning bolt of pain lanced straight through his skull. He pinched the bridge of his nose. He really must have pushed too hard. "He was, uh… he was-"

Sam stumbled backwards as the room swayed. His calves hit the coffee table and he practically fell atop it, managing to awkwardly sit down with a thump instead. From there, he slid back onto the floor. His head was killing him. Missouri was in front of him again, steadying hands on his arms, worried face sliding in and out of focus. Her lips forming a question of concern was the last thing Sam saw before his vision went dark and he was once more no longer in her living room.

It was dark. Not night, but so poorly lit that it might as well have been. Only a thin sliver of light was sneaking in from somewhere up high. The air was musty, that streak of sun illuminating the dust in the air. There was dirt beneath his bare feet, a mix of fine powder, larger clumps, and straws of hay. Sam looked down at his toes, scrunching them against the loose dirt and straw.

Probably a barn, he thought, looking back up. His eyes were starting to adjust, but even then it was hard to see. He made his way out of what was most likely a stall, though long since used by any animal or person. As he rounded into the main room of the barn, looking for windows or doors and encountering only boards, Sam stopped in his tracks.

Dean was hanging in the center of the barn, strung up by his wrists from one of the loft rafters, swaying on his tiptoes.

"Dean!" Sam rushed forward, grabbing his brother's shoulder with one hand, cupping his cheek with the other, desperately searching for signs of life.

What the hell was going on? He didn't understand. Sam had just seen Dean in the Impala with Cas. What was this?

Sam looked frantically around the dimly lit space, searching for the angel. Had something happened to them on the case? Dean mumbled into his palm and Sam's attention snapped back to his brother.

"Dean? Dean, can you hear me? Wake up!"

The older Winchester didn't respond, eyes open slits but unseeing. They rolled back into his skull as Sam tilted his head to get a better look at his pupils.

Sam didn't understand. He had just been with Dean in the car. Maybe…. The young psychic's mind raced for an answer. Maybe that had been real-time, the present, which made this…

The hunter straightened, terror coiling in his gut like a lead ball.

A death premonition.

"No," Sam whispered aloud, fear hitting him like a bag of bricks to the gut. "No, no, Dean!!"

He doubled his efforts to wake his brother, shaking and even delivering a slap to his cheek, but the older hunter barely responded.

Whatever had taken him had him heavily drugged.

Sam took a step back, desperately surveying the creature's set up. Dean was strung up by his wrists and had been for a while given the dried blood and deep bruising there. An IV was taped to the back of Dean's hand, but the system wasn't pumping anything into him. It looked like it was pulling it out.

"Blood," Sam realized, the liquid filling the tube was viscous and so dark it appeared nearly black under the lack of light.

So a vampire, maybe? Holding onto his prey long term? But Dean and Cas had been investigating haunted – or cursed – objects. How the hell had a vampire gotten them?

"Cas."

At the moan, Sam cupped his brother's face again, trying to hold his head upright and alleviate the harsh angle of his neck. "I'll find her, Dean. I'll find you both. Just hold on."

For a moment, cloudy green eyes locked on his own and a flicker of hope lit the flame of adrenaline in the younger Winchester.

"S'mmy?"

"Yes, I'm here, Dean." Sam scrambled to stay in his brother's eyeline but the older man's gaze was already drifting. "I'm going to find you!"

Sam was growing increasingly concerned about his brother's condition. How long had he been strung up? He wasn't getting any fluids, clearly wasn't being fed. He looked bad, and Sam could count on one hand the number of times he'd thought that during a hunt gone wrong.

The edges of his vision started to flicker.

"No, not yet," Sam hissed, now frantic to find something – anything – that would tell him where his brother was. There wasn't enough light to see anything in the barn and the harder he tried to look, the more his head hurt. His vision was starting to white out from the building pressure.

Before he could step away, find something before this dream ended and he lost his only chance of locating his brother, Dean's half-lidded eyes locked on something just over Sam's shoulder. The younger Winchester stiffened the same moment he felt a presence behind him. But it was dark, and his vision was blurring, narrowing down to a pinpoint. He was losing the connection; he could feel it happening like sand through a sieve.

"No," Dean groaned, trying to pull away but he had no purchase hanging as he was. He just ended up swinging back and forth, top heavy and weak.

The white enveloping his vision crept in further, Sam's head started to pound behind his eyes, and he knew his time was up.

His fingers curled protectively over his brother's shoulders, silently promising Dean (and himself) that he would get him out. As a shadow fell over his shoulder, the younger Winchester turned his head, ever so slightly, to glimpse the thing holding his brother even as the vision folded in on itself.

He caught a flash of something humanoid bathed in blue light before darkness overtook him and he was bolting upright in Missouri Moseley's well-lit living room, gasping for air.

"That's it, you're back, Sam. Just breathe." Missouri's calm, steady voice coached him back to reality and Sam forced his lungs to take more measured, even breaths. The woman's comforting hands on his back and shoulder helped him remain upright as the physical world once more crashed back in on him. "That's it. Just breathe, honey."

He was a shaking, volatile mess, but Sam did as he was told. Soon enough, the pain in his head began to ebb, his vision cleared of the spots and flashes that were as much from the headache as they were afterimages of another place, and his breathing calmed.

"Holy shit," Sam got out shakily, reaching up to pat Missouri's hand where it rested on his shoulder, letting her know he was with her once more. "I'm okay. I'm okay."

"But you have to go get your brother." Missouri nodded like she'd already heard the whole thing and Sam could only bob his head loosely.

On the coffee table behind him, his cell started to vibrate. Bobby's name flashed across the small screen.

Chapter Break

Present

Sam watched his brother from his peripheral as Dean dressed and packed. He knew that his brother was aware of him watching, and he also knew it was pissing Dean off, but Sam couldn't help it. Pretty much immediately after asking for a gun, Dean had demanded they get moving, pack up and head for the bunker. Since then, he'd been quiet and, if not quiet, curt and defensive.

So, pretty much exactly what Sam had been expecting. At least that much was right in the world.

"We don't have to get back right away," Sam said in lieu of the tense silence, slowly packing his own bag and the medical supply duffle. "I called Bobby last night, he's not expecting us anytime soon."

He'd phoned the older hunter the minute he'd gotten Dean into the Impala, safe(ish), and headed for a motel. Bobby had been waiting for the update ever since Sam answered his phone, already shoving his sparse belongings into a bag and heading for the car he'd 'borrowed' to get to Missouri's. Apparently Dean had missed his check-in the night before and, come morning when he still wasn't answering the phone, Bobby had summoned the cavalry. Stupid, stubborn-headed Winchester idjits and their self-sacrificing ideas of hunting solo.

The old hunter had been the one to tell Sam that Cas wasn't back, to his knowledge. Neither of them had known what Sam had seen – there was no hunt about pawned, haunted objects. At least, not one that Bobby knew about, let alone put together a file on. Neither of them had known what to make of it. At least, not until he'd found his brother and the older Winchester had named the creature.

Dean's shoulders, which had already been tense, were up around his ears now and he made a frustrated growl, throwing something into his duffle with the kind of anger that said, okay, we're doing this. Sam braced himself for the inevitable explosion.

"I said I'm fine," Dean bit out, turning to face Sam with a challenging expression.

"All I'm saying," Sam offered, holding a hand out in a deescalating gesture, "is that you don't have to be."

“I’m fine , Sam.” The older Winchester snatched up his bag and headed past his younger brother for the motel door. “Let’s go, I want the hell out of here already.”

Sam watched him pull open the door, also with more force than was necessary, and sighed as his brother stomped off towards the car. Yep, emotionally constipated Dean Winchester, as predicted. He grabbed his own bag of clothes and the duffle of medical supplies and headed after him, ready for the next fight.

At least this one he knew he was going to win, no matter how fine Dean said he was.

“Fine, but I’m driving.”

End Chapter

Chapter End Notes

A/N’s: I am actually still in the process of clarifying and defining Sam's powers for myself/this story, so you're sort of in this experiment with me 🧐 Y'all let me know if A) something doesn't make sense, B) you have cool ideas because I'm still very much doing that defining bit and C) you notice I start drowning in the deep end of the psychic pool but call it swimming.

Next Up: Dean and Sam have a talk, and then another talk, the bunker makes everything better, Dean’s a sucker for mangy mutts and Sam’s an Herbal Essence Commercial.

Delay Update: Apologies for disappearing on you all. I promise, the story is still ongoing, I've just hit a couple snags. The majority of them are RL related, as the craziness of 2025 continues. This week's episode involves a new foster dog! Which is wonderful(ly chaotic 🤯).

The Muse also did me dirty, turning some plans on their head, then throwing a huge number of blueprints out the window (after setting them on fire). To finish it off, she walked right back out of the crisis she created, leaving me to, uh... Well, let's be honest. Bury my head in the sand and pretend it wasn't happening.

Update 05/12/2025: Guys, guys, guys, guys, guys, I'M WRITING AGAIN!!!

After the worst, unexpected, last minute turnaround the Muse has ever put me through (and again, damnit, she was right to do it, I just wasn't ready) I am BACK! And it only took five months -_-

Posting won't resume just yet, I'm afraid. I need to get a little stockpile going in case this resolution is short lived (□□□□ that it's not) But I can at least say that I'm writing again, I've gotten past the worst of the rut, and I have lots of fun stuff to get through before I have to confront the next potential hangup. SO BRING IT ON!

This would be a good opportunity, if you have the time, to reread Season 3 (all three chapters of it <.<) as a re-read really will be necessary once I get posting again (hopefully in a couple of weeks or so)

Chapter 146: Season 3: Chapter 5

Chapter Notes

Author's Notes: WELCOME BACK, EVERYONE!!!!

Oof, am I so sorry about the unexpected delay. The muse did me a dirty and decided to include something entirely not planned for, that changed the entire dynamic of the planned Destiel. I was not ready for that and it took me months to come to terms with it, figure out all the changes it entailed, and tackle an identity crisis I thought I had years to figure out. Just oof.

It's for the best - even as she took over and started writing it, I knew it was the right call. But OOF, I tell you! Anyhoo, none of that is in this chapter, but I knew it was gonna slow me the hell down, so I didn't want to post anything until I had it sorted.

So, yeah, in short, WELCOME BACK!!!

Chapter Warnings: Dean isn't taking Sam's advice, Sam's not pushing, Dean's not talking about it, and 90's shampoo commercials were something else.

Actual Chapter Warnings: Brief and undescriptive mention of stomach illness and worshiping the porcelain god.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 3: Chapter 5

Dean sat in the passenger seat of his own damn car because someone wouldn't let him drive.

(It was absolutely the right call; he was in no condition to be driving. His head was pounding, his eyelids felt like sandpaper every time he blinked, and he ached everywhere. But that wasn't the point. Being grumpy about it was the point.)

As Sam got them onto the highway headed for Lebanon, Dean slouched down, arms crossed over his chest, and angled his body into the door, forehead pressed to the window. All he wanted to do was sleep. The spring sun was warm on his face, the glass contrastingly cool, and closing his eyes helped with both the headache and the sandpaper problem. But the last thing he wanted to do was dream, so there was no way he was falling asleep. Maybe ever again – time would tell on that one. Dean bet he could make it at least four or five days before his body gave out. Maybe then he'd be too tired to dream.

The thought triggered a long, angry rumbling through his stomach and he shifted around it. That was as good a distraction as any, he supposed.

"Pull over at the next greasy spoon, will you? I'm hungry."

Sam looked over at him, eyebrows raised. Then the road, then him again. Dean just slouched down further, hunching his shoulders and ignoring his brother completely.

"Really? You think that's a good idea?"

Dean looked over at him like he had grown a second head. Sam gave the look right back.

"You haven't had solid food in, like, two days, man. Maybe longer," the younger Winchester reasoned, tone matching his expression. "Your stomach isn't going to handle greasy diner food well."

"Pffft," Dean scoffed, rolling his eyes. "Don't tell my stomach what it can and can't handle. It has an iron constitution."

Sam turned back to the road with a disbelieving laugh. He spotted the telltale, colorful sign of an upcoming roadside diner and flipped the Impala's blinker on. "Alright. It's your funeral."

Chapter Break

Once in the diner, Dean hunkered down in the booth, arms crossed over his chest once more, steadfastly ignoring his brother again. Sam had been looking at him since they'd sat down, so Dean was looking anywhere else. Like the smattering of four- and two-seater tables between them and the bar, which ran the length of the small restaurant. It wasn't a bar so much as a breakfast counter at the moment, but Dean could easily see the switch over once the night crowd came out. Was probably a pretty decent dive bar after dark.

Sam was still staring.

Dean hunkered down further, shoulders up, body screaming, 'Leave me alone, Sam,' in as close to a bitchface as the older Winchester ever made. The waitress came over and took their order: a coffee and strawberry pancakes for Dean ("See, Sam, I'm getting fruit. My stomach'll be fine.") with a side of sausage (Sam's returning bitchface was a solid mix of #3 and what would be a future #5), a Denver omelet and orange juice for Sam.

Who resumed watching him once Beverly left to put their order in.

"You got something to say, Sammy, say it ."

He got a pair of raised eyebrows in return, damn near climbing towards that stupidly long hair. Sam held his hands out in the universal sign of innocence. "Dude, I'm not doing anything. I am just sitting here."

"Staring at me," Dean tacked on under his breath, purposefully turning in the booth to angle his torso as far away from his brother as possible. Sam had told him more than once what certain body language said about people. Well now Sam could figure out what he had to say without any need to say it.

"I'm fine not talking about it, Dean," the younger Winchester announced, apropos of nothing, as Beverly came back with their drinks. Dean shot him a glare around her arm as she set down his coffee. It perfectly conveyed just how much he believed that statement. Sam shrugged his big shoulders and thanked the waitress for his OJ. "We don't have to talk about it unless you want to."

"Well, I don't, " Dean grumped.

Sam nodded and said, "Okay."

But he kept watching. A few minutes later, Beverly returned with their plates and Sam started in on his healthy little egg white omelet, or whatever he'd ordered. Dean looked down at his own food, stomach both growling and turning, only to feel the itch of Sammy eyes on him again.

“It was Cas, alright?” he finally spat out, glaring across the width of the table, a fiery challenge in his eyes. Sam just raised his eyebrows, the picture of innocence, I-Didn’t-Say-Anything .

“What do you mean?” Sam asked, sounding genuinely curious before Dean could get angrier.

“I mean she was there . Back. Here. She was back here, with us.” Dean’s cheeks were turning red with what Sam assumed was frustration at not having a proper connection between his brain and his tongue. “And we were on a hunt together.”

Sam hesitated, wondering if he should ask what the hunt had been about. If they had been in the Impala, driving north, discussing pawned, haunted objects. He wondered if he should tell Dean that he’d seen him. Them. Together, hunting. But he hadn’t known it was a dream at that point.

“And when it all got too good,” Dean continued, missing Sam’s internal debate entirely, “that’s when I realized it was…. That’s when Chest Cas showed up. Saved my ass.”

Sam lowered his fork, watching his brother with a combination of caution and sympathy. “He kicked you out of the dream?”

“What?” Dean blinked, momentarily confused, before remembering that this Sam had never encountered a Djinn. A vague memory – distorted by pain, roiling nausea, and spinning vision – came to him like a brick to the side of the head.

Sam, in a dark space that smelled like straw and dirt, asking frantically how to kill a djinn.

“The djinn’s dead, right?” Dean asked, voice empty and hollow. Fear was rising through him, from his gut, overtaking his chest, overwhelming his throat, until he almost couldn’t breath. He immediately recognized the warning signs. He was in for a new bout of PTSD. Great. Like he needed more of that.

“Yeah,” Sam confirmed, surprised by the question but solid in his answer. “He’s definitely dead.”

“Kay.” The response was lackluster for the older Winchester, eyes glazed over and mind somewhere else, but Sam didn’t push. Dean was still recovering from the ordeal, not just physically but mentally. Sam itched to ask but had decided last night, while researching Djinn, that he wouldn't pressure Dean to share before he was ready. At least, not until the stubborn hunter refused to deal and it became a problem.

(Which it would; it always did. So Sam had a plan for that, too. But for now, he would let Dean pick the direction of his recovery.)

"Uh, no," the older Winchester suddenly answered Sam's earlier question, eyes clearing as he gave himself a little shake. He was back in the present. Still, Sam didn't push. "Chest Cas didn't get me out. The, uh, the only way to escape a djinn dream is to, uh… kill yourself.

Sam's eyebrows climbed back into his hair with a jolt. "What?"

"Yeah." Dean grimaced. It was supposed to be a smile, sardonic at best, but it fell short. There was nothing funny about a djinn. Even less about waking up from one, if you were lucky enough to in the first place. "Only way to free yourself from the wish is to give it up. You know: if you love something, let it go, or some other psycho-babble bullshit."

Sam wanted to ask. He wanted so very much to know what his brother's wish had been. What had caused him so much turmoil in such a short period of time. Sam's academic mind and tendency towards puzzles had wanted to know the second Dean named it a djinn, and only more so after the quick read up he'd done last night. His mind went back to Cas, riding passenger in the Impala, on a hunt with Dean.

But he didn't ask.

Instead, he thought over the new information, the part that hadn't been in the research. His brother had believed so wholeheartedly that he was in a dream that he had been willing to kill himself to escape it. He had risked being wrong and never waking up. Had trusted, completely, that suicide was the only way to live.

Fuck, Sam thought. Djinn really were a whole other level of monster.

But it hadn't been their only run in with another level, lately. It hadn't been so long ago that Dean was stuck in a pocket dimension, killing himself over and over and over again.

"Jesus," the younger Winchester muttered, troubled by just how often his brother was backed into a corner where death was the only way out. And Dean made it seem like just another Tuesday. That didn't bode well for their future.

"Yeah." Dean went back to staring at his food, which now seemed utterly unappetizing. Still, he'd been the one to insist they stop, and he was hungry. In a purely physical way, at least. He managed a couple bites of syrupy, strawberry pancake as his brother continued to watch him.

"So, uh…" Sam cleared his throat, digging back into his own food as soon as Dean tensed. This was where Samantha would start pushing, expecting him to share his life story along with his feelings. And Sam knew it, which is why he adopted his most innocent, shit-eating little brother expression, and asked, "Your phone broken?"

"What?" Dean pulled his head back, instantly offended by the seemingly-casual-but-entirely-not tone, even if he didn't know what it was he'd done now.

He pulled his cellphone out of his back pocket, only to find it completely fine. It had been sitting on the motel dresser that morning, charging next to his go-bag of clothes. Dean didn't know where Sam found it (probably just laying around the djinn's lair, battery long since dead or switched off), but it had worked just fine when he powered it up.

He looked back up, still confused (defenses rising), only to find Sam wearing a look. A very telling look, framed by his stupid hair. Dean's face dropped into a neutral, deadpan expression. Sam ignored the warning completely.

"You forget my number, then?"

"Shut up," Dean grumbled, tucking his phone back into his pants and grabbing his fork once again. "Is sass all you learned at Missouri's?"

"No. Although that would be a master class." Sam actually laughed and Dean felt a smile tug at his own lips. He fought it off with well-earned grump. When Sam sombered, his words weren't nearly as scolding as they could have been. Insistent, but not admonishing. "You should have called me. I want you to call me."

"Yeah… I know." Dean sighed, begrudgingly appreciative of his brother's approach. He pushed a mushy strawberry around on his plate. Finally, he put his fork back down and actually met Sam's earnest face. “You were right, okay? You and Bobby. I should have called. It’s just…”

His brother waited him out, still staring, but Dean knew (even if he didn’t want to admit it aloud) that Sam was waiting him out supportively, not expectantly. He just wished the kid would quit while Dean was behind and stop waiting entirely.

(Only no, he didn’t want that, no matter how much inner, grumpy Dean said yes, yes he did want that. Because he was glad Sam was here. Damn happy about it, actually. He was just… the rest of it sucked. The circumstances sucked.)

“I was angry, alright?” Dean admitted, almost defensively, but he managed to reel it back in at the last moment. Sam wasn’t pushing, he was asking Dean to share. And the older Winchester had promised he’d… you know. Try. “I’m still… I’m just grumpy , okay?”

Sam snorted, which earned him a glare, but he gestured for the older Winchester to continue. Dean swallowed, looking away, because now he had to continue. God, this sucked .

“I don’t like that you’re off pursuing your powers.” He held up a hand when Sam opened his mouth to defend the choice. The words of a fake Cas – about Siths and Jedis – were echoing around his skull. “I get it, alright? I do. I know why you need to do it, and I don’t even think it’s the wrong choice…”

The younger Winchester’s eyebrows climbed slowly back towards his hair – Dean found himself oddly distracted by it – but Sam didn’t dare interrupt.

“I just don’t like it.” Dean turned away, staring absently at the rest of the diner. It was easier than facing his brother through this particular conversation.

The truth was he’d been angry that Sam had left. Everyone he loved, everyone who loved him, they always left. But Dean knew he had to be supportive of Sam’s decision. He wanted to be supportive; he just didn’t know what that looked like. So he hadn’t called, under the bullshit reasoning that he was being supportive , not taking Sam away from his training. When, really, he just hadn’t wanted to call. He’d wanted his brother to be stuck with the silent treatment, wanted him to make the decision to come back rather than be asked or told, because Dean had been hurt and angry. And, apparently, he could only express those emotions like a friggin’ nine-year-old.

But he should have called. Because being strung up by a djinn, dying from blood loss and dehydration, was a pretty shitty way to go. A phone call and some swallowed pride was a small price to pay.

"Sorry," Dean added, going back to playing with his food. He managed a few more bites, knowing he needed the fuel.

Across from him, Sam smiled. "Yeah, I get it. And I'm sorry it has to be this way, because it sucks."

Dean glanced up at that, gauging how serious Sam was or whether he was just telling him what he wanted to hear. But his kid brother looked honest and Dean relaxed a little further, something inside him uncoiling from the fear of being left behind.

"I'm not running away, okay? That's not what this is," Sam reassured his brother. And it wasn't. This wasn't Sam trying to get away from his family (or the family business) this time. "But I have to do this. It's my best chance of not going down the same path as your Sam."

Green eyes dropped back to his pancakes and Sam felt a flicker of regret even bringing up that other version of Dean's brother. But they couldn't shy away from these conversations, no matter how hard they were. Not if they wanted to change their future.

"Seriously, though," he continued, tucking his hair behind his ear. Dean's eyes followed the motion, narrowing. Sam waited until he had his full attention; he wanted his brother to see how much he meant what he was about to say. "I'm still a hunter. I'm still your brother. So call me ."

Dean swallowed roughly but nodded.

"I'll spend whatever downtime we have training up with psychics, but just the downtime," Sam added, feeling some of the worry drain out of him as the tension slid off Dean's frame one promise at a time. "Soon as we've got another case, we go. You can pick me up on the way."

The older Winchester couldn't find words to answer – his throat was feeling pretty damn tight and his eyes were starting to blur damn suspiciously – so he just nodded. And then the finer details of what Sam had said registered and his brain latched onto the distraction.

"What do you mean, psychics? Psychics, plural ?"

Sam just shrugged. "Missouri doesn't think she can take me much further. Her abilities, they're all sensory. She's pretty sure mine are more, uh… physical."

Missouri had actually warned him early on that she didn't know how far in his journey she'd be able to accompany him. She had been fairly certain he'd outgrow her ability to teach him quickly, and she hadn't been wrong. The last week had been a lot of practicing what Sam had worked out with Missouri, but she'd been running out of advice to offer.

Sam had known, even before he'd managed to trigger that dream-walk vision of Dean, that his time at Missouri's was coming to an end.

"She suggested a couple others," Sam added with another shrug, one-shouldered this time. He brushed his hair behind his ear, having dislodged it with the movement. "Bobby offered a few names before I left, too."

Dean, who had been thinking of Pamela Barnes and was about to ask if she'd been on either list, was sidelined entirely by his brother's hair. He stared at the floppy mess, trying to figure out what it was that had been bothering him ever since they sat down. Something was definitely different. Wrong.

"What's with your hair?" Across from him, Sam frowned at the non sequitur. His expression must have been a question enough, though, because Dean added, "It's long."

Sam only grew more confused. "Yeah… you've been making fun of that fact for half my life, Dean."

The older WInchester narrowed his eyes to suspicious slits, like he was trying to solve a Rubik's cube. Sam could only watch, bafflement increasing.

"Yeah, but… you usually cut it by now," Dean reasoned aloud, eyes all squinty, and Sam found himself running a hand through it self-consciously. He tucked it behind his ear once more and Dean's glare only got more glare-y. "It's long-long. Longer than you ever let it get before. Not yet, anyway."

Sam's eyes widened at the 'not yet ' bit. That was new information.

"I don't know, you kept talking about how long my hair was," he replied with a shrug, shifting in his seat, "so I just kept letting it grow."

His shoulders brushed the bottom of his hair with that shrug and Dean's gaze hyper-fixated on it. See, that. That was what he was talking about. It shouldn't be doing that yet.

"At first it was to annoy you more than anything," the younger Winchester admitted with a grin and a shake of his head that just accented the brown mop. "But, I don't know. I kinda like it."

Dean's eyes went from slits of suspicion to bulging saucers of disbelief. He sat straight up, startling Sam with the abrupt change, and leveled a finger at his brother warningly. "Oh, hell no. No, no, nope. No. You are not growing your hair out ten years early because of me. "

Sam was laughing by then, loud and carefree.

Despite his gruff tone and his adamancy, Dean was smiling too as he insisted, "It's not happening, Sam. I quit. Send me back to the future, man, we're doomed."

The young hunter kept laughing, right up until Dean's grin turned into a very different expression and he was bolting for the bathroom, holding his stomach like it might get left behind in the hustle. Then Sam was still laughing, just for a different, slightly-more-concerned reason.

Sam called after his brother's quickly retreating back, "Told you!"

Chapter Break

Dean left the diner several shades paler (and a couple greener) than was strictly healthy, holding his stomach like he might empty some more of it real soon.

"Seriously. Let's stop at a Quick Clips," he was saying as he pushed the door open. Seeing a woman coming towards the restaurant, Dean stepped to the side, holding it open first for his brother and then for her, as he continued, "You look like an Herbal Essence commercial."

"Thank you?" Sam said, expression incredulous as he came out of the diner, side-stepping out of the woman's way.

Instead of immediately walking through the open door, she eyed Sam's lengthy hair. And then the rest of him. With rosy cheeks and shy grin, she darted inside the diner, leaving a surprised, somewhat baffled Sam in her wake.

Dean cackled, releasing the door and heading into the parking lot. "She's totally picturing it."

"Picturing what?" Sam asked, following with a frown.

"You, in an Herbal Essence commercial."

To help Sam picture it himself, Dean mimed shampooing his hair beneath the spray of a shower, moaning obnoxiously as he did. Sam turned bright red but rolled his eyes, pulled the Impala's keys out of his pockets. As revenge, he made a point to beat Dean to the driver's side.

Chapter Break

"Ohhhh," Dean moaned into a toilet a few hours later, far less theatrically now but no less dramatic. It was their third rest stop so far on the drive back to the bunker. "Kill me now."

"I did warn you," Sam said with a sympathetic chuckle and another head shake. He was leaning against the front of the stall, watching his miserable brother worship his porcelain god.

"Shaddup," Dean managed to get out right before another dry heave wracked his whole upper body. He spat into the bowl beneath him, sweat-soaked forehead pressed to the cold seat. "There isn't anything left in my stomach. What the hell."

Sam shrugged, feeling for his brother but also… he had told him so.

"K… think I'm good- nope." Dean leaned back over and emptied yet more nothing into the toilet. Sam sighed sympathetically and pushed off the stall door, fetching some paper towels for the poor man.

"We could stop for the day," he called over his shoulder from one of the sinks, wetting them beneath the tap. "Get a motel. At least you'll be closer to the toilet."

“I’m-” he hiccupped and groaned- “ fine , damnit.” Dean collapsed back against the stall wall, confident his stomach was finally done. He hadn’t even eaten half the pancakes; this was total bullshit. “And no, I don’t want to stop. I want to go home, Sam.”

The younger Winchester paused, wringing out the paper towels, before he resumed his journey over to Dean. He handed him the towels, watching his brother closely as the man wiped his mouth and then proceeded to press the rest to his forehead, relishing the cold, wet relief against his hot skin.

Sam had only ever known his older brother as a nomad. The whole of the Winchester family, the only life Sam had ever known before running away to Stanford, always moving from one town to the next, one hunt to the next. To see Dean now, so desperate for a home they’d never known as kids – or, hell, full grown adults – well…. Suddenly it seemed important to get his brother back to the bunker.

“Okay,” Sam said, holding out his hand so he could help Dean to his feet. “Let’s get you home.”

End Chapter

Chapter End Notes

Author’s Notes: If you’re too young to remember the Herbal Essence commercials from the 90’s, do yourself a favor and go find one (sound on, maybe not in public, definitely not at work ;P)

Alrighty, we’re officially back! This chapter was originally much longer, but I decided to cut it in half, get back to our normal length chapters, rather than the double-length chapters. It means not a lot happened in this one, but it also means that I will post again next weekend, rather than a two week delay!!

[insert author dancing here]

See you all in a week!

Cheers,
Silence

Chapter 147: Season 3: Chapter 6

Chapter Notes

Author's Notes: And we continue!!! I'm thinking a return to normal length chapters may really help me get a stockpile going as I keep trying to write. I am definitely making progress (I'm trying. I'm trying soooooo hard) but the Muse's fuckery lingers on. Plus, it's nice to post weekly again - I miss the weekly high of sharing the story with y'all

Chapter Warnings: Dean's got an itch (even if he can't partake), Sarge gets a burger because he is best boy, and both Bobby and Sam are asking questions that Dean doesn't want to answer.

There be more sharing of emotions ahead, best you be warned!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 3: Chapter 6

It was another three hours, with one more stop to worship a porcelain god, but they arrived at the bunker before sundown. Dean was actually doing pretty good by the time they pulled into the garage. Whether the stomach thing had finally passed, the (reluctant) sleeping in between rest stops had actually helped, or the dopamine fix of being home did it, the older Winchester had a straight up pep in his step as he tossed his go bag onto the first table in the library.

Sam, following at a more sedate pace, set his bag next to Dean's and immediately noticed a piece of paper at the other end of the table. He walked over to it as Dean crossed the length of the library like a man on a mission.

"Yo, Bobby! Want some grub?" Dean hollered through the bunker as he headed directly for the kitchen.

"He ran an errand," Sam answered in the silence that followed, following after his brother, paper in hand. By the time he made it to the kitchen, Dean already had the refrigerator open, head buried halfway inside. Sam lifted the note as proof when the older Winchester glanced over his shoulder, busy pulling a handful of items out of the fridge, including what looked like ground beef. Sam pulled a look immediately. "Really, man? You just stopped throwing up."

"Yeah, this ain't for me," Dean grumbled with clear regret. He set a carton of chicken broth down on the counter with an unhappy thump. "I will be having this for dinner. Yay me. You, on the other hand, gotta eat. And so does Bobby. No need for everyone else to be on a liquid diet. That note say when he'll be back?"

"A couple hours. So anytime now, I guess," Sam answered, watching with baffled amusement as Dean pulled an apron over his head and tied it behind his back. His chest now read, 'Mr. Good Lookin' is Cookin' and Sam raised an eyebrow, lips already upturned. Dean's return look dared him to say something about it. The younger Winchester raised his hands in surrender.

There'd be plenty of time to bring that up later. Maybe in front of Jo. Or Castiel.

"Then he'll need food when he gets home," Dean announced loudly, pointedly ignoring the amusement in his kid brother's eye. He started moving around the kitchen, pulling out a skillet, cutting board, glass mixing bowls, a knife, and a spatula. He moved about with a level of comfort that left Sam agape. The younger Winchester slid into one of the table stools as Dean got to work. He didn't stop what he was doing or actually look at Sam as he asked, "You staying for grub?"

There was an edge to his words, trying hard to stay nonchalant, but Sam could hear the apprehension hidden beneath.

"Yeah," the psychic confirmed immediately and watched as the tension predictably eased out of Dean's shoulders. "I figured I'd stay a couple days, figure out my next move."

Dean nodded, pouring some oil into a skillet and getting the burner going beneath it. He turned to the mixing bowls next, chucking ground beef into one and following it up with a bunch of spices, none of which he measured. Dean didn't catch Sam watching him until well after he'd folded the flavors into the meat, separated the mass into four large balls, and started shaping individual patties.

"What?" he asked defensively, fighting the self-consciousness that clung to him like a real itchy blanket. "So I like to cook. It calms me down, alright?" Sam nodded supportively, which only made Dean glare harder. "Shut up and appreciate that I'm cooking for you, Bitch."

"By all means," Sam responded with a grin, leaning back and making a grand, sweeping gesture for his brother to carry on. "Cook away, jerk."

Oh, he would.

"Bitch," Dean grumbled as he threw the burgers on the heated skillet, enjoying the sizzle and the smell of grease that filled the kitchen. He moved on, fetching buns from the pantry and digging condiments out of the fridge. "So. Who you gonna see next?"

"What?"

"Your next Psychic Master." Dean raised an eyebrow from over his shoulder, though the look was severely undercut by the apron strap across his neck and the perfect bow tied behind his back. "Who'd you pick?"

"Oh." Understanding crossed Sam's face before it smoothed over and he shrugged noncommittally. "I haven't yet."

"Any top contenders?" Dean effortlessly switched between slicing a tomato and flipping the burgers.

"Uh… yeah, I guess one," Sam answered, posture perking up a little as he started actually thinking about the question. He had a handful of names to pursue, but the closest psychic had come highly recommended. And after the djinn… well, Sam now had a vested interest in staying close. "She was on both Bobby and Missouri's list, so I thought… yeah, probably a good place to start."

"Her name Pamela Barnes?"

Sam sat straight up, eyes wide. "Yeah! How did you–" His eyebrows went up and he leaned in, excitedly, "Wait, did we know her?"

"Oh, we knew her." Dean couldn't help but grin at the excitement in his brother's voice. He started assembling the buns as he said, "You are gonna have a fun time with her."

Sam's eyebrows climbed into his hair and Dean cackled at the mix of surprise, anticipation, and boyish embarrassment turning the tips of the kid's ears red. Dean decided to take mercy on him as he pulled the patties off the skillet.

"She helped us find Cas after I got dragged outta Hell with no clue who'd done the deed. She's, well… she's something."

He purposefully left it at that: no need to tell his brother that they'd gotten the poor woman's eyes burned out of her skull or later killed. The Pamela that Sam would be meeting had been something else and, hopefully, she'd stay that way. Full of life and mischievous joy. Besides, she wouldn't be running into any angels this time.

"Foods up," Dean announced, carrying a plated burger over to where Sammy was seated, another one left at the counter for whenever Bobby got in. Sam accepted the food with eyebrows raised in surprise (it actually looked edible. Not just edible, but good) and Dean returned a moment later with his microwaved bowl of chicken broth.

Yay him.

Sam's first bite was followed by a surprised moan and Dean grinned at his baby brother. "Good, right?"

"Holy crap," came Sam's response through a mouth full of food.

Dean just kept right on grinning as he picked up his spoon and willed his boring broth to be as good as he knew his burgers were. He failed, miserably, but that was okay. Seeing Sam enjoy the food he cooked was enough.

As they chatted about Pamela and some of Sam's plans – when he should leave, when he'd be back, and a reminder (several, in fact) for Dean to call him – the bunker door opened and closed with its signature clank and clunk. The thumps of Bobby's boots on the metal staircase were preceded by the scrabble of four paws.

"In here!" Dean called out before Bobby went looking for 'em. Sarge found them first, racing into the room with tail wagging furiously. Sam greeted the dog enthusiastically while Dean rolled his eyes and made face after face. Bobby came into the kitchen next, eyebrows raised at the scene. Dean gave him a look (which was returned in equal measure) and asked, "Hungry?"

"Smells good," Bobby answered with a nod even as Dean got up to grab the awaiting burger. "You make enough for Sarge?"

The older Winchester grumbled obscenities as he snagged Bobby's plate off the counter. He had, of course: an extra patty with no seasoning or salt, because it turned out he was a god damn sucker for anyone enjoying his food (including a mangy mutt) and sodium was apparently bad for dogs.

God damn sucker .

Dean served up Bobby's burger first, glaring at the man even as he went back to the counter and dug out a small bowl. The dog pranced up and down like a friggin' bunny and circled around himself several times as Dean grabbed the spare patty and started breaking the meat up into the bowl.

"Hold your horses, ya filthy animal," he muttered to the mutt as he added a scoop of the kibble they kept in the kitchen.

The ear-to-ear grins on both Bobby and Sam's faces – way too fond and way too pleased with themselves – had Dean resuming his grumbled obscenities as he set the bowl down. Sarge circled two more times, tail going so fast his butt was trying to outpace his front. But as Dean signaled the dog, the shepherd sat (tail still going a mile a minute) and waited for his release command.

"Alright, eat your heart out, you mutt," Dean muttered. The dog dug in with gusto.

The older Winchester shook his head, appalled as much with himself as he was with the animal, and went back to his seat at the table. He glared at his family, still grinning away, and dug into his soup with bitter vigor.

"You know, my bunker didn't come with a dog," he grumbled, slurping his broth as obnoxiously and loudly as he could.

"Well, our bunker does," Sam said with both tone and posture that could only be described as perky .

"What your brother said," Bobby groused his agreement around a mouth full of delicious burger. His boy was a damn good cook, as he'd had the privilege of discovering over the past several weeks.

Dean should be making fun of the both of them, or at least grumbling some more, but he was so damn pleased that they'd called the bunker theirs that he could forgive the inclusion of a furball.

He was still smiling when Bobby, in lieu of telling him he was adorable (which had been a close second choice – don't think he hadn't noticed Sarge's burger sitting aside from the rest, clearly made for the dog), gave his kid a long once-over. Bandaged wrists, circles under his eyes, pallor a couple shades too light, eating broth while burgers surrounded him. Once he'd caught Dean's eye – the kid's smile regrettably fading – Bobby offered a solemn nod and said, "You look like crap."

"Gee, thanks." Dean glared at his surrogate father as surely as he glared down at his soup, which really wasn't at all appetizing, despite his best attempts at pretending.

"It was a djinn," Sam announced without being asked. The older Winchester shot him a glare that, if looks alone could kill, would have made him an only child.

Bobby swore viciously and the man from the future flinched in turn. "Damnit, Dean. You god damn idjit!"

"I know, okay? I already got the lecture," Dean bit back defensively, shoulders up just like his hackles. He was tired of hearing this, and they'd been right , alright? Wasn't telling Sam that enough?

When his brother raised a challenging eyebrow – apparently he hadn't been lectured enough, in Sam's opinion – Dean snapped, "I gave it to myself when I woke up hanging from the ceiling being drained of all my blood, alright? Next time, I'll call Sam."

The silence that followed should have made him feel good. The shaded looks that fell over his family should have too. But it only made him feel worse and Dean once again stared into his soup.

"You alright?" Bobby's voice was softer but no less gruff. The silent 'son' tacked onto the end of that sentence was not all that silent to either Winchester.

"Yeah," Dean answered immediately, then, almost as immediately, followed it with a completely unapproved, unintentional, and entirely too truthful, "No, not really."

Once it registered that he had, indeed, blurted that out to his family, Dean was about as horrified from the admission as they were surprised by it. He opened his mouth to hastily deny the words, only for nothing to come out. His brain was spinning but his thoughts were utterly empty, a contradiction that made him want to punch something. Slowly, Dean closed his mouth.

Hesitantly but unable to stop himself, Dean looked over his shoulder at the kitchen counter. Cas had made him coffee there just yesterday. At least, he'd thought she had. He'd experienced, even if it hadn't actually happened. A shiver slithered its way from the back of his neck to the base of his spine. He could taste it on his tongue. Black, no room for cream or sugar. He could feel her skin beneath his hand as he helped her pour. Could see the smile on her lips.

Taste those lips against his.

Dean quickly looked away, head down, and tried to think of anything else. Like the fact that he'd just told his family he was absolutely not okay.

That did it. Instead of very nearly hyperventilating over a djinn dream, he was very nearly hyperventilating over that.

He could lie. He could tell Sam and Bobby that he was fine, make up an excuse for why he'd said he wasn't. But they'd both know it and he hated the look they always gave him when they knew. Knew, but didn't call him on it. It looked too much like disappointment.

"No," Dean repeated as he scrubbed a hand through his short hair. The truth sucked – every damn time – but there was also something to be said for that whole 'truth sets you free' crap. With a frustrated sigh, he raised his eyes to meet theirs. "No, I'm not alright. But I will be."

And that was the truth. He'd get over it; he always did.

The friggin' way that Sam's eyes lit up, watery with pride, made Dean's jaw clench (even if it did something entirely different to his stomach – something squirmy that he wouldn't be examining anytime soon). Bobby, on the other hand, gave a firm, manly nod that the hunter appreciated so much more than Princess Samantha's Anime Sparkle Eyes of Hope (no matter if that squirmy thing in his stomach came with a voice that whispered, 'you like it and you know it,' which he would also not be examining anytime soon).

"So," Bobby started with a raised eyebrow and thinned lips, like he knew what he was about to ask wouldn't go over well, but he was damn well gonna ask it anyway. "Wanna talk about it?"

"Hell no," Dean answered immediately. This time there was no second guessing his response.

Bobby nodded in complete understanding. Then shrugged a shoulder and said, “Yeah… you gonna anyway?”

Dean groaned and dropped his head again, tugging at his hair and wishing the ground would just open up and swallow him whole. “You know, my bunker didn’t come with the touchy feelies, either.”

“Well, ours does,” Bobby parroted Sam’s earlier words before the younger Winchester could repeat them with a predictably smug grin. Sam perked up once again, looking so damn pleased with himself and their surrogate dad that Dean’s stomach started doing the squirmy thing again.

He ignored it and scowled instead. The stupid thing just kept right on squiggling. He spent a good couple minutes trying to ignore its existence before sighing in defeat. God damn feelings. “Don’t even know where to start.”

“What was the wish?”

Just like that, all the good feelings were gone and all the moisture in his mouth dried up like a desert creek in the hottest month of the year. Dean swallowed past it. Took him a couple of tries, but he managed. He could do this. He’d volunteered for this, damnit. “I, uh… dreamed the Apocalypse was nixed. For sure, I mean.”

Sam’s eyes instantly turned puppy-dog-hopeful-sad-pittying-sympathetic-and-all-around-teeth-grindingly-annoying, so Dean maintained a probably-too-intense gaze on Bobby instead. He, like a normal person, pursed his lips in contemplation, then nodded in acceptance, like Dean’s admission was nothing special, made perfect sense, and didn’t need to be handheld, coddled, or supported to death.

“You know,” Sam started, voice already taking on that overly cautious, hedging tone that never failed to set Dean on edge anytime it was aimed his way, “if we have no way of knowing whether we stopped it or not, maybe you could, I don’t know… try to relax? There’s nothing we can do until…”

“Until it’s too late?” Dean added helpfully and not at all through a clenched jaw and a look that told Sam to shut up before he really ticked him off.

He looked at Bobby, begging him with a glare to take over before Sam stepped in it. Unfortunately, for all Sam's smarts, that was one battle he never seemed willing to lose. For all of Bobby's, it was one battle the old hunter rarely got in the middle of.

Sam shrugged in response, eyes all earnest, and Dean kind of wanted to punch him.

(Which was usually, and most annoyingly, when Sam had a point.)

"What if it's never too late?" He reasoned. Beside the younger Winchester, Bobby glanced at him sidelong, like he wasn't sure this was the best approach, even if it was the right subject. "What if we really did stop it, are you going to stay this uptight and stressed for a whole year before you start letting yourself believe maybe it's safe?"

Dean leveled a glare at his brother that skipped right past suggesting a topic change and now demanded it. Bobby's skeptic glance switched brothers, now cautioning Dean, who steamrolled right past.

"You're the psychic, you tell me. Should I feel safe, Sammy?"

Dean knew it was over the line even as he said it. And if he hadn't, Bobby hanging his head with a huff and adjusting his ball cap like a disappointed dad at a kid's little league game, would have definitely clued him in. As well as the flash of hurt that crossed Sam's whole face before it smoothed out completely, eyes turning glacial.

"Low blow, dick," Sam bit out with an incredible amount of patience given the audible anger behind the words.

Dean knew it for a fact. He'd said it to start a fight, to end the conversation (which he had willingly entered, the little voice reminded him). With a frustrated sigh the older Winchester buried his head in his hand, elbow on the table, and scrubbed angrily at his scalp again. Why the hell was he so bad at this?

Sarge let out a distressed whine, nudging Bobby's thigh and looking between him and the two brothers. The old hunter offered a comforting pat to the dog's head, but Sarge backed away, whining once more and turning towards the kitchen door.

"We were just outside, you mongrel," Bobby complained, even as he climbed to his feet.

"I can take him out," Sam offered, probably looking for an escape just as much as Dean (but only if it meant helping rather than lashing out.

Because that was Sam Winchester in a nutshell, wasn't it?)

"Nah," Bobby shook his head, already on his feet with Sarge pacing anxiously by the open door. "You two figure this out-" he made a sweeping gesture at… well, both of them. "I'm hitting the hay soon anyway."

With that, the older hunter ambled out of the kitchen, Sarge taking off ahead of him. Sam turned back to Dean, who still had his head buried in his hand, pointedly ignoring everything around him. After a lengthy silence (which was giving him hives), Dean stood abruptly and gathered the empty plates and half-eaten bowl of broth, taking them over to the sink.

The clanking of dishware and running water was the only sound for several more moments before Dean made an aggravated noise and shut off the water with an angry jab at the knob. He spun, hands on his hips – which was quite a pose given that he was still wearing the apron – and anger in his eyes. Aimed at himself, this time, not Sammy.

"I'm sorry," he said, kind of forcefully for an apology. "It's just been a long-"

A long what: night? Try days . He had been in that dream – that other world, that had felt real, if only because he'd wanted it to be real – for days .

"I'm just tired, man," he finished lamely, dropping his arms at his sides. "And I miss-"

The man from the future cut himself off as soon as he realized where that admission was headed and instead turned back to the sink. He resumed doing dishes, soaping up the plates without running the water again, absolutely hiding from his brother.

He missed Cas. A lot. A stupid amount. Having her around, even if it hadn't been real…

(And a lot more than just around , holy shit. He was so not examining that anytime soon. As far as Dean was concerned, that part hadn't happened . That part had just been a normal dream – an actual dream – and a weird ass one at that. It hadn't been part of the wish. Nothing more to say about it.)

But a world where Cas had been with them, safe and free to do what she wanted, safe and free to stay with him - them, well…. Dean knew Cas, even a younger version. She had been happy to be there, with him in the bunker and then on a case. And damn if that hadn't made Dean miss her all the more.

He didn't get it (and was not examining it, thank you very much), but it was starting to feel like an ache. Dean didn't have a damn clue what to do with that.

"Who do you miss?" Sam asked when Dean failed to continue. He was going for nonchalant, but there was too much puppy-dog-victim-voice buried beneath it for Dean not to notice.

The time traveler sighed, setting the now soaped-up dishes back in the sink and staring at the faucet like it had personally attacked him. Like most things that gave him the hives when he thought too hard on 'em, Dean did what he always did: decided not to think about it. He reached forward and turned the water back on.

"Tell me about your Jedi training," he said, equally nonchalant, as he started rinsing plates. Behind him, he heard Sam sigh as well.

"Dean-"

"Leave it, Sammy."

"No, I'm not going to do that," his kid brother announced loudly, easily heard over the running water. "I'm tired of dodging your emotional landmines, alright? Why do you act like you're not allowed to care about her?"

Dean balked, pulling his head back and turning to give Sam an over-acted side eye, like he had no idea what his brother was talking about. "Who?"

Sam's bitchface was the Ultimate variety (requiring no number, for it was Ultimate) and Dean knew he wasn't fooling anyone. At least he got bonus points for annoying his little brother into that particular bitchface.

"Castiel, Dean. You act like you're not allowed to have feelings for her-"

"I don't have feelings for her," Dean replied immediately, tone perfectly neutral and not at all freaking out, squeaky, or hysterical. Sam raised an eyebrow and Dean turned back to the sink, practically hiding his head between his shoulders.

“I’m not talking about love , you blockhead,” Sam announced loudly, voice exasperated. Dean heard him stand from the table but didn’t turn to see if his brother was approaching. He really hoped he’d keep his distance. Lord knew he needed it. “She is your best friend , Dean. She gave up her whole life and family for you, died for you, and sent you through time . Of course you have feelings for her!”

Dean faltered, nearly dropping the dish in his hands. He set it down carefully on the counter before casting a furtive glance at Sam, who had resettled against the side of the table closest to the sink, perched on the edge with arms crossed over his chest. Confronting Dean without closing in on him. The older Winchester swallowed roughly and reached for the next dish.

“Emotions do exist outside of romance,” Sam said calmly. “And having them doesn’t make you less of a man.”

“I know that!” Dean erupted, face flushed red as he finally turned to face his brother. “That’s not-”

“Which means,” Sam continued on, right past Dean’s interruption, “that you are allowed to have feelings for Castiel. She can mean more to you than everyone else, Dean. You don’t have to hide that like it’s some shameful secret. She’s your best friend; you’re allowed to fucking miss her, dude.”

Dean wished he’d stuck to doing the dishes, back turned to this conversation, ignorant of the imploring (and exasperated) expression on Sammy’s face. The one that said, ‘ you can have this, Dean ,’ and somehow managed it with a straight face and friggin’ sincerity .

The silence stretched, Dean’s jaw torn between clenching tighter than a damn vice and shaking right alongside his trembling bottom lip, which he hid by sucking it between his teeth and clamping down hard. The hunter tried to keep a glare locked on his brother, but his stupid eyes kept looking away.

“You done?” he finally managed, crossing his arms over his chest and glaring at the side wall. It was supposed to be snarky and snappy, supposed to show Sam that he didn’t care about this sissy stuff, that he was fine , and definitely not moved by it at all. But what came out was meek and cracking and desperately hopeful. Dean cleared his throat out of sheer embarrassment. Worse yet, that little voice in his head – the one that had been getting louder and louder ever since he traveled back in time – whispered, 'maybe it's okay .'

Dean kind of wanted to break right then and there, but he couldn't because it wasn't. It wasn't okay. And it wasn't Sammy's job to pick up the pieces of his broken mess. Since there wasn't anyone else to do it (and no way in hell was Dean up to the task alone), he just wouldn't break. That was all there was to it.

"You done being an emotionally constipated idiot?" Sam countered.

"Rude," Dean responded immediately on rote, but actually noticed that his shoulders relaxed at least half an inch and his gut, which was clenching hard enough to cramp, uncoiled. His hands ended up on his hips before he even realized he was gearing up for a lecture all his own.

Just like that, Sam had broken all the tension when Dean hadn't even known where to start.

Annoyed (and yet incredibly thankful), Dean focused on that: familiar ground. "I was in that djinn dream for days, alright? Give a guy a break."

"I could," Sam responded with a light shrug. "I actually want to. But I can't if I don't know what that break is for."

Sam had walked him right into that one. Beautifully, painfully, expertly. Dean wanted to be annoyed, he did, but really, he was just tired. So he stalked back over to the table and sank onto the chair opposite his brother, glaring the entire time. Sam joined him, waiting it out, already secure in his victory.

"Cas was…"

The man from the future sighed, running his hands through his hair in frustration. How did he even start talking about it? Dean took a deep breath and decided plowing ahead, mindless of the path of destruction he'd be leaving in his wake, was the way to go. He'd clean up after or shove it under a convenient rug.

"Cas was there. In the dream."

Sam nodded with complete understanding he didn't deserve to have because he didn't understand .

Dean fisted his hands on the metal tabletop and tried to find the words to make him understand.

“Cas was living with us. In the bunker. She was still an angel, I think, but, uh, she was… you know, making like a human for the most part. And it wasn’t…” He fell off again, struggling and hating every second of it. Dean ran a hand through his hair again to keep his fingers from curling into fists. He tried to find the words for what he needed to say without thinking too hard about what those words actually meant. “It wasn’t as hard for her as, um… last time. She was taking to it.”

His brother nodded again, not commenting – which was driving Dean up a wall he didn’t have a name for – but listening patiently. The older Winchester couldn’t decide if he was grateful or annoyed. Maybe that wall was both.

It wasn’t like Sammy would ever change the subject, even if that’s what Dean desperately needed his brother to do. The silence stretched and the older Winchester got fidgety. At least if Sam wasn’t asking questions, Dean wouldn’t have to figure out any answers, he supposed.

“She was happy,” he found himself, mouth moving while his brain was still panicking. Fan-freaking-tastic. This was why talking it out sucked. Now he was gonna say shit he definitely didn’t need Sam psychoanalyzing with puppy dog eyes and unearned sympathy. “Cas was happy. Or, you know, seemed happy. And I…”

…had been happy, too. Fuck . He’d been happy because she was happy, and he fucking missed that feeling.

Dean dragged a hand down his face, wondering what the ever-loving hell he was getting himself into here. Whatever it was, it was a place he was pretty damn sure he didn’t want to be. Had no right being, if nothing else.

“Look, it was just… a mind-fuck, alright?” he settled on, the words defensive but the tone absolutely exhausted. He wasn’t sure how else to put it and was too damn tired to look for more elegant phrasing. It was the truth. At least most of it. “It was-”

Everything I want her life to be.

“R and R,” was what came out of his mouth as his stomach clenched and his throat tried to swallow glass and his heart was doing something real damn painful in his chest. There was a soft flare alongside it, a gentle brush of that sliver of grace in his chest. If anything, his heart ached all the more for it.

Sam was looking at him a little funny – maybe because his brother was having a damn heart attack across the table from him while trying to joke away the whole conversation – but the older Winchester shook his head.

"I'm serious," he insisted, trying to make sense of what was going on in his brain. He'd never been great at putting any of that sorta stuff into sensible words. "It was like taking a vacation from all-" he gestured around them. "It was nice. And I, uh… I didn't want to leave."

Sam stiffened at the quiet admission, which he knew had to be as painful as pulling teeth for his brother to admit out loud. The younger Winchester was glad Dean was trying to open up – seriously glad – but taken aback to see his stoic, always-has-to-be-fine, older brother admit that he wanted, even for a second, to give up. But Sam understood, entirely too well. If it had been Jess….

"I don't think I would have been able to," he whispered his own admission, imagining for an all-too-real moment what that would have been like. To believe it was real, to feel that you'd finally gotten something you wanted – so desperately that it was no longer a want so much as a need – and then to have it all pulled out from under you. Worse yet, it wasn't taken away from you; no, it was represented as a lie that you could still have, if you were okay knowing none of it was real.

Having to choose to abandon your own deepest desire…

Sam closed his eyes. Any remorse he had for ending that djinn's life, especially as it had been a particularly gruesome death, evaporated as he realized just what the creature had put his brother through.

He preferred the monsters that just outright tried to kill you. They were somehow simpler. Fairer. Just the circle of life, food on the food chain, predator and prey alike, both trying to survive.

When he opened his eyes again, Dean was staring at him. Sam cleared his throat. "If it had been Jess," he clarified, "I don't think I would have been able to leave."

His brother's green eyes fell to the table and Sam could read shame there, but more so he saw loss and maybe even grief. Like Dean was starting to accept that it was okay to feel he'd lost something these past few days, as illusory as it may have been.

“I didn’t want to,” the older Winchester added, clearly still uncomfortable sharing. A swell of pride filled Sam as he watched his brother keep at it anyway. “God, I really didn’t. But I knew it was fake and… I had people waiting for me out here.”

“I’m glad you came back,” Sam said just as quietly, reaching out to lay his hand atop his brother’s arm. Dean’s eyes flickered to his for a second before dropping. Sam withdrew, not wanting to push ‘chick flick territory’ any further than he could get away with. Instead, with a smile he added, “Even if the world could be falling to shit.”

It got a laugh out of his brother, which had been the goal.

“But,” Sam continued with a casual one-shoulder shrug. “Since we don’t know that it is, maybe until then…”

Dean’s smile morphed into a good-humored glare. “Chin up?”

“I was going to say why not take some R and R?” Sam said with a chuckle. When Dean’s eyebrows went up, he offered another simple shrug. “I know it won’t be the same, because you’re still worried about Cas, but… you’ve been going nonstop since 2016, Dean. You’re going to burn out if you don’t take some downtime.”

The older Winchester glanced away, familiar guilt clouding his expression once more.

“You’re confident that Cas isn’t in any danger,” Sam added, pushing a little harder now for his brother to hear the truth in his words. “And we’ll figure out how to get Gabriel to release her, okay? We’re not just giving up there. But in the meantime… you’re no good to anyone dead on your feet.”

Or stuck in your own head .

Sam didn’t say it, but Dean heard it. Or maybe that was just that new voice in his head.

The younger Winchester stood, grabbing his cup. “Get some rest, okay? Dinner was great. Thank you for cooking.”

The compliment was given with such genuine appreciation that Dean found himself blushing. Not trusting the lump in his throat or his brain-to-mouth connection, he just nodded as Sam headed out of the kitchen, leaving his older brother with a lot to think about and a lack of energy for doing the thinking.

End Chapter

Chapter End Notes

Author's Notes: Oof, it has been a JOURNEY to get this boy to a point where he can share without cracking a tooth. I mean, he's not doing his teeth any favors, let's not get ahead of ourselves, here, but we are making progress!!! Phew. [insert sweat flick here]

Up Next: Get ready for the chapter where the Muse burst into the room and took over. I even sat there cheering her on, realizing with both terror and delight where she was going with it. Then that delight started to settle and I was left with only terror as it became to clear to me she hadn't just thrown the Destiel blueprints out the window, she'd set them on fucking fire.

Guys. Romance is not my thing. I'm not good at it. And she made me REPLAN ALL OF IT. And that's why I was gone for 6 months

Cheers,
Silence

Chapter 148: Season 3: Chapter 7

Chapter Notes

Author's Notes: Alright, here we go. The completely unplanned-for, hard right turn the Muse decided to take without consulting me at all first. (It's not going to seem like a hard right for most of you, I imagine. But it was a hard right for me and my copious blueprints)

Chapter Warnings: The Destiel pairing is the thing taking that turn (que 90% of this audience: FINALLY)

Enjoy!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 3: Chapter 7

He didn't dream of Cas right away. Not the real one, at least. Not the one currently taking up residence in his chest cavity. No, Dean spent a good two-thirds of his night slipping in and out of nightmares. First came the predictable replay of the djinn dream, only this time Sam grabbed him before he could shoot himself, leaving him stuck in a world where a fake Cas looked at him with so much grief that Dean had jolted awake choking on his sobs.

He almost gave up on sleeping after that. There had to be something in the bunker that needed doing. A case to find, storage rooms to go through or organize. Something.

He'd gotten all the way out of bed when Sam's words – about rest and burnout – came back to him. His kid brother wasn't wrong, much as it pissed him off. He could feel the exhaustion clinging to him, the edges of darkness starting to claw closer, that void of nothingness that used to sit in his soul, waiting to devour him. It wasn't the first time. Hell, not even close. Dean knew that oncoming feeling well. Knew where it led.

A spiral he'd never fully crawled back out of.

With a frustrated sigh, he sank back down onto his not-quite-memory-foam mattress and buried his head in his hands. He couldn't avoid sleep forever, no matter how hard he tried. And he'd tried aplenty in his lifetime. The dreams were going to come. Best to tackle them sooner rather than later and get it over with.

Grumbling about the bullshit that was his life and the things he didn't want to be doing – which included sleeping right now – and how Sam better be damn proud of him for this (not that he'd ever be telling Sam in the first place) – the hunter laid back down, stiff as a board. Unfortunately, it didn't take more than a handful of minutes to fall back under.

That new voice in his head (which sounded a lot like Sam right now) said, ' Of course, your body needed it.' Dean said, 'Bite me' as he drifted fitfully into the waiting darkness.

The second dream left Dean rigidly upright, searching frantically for a weapon and tearing one off his wall of show pieces. He held it, trembling, against his own temple, waiting for reality and the djinn dream to separate into two distinguishable existences. It took time – way longer than he was comfortable with – as he sat alone in his room in the bunker, waiting for someone to knock at the door and tell him to put the gun down.

The knock never came and, after five excruciating minutes, Dean lowered the weapon and sagged back into the twisted, sweat-soaked mess of blankets and pillows.

Okay, fuck tackling things sooner rather than later.

Dean hauled himself up and out of bed, ended up in the kitchen making himself a glass of chocolate milk of all things (a solution he'd stumbled his way into when Ben had been having bad dreams and didn't want to go back to sleep), and grabbed a random book from the library. He'd learned the hard way that phones and laptops - internet access, in other words - were a no-go after bad dreams. They did not help.

The hunter took his little consolations and forced himself to go back to his room.

It wasn't exactly a calming place to be, given that the most recent memories of it included making out with his best-friend-slash-angel on that same damn bed, but Dean wasn't a coward.

Or maybe he was, since the real reason he was back in his room was less about facing the aftermath of a djinn dream head-on, and more about hiding the fact that he wasn't sleeping from Sam, who might wander into the library at any time. He'd want to talk about it and Dean had had enough of that for one evening.

He settled back on the mattress, pointedly ignoring all sensory input, and opened the book. He sipped his chocolate milk for another fifteen minutes, mindlessly reading about mermaids of all things, until he was out of beverage and nodding off, book falling to his chest.

He didn't remember falling asleep. Dozing, maybe. Resting his incredibly tired, dry, and itchy eyes. But Dean jerked back awake as the mattress dipped beside him. His hand was already reaching for the knife he usually kept under his pillow (not currently there, he remembered, after his last frantic search for a weapon), but he froze when he met a pair of familiar, beautiful blue eyes.

The right color blue.

"Hello, Dean."

The man from the future swallowed roughly as Cas sat down on the bed next to him, hair wind-ruffled as always, tie askew, trench coat splayed on either side of him. His eyes were sad, but only in that way that Dean knew was meant for him. Cas was sad for him. The angel offered a small smile that crinkled the corner of his eyes.

"Cas," the hunter breathed out, completely unsure what came next. He glanced around the room – his room, the room he'd fallen asleep in – but couldn't make himself relax. "This… is a dream, right?"

"Yes," Chest Cas nodded, his hands folded in his lap, which Dean marked as odd. Like Cas was keeping to himself.

A flare of panic – guilt, shame, horror, appalment, the whole gambit – rushed through him, taking Dean's breath away.

"I'm sorry," he blurted, realizing only now that Cas had been in that djinn dream. That part had been real. The angel sitting next to him on the bed had walked in on him making out with a younger version of himself on that very same mattress in a fantasy-granting wish dream.

His chest was tightening up, lungs screaming for air he couldn't seem to get, shoulders aching as they hunched forward, as though he could fold in on himself and disappear entirely.

Cas only tilted his head and Dean kind of wanted to start crying.

“What are you apologizing for?”

He looked away, unable to hold that piercing gaze any longer. When Cas said no more, eyes ever patiently locked on the human, waiting him out in the silence, Dean caved and grumbled, “Come on, you gonna make me say it?”

“Yes.”

Dean’s eyes darted to the angel, a little taken aback by the directness. His surprise only served to remind him just how accustomed he was to Cas giving him what he wanted. Or at least not putting up much of an argument.

“Because,” his angel continued, catching Dean’s gaze and holding it with the intensity of a physical force, “what you think you need to apologize for is rarely what I would like you to apologize for.”

Blinking, Dean shook his head a little as his brain tried to process that and pretty much failed. “Uh… what?”

The expression that overtook Cas’s face was overly fond, and Dean found himself blushing without knowing why. He looked away, then back, reminding himself he wasn’t a coward. He could do this.

“The things you blame yourself for, Dean, are very rarely the things I blame you for,” Cas explained, patient and understanding. It made some sense, Dean thought. Their friendship had always been rife with misunderstandings that he’d never really understood. Cas’s blue eyes were soft as he asked, “So, what are you apologizing for?”

“For… for, you know…”

The look Cas gave him, while still endlessly patient, was pointed. Yeah, yeah, okay, fair. Dean swallowed roughly and reminded himself he could do this . He needed to do this.

“I pictured you pregnant!” he burst out, the words tumbling from his mouth uncontrollably. Apparently, he only came with two levels of communication: absolutely zero and turned up to eleven. “In a wish fantasy, Cas! I made you pregnant in a djinn dream! That’s so- it’s so- skeevy! ”

The angel tilted his head again, well aware that particular word was Dean’s go-to adjective for witches, his least favorite of all the creatures they hunted.

“Why?”

Dean did a double take, unable to understand how Cas couldn’t understand. “What do you mean, why?”

The pointed look returned and Dean felt like the world around him wasn’t functioning properly. Up was down, left was right, Cas didn’t seem to realize how friggin’ creepy it was that he’d pictured the angel pregnant by his goddamn hand, a choice she’d had zero say in and which Castiel had been forced to witness.

He’d say this was some sort of messed up dream, only…

“I don’t see how it’s as appalling as you’re describing,” Cas explained calmly – too calmly, in Dean’s opinion – and the hunter could only stare, flabbergasted.

“Cas, I- I… used you.”

The angel's damn customary head tilt was too friggin' cute for a conversation this devastating and that was that. This wasn’t a real dream, Dean decided. He wasn’t having a real conversation with Chest Cas. This was a dream all his own, where his best friend didn’t have a problem with what he’d done. What he’d wanted. There was no way Cas could actually be okay with… He couldn’t be this… this…

Stupid, is what Dean wanted to say, but there was that little voice in his head again, replacing that word with a much more understanding, far less possible one.

Accepting.

“I don’t feel used,” Cas confided, eyes open and honest. Dean couldn’t really argue with that, could he? How did you tell someone they were wrong about how they felt?

(You didn’t. Even Dean knew that much.)

“I have always known what you’ve wanted, Dean,” Cas said softly, openly, and Dean felt his shoulders draw back, his fingers curl into claws that dug into his thighs, his every muscle tense as unbidden fear flooded his system. “Your greatest desire.”

He could feel the heat as it enveloped his whole face, from anger or embarrassment or loathing, who knew. What did it matter? His arms trembled under the pressure he was exerting against his legs, sitting there with a dysfunctional brain that could not put two words together. Those words would form a sentence that wasn’t true. It couldn’t be. He wouldn’t use his best friend like that. Would never use anyone like that, but especially not Cas.

Dean clenched his teeth to keep from voicing the denials. He didn’t deserve denial; Cas had seen him. He’d been caught red-handed, there was no getting out of this, no refuting what he was, what he’d wanted.

“A family,” Cas said, voice gravely and accepting and so familiar it ached.

Green eyes flickered to blue, confusion and incomprehension as obvious in that wide gaze as it was in his open mouth and dropped jaw. Dean couldn’t breathe. His chest stuttered as he tried to pull air in, because that’s- that wasn’t-

Fuck.

Fuck!

He wasn’t wrong.

Yes, Dean wanted a family. He wanted that so, so damn badly. But he was never going to get it. And hoping for it… dreaming about it when he knew he couldn’t have one… and now talking about it with Cas, like it was perfectly fucking acceptable, like it was even possible…

Fuck!

Dean couldn’t hold the angel’s gaze, cutting his own away to focus on his hands, instead. They were shaking. Full on shaking against his thighs. He turned the claws into fists and pressed as hard as he could against his jeans, hoping to cure the shakes he couldn’t explain and didn’t like.

“I am honored to be included in that family, Dean,” Cas resumed speaking softly and so, so friggin’ earnestly. “To be a part of that dream, of what you want more than anything else.” He looked away as well, eyes distant but there was a small, tentative smile on his face.

Although it was sad, it was also full of… something. Something Dean wasn't sure he could put a word to, even if he suspected what that word was. "I would have liked very much to have a family with you."

The man from the future startled at his best friend – his angel – and stared at him without realizing that his shaking had stopped. The tension that held his body rigid – like a string ready to snap – melted away, so effortlessly that he didn't even notice its absence.

Cas turned and smiled at him, eyes watery, and Dean couldn't have looked away if he'd tried (and he did try, because there was a voice – different from the new, terrifyingly supportive one; no, this one was old hat, a familiar friend named panic – screaming in his ear to run, go, go, go, get the fuck outta there). But he didn't. He stared, and stared, and stared, those perfect blue eyes drawing him into an embrace that was anything but physical, and Dean didn't want to pull away.

(Home.)

"Could- could that even happen?" he found himself asking before the words actually caught up with his brain and he slammed his mouth shut hard enough for an audible clack to fill the space between them.

Cas's smile turned far more amused, eyes practically twinkling with laughter. Dean could feel his cheeks heating up furiously and he kind of wanted to punch himself in his own face.

"It could," the angel replied, once more startling Dean with an answer he hadn't been expecting. "Were Castiel to fall, as I did, it might be possible."

The hunter clenched his jaw and looked away, feeling like an asshole for even thinking it, let alone allowing the small spark of possibility to turn into something that seemed dangerously close to hope.

'It's not for you,' that poisonous voice hissed. It was a lot louder than the new one, drowning out the soft, 'But what if it could be…' whispered into a void of guilt and self-loathing.

"I would never ask for that," Dean said aloud, as much for himself as for his angel. He turned to face Cas, eyes imploring, desperate to be believed. "I would never ask you – even a different you– to fall for m-to- to fall."

The smile he got in response was so damn soft, so damn loving, that Dean couldn't pretend anymore. He knew exactly what that emotion was as it stared him in the face (declaring, 'Have a friggin' baby with me, Dean Winchester.')

"I know, Dean," Cas confirmed, voice still soft and gentle and accepting; everything Dean wanted so, so very much but was so, so very sure he did not deserve. "For what it's worth, if things come to pass as they did for me… I doubt you'd have to ask."

Dean turned away for the hundredth time – bright red at his best friend all but confirming he would have had his baby if he could have (and Jesus Christ, how had they gotten here of all places?) – but for just a second, a microsecond, Dean let himself picture it. Let himself have the fantasy, knowing it was never going to be anything more than that. No matter what Chest Cas thought could happen.

Forget whether or not he deserved it, whether or not he could have it. Dean would never raise a child in a world where he was a hunter. He'd tried once, to get out of the life and have that family, and he'd ended up bringing Hell straight to their front door.

Never again.

Dean hung his head with a mirthless chuckle, then looked at the angel again, vision blurry through unshed tears.

"So… what were you hoping I'd apologize for?" he asked wryly, wiping at his eyes. Castiel didn't comment as Dean sniffed back all those pesky feelings and offered a smile that was at least two-thirds real.

Cas thought about it for a moment, eyes off towards the ceiling, before they returned to the hunter, full of mirth and painful honesty. "Perhaps for being sexist?"

"What?" Dean practically squeaked, choking on all the emotions he'd been busy swallowing down.

The angel smiled, but his words were serious as he continued, "Your ability to accept Castiel because she occupies a female vessel was… frustrating to witness after I had fought so hard and so long for the same acceptance."

"You had it." The words were formed before Dean had a moment to think them through. But he knew he didn't need to think about it; that was probably the whole point. "I know I was utter crap at showing it, but you had it. Have it. Almost from day one, buddy."

The cynical look Cas gave him was like a punch to the gut. One he deserved, Dean reckoned. He started thinking of ways to prove it, because he wasn't lying. He had been crap at showing it, but Cas had had his trust almost from the damn beginning. Way sooner than he should have, given who he was and what he did for a living.

When had he decided Cas was on their side? When had he started thinking of the angel as a friend? It had been way earlier than had ever made sense. Something Dean was pretty sure Sam (among others) had spent years trying to tell him. That the two of them had just clicked in a way no one else understood. The sort of trust that had taken everyone else months - sometimes years - to develop with the angel.

Meanwhile, Dean had just… known.

"First time I met Uriel," the man from the future recalled, gaze split between his best friend and another time. "That's when I knew. You were special, Cas. You were…." Dean's breath caught as the words flitted through his brain and he realized how right – how true – they were. "You were meant to be with us. With- with me. That's why I can be so comfortable with her, Cas. She's you. I know you. You're-"

Mine. Dean swallowed back the thought and the spark of panic - and shame - it brought with it. Too possessive. Too… Shit, he didn't even know.

"With me," he amended, but the words were unsatisfying. They lacked something. Something permanent, something that… meant something.

Struggling, Dean finally looked back at Cas only to find the angel staring at him. His eyes were wide, but guarded and Dean knew, immediately, that he had put that wariness there. Through years of unintentionally pulling his friend in closer only to shove him away when he got too close. When Dean got scared.

The man from the future cleared his throat, blushing bright red as he realized what he needed to do. What he had to do. If he wanted to fix this – truly fix it – he had to go all the way.

Commitment. God, the word gave him hives. But it's what had been missing, wasn't it? So he couldn't half-ass it and leave the angel wondering, like he had so many times before, where he stood.

“Maybe it’s not, uh… not in the way that, uh, you would have maybe, um, preferred,” he stumbled and stuttered, clearing his throat several more times, cheeks on fire like some poor, pimpled teenager talking about sex for the first time. He pushed through, though, because that new little voice was nudging and prodding and pushing. “I knew, after meeting just one of your dick brothers, that you belonged with us. With humans.”

Dean licked his lips, that new voice getting louder and more insistent, because he knew he was beating around the bush. Knew he wasn’t saying what he needed to say. What dozens – probably hundreds – of allies and enemies had been saying all along.

“But, um… mostly with me.”

He met that watery, blue gaze filled with so much hope and pain and love and hurt that Dean felt his own eyes well up, too. With half a laugh – because it was that or cry – the man from the future smiled at his best friend. His angel.

“I knew it. I knew it the whole damn time, Cas. I just didn’t know how to…” He swore, laughing and wiping at his eyes again as the tears spilled over, because apparently it hadn’t been one or the other, after all. Today was a day for both, it seemed. “Acknowledging it was… fucking terrifying, man. Still is.”

He shook his head, but didn’t look away from Cas. Not this time. 'Maybe,' that little voice whispered into a void that seemed just a little less endless, ‘not ever again.’

Which was a damn scary thought, tinged around the edges with something equally terrifying but somehow way less scary, so Dean didn’t look at it too deeply.

“Needing you, like that, when I could so easily lose you. When-” his throat closed up as he realized- “when I did lose you. More than once.” Talking got downright painful at the realization that he still could. He looked at his best friend, heart on his damn sleeve, and confessed, “Cas, I still don’t know how to handle that.”

The angel just smiled, sad and sweet and heartfelt. “No one does, Dean. Love – familial, romantic, or platonic – is terrifying.”

The hunter laughed, aware of the irony. “Yeah, well… you all seem to have a better handle on it than me.”

Cas shrugged good-naturedly. "Some things take longer for others."

'There's still time, Dean.'

The man from the future straightened at the distant memory, the words that had hung over him for two whole years now, echoing from a cemetery years away. Once again, his angel was telling him he had time. Was giving him time. Time to fix things. To change the road he was on.

Dean was frozen to his core, both in fear and realization that once more (always), his angel was right. He could keep running from this… this thing between them, but he would be running from it forever. Until he decided to stop running. Until he chose it.

He locked his gaze on Castiel and felt instantly lighter (more hopeful, more optimistic) and simultaneously horrified (god, he could fuck this all up so, so much worse than he had the first time). "You think… you think she'll, um…"

"Yes." Cas was still smiling, so gentle, so friggin' supportive and happy in that secret little way he never seemed to want to share. Like he wasn't quite allowed, despite everything.

Dean just sat there, blushing, fiddling with the rough texture of his jeans, knowing there was something else he had to say. It couldn't be left unsaid. Not anymore. No more running.

"Hey Cas…?"

"Yes, Dean?"

He swallowed, fisting and unfisting his hands, and then met the angel's piercing eyes. 'Man up, Winchester.'

"I know I never said it," he started, wetting his lips nervously. "And it's not, I mean… I don't know if you even want to hear it."

The smile on the angel's face shifted into something affectionately nostalgic. "I always want to hear what you have to say, Dean."

The hunter swore softly, still blushing bright red. "Not making this any easier on me, bud."

Cas's grin turned downright impish. He was enjoying himself entirely too much and Dean knew it. Worse, he was positive Cas wanted him to know it, too. "If there is one thing I've learned during my time with you, love is not meant to be easy."

Dean practically choked on nothing and everything and then nothing once more. But, somehow, it was what he needed to hear. That Cas already knew what he was going to say, now all he had to do was say it. Because Sam had been right all along; Cas was more important to him than anyone else. Dean had spent too long fighting it, denying himself – and Cas by proxy – everything they could have been (family, that voice whispered again and Dean shoved down the flicker of want that came with it). His denial, his fear, had only hurt them both. For years.

Well, no more. Enough was enough.

Dean straightened up, looked his friend in the eye, and said, "I do. Love you, I mean."

Cas's smile dipped into the range of genuine happiness. Fond and heartfelt and there.

"I know."

The man from the future choked again, this time coughing on the spit he'd managed to somehow swallow the wrong way. "Did- Did you just Han Solo me?!"

After everything it took to say it – to say those words – and Cas just casually quoted Star Wars like it was nothing.

…And… well… maybe it was the best damn response Dean could have ever gotten. It did exactly what the older Winchester needed it to do: made it not a big deal.

Cas just smiled slyly, once more impish and mirthful and Dean found himself laughing, long and loud.

He loved Castiel. He really, really did. Maybe it still wasn't the way the angel loved him, not completely, but it was no less true. Dean let out another startled laugh, this one a little breathless, at what he'd just said aloud. What he'd just realized.

He loved Cas.

Still grinning, all he could manage was a stunned, "Holy shit."

End Chapter

Chapter End Notes

Author's Notes: Cool, cool, cool. So, who just managed a love confession/15x18 fixit that wasn't REMOTELY in the blueprints?!

Muse: raises hand That would be me.

No, you put your hand down! You're the one that came in, set the Blueprints Room on fire, and STROLLED BACK OUT AGAIN.

Muse: …that's what I said. Me, I did it. I get all the credit here.

head-desk

Destiel: So, I bet for some people this seems like a totally normal progression for the pairing. And it is. It really is. It's just NOT WHAT I HAD PLANNED. Dean was going to be in denial until he practically shot himself in the foot. But then the Muse came along and was like "Nope! He's done with that. Been in that river long enough, time for a quick towel off and then a marathon chase after a certain angel, who may not be in a river, but is definitely wandering a desert called Obliviousness. You're okay with all that, right?"

I'm kidding, of course. She never asks me if I'm okay with anything -_-

And it's the right call. It makes so much more sense - and is far more poignant - to have Dean be the one chasing after Cas this time. "Tables Turned" is practically a tagline for this fic. But it WASN'T. IN. THE PLANS. GUYS. The EIGHT YEARS worth of PLANNING.

□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□

Cas Pregnancy: Fair warning that there are no plans for a Cas pregnancy in this fic. While it was important for Dean to realize that he wants a family and that family could be with Cas, I am not planning on that route. It worked well for the Djinn dream, but seeing as Jimmy-Cas is back by the end of this season, the djinn dream was just a dream, no foreshadowing here. (There's also some moral complications about Cas getting pregnant in an occupied vessel that I'm not sure I want to get into…. Although I bet Angela would be down because she ships these two harder than I do 😁)

Up next: Cue the self-identity crisis and corresponding panic we've all been waiting for 😁

I hope you all enjoyed that chapter! I want to say it was worth the stress. I'm betting it was worth the stress. Y'all let me know, though. I'd love to hear from you :)

And yes, I know a majority of you probably wanted a kiss. ForestPelt was like "How about a hug? Just a hug!" and I was so scandalized: "WHOA, SLOW DOWN! What would Jane Austen say, you heathen!?!"

We'll get there. I promise, I will get us there!

….in another million words.

(Oh, also, HAPPY ONE MILLION WORDS!!! Can y'all believe you've read about 10 novels' length just to get to this point?!?)

(Cuz I can't believe I wrote 10 novels worth just to get to this point 🤦😁)

Cheers,
Silence

Chapter 149: Season 3: Chapter 8

Chapter Notes

Author's Notes: We're back! Sorry for the lack of chapter last weekend - that was totally my bad. I space-cased it big time.

Comments : Thank you everyone so much who left a comment last chapter! There was a lot of smiling and cackling as I read through them. I'm hoping to get some replies out this week

Chapter Warnings: Dean's good, he's real good, until he's not, and then he's bad, but then he's cooking!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 3: Chapter 8

Dean woke feeling good. Real good. He opened his eyes to the bunker ceiling and drew in a long, measured breath before sitting up, practically vibrating with some kind of energy.

"Holy shit."

He felt amazing. Best mood he'd been in, in... Damn he didn't even know how long.

"I know."

Dean's eyes widened at Cas's voice, flitting through his head. The dream crashed down on him like a tidal wave. He'd confessed to Cas last night. Or, well, okay, maybe not confessed; that would be a lot. Or girly. Or...something.

But he had told the angel that he loved him.

"Holy shit," Dean breathed out, waiting for the panic. The barrage of denial, the judgement and disappointment, the fear of being… something he wasn't.

It never came.

"Holy shit."

Dean sat up, floating on a damn cloud. Which, of course, was when the panic finally hit. Reality – that they were in the middle of an apocalypse, that they didn't have time for this, that he was terrible at relationships and love and all the mushy stuff, that he'd just told an angel of the damn lord that he loved him – wrapped its ugly claws around him and brought Dean crashing back to earth. The sudden fear – that he couldn't take this back, he was only gonna mess it up, he never should have said anything in the first place – engulfed him one self-critical, disappointed accusation at a time.

"Holy shit," he breathed out again for entirely different reasons. His heart rate skyrocketed and he found himself rubbing at his chest, wondering if he was having a damn heart attack

He'd confessed to Cas. An actual friggin' love confession . That wasn't something you could just take back. That was... that was...

Monumentally panic-inducing.

Dean grabbed at his shirt, lungs working double-time to catch up to his racing heart. There wasn't enough air in the room.

He'd told Cas that he loved him. And now, the next time he saw the angel...

"It's fine," Dean ground out as the panic threatened to overwhelm him. He hunched over, fisting his shirt above his pounding heart and pressing his knuckles into his sternum harshly. "Sammy says it's fine, so it's fine."

Of course, that wasn't exactly what Sam had said. He'd said it was okay for Cas to be more important to Dean than anyone else. Which, yeah, not, uh, not no . Not after last night. But the kid hadn't exactly been raising the damn pride flag up the Men of Letter's flagstaff, either.

(They actually had one, too, those patriotic old farts. It was just behind the building, at the edge of the meadow, not too far from the garage entrance. Rusted, abandoned old thing.)

"I know."

Dean took a shuddering breath and closed his eyes, trying to picture Cas's expression from the dream. Fond. Affectionate. Loving .

"It's no big deal," Dean breathed out, trying to channel his inner Han Solo. That's what Cas's words had meant. That's what he'd said. "It's no big deal."

Which went a long way in keeping the panic from bubbling over completely, but it was doing jack shit for the buzz vibrating throughout his whole body. Dean had excess energy that would put a coke addict to shame, paired alongside a panic attack that hovered just around the corner, held at bay by two little words. That was not a good combination for lying around in bed. In the dark. In silence.

Dean rolled off the mattress and onto his feet, jittery and rubbing at his chest aggressively.

"Distraction. I need a distraction," he muttered, looking around the room. No way in hell was he going back to sleep. He was – in no uncertain terms – not ready to see Cas again. It was one thing to tell the angel he loved him spontaneously in dreamland. It was another entirely to embrace the truth in the real world, where there were so, so many more consequences and complications.

'Maybe you can take it back,' a petrified voice whispered in his ear. 'Pretend it never happened.'

The very thought summoned every crushed, heart-broken, rejected expression Cas had ever made, more than half of which had been by Dean's own hand. It was a slideshow of misery and heartbreak across the backs of his eyelids. His chest pinched and pulled and ached, like he was having a damn heart attack. Dean's breath started to pick back up for a brand new reason.

He was not doing that. He was… just not. Not no way, not no how. Cas didn't deserve that, that cowardice shit, and Dean... Dean was better than that. He could be better than that. He had to be.

"Okay," the man from the future whispered, trying to slow his breathing. He nodded emphatically and held up his hand, thumb up to the sky despite the empty room around him. "Okay, no take-backs. Got it."

Which once again left him a jittery, vibrating mess with no outlet and a boatload of commitment he was in no way ready for.

"I need..." Dean looked around again, bunching his hands into fists and cracking his knuckles anxiously. He needed movement. He needed something to occupy his mind that wasn't Cas Cas Cas . Dean straightened up, the metaphorical lightbulb over his head turning on. "I need to cook something."

Chapter Break

Bobby ambled into the bunker kitchen around five thirty, Sarge by his side, and drew up short at the sight of Dean already inside, and busy at that. There were dishes piled high in the sink, flour and empty egg cartons on the island counter, and sizzling coming from multiple pans atop the stove. There was a plate loaded with pancakes already on the table, a kitchen towel draped over them to keep 'em warm. In the middle of all that was Dean, managing all of it like he was a contestant on Hell's Kitchen.

Bobby's eyebrows went up.

"We expecting company?" he asked as he shuffled over to the coffee pot, already filled with a fresh brew. Sarge headed directly for the table edge, sniffing curiously at the smell of fresh pancakes he couldn't quite reach and was too well behaved to try.

Dean fumbled the pancake he was in the middle of flipping – just barely managing to keep it from tumbling to the floor – as he startled and tried to spin towards the old hunter all at once.

"What?" he squeaked. Bobby's brow rose higher, and only partially at the apron the man was wearing, proclaiming him Mr. Good Looking . Dean cleared his throat and tried again in a voice much closer to normal, "No, just, uh, just us."

Now that he was closer to the stove, Bobby eyed what had to be a full pound of bacon, half of it already cooked, enough batter for at least another dozen pancakes, and – from the smell of it – something baking in the oven. He gave his boy a look and Dean shuffled nervously, avoiding eye contact by focusing back on the food.

"Felt like cooking," he said a little grouchily, shrugging defensively.

"Uh-huh," was all the old hunter said, filling a mug and leaning back against the counter as Dean kept cooking. Sarge, either bored or content with his investigation of the food he wasn't getting, trotted over to his side. Bobby gave him an idle pat to the head as he started sniffing along the island counter instead. "Rough night?"

It was telling just how much Dean didn't look at him even after he scraped the pan loudly against the stove's grate and winced at the noise.

"Uh… no, not, uh, not really," he offered after a long pause, though he didn't exactly sound sure of himself.

Bobby kept his raised eyebrow to himself this time, not entirely sure what to make of that. Not a nightmare that had him up at ass-o'clock in the morning cooking up a feast, then. But if not a bad night… what had the kid so jumpy?

"Anything you wanna talk about?" Bobby asked, though he wasn't sure it was the right move. There was an undiscussed code of conduct between them, one that didn't always benefit from even well-intended poking. So he kept his voice gruff about it when he offered.

"God no," Dean replied quickly and with a whole breadth of confidence, horror, and just a smidgen of guilt. "Thanks, Bobby, but, uh… yeah, just no."

The old hunter shrugged and sipped his caffeine. "No skin off my nose."

Dean nodded, shoulders relaxing as it became clear Bobby wasn't going to push the issue. Sarge had left the island for the stove and now had his muzzle pointed straight up at the smell of bacon. He caught Dean's eye and immediately plopped down on his hind legs, head tilted to the side (in a way Dean was almost positive he'd picked up from Cas), and eyes turned gooey-levels of adorable (in a way Dean was damn certain Sam had taught him). The hunter glanced over to the pile of already cooked pieces, debated for a second, and then snapped off a section and 'accidentally' dropped it in Sarge's direction. The Shepherd snatched the bite mid-air, then sat back on his haunches to patiently wait for another.

"Mutt," Dean muttered under his breath, but there was a hint of amusement that betrayed him.

"Mongrel," Bobby countered, aimed entirely at the human and not the dog. Dean sent him an offended glare, scoffing at the insinuation, but

Bobby sent the look right back, taking another swig from his mug. "You're teaching him bad habits."

Bobby grabbed a plate from the counter where Dean had stacked three and rooted around a drawer for utensils, sipping coffee all the while. If the kid was going to cook up a feast to ignore whatever was going on in his head, far be it from Bobby to stop him. Might as well help him out, far as the old man saw it. The food wasn't gonna eat itself.

"What's the point of having a dog if you can't give him table scraps?" Dean grumbled even as he reached across the stove for the syrup and handed it to Bobby before he made his way to the table. "Isn't that the whole point?"

"Gonna make him fat," Bobby grumped, taking a seat. He wasn't going to fight the kid on it, though. Sarge was a damn good dog and a senior one at that; he deserved the occasional treat. Even the artery clogging ones.

"Please. Sammy'll take him on morning runs. Just wait, he'll be like a kid at Christmas when the thought occurs to him." Dean brought over the plate of cooked bacon, setting it down next to Bobby's elbow. "Problem solved."

The old hunter eyed the kid without comment. He wasn't wrong – Sam would probably trip head over heels at the idea. Dean went back to cooking up enough food to feed an army and Bobby sat, nursing his coffee and partaking leisurely in a lightly syrup-ed pancake (he was approaching seniority himself, after all. However, unlike Sarge, no one would be taking him on runs anytime soon to clear up those arteries. Least, not if he could help it.) He watched their newfound chef as he moved confidently about the kitchen, waiting to flip pancakes, pulling off more bacon, crouching down to check whatever it was he had going in the oven. As the minutes passed and the silence stretched (comfortably, or so Bobby thought), he noticed Dean's shoulders tensing, bit by bit, as he got wrapped back up in his own head.

"So…" Bobby let the word drag out along with the silence after it. Just enough for Dean to freeze. Kid might have forgotten he was there, the old hunter figured. Definitely wrapped up in whatever was going on in that brain of his. "You gonna talk to your brother about it?"

"…About what?" Dean tried for nonchalance and missed by a nautical mile. Bobby just harrumphed and didn't bother keeping it quiet.

"Whatever's got you cooking at the butt crack of dawn, ya idjit."

"Aw, come on, Bobby," Dean groused, shoulders sagging. He hadn't forgotten Bobby was there, he'd just… been distracted by other things. Cas related things. Which he didn't want to talk about, hence the cooking. The man from the future glanced petulantly over his shoulder, "Can't you leave it alone?"

"Sure can," Bobby replied without missing a beat, his utter confidence like a rock against Dean's flimsy paper airplane of denial. "Can you?"

The kid snapped his mouth shut, teeth clacking, and turned back to the stove, his back to the old man.

Dean wanted to yell. He wanted to stomp his feet and throw a temper tantrum. He wanted to be left alone (only no, he really didn't, because clearly, as Bobby had just pointed out, alone time left Dean with his thoughts, which he didn't want to be having .)

Worst of all, he didn't want to admit Bobby was right. He was going to need Sam for this. His younger brother had this way of looking at things - taking all that jumbled, agonized, chaos that comprised Dean's thoughts - and explain it in a way that made panicking seem unnecessary. He could lay 'em out and everything would seem much more manageable. Sam made things make sense, where all Dean could see was panic.

Cooking hadn't been a distraction so much as a stall tactic, waiting for Sam to make his way to the kitchen. A tactic that clearly wasn't lasting as long as Dean had hoped it would.

"…Screw it," the hunter muttered, throwing down the spatula and pulling off his apron. He flipped the burners to low and marched right past Bobby on his way out the kitchen. "Sammy should be up by now, anyway. It's, what, six o'clock? What's he doing, sleeping in? Gonna wake his lazy ass up."

Bobby just nodded leisurely as the flurry of (panic? Anxiety? Mid-life crisis?) strolled right on past and out the kitchen door. The old hunter handed Sarge another piece of bacon and selected himself a second pancake.

Chapter Break

"Morning, Sunshine!"

Sam shot upright on his completely-adequate-spring-mattress, hunting knife in hand, before he even registered what had woken him. He turned towards the source of light: a rectangle of brightness the approximate size and shape of a door with someone silhouetted in the middle of it. Sammy stared at that figure through a mop of bedhead and sleep-squinty eyes.

"Dean?"

"That would be me. Up and at 'em, Sammy."

Dean strolled into the room, downright chipper, and kicked the frame of his bed twice. The mattress shuddered beneath him. Sam continued to stare through sleepy slits. He felt like he'd slept for days, which might explain the brain fog, though it did not explain his brother.

(Little did, he'd found from years of experience.)

"What time is it?"

"Time to get up!" Dean clapped his hands a couple times, trying to rouse the younger Winchester. "You know what day it is?"

Sam blinked, then tried to think about the question. He didn't have a clue. What day was it? What day had yesterday been? Yesterday… had been a Djinn. No, that had been the day before yesterday. It was too early for this.

Well, not for Sam. Not usually. He didn't know what time it was, but if Dean was waking him up, then it was pretty late, at least for him. He usually enjoyed his early mornings but Dean did not. Dean didn't do mornings, period. Which was adding to the confusion.

Had he been the one in a Djinn dream? This certainly felt like an alternate universe.

"…Saturday?" he hazarded when his brain shoved the answer at him out of nowhere.

"That's right," the older Winchester confirmed way too cheerfully.

And way too loudly. Little manically, actually. “And you know what we do on Saturdays?”

Sam, still staring in utter confusion, shrugged his shoulders like he was asking a question. Because no, no he did not. He didn’t have a damn clue what Winchesters who had a homebase did on Saturdays. Just like he didn’t have a clue why his brother was waking him up for it.

Chapter Break

Sam stared in utter bewilderment, befuddlement, and even something approaching awe, as he stumbled into the kitchen several paces after his brother. A hurricane had swept through the kitchen. There was enough food to feed at least six people, bowls and dishes strewn about, a pancake still on the stove, and Dean was pulling even more bacon off of another pan.

"What the..?" Sam turned to Bobby for answers, still confused and not completely certain this wasn’t all a dream. But the old man just shrugged and offered a look that said, quite clearly, 'He's your brother.'

Sarge licked at his fingers and Sam startled at the sudden wetness. He bent down to give the dog some attention, eyes never leaving the scene that was their kitchen. Dean was turning the oven off before crouching down to pull out something in a glass dish that smelled amazing. He set it down on the island with a set of oven mitts (Sam wasn’t aware they owned oven mitts, though they did look rather fifties-esque) and pushed it towards the younger Winchester.

“There, that’s got all your stupid rabbit food in it."

Sam gav a final pat to Sarge and stood, approaching the island. It was a quiche. Some sort of spinach and bell pepper quiche. The confused psychic could only stare, then look up at his brother, who was scraping the abandoned pancake into the trash. Cautiously, as though it might bite, Sam grabbed a fork and stuck it into the quiche, cautiously taking a bite.

“Wow,” came out of his mouth unbidden as he chewed. “This is actually good!”

Dean, making his way over to the table with the last of the bacon, pulled his head back, affronted. “Hey!”

But Sam was already shaking his head and taking another bite. “No, I mean good good. Really good.”

Chef-level kind of good, was what Sam was thinking. He’d have ordered that in a nice brunch restaurant and not balked at the unnecessarily high price tag. At least, he would have back in his Stanford life.

A smile overtook Dean’s face until the man was all but beaming. At least, until he realized what his face was doing and started fighting it. With a light flush, Dean cleared his throat and sat back down at the table.

“Well, good as it can be with all that health crap in it,” he amended Sam’s statement. It was clearly a cover for how quietly pleased he was with himself, but Sam didn’t call him on it. Instead he grabbed a plate, loaded it up with a large slice of quiche, and joined his family at the table.

"You want coffee or OJ?" Dean asked a still baffled Sam after he’d sat down.

"Uh...” Sam seemed surprised they had options. “OJ."

"Then grab it out of the fridge, bitch,” the older Winchester replied with a smirk, expecting a bitchface.

Sam wasn’t ready to play along, though. He was still staring at his breakfast, and then Bobby’s and Dean’s, and the other two dozen pancakes still waiting to be eaten between them. Something wasn’t adding up, but Sam didn’t have a clue what that was.

His brother had been in a Djinn dream the other day, Sam supposed. Maybe this was some sort of… therapeutic processing?

"Dean...” Sam shook his head, not even sure where to begin. He settled for the first thing that burst out of his mouth, which was less than helpful but very accurate to how he was feeling. “What the hell?"

"What?” the man in question snapped defensively, digging into a pancake. “A grown man can't want a decent breakfast?

"Sure," Sam nodded. "And the other fifteen grown men?"

Dean shrugged at the dig. Okay, he'd cooked a lot of food, sure. But he'd woken up over an hour ago with time to spare.

"So, we'll have leftovers."

"Leftover pancakes," Sam countered flatly.

Dean sent him a look that warned of a fast approaching line. "Just sit down and eat your breakfast. After this, we're going shopping."

There was something in the way he said it that made it very clear to Sam he didn't mean a grocery store or supply run. He meant shopping.

Sam screwed his face up. "We're what?"

His brother didn't even blink, finishing off his mug of coffee with a loud smack of his lips. "It's Saturday, Sammy: garage sale day! We got stuff to find."

The younger Winchester just stared, then glanced between Bobby and his brother, to no avail. All he got was a repeat of the same look as before.

'He's your brother.'

"What stuff?" he tried, again feeling like he'd gone to sleep in one universe and woken up in another. One where his brother was a morning person who liked to cook and shop garage sales.

"Stuff," Dean repeated as he stood up, grabbing his mug off the table. "Don't worry about it."

Well, that wasn't an actual option, not for Sam. However, it didn't sound like Dean was going to be any more forthcoming, so the younger Winchester tucked back into his breakfast. Because, apparently, they were going garage sale shopping.

As Dean poured himself another cup of coffee and then started digging through the fridge for something, Sam turned to Bobby. "Have you ever gone to a garage sale?"

"Sure," the older hunter responded with a nod. "You can find all sorts of things cheap. Tools, car parts. Sometimes the whole car. Plus, the occasional occult item."

Sam straightened up, suddenly a lot more interested in the notion. “Really?”

"If you’re lucky,” Bobby confirmed. “Don’t happen often, but I've found a few."

Dean set a glass of OJ in front of Sam, much to the younger Winchester’s surprise.

“Thanks,” he said even as the other man went back to the fridge, looking for something else. Sam wasn’t sure what. They had everything they could possibly need and then some. Still, he took the opportunity to glance at Bobby once more and quietly ask, “Any idea what Dean’s looking for?”

Bobby snorted, fork in hand. “Not a clue.”

Sam watched as Dean shut the fridge door with a jug of milk in hand, uncapped it, and poured a not insignificant amount into his coffee. Sam just stared, and continued to stare as Dean returned the milk to the fridge, then made a stop at the pantry shelves for sugar.

Dean had only ever taken his coffee black. Sam knew this. Everyone knew this. Did Sam know that Dean secretly loved the crappy, overly sweet, flavored creamers found at gas stations? Yes, yes he did. But Dean would never allow himself to have those, except by ‘accident’. Sam thought it was ridiculous but had bowed out of that battle ages ago.

Now he could only stare as Dean grabbed a spoon from a drawer, added two large spoonfuls to his coffee, and sipped away. Involuntarily, Sam’s eyes roamed over the rest of the kitchen, the results of Hurricane Dean sweeping through at six o’clock in the morning.

Returning to his conversation with Bobby, Sam couldn’t help but suggest, “Maybe what’s left of his marbles?"

Bobby snorted again and, having just taken a bite of pancake, did his best not to choke on it. Dean gave him a concerned look as he settled back in his seat, but the old man waved him off. Instead, Bobby glanced side-long at Sam and, not bothering to be quiet about it, said, “Good luck with that.”

Chapter Break

In this alternate universe, Saturdays were for garage sale shopping. Much to Sam's continued bewilderment – half believing Dean had just been pulling his arm or using it as a cover for something else (like hitting up a bar or finding a case or… god, Sam didn't even know what) – they hit up their first sale at seven fifteen in the morning.

"Gotta go early if you want to get the good stuff before it's snatched up," Dean told him with confidence that seemed entirely foreign to the younger Winchester as they pulled up to the curb outside of a yard full of odds and ends.

Sam just stared at him and wondered if it was possible a shapeshifter or skinwalker could have infiltrated the bunker. Did he have silver on him? As his brother climbed out of the car to go shopping, of all things (willingly. At seven in the morning) the younger Winchester patted himself down, checking for silver, even knowing this was definitely his brother.

His brother who wore aprons, cooked feasts when obviously bothered by something, and went garage sale shopping.

Sam shook his head and climbed out of the car.

There was a smattering of furniture, a rack of men's clothes that the younger Winchester wouldn't fit in but Dean perused, and a whole lot of household junk. Sam was actually surprised to see how much stuff a normal household had and didn't need.

Not knowing what they were looking for (and not looking for anything for himself, since Sam still didn't know why they were doing this), he watched his older brother haggle for a couple items, including a couch (which he tested rigorously before agreeing on a price). The older Winchester pulled a wad of cash out of his back pocket and parted with a couple bills before heading back over to Sam.

"We are the proud new owners of a couch, Sammy!" he announced with pride, grin spread wide across his face.

Sam raised an eyebrow and tried not to be too judgmental as he asked, "And we need one of those because…?"

The older Winchester just scoffed. “For the Dean Cave, obviously.”

Any and all attempts to remain judgmental were quickly abandoned.

“It’s going to be awesome,” Dean argued against Sam’s look as they walked back to the Impala, his smaller finds tucked under one arm. “Just you wait. We’ll get the couch, a TV, mini fridge for beers, microwave for popcorn. Everything a growing man needs for a proper movie night.”

“And how are we getting this couch back to the bunker?” Sam asked, foregoing any questions about the Deave Cave. He was sure he’d be seeing the answers in person soon enough. “I don’t think it’s going to fit in the Impala.”

His brother waved off the sarcasm as he climbed into the driver’s seat. “We’ll come pick it up with Bobby’s truck later. Owner said anytime before two was fine.”

“Okay…. And how are we going to get it into the bunker?” the younger Winchester asked dubiously, thinking about staircases and getting a bad feeling.

“Just like last time.” The man from the future offered his brother a hundred-watt grin as he pulled away from the curb. “Carefully.”

End Chapter

Chapter End Notes

Author’s Notes: Despite, like, six thousand things being discussed in this chapter, Dean waking up, having a panic attack, and reassuring himself with, “Sammy says it’s fine, so it’s fine” is my favorite line in this chapter. It’s so adorably Dean Winchester XD

Dean Loves Cooking: I’ve seen this as a growing trend in the fandom and I am all on board. I didn’t know I needed this headcannon until I stumbled on Everyone’s a Critic by EnglandWouldFall, the Chef!Dean Destiel AU I never knew I needed. I highly recommend; it is chef’s kiss good (pun intended).

Garage Sales: Sooo I have no idea if the boys ever went garage sale shopping, but my inclination was probably not. I picture John taking them to thrift stores and the like, kind of dragged to stores by him as needed for things. For some reason, I can't see John taking them to yard sales for second hand stuff, though, so I went with Sam having never been to one.

Up Next: Dean uses second hand shopping as an excuse to have a conversation with Sammy!

Posting Schedule: I want to maintain weekly posting (when I remember) but I also need to give everyone the heads up that I haven't been writing much at all (the Muse Fuckering lingers on, but I will get through it!) So a return to two-week schedule or a posting delay may be up-n-coming. I'll do my best to avoid it! Cheers, Silence

Chapter 150: Season 3: Chapter 9

Chapter Notes

Author's Notes:
Welcome to our next installment: Dean tries to talk to Sam without talking to Sam!

(I'm real tired tonight, so the babbling and chatter is gonna be disturbingly absent Nevertheless, ENJOY!)

Chapter Warnings:
The boys continue to fill Baby up with all the accouchements a Dean Cave requires (minus a foosball table, which just wasn't at any of the garage sales. But never fear. Dean's pretty sure Craigslist's a thing in 2007). Sam's getting suspicious that Dean might want to talk and Dean's trying to figure out whose brilliant idea it was to get Sammy up so they could talk

, cuz it sure wasn't him.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 3: Chapter 9

They found an old but decent TV at the next stop. It wasn't a flatscreen, which annoyed Dean to no end, but then, those weren't common enough yet to start showing up in yard sales. It also made loading it into the backseat of the Impala way more work than the last time they'd had to do it. But between the two brothers and some mighty fine curse words, they managed to get the television into the car.

It was on their third stop for the morning that he saw it.

It was a print, framed in black plastic and cheap glass, but that hardly mattered to the older Winchester. What mattered was that it was a painting of a scantily clad warrior lady astride a grizzly bear, wielding a sword in a sunbeam of light as she led the charge of several other bears. It wasn't the same as Andy's van painting, but it was still perfect.

Dean picked the framed artwork up, inspecting it closer before looking around for the owner. "How much for this?"

"Seriously?" Sam asked as he came up beside him, eyeing the painting dubiously.

"It reminds me of him," Dean answered with a shrug, but the way his eyes were locked on the painting clued Sam in. He looked over it again, something vaguely familiar about it teasing at his brain. Dean, meanwhile, didn't even bother haggling with the owner, who asked for four dollars. He just handed over the cash and went back to staring at his prize.

It was perfect. A little bit of Andy for the Dean Cave. Kid would have loved it.

When Sam finally realized why it was familiar, he let out a startled laugh. "Is that what he was trying to paint on that old van?"

Andy's attempt with several cans of spray paint had left a lot to be desired, but Sam remembered (vaguely) the kid's original van and the painting of a Viking woman riding a polar bear into battle. Of course, Andy's attempt at a recreation had looked more like a stick figure with boobs riding a couple white blobs, but it had made him happy regardless.

"Close enough," was Dean's answer as he tucked the painting under one arm. The Dean Cave from his bunker had never had any artwork, per say (Sam would argue Led Zepplin posters didn't count), but this one would.

(Of course, Sam would probably argue this didn't count as 'art' either.)

Chapter Break

After that find, Sam started looking at the items with a little more interest. Dean had already grabbed several things, proclaiming them 'perfect' for his room. Sam wasn't oblivious to the little nudges. Hints to maybe start looking for odds and ends to decorate his own space in the bunker.

The only problem was, Sam didn't feel the need. Outside of his Stanford Years, he'd never had a home to decorate. Given how that stint had ended, the young psychic wasn't as eager about nesting into their new space as Dean. He understood abstractly how much it meant to his brother to have a home, but the bunker didn't represent that for Sam yet. His room wasn't his , it was a place he slept for now, like any motel room along the road.

Maybe, with some time, it could become home. Maybe, Sam thought, if they survived the apocalypse, he could let himself have that again.

Watching Dean dig through things, however, occasionally exclaiming a victorious, 'Huzzah!' with childlike glee, was decent incentive. It was hard not to join in on the hunt, Sam realized, even if Dean was absolutely ridiculous about his finds. His excitement was… perhaps not contagious, but endearing enough to play along.

So the younger Winchester decided to put in the effort, for Dean if for no other reason. He approached the next sale with a different eye. He found a couple things – a small plant that could use some love (he'd have to get some sort of light for it so it didn't die underground – and several books that looked interesting. When he followed Dean up to pay the owner, the look of approval and spark of pride in his eye made the whole thing fairly worth it.

Throughout their shopping, though, (one microwave, a TV, several DVDs, a popcorn bucket, a few posters, and a new monkey suit later), Sam began to notice fractures in his brother's demeanor. He'd caught Dean staring off into space, shoulders and jaw gradually tensing, until the older Winchester would shake himself out of it and double his enthusiasm until it happened again. Sam knew what his brother looked like when he was wrapped up in his own head. Panicking while pretending he wasn't panicking. It was certainly presenting itself differently than Sam was used to (garage sale shopping had never been on the list of distractions before), but he chalked that up to the ten-year experience gap he had with this Dean.

When they climbed back into the car after their final stop, Sam let Dean pull off the curb and get a couple blocks before he asked, “So what’s this really about?”

Beside him, Dean predictably tensed, fingers curling around the Impala’s wheel, but he didn’t immediately deny it. Casually, he went with, “We need the stuff,” but his heart was barely in the brush off and Sam could hear it.

“Sure, for the Dean Cave” he agreed without a hint of sarcasm. Amusement, maybe, but Sam had already accepted their bunker came with a Dean Cave. “It’s even been kind of fun.”

In a bizarre, Twilight Zone sort of way. But Sam knew there was more to this trip. Even if Dean hadn’t been acting like a well-disguised wreck that morning, Sam had been expecting some fallout from the djinn dream. His brother had spent days locked in a world that wasn’t real, thinking it was and killing himself when it turned out not to be. No one walked away from something like that in one piece. Which was why he was pretty sure this trip was an excuse to talk.

Dean just didn’t know how to start. Maybe Sam could offer a hand.

“And this morning?” he prompted with amusement. If he kept it light, his emotionally constipated brother might open up. Or at least play along.

Dean’s face took on the grumpy pout of a five-year-old and, defensively, he grumbled, “I like to cook.”

“You’re good at it too,” Sam replied without hesitation. And he was. Damn good. Sam wondered if that was a natural talent his brother had never had the opportunity to explore, or if he’d gotten good after years of practicing in the bunker kitchen.

The lack of pushback threw Dean for a loop and he glanced at Sam in brief surprise. He looked away just as quickly, the bridge of his nose tinged red. He cleared his throat, feeling like he needed to explain himself. “I like- it keeps… it keeps my hands busy. Requires multi-tasking. You know. It’s a good distraction.”

Sam waited a couple beats to see if Dean would segue on his own into why, exactly, he needed that ‘distraction.’ When he didn’t – remaining quiet but tense in the driver’s seat – Sam decided another prod was needed.

“Is this about the djinn?”

Dean tilted his head back and forth, physically hemming and hawing. It was better than Sam had anticipated, although he’d prepared himself for the worst. After a far shorter wait than expected, Dean confessed in a strained but stern tone, “Maybe.”

Now Sam waited. He’d learned during his teenage years that if he over-prodded, Dean would shut down harder. And it was obvious his brother wanted – probably needed – to talk.

“Cas was pregnant.”

Whatever Sam had been expecting – and several of his speculations had certainly been along the lines of Dean’s relationship with the angel – that particular scenario had not been on the list. Realizing his jaw was hanging open, Sam quickly closed his mouth and cleared his throat.

“O-Oh. That’s…. good?”

The look Dean sent his way, accompanied by a deadpan head roll and stare, told the younger Winchester that his strangled attempt at nonchalance had not sounded any more convincing to Dean than it had to him.

Despite Sam’s less than smooth reaction, Dean kept talking, though his eyes went back to the road and stayed there. “It was at the end. Once I’d figured it out and the djinn, or his magic, or whatever-” the hunter dismissed the fuckery that was their lives with a frustrated headshake and cleared his throat. “It knew I was gonna end it and, uh… I guess it was trying to convince me to stay.”

“By making…” Sam was still trying to process the previous piece of information. Not the fact that Castiel had been pregnant: that was fairly simple. But what seeing it, maybe believing it was real, would have done to his brother. How it could be contributing to his mental state now. And exactly where this conversation might be headed so Sam could be prepared. Damn. He needed to start with the basics before he could process any of the rest of it. “So… you two were….?”

Dean grit his teeth. “Yes, Sam. Now can we focus on the part where I impregnated my best friend in a friggin’ wish fantasy?”

Sam winced, but pushed on. Full steam ahead, as it were.

“Okay, um, yes , we can skip over the part where you were in a relationship with Castiel,” he started, emphasizing that no, he was not going to force Dean to talk about the bit he was clearly not ready to process yet himself. But Sam couldn’t help but point out the hypocrisy of such a request. “And instead focus on the physical result of that relationship. Whatever part of it you wanna talk about, man.”

How, exactly, he was supposed to help Dean emotionally process having a kid with Cas without acknowledging the with Cas part…. Sam was good at talking Dean through things, but even he wasn’t that good.

“ Sam .”

Those were very, very gritted teeth now. The younger Winchester relented, but not without a shrug that his brother would probably classify as a bitchface all its own. “Do you want kids?”

Dean pulled his head back, face scrunching up while simultaneously turning red with indignation and horror. “Wanting kids is not the same as knocking Cas up, Sam! I imagined her- and in a fantasy -! That- That is a very different thing! That is- it’s skeevy !”

Sam wrinkled his nose, confusion written across his face. “Okay…. Why?”

“She’s not human, Sam,” his brother countered, head whipping between the road and the passenger seat in disbelief. What the younger Winchester didn’t know was that Dean couldn’t understand how he was the only one finding this unacceptable. What the hell was wrong with Cas and his brother that they didn’t think he was the scum of the earth just imagining it? Let alone wanting -

Dean’s grip turned white-knuckled and he had to force himself to breathe out and release the tension in his fingers. Calmly as he was able (which wasn’t very much at all), he tried to explain. “She wouldn't know what she was getting herself into.”

Sam just huffed, shaking his head minutely. He got the vague sense he was missing something, but he didn’t chase after it. Dean had already brought up enough to last them the rest of the drive.

“I think you’re taking this too literally.”

Dean glanced at him, then the road again, confusion evident in his eyes and the scrunch of his nose. “What?”

“It’s not about you having impregnated Cas – and yes, when you put it that way, it’s disturbing, I see it – but that tactic…. Dean, it wasn’t about the, you know, act of making a kid so much as the offer of something you wanted.”

Dean swallowed roughly, fingers curling tight around the wheel once more. “A family.”

It hurt to hear his brother – someone to whom family was everything – speak with the dread of someone who knew they’d never get it. Resigned acceptance of something he could never have. But that was a whole separate conversation for another day, so Sam let that one go too.

“I saw the way you looked at Ben in that Baku Dream, Dean,” the younger Winchester said softly, gaze back in a dreamscape and the kid who’d hugged Dean around the waist and smiled up at him. Sam had known, instantly, what he’d been looking at that day. “He may not have been yours biologically, but he was your kid, and you loved that. The djinn was trying to draw you back in by offering a world where you could have that family again.”

And keep it this time.

“Yeah,” Dean grunted, grip on the wheel now punishingly tight. “Just replace that white picket fence with a military grade bunker.”

Sam huffed again, amused. “Hey, you already have the dog.”

“No. No dog,” the older Winchester barked immediately, but he couldn’t hide the quirk of his lips or the hint of humor in the glare he sent Sammy’s way. “My white picket fence does not include furballs or mutts. My Barbie Dreamhouse comes with-”

“A fridge filled with endless beer?”

Dean opened his mouth to tell his sarcastic little brother, ‘ Damn straight ,’ only for the words to stick in his throat.

Because that wasn’t what had come to mind. Unbidden, the memories of picking Ben up from soccer practice flitted by. Fixing Lisa’s old car so it didn’t sound like death on wheels every time she turned it on. Sitting side by side on the couch, watching a movie while Ben sprawled on the floor, tossing popcorn into his mouth (with more on the floor than made it to his mouth).

His breath hitched and Dean closed his mouth as his traitorous brain tried to put Cas in Lisa's place. The man from the future immediately baulked, trying to dispel the half-formed idea. And yet. Hadn't he and Cas done just that in the dream? Sure, it hadn't been a couch but a library and a pair of chairs that were not nearly comfortable enough to sit in for nine straight hours. But they'd watched movies together all day long, and Dean had loved every minute of it.

Just like he always had when he and Cas shared a movie night in the bunker.

Shit.

Sam stared at his brother, the man convulsively swallowing like his throat had forgotten how to do it, knuckles white on Baby's wheel, eyes locked on the windshield like he was trying to break it in half with his mind. It hurt, seeing his tough older brother so torn up.

"That place really messed you up."

Dean snorted. ' Tip of the iceberg, Sammy. '

He tried to push aside all the white noise his brain was busy supplying: images of Cas curled up on a couch, waiting for Dean to join him, of the two of them in the Impala, arguing about mixtapes and which pre-millennial band was better. Ben grinning up at him, arms around his waist, eyes a damn mirror to his own when he'd been that age. Cas, with that soft little baby bump and the promise of another chance.

"I don't want kids," the older Winchester asserted firmly, clearing his throat and banishing those thoughts. All thoughts. "Not if I'm hunting."

Sam closed his eyes – a brief and mournful acknowledgement of the horrors of their own childhoods – before nodding. Of course. How could he not understand that? "Yeah. Yeah, I get that. But… otherwise?"

"Otherwise what, Sammy?" Dean snapped, glancing his way with more incredulity. "I'm never getting out of this life. I tried, and it just followed me. That's… that's why it was a wish ."

His voice broke and Sam wished there was something he could do to change it all.

“I’m sorry,” he offered, earnest and heartbroken for his brother. He sank into his seat, thoughts on Jess and the life he he’d thought he’d get to have, only to be pulled back in to the endless hunt. That life had put her in harm’s way; he’d almost gotten her killed just by virtue of who he was. Sam knew too well what it was to want something and know you couldn’t have it. He stared out the window, gaze on a future he didn’t know if either of them would get. “Maybe after. After we stop the apocalypse and-”

“Don’t.” Dean was shaking his head, swallowing back the emotion that threatened to boil over. Sam recognized the boundary. Dean wasn’t ready to talk about the possibility. Wasn’t capable of that kind of hope. “Just don’t, Sam. That’s not gonna- It’s not- it’s not what this is about.”

‘This’ being the reason Sam had been woken up and dragged yard sale shopping, he figured. Whatever this was that Dean needed to talk about. So he waited a beat for his brother to continue and, when he didn’t, the younger Winchester prodded once more, albeit gently. “What is?”

It was like watching the answer get physically pulled from the hunter’s body as he fought every inch of it. Sam could trace it, physically rising from Dean’s gut – the man curling in on himself like a bad cramp – then up through a tight chest and tighter shoulders – rising up right along with his response – before he finally released it breathlessly. Like it had taken everything he’d had to let it out.

“…Cas.”

It was almost painful to witness, which was the only excuse Sam had for the stretch of silence before his brain kicked in and he managed a response to the confession that he’d already known was coming all along.

“Ah.”

This time when Dean repeated the head rolling deadpan glare, Sam had no guilt. He offered a less than apologetic shrug. It’s not like Sam hadn’t been expecting this conversation – at some point – pretty much since Dean had set his eyes on Cas and told him he was carrying his grace. In fact, Sam had stopped counting how many times Dean had told him this conversation would not be happening, and he’d only been around the two of them for a year.

He didn’t know how his other self had lasted ten times that without saying something. Or locking them in a room together.

“So we can talk about the part where you were in a relationship with your best friend now?”

Sam was pretty sure he could hear Dean’s teeth squeaking against one another, his jaw was so tightly clenched.

“Sam, I swear to god-”

“What about it bothers you?” Sam asked genuinely, stashing some of his mirth. He’d had his fun and didn’t want to tease his brother past what he could handle. Otherwise the older Winchester might retreat right back into his emotional shell and it would be another ten years before he’d be willing to come out again.

Dean struggled to answer. Sam could almost see the physical search across his face. So he offered another option.

“Or is it that it doesn’t bother you?”

The way Dean swallowed, eyes locked on the road like it was a lifeline, like he was coming to that very same conclusion, was all the answer Sam needed.

“Okay. So you like Cas,” Sam said, like it was the simplest of things. He offered an encouraging smile, posture relaxed. “That’s cool.”

Dean’s head whipped around, enough so the Impala swerved with him and the hunter was quick to turn back to the road and correct the car. He tried to switch between the windshield and his brother several times after that.

“That’s- that’s cool ? That’s all you’ve got to say?”

Sam shrugged his shoulders and his eyebrows in tandem. He wasn’t sure what Dean wanted from him, but it was clearly something other than casual acceptance. Sam wasn’t sure what else there was to offer other than support.

“Should there be more?”

Dean once again looked at him with incredulity. “Yes!”

“Like what?” he asked innocently enough. Without knowing what Dean wanted from this conversation (was Sam supposed to say it was crazy?) he decided to play along, since Dean apparently wasn’t going to tell him and Sam wasn't a mind reader, despite being psychic.

"Like- like how he's an angel, for one!"

The first thought he had was, 'Okay… and?' but Sam knew better than to say it aloud. This might not be a hangup for him, but it clearly was for Dean. He'd have to tread carefully. Even if he was fairly certain Dean was busy overthinking all of this.

"You think she won't be interested because she's an angel?" He weighed the thought, supposing it was possible. Sam hadn't chatted much with Castiel about her home or family. He'd snuck in his own curiosities when he could, of course, but getting time alone with the angel was rare (it had not taken long for Sam to realize all talk of Heaven or 'winged dicks' was not wise around Dean). He was aware, at least, that emotions were a tricky topic for the angel; they weren't approved by upper management, and Cas always had a mildly constipated look anytime she was feeling one. From that, Sam could imagine angels probably didn't do romantic or physical entanglements. "Do they not date?"

By that point Dean had pulled off the interstate and was on the familiar back roads heading for the bunker. "No, they don't date , Sam. They're angels ."

"Okay," Sam considered, nodding along, "so… you're worried it's unrequited, then?"

Dean looked like he wanted to bash his head into the Impala's wheel as he pulled around the abandoned power plant, heading for the entrance to the garage. "I'm not worried about anything , because it's not going to happen."

Which was not necessarily new information to Sam. Everything his brother had ever said about relationships – past and future – indicated either passing fancy, pure fantasy, or failed reality, and all in the painful tone of perpetuity. Written in stone, rock and a hard place, it couldn't happen.

"…But you want it to."

Dean put the car into park, but his hands stayed wrapped around the steering wheel, the leather squeaking beneath his grip. His breathing was purposefully even, deep and measured.

Bingo.

Sam took a calm breath of his own, knowing it was a pretty big push but hoping it was the push his brother needed. “Dean, you’re allowed to want it.”

The older Winchester swallowed again, like it was the only thing keeping back a tidal wave of emotion he wasn’t ready to handle. He wrung his hands around the wheel twice. “I can’t, Sammy.”

The strain in his voice was obvious. The way he was just barely holding back the panic. Not unlike the earlier conversation, maybe Dean wasn’t ready to have this one yet, either. So, rather than push past what Dean could handle, Sam took a different gamble.

“Okay,” he said, relaxing back into the passenger seat, hand reaching for the door handle and signaling the potential end of the conversation, if Dean wanted that. The older Winchester was clearly surprised by his sudden shift in demeanor, like he’d been expecting Sam to push. But the psychic only offered a reassuring smile. “Then don’t. It was just a dream, Dean. It doesn’t have to mean anything.”

With that, he exited the Impala. It took a moment for his brother to scramble after him, clearly confused. Dean braced an elbow on top of the Impala, keys in hand, staring at him across the metal.

“That’s it?” the man from the future asked, both angry and incredulous. “Just… forget all about it? That’s your solution?”

“Yeah, man. It’s that simple, if you want it to be,” Sam confirmed. He opened the back door and started pulling out some of their purchases from that day. “You can’t? Then you can’t. Now come on, we’ve got a Dean Cave to set up.”

With arms full, Sam headed for the door to the bunker. Stunned – that was not remotely how he’d seen this conversation going – it took Dean several minutes to follow after him, grabbing Andy’s poster on his way.

End Chapter

Chapter End Notes

Author’s Notes:

Sam Winchester, Master of Reverse Psychology!

Comments:
Thank you all for coming out of the woodwork these last couple chapters. I keep getting the email notification ping and I'm smiling before I've even read the comment. So really, bottom of my heart, thank you. It's been a rough year so far, but hearing from you, having this story have fans, is helping carry me along through the worst of it.

New Readers:
Welcome!! We had a surge of new readers over the last two chapters, so I just want to say welcome!! Thank you for checking out mah little beastie of a story and making it through a million words to join us! That's a feat unto itself

UPDATE 08/23/2025: Hey guys! I'm so sorry for the two (three) week radio silence. It has been a hectic couple of weeks, so I wasn't able to get the chapter edited to a satisfactory level. I will do my absolute best to post tomorrow night, if I can (I'm currently out of town for a wedding but if I have time tomorrow night I will!) and next weekend if not.

Cheers,
Silence

Chapter 151: Season 3: Chapter 10

Chapter Notes

A/N's: Welcome back from a totally unplanned, unintentional month-long break! I am SO sorry, everyone! Something about this chapter kept tripping me up, and once I figured out what it was I had so much trouble writing it. I never do well when I have to add after a chapter is finished. I have a tendency to get carried away (which is just how I write), but then I end up writing in a direction that is different from the whole rest of the chapter. Which ends with me paralyzed, wanting to keep both, and either having to work reeeeeal hard to make them line back up, or start editing my edit (which, as you can probably imagine, becomes a vicious spiral reeeeeeeal quick)

But here we are, I finally figured it all out and am happy with the end result. Hope you all enjoy! (enough that it lessens the sting of a month wait 😉)

Chapter Warnings: The boys have a poster to hang and a Dean Cave to set up, Dean's got some more freaking out- I mean thinking to do, Sam's got the patience of a saint, and together they're gonna figure out how to romance an angel. (Alone. Dean's gonna romance an angel alone, but Sam's definitely playing wingman.)

Translation Heads Up: For those not reading in English, you will shortly encounter the term Man'd Up, which is the past tense version of the phrase 'Man Up' or, basically, 'get over it'. It's followed by a gender-neutral version, 'People'd Up' which is not a common alternative, so I will not be surprised if translators mess that one up. It's not spoilery enough to make y'all wait till the end notes. Cheers!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 3: Chapter 10

“You know,” Sam started as Dean stepped back from the poster, having just leveled it against the wall, “when it comes to your taste in art… this is not what I imagined.”

Dean chuffed, rolling his eyes but he couldn’t help the grin that followed. “Shaddup.”

Andy’s warrior bear queen hung there in all her high fantasy glory. It was the perfect addition to the Dean Cave.

“Although,” the older Winchester added, glancing at Sam with a cocky grin. He raised cupped hands and outlined a curvy silhouette mid-air. “The artist did a great job exaggerating her, uh, assets.”

It was Sam’s turn to roll his eyes and chuckle. He glanced over at Dean, amusement ebbing. Sam’s thoughts turned to their outing and wondered if his brother had done it once before, with his Sam.

“We do this before?” he asked, gesturing with his chin towards the poster.

Dean didn’t say anything for a moment, licking his lips and staring at the hanging art that had never existed in his Dean Cave. “No. Uh. Never had any art in here before.”

Sam turned towards him with a frown, something in his brother’s tone tipping him off that Dean wasn’t just talking about a poster. As he followed Dean’s gaze back to Andy’s painting, Sam visibly startled. No art of a bear-riding queen, no memory of Andy. It had never occurred to him – he’d never thought about the Andy Gallagher from Dean’s timeline. Or a world where the Jedi might never have joined their team. Joined their family.

Swallowing, Sam asked, “We didn’t…?”

The man from the future shook his head, but didn’t put it into words either. It was still a raw wound; it wasn’t ready to be touched.

With a steady breath, Sam turned back to the wall, trying to imagine a world where they’d never known Andy Gallagher. A world where they’d said goodbye to him the same day they met him, and that had been that.

“Dude,” he breathed out on a huff of air. He looked at Dean, eyes watery but a touch of levity to his words as he said, “That sucks.”

The bark of laughter that escaped Dean wasn't exactly mirthful, but it wasn't harsh either. He hung his head for a moment, another chuckle rolling through his shoulders before he nodded. There was water gathering in his eyes too, but he smiled, sad and commiserating. "Yeah. Yeah, we were a couple of idiots. Didn't know what we were missing."

A brother.

The silence stretched between them, tinged with grief but also the remembrance of life. Dean stared at the poster, eyes a thousand miles away, remembering the past year.

"We do now," he continued, tone somber. There was something heartbroken in it, something that sat heavy in Sam's gut. Dean didn't meet his gaze as he continued, "You ever think… maybe it'd be easier if… you know?"

Dean glanced over at him, but the look was fleeting. When Sam shook his head, unclear what he was getting at, Dean looked almost distressed to have to say it out loud. Sam furled his brow and Dean downright squirmed.

"You know," he insisted, beating that bush like it had personally offended him. Sam could only furl that brow further. There was something he was missing here - something more than just Andy - but he didn't know what. Exasperated, Dean blurted out, "Better to have loved and lost, than…?"

His eyes widened with sudden understanding and Sam shook his head before Dean even finished the thought.

"No."

Maybe this was about more than just Andy (and given the precise choice of metaphors there, Sam was pretty sure what it was about) but Dean feeling regret or guilt, even for a moment, for bringing Andy into their lives was not an acceptable train of thought, regardless.

"I wouldn't take it back. Any of it," Sam firmly stated, keeping Dean's gaze when the man from the future finally glanced over. "And Andy wouldn't either."

Dean's eyes widened, taken aback by the confidence in that claim, but Sam didn't back down.

"Andy could have left, but he didn't. He chose to stay. He chose us. He died choosing us!" Sam had to bite back the bitter sting of bile at the thought. It soured his stomach and cramped his insides. Andy had died for him. Gave him the Persian sleep coin so he'd be protected and told him to run. He'd died trying to keep Sam alive. Hazel eyes locked on green so fiercely that his older brother froze, eyes wide and suspiciously wet. "So don't tell me he'd have chosen anything but this series of events."

His brother couldn't keep his gaze and stared at the floor, instead. Dean couldn't help but think of Andy's death as being on him. He'd brought the kid into their lives. And yeah, the Battle Royale had claimed Andy's life last time as well, but this go around had been so… personal. The kid had suffered a hell of a lot more with them than he ever had on his own. Dean couldn't shake the feeling of responsibility for it.

"I wouldn't take it back for anything," Sam repeated, unwavering.

After a beat, Dean relented.

"Yeah," he agreed, but it was quieter. A somber confirmation, laced with guilt but also the beginnings of acceptance. "Yeah, me neither."

Sam cleared his throat, releasing the tension holding the room, and awkwardly said, "I uh, actually meant did we do all this, before. Together, I mean? Go garage sale-ing and set up a Dean Cave?"

The older Winchester didn't immediately respond, brain taking an extra moment to process the question amidst feelings. He pushed them away hastily, happy for the distraction. "Uh, yeah. It was your idea, actually."

"Seriously?" Sam laughed, trying to picture a version of himself that suggested they go knick-knack shopping through normal peoples' leftovers. He shook his head, unable to imagine it. "I can't believe how domestic we become."

"I know, right?" Dean cackled, grabbing the TV cord and bending for the outlet. The TV stand wobbled under his arm and he swore, glancing down at the offending, uneven leg. He'd have to find something to shim it. Dean straightened back up and pointed at his brother. "Alright, you get the dvd player hooked up, I'll fix that."

As Sam got started on untangling the cords, Dean left the Cave to fetch a chunk of wood for the uneven stand (and how annoying was that? Flatscreens could be wall-mounted but nooo, they had to not only lug down a hulking TV but also the stand for it. And it wasn't even level! The past sucked.) As he jogged up the steps to the garage, his mutinous thoughts kept turning back to Sam's stupid points about love and loss.

It was stupid because it was right. He wouldn't take back the grief, the sadness and pain, not even the guilt he was feeling. Not if erasing them meant also erasing Andy from their lives. Dean had meant what he'd said, about him and the Sammy from his timeline; they hadn't known what they were missing. Andy Gallagher belonged with them. Should have been with them all along. Nothing, not even grief, should take that away.

Better to have loved and lost… than never to have loved at all.

Which was really, really annoying because – like friggin' everything these days – it led him back to Cas. That damn stupid L word. One little confession and suddenly it's everywhere.

"Sure," Dean drew the word out mockingly, making a face as he started back towards the Cave, a suitable chunk of scrap wood in hand. "'Just don't think about it,' he says. 'It's that simple,' he says. Bullshit, Sammy, that's what I say."

All he'd done since Sam told him that load of crap was think about it, goddamnit. He'd tried not thinking about it, but that was somehow worse. It turned out, telling Dean Winchester not to think about his angel was the quickest way to make him think - endlessly - about his angel.

Go figure. It was friggin' annoying and unfair.

So. Currently, he was busy not thinking about Cas, which meant he was totally not thinking about her lips on his or her soft skin beneath his hand. The blue of her eyes, so clear, locked on him, in awe of him (in love with him). Each little breath, each stifled exhale and breathy gasp she'd tried to hold in. Next time he'd tell her not to. After all, making noise was a part of the fun.

Next time. Apparently he was now also not thinking about a next time.

'It was just a dream,' Sam had said. 'It doesn't have to mean anything.'

Yeah, well, tell his subconscious that. It was apparently making plans for next time. There wasn't going to be a next time.

Probably.

Dean faltered to a stop at the top of the stairs, then shook his head and started down the steps.

Yeah, probably. It wasn't likely to happen. Cas wasn't even the Cas he knew, the one he was in l… the one he knew.

Besides, it wasn't like he wanted it to happen… did he?

Dean made it another two steps before he once more came to an abrupt stop.

He'd all but told Chest Cas as much, hadn't he? Dean had said he l- He'd told him that he lov- He'd used the L word and, as they'd already cleared up this morning mid-anxiety attack, there were no take-backs with the L word.

Yeah, but telling a sliver of his best friend – the man who had rescued him from Hell, stood by his side for ten years, knew him inside and out – that Dean L-worded him (that he'd always L-worded him) was real different than pursuing a younger version. A still-terrifyingly-innocent angel with less than a year of humanity under her belt. Less than a year of Dean Winchester under her belt.

God, that version of Cas almost hadn't trusted him in his timeline, almost hadn't picked him over Heaven. They'd barely known each other. Why the hell would that angel want anything resembling a relationship with him right now?

"This is ridiculous," Dean growled out as he started down the stairs, stomping his feet and muttering the entire time.

'It's that simple. If you want it to be.'

Ha! That was the biggest piece of bullshit in Sam's mountainous pile of bullshit advice. Had his walking encyclopedia of a brother somehow missed the part where Dean didn't know what the fuck he wanted? That was why he'd needed to talk to Sam in the first place!

He was back at the door to the Dean Cave well before he'd figured a single thing out. In fact, he was pretty sure he was more frustrated (translation: confused) than he had been that morning.

He needed to talk to Sam.

"Goddamnit." Dean hesitated at the threshold, teetering on the edge of going in. He could hear Sam inside fighting the cords and occasionally grumbling about it. The man from the future closed his eyes, took in a deep, steadying breath, and Man'd Up.

('People'd Up,' Charlie corrected him in his head. 'Inclusivity is always sexy, Dean.")

So, he People'd Up and strolled into the Dean Cave like he hadn't just been having an identity crisis. He marched up to a startled Sam, chin up and jaw squared.

"What if I could?"

The kid's raised eyebrows and slightly widened eyes clearly said he wasn't following.

"Have… it," Dean added stiltedly. When Sam remained a little lost, Dean fought off rolling his eyes. For a second, he thought Sam was just playing dumb, making him say it, but the sasquatch of a man did look genuinely confused. Annoyed he had to spell it out, Dean managed to grind out, "With Cas."

Sam's face took on the most cartoonishly perfect 'Oh' expression and Dean's own smoothed out in a deadpan of death. The younger Winchester quickly schooled his features before Dean could retreat any further into his angry turtle shell.

"A family?" he asked, though there was an edge of caution – of guessing – to his tone.

"No," Dean snapped back, only to realize it was a pretty harsh reaction to a relatively innocuous question. Sammy was just trying to help. So Dean cleared his throat, tried to remember he wanted that help, he'd asked for that help, and reiterated, "No. Not as long as I'm hunting."

Which pretty much meant not as long as he was breathing.

Sam nodded, realizing the misstep, and held out his arms in truce. "Right, yeah, okay. So… what you want with Cas is… a relationship?"

The look Dean sent his way suggested he was gonna start throwing punches if he had to spell it out. But Sam was being cautious for a reason; this conversation wasn't going to last long if they started with misunderstandings. And Dean was pretty damn good at creating those right off the bat.

Given Sam looked and sounded like he was genuinely figuring things out rather than poking the bear, Dean relented and grumbled, "Yes, okay?"

"Okay," his brother answered immediately and easily, a half-smile on his face and support all but oozing from every inch of him.

Dean wanted to make a face, but recognized that might be viewed as childish, so he managed to keep his expression mostly blank. Mostly. Sam, on the other hand, wondered why Dean looked… well, constipated.

"So… are we talking hypothetical here?" Sam started, trying to keep his tone light and helpful. That's all he wanted to do, here. He wanted to help Dean through whatever this was (a romantic identity crisis, for certain. Probably a bit of a midlife crisis, given how long he'd felt this way without acknowledging it, and most likely a sexual identity crisis somewhere down the line), then get him to the other side of it all with as few limbs lost as possible. Of both his and Dean's. "If there were no obstacles, whatsoever, and you and Cas were mutually interested in a romantic relationship."

Sam watched Dean squirm at just the words, a vein in his jaw jumping, his foot bouncing against the floor in a classic case of the jitters, and a quick crack of the neck, probably because his shoulders were creeping up towards his ears and Dean was trying to dispel the tension.

"Yeah. Let's, uh, let's go with that." The older Winchester wasn't quite meeting his eye, though he was trying every couple of seconds. "What… then?"

"Then… you get to have a pretty normal relationship." At Dean's immediate look, Sam bobbed his head side to side, "Okay, not normal, but… it's just dating, Dean. You spend time with her, enjoy each others' company, discover stuff you like to do together. Maybe you can teach Cas to cook."

The older Winchester looked utterly unimpressed. "And all while saving the world?"

“We were talking hypothetical,” Sam countered, but ultimately shrugged, tucking his hands into his pockets. “But… yeah, Dean. You can have a relationship and save the world. I know multitasking isn’t your strong suit-”

“Ah shaddup.”

Dean turned away from his grinning kid brother and thought about it. What it would be like, to… date Cas, smack dab in the middle of a possibly (probably) impending apocalypse. Their whole lives had been nothing but one impending crisis after another, so really, he was just picturing trying to date Cas during life. Movie nights and hunts, getting the angel caught up on pop culture, properly this time. Teaching him- her- them what being human was all about.

What if he could have that?

“You…” he cleared his throat, fiddling with the block of wood he was still holding. “You think that could actually work?”

“I do,” Sam answered, earnest and kind and caring as always. “If it isn’t… I’m not sure what we’re saving the world for.”

Dean huffed, finally turning back to the younger Winchester with another look. Sam chuckled in return, a soft smile stretched across his face, but it didn’t quite reach his eyes. They stayed somber.

“I’m serious,” he ended up saying with another small shrug. “We both know that if the apocalypse does happen, there is every chance we don’t see the other side.”

Well. Shit. Now Dean was feeling pretty damn somber too. He looked away with a rough swallow.

“If we don’t live, now, like every day could be our last…” When Sam trailed off, Dean glanced over furtively, but his brother wasn’t looking his way. His eyes were on Andy’s poster. Dean swallowed roughly, his heart squeezing violently. Sam turned back with a small shrug, that soft smile still in place. “What are we even doing?”

Green eyes stayed locked on Sam this time. Damnit, the kid had a point. Dean curled his hands into fists, then let them go again.

“Yeah,” he muttered. “Can’t really argue with that.”

The silence that stretched between them was almost peaceful. Dean’s eyes were drawn to Andy's poster several times, leg resuming its former jiggle as his brain just kept going in circles.

"So…?"

Dean rolled his eyes as Sam ended that perfect and preferred silence and sent a glare his way that bordered on bitchy.

"So…" Dean faltered, the biting sarcasm disappearing just as abruptly. The man from the future sighed, letting his head fall back as he realized that yup, he was really about to do this. "Yeah. Okay. So, uh… how would it even work?"

Sam gave the question some thought. "Well, for starters, do you think Cas will be interested?"

In the time it took the older Winchester to blink, he turned bright red and quickly – too quickly – looked away. At a slower, more reasonable pace, Sam blinked as well before a grin started spreading across his face. He had to fight it back, pursing his lips and biting down to keep that amusement tucked away.

"Chest Cas thinks she would," Dean muttered, unaware of Sam's amusement, which quickly turned into shock.

"Sorry," Sam started, breath coming in repeated huffs as he tried to wrap his head around what his brother had just confessed. "Chest Cas?"

Dean looked like he'd be perfectly fine with the ground opening up and swallowing him whole. "I… might have told him… uh… everything."

It still took several more seconds for his brain to fully process that before Sam leaned back, straightened up and opened his mouth, only for nothing to come out. Huh. Well, suddenly the cooking storm that morning made a whole lot more sense.

"So, you, uh… in a dream, you told the sliver of Cas…"

"That I l- That I- uh… everything, yeah. I told him everything," Dean struggled to get out, arms crossed over his chest, hunched in on himself like a scolded child. His heel was tapping out quite the rhythm against the ground, knee jiggling with pure anxiety.

Sam pitied him, then, though he'd never tell his brother as much. To be so stressed just from realizing you were in love. It was a damn tragedy, and Sam had to bite back his own anger, knowing their father was the root cause.

But that wasn't what this conversation was about. Wasn't what it was for. Or who it was for. So Sam took a calming breath and kept on going.

"Well, if Cas thinks it would work, then…" Sam gave a little shrug, at a loss for any better way to phrase it than, "you ask her out, I guess."

There was a brief flash of pure relief across Dean's face – that Sam hadn't pushed, hadn't poked or prodded or tried to get mushy on him – before he was immediately balking, pulling his head back. Green eyes locked on him with incredulity, stress momentarily forgotten.

"She's an angel, Sammy."

The younger Winchester pursed his lips again, unsure what exactly that meant. "Okay, how do you ask out an angel, then?"

The look got worse. "You don't."

Sam threw his hands out, expression conveying his exasperation, affectionate as it was. "Kind of a nonstarter, Dean. If you want to ask her out but there isn't an angel-specific way to do that, then ask her out like she's human. You keep talking about showing her what humanity is all about."

The man from the future was already opening his mouth to explain, 'No, Sammy, you don't ask out angels, period,' when his brother's words actually registered and just clicked in his head. He perked up, brain latching onto the idea; he knew how to date humans. He was actually good at that. Maybe not the whole relationship part – he was pretty sure he was mostly terrible at that – but the wooing. He was a damn Don Juan when it came to landing that date or, in his case, a night of fun.

But one-night stands weren't the only thing he excelled at. He just didn't have the life that allowed for much more. Dean knew how to get the girl, though, and – the few times he'd kept at it – it turned out he was pretty damn romantic.

Still terrible at relationships, because he was also a depressed alcoholic and the last time he'd given it a shot, Sammy had been stuck in Hell with no way for Dean to get him out, but… He'd still made the magic work, even then. Turned on the charm like nobody's business. We're talking a rose petal trail leading right to the candlelit bubble bath. Oh yeah, Dean could romance the heck out of a woman when he wanted to.

"Yeah," he said with a grin, giving Sammy a confident nod. He felt like his feet were back on solid ground for the first time since he'd woken up from that djinn dream. "Yeah, I can do that."

He tried not to panic too badly when his brain supplied the next hurdle: 'Yeah, but can you romance a man?'

The thought of it alone had Dean freezing up, a cold shiver running down his spine. Fear plowed into him like a bag of bricks to the stomach and it took a few seconds to fight through it. To quiet the voice of John Winchester's disappointment ringing between his ears.

Castiel may be in a female vessel now, but she would be the first to remind Dean that what he saw was not truly Cas. And while that angel would also insist she was neither gender, Dean thought of Cas as a guy. He had history with that dude. Almost a decade of slowly and obviously falling for someone he considered a man. Dean knew he couldn't just ignore that part and consider himself lucky the angel was in a female vessel. If he was going to do this, he couldn't halfass it.

The thought was terrifying.

"Great," Sam interrupted, snapping Dean back to the present. The younger Winchester offered an exasperated smile. "Problem solved."

"Y-yeah," Dean managed to get out, clearing his throat. "Yeah, you're a miracle worker."

He offered his brother a half-hearted glare before he leaned over and jammed his shim under the wobbly corner of the TV stand. When he stood back up, pushing on the top, it held steady.

At least he was still capable of fixing the physical shit in his life without help.

Speaking of.

He turned to Sam with a grin one could only identify as smarmy. "Now help me get the couch."

The younger Winchester instantly groaned, bemoaning aloud how he should have left for Pamela's last night when he had the chance.

End Chapter

Chapter End Notes

A/Ns: Okay, with that one out of the way, hopefully the next chapter doesn't take another month to edit. I do have to warn y'all that I'm getting low on chapters, though, so another posting delay is currently imminent unless I kick it into gear real soon. The start of Season 3 is draaaaaggggggggging, man. I'm so close to the good stuff, when my writing should speed up, but at the moment I'm glacial 🥶💨

But hang tight while I get through it, because I will get through it! In the meantime, thanks for everyone's patience!

Up Next: Dean takes a biiiiiiig step and figures some stuff out about himself that he probably always knew but was never able to embrace.

Cheers,
Silence

Chapter 152: Season 3: Chapter 11

Chapter Notes

Author's Notes: Okay, so, I've been writing this story for, like, nine years now? And I've been at my current job for five of those. You'd think, somewhere in those last very consistent five years, I'd have managed to put into words that I am a busy MF in the Fall and y'all should expect delays. Somehow, this has not made it into a single author's note yet

Anyhoo. Hey guys? I'm a busy mother fucker in the Fall. Every year I tell myself "I won't do that again." "I won't book every single weekend once a show wraps." And every Fall, I do just that. Starting today I will not be home for a single weekend for five straight weeks. I'm writing this in an airport right now
BUT! My partner has officially moved in, my friends moving to London have wrapped all the packing, Disneyland trips, and matching tattoo appointments we made, and crunch is finally over for Zootopia 2 (did I mention the last two weeks have been crazy!?!), so I should have plenty of availability to write once more during the week Which is good, because my stockpile has just one chapter left after this one

Chapter References: Due to my inconsistency with posting, I highly recommend re-reading at least the previous chapter. Preferably re-reading from, like, chapter 6 onward would be best. But that's a lot of reading to catch up on so, if you're unable, here is a bullet point summary (this is legit how it's listed in my blueprint file atm. I've actually been so inconsistent with writing I had to go re-read from Chapter 6)

- Chapter 6 - Drive home from the Djinn encounter / Talk with Sam 0.5
- Chapter 7 - Chest Cas Dream / Confession
- Chapter 8 - Freak Out Breakfast Storm / Garage Sale
- Chapter 9 - Garage Sale continued / Talk with Sam 1.0
- Chapter 10 - Dean Cave Setup / Talk with Sam 2.0

And now…

- Chapter 11 - Dinner / Talk with Sam 3.0

Translation Notes: I'm not sure if "aka" is well known outside of the US. In case it isn't, it's an acronym for "also known as"

Enjoy!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 3: Chapter 11

After several hours of hard work – carrying furniture down stairs that had no business being that narrow – Dean decided a well-deserved dinner was in order. He whipped up a couple of steaks he found in the fridge (courtesy of Bobby, no doubt, since he'd been off fucking with a Djinn for the last several days) . The bunker didn't come with a grill, but the man from the future had gotten fairly good at cooking 'em in a pan and oven. It helped that he'd learned in a timeline where the whole of the internet was in your pocket and Food Blogs were a Thing©.

As Dean got some sides going – despite being served a Michelin Star worthy steak, Samantha would complain if there weren't vegetables – he let his mind focus on the task at hand, all other thoughts (aka: impending panic) drifting away. Cooking would keep his mind off that question he hadn't actually answered. That question he didn't know if he could answer.

So having dinner to make was a godsend. Sam came in, freshly showered, just as Dean was plating up. Bobby followed a moment later, Sarge at his side. The old hunter grabbed his plate (throwing the unseasoned steak for Sarge right on top, because apparently Dean wasn't just a sucker, he was a predictable sucker) and headed back towards the door, grumbling about a case he was helping with and eating in the library to speed things up.

Which was all well and good – Dean liked seeing Bobby at home in the bunker – until he sat down across from Sam and silence reigned between them. It was probably a perfectly normal, not-awkward-at-all silence. For Sammy.

For Dean, there was no more distraction to be had and the thoughts (aka: panic) were real quick to come back. Sam was reading something on his phone, device in one hand, fork in the other. Dean tried to focus on his meal, in what was totally a comfortable silence (totally). The food was great – Sam had moaned his enjoyment after just one bite – but it was doing little to distract from the silence. It was just so loud and awkward and oppressive.

Or maybe it was the voices in his head: one cruel and critical, the other defensive and angry.

Dean lasted another two minutes, leg getting increasingly jigglier, until he just couldn't ignore them and their panic any longer. "Would that make me… gay?"

Sam looked up with wide eyes, either surprised by the start of a conversation or the topic. There was a piece of steak on his fork, halfway to his mouth.

"Telling Cas I lo- uh… want to ask him out? Her, I mean." Dean elaborated. Well, tried to.

Sam rested his fork back on the plate, realizing this was going to be longer than a yes-or-no conversation. "Not necessarily."

Dean could only stare (rather intensely), hanging on his younger brother's words with a palpable tension running through him. Sam tried not to let that unnerve him. This wasn't exactly easy stuff they were launching into. Especially for Dean.

"Are you physically attracted to her?" Sam asked, then immediately shook his head, holding up a hand to stop Dean from answering. "Nevermind, your IQ drops ten points anytime she enters the room."

"Bite me." Dean immediately growled but there wasn't much heat to it. He knew Sam had a game-winning argument right there, no point denying it. "We get it, move on."

"Well, I mean… Cas is in a female body right now," Sam began cautiously, uncertain what part Dean was getting hung up on but knowing that if he stepped wrongly, his brother might brush the whole thing off.

"Yeah, but she won't-"

Dean stopped himself from saying she wouldn't always be. He didn't actually know that. Angela seemed like a pretty perfect vessel - for Cas, for the Novak family, for Dean's current identity crisis – but the man from the future couldn't shake the fact that to him, Cas was male. He knew the angel wasn't actually male (he could already see Sam rolling his eyes and Cas gearing up for another lecture on gender neutrality and the limits of human understanding), but Dean already knew his own truth; he would always think of Cas as a dude. Even if the angel stayed in Angela's body, Dean would still see Cas as a guy just kinda… borrowing a chick's body for the moment. His angel currently occupying Ms. Friggin' Hawaii was not an acceptable excuse for Dean to chicken out about this.

All the way, or not at all, he reminded himself.

Clearing his throat, Dean finished his thought with, "Cas isn't a woman."

Sam thought about it for a moment then shrugged both mouth and shoulders. "By that logic, she's not a man, either."

Dean glared at the sasquatch, who was fighting him on this harder than he'd fought himself.

His snot-nosed brother finally gave up the runaround and instead said, "Either way, if you see Castiel as male, then you'd be bi at most." When Dean scrunched up his face, Sam mistook dislike for confusion. "Bisexual. Meaning you like-"

"I know what bi means, Sam," he cut in a little sharper than strictly necessary.

It was Sam's turn to glare. It was a light one – more reprimand than actual anger – and served as an efficient reminder that Dean had started this conversation, Sam was just trying to help.

"You like women, don't you? Sexually, I mean. You're attracted to them?"

The older Winchester eyed his brother. "Do you know me?"

"I do, regrettably. If you also liked Cas in a male body-" Sam paused, thought train jumping the tracks as he realized they might have to go deeper into this subject than he'd initially assumed. Dean probably didn't know the difference between being attracted to someone physically versus romantically. Which could very well be where the hangup was. Sam changed directions and asked, "Do you find men attractive?"

Dean very physically hemmed and hawed, mouth kind of wibbling as he thought it over. Or stalled.

"Sexually?" Sam clarified, and Dean turned bright red. It was oddly adorable, like he was talking to a kid about his first physical crush. Sam fought off the chuckle at the thought of being the one to walk his big brother through a sexual discovery. Any discovery, actually. His whole life, it had usually been the other way around. "If it helps, you have to know I don't care, right? Bi, straight, gay, you're still my jerk of a big brother."

"Bitch," Dean answered without missing a beat but it sounded a lot more like, 'Thanks' to Sam. The older Winchester gathered himself, trying to get his thoughts in order, and reminded himself that this was something he could tell Sam. Sam felt… safe? Dean wasn't sure how to describe it, but Sam was safe.

"I… find men, um, attractive, I guess."

Safe, apparently, did not mean easy.

Dean spread his hands on the table, grounding himself on either side of his still full plate. "Like Dr. Sexy, you know? He's… good lookin'. I mean, I've never thought of having sex with him– Well, I guess there was that one time-"

Sam immediately shook his head, cutting him off with a waved hand. "I don't need to know the details."

"Oh thank god," was Dean's immediate, breathless response as he sagged onto the table. Sam resisted laughing at his brother's obvious relief.

"Let me ask you a question," Sam said instead, steering their conversation away from the more awkward edges of the topic. "Can you picture yourself with Cas, physically? Male Cas, I mean."

There was a flash of panic in Dean's eyes before he glanced away, gaze flitting side-to-side, thoughts racing. It was a mental marathon, conducted at breakneck speed, from most embarrassingly mundane to some pretty vivid imagery (that came out of nowhere and made his jeans unexpectedly tight.)

(He was still blaming Andy for that. Andy was the OG reason he could even picture that. Now the kid was sending him friggin' gay porn from heaven.)

All of which was to say: yeah, he could picture himself with Cas physically. He could perfectly picture himself turning tomato red, swallowing – and therefore choking on – his own tongue, and uselessly stuttering, stumbling, and flailing his way right into a hole in the ground which would – thank fuck – swallow him whole and put him out of his misery.

So… nothing he would be discussing with his kid brother, thank you very much.

From Sam's position across the table, it was clear Dean was struggling (though not as badly as the younger Winchester might have guessed.) He tried again, offering the man from the future another out without letting him out of the conversation itself.

"Can you picture yourself with him romantically?"

Dean blinked, baulked, then thought about it, and settled for staring with that strange intensity once more, nearly vibrating with it. Almost defensively, he asked, "What's the difference?"

Sam huffed, shaking his head with fond amusement. He was completely unsurprised to hear that Dean didn't differentiate between the two. "Do you think two people can be in love without having sex?"

Pulling his head back, Dean went back to baulking. "Yeah, of course. Old married couples do exist, you know."

The younger Winchester almost laughed at that, but refrained. The elderly couple above them in their Stanford apartment would have had something to say about Dean's belief on that one, but he didn't want to traumatize his brother. Their conversation would do that enough on its own.

"Could you and Cas?"

Dean stiffened, caught off guard by even the thought of it. That… had not exactly occurred to him. His first impulse was no way, no way he could be celibate. On the other hand… he could picture him and Cas old, sitting in rockers outside the bunker door (since they didn't have a porch), growing new wrinkles or whatever it was old people did together.

Cas wouldn't actually age and Dean probably wouldn't make it past fifty, but he could picture it. Like a fantasy, he supposed.

Hell, even if they didn't make it more than five years – if they didn't make it through the apocalypse this time around – Dean could see him and Cas together for however much time they got. Movie nights, hunts, introducing him to new foods (burgers was top of the list), maybe even teach the angel a little about cooking like Sammy had said.

He'd just spent days in a dream that were pretty much just that, hadn't he? So picturing it was damn easy, especially the more comfortable he got with the idea. In fact, the more thought he gave it, the more Dean had to admit that his wild nights – heck, even his tame nights – of sex with a hot and willing stranger were pretty much behind him. He'd spent the better part of the last decade not getting much in the way of one-night stands. There'd been a few here and there, but his heart just hadn't been in it like before. Not after Lisa.

But could he go forever without sex? That… it just didn't sound like him. Didn't feel like him, either. These last couple years he'd just been… waiting for someone who felt right. So probably not a stranger, which was why he'd all but given up on one night stands.

But it was gonna happen; he'd find the right one eventually. He'd always operated on that notion. He couldn't just not have sex for the rest of his life. He'd wither up and die. Wouldn't he?

Sam was once again watching Dean struggle, so he opted to steer his brother in an easier direction. "You may be interested in Cas romantically, more than sexually. That's not to say a sexual relationship couldn't develop-"

Dean looked so uncomfortable in that moment, talking with his brother about his potential sex life with an angel, that Sam barely contained himself. It was comical, in his opinion, given how often he had to listen to his brother's open honesty – too open and way too honest – about previous sexual escapades. Or, well, used to, at least. Sam hadn't failed to notice that this Dean seemed entirely indifferent to picking up women when they hit up a bar. He had to remind himself, sometimes, that this Dean was approaching forty.

And had spent the last ten years falling in love with his best friend. It was funny how everyone else seemed so much less enticing when the one you actually wanted was next to you.

"But back to your question about being gay," Sam redirected, much to his brother's relief. At least until he realized the new topic and tensed right back up. “Even if you were sexually attracted to Cas, or other men, it would still make you bisexual at most.”

The expression on Dean’s face could only be described as brooding. Like someone trying to come to terms with a conclusion and finding it wholly unsatisfying. As though he felt identifying as bisexual was somewhat more acceptable than being gay, but somehow it didn’t matter much. Probably because Dean had already decided long ago that whatever he was, it wasn’t acceptable.

Sam abruptly switched tactics. “Would you care if I was gay?”

Dean blinked at the sudden question, eyes wide. Without thinking, blurted out, “Are you?”

“Tell me if you’d be okay with it first.”

The older Winchester looked away, dropping his eyes as he considered the question, only to realize he didn’t need to. The answer was instinctual; he could never shun Sam for anything (except, maybe, drinking demon blood, lying to him about it, and picking a demon skank over his own brother. But outside of one very specific scenario, Dean could forgive Sam for just about anything.)

Meeting his brother’s eyes, Dean firmly (but nonchalantly; gotta keep up appearances) answered, “Of course. You can do the nasty with anyone you want. Well, almost anyone,” he corrected with a reminding glare. “Just do it behind closed doors.”

“So, it would be okay if I told you I wanted to pursue something with….”

Sam casted around for a man they both knew. He straightened up with internalized, evil-little-brother-glee when he realized he had the perfect one.

“Asa Fox?”

Dean violently choked and, while it was obvious just from his sputtering that he was not okay with Sam crushing on the source of his own fanboy admiration, he got through it and managed a very rough nod. He raised his finger and pointed it very seriously in Sam’s direction. “I think he’s way too old for you, so I don’t approve. But yes, it would be, uh… okay. Ish. Does it really have to Asa Fox, man?”

Sam couldn't hold back the laugh this time, sitting across from his poor brother as he struggled through a second, unintentional crisis on top of his first. Dean grumbled, knowing Sam had picked Asa specifically.

Asa Fox isn't even Sam's type, he scoffed internally.

Which, huh, meant he could picture a type – of the male variety – for his brother. Imagine that. Which, of course, was what his brain was now doing. What kind of guy would Sam go for, if he was gay? The beanstalk liked women who could hold their own, who were strong but not in a physical way. All the women Dean had ever seen with his brother were badasses, but physically appeared… soft. Sweet.

Jess, Maddison, Sarah… Hell, even Ruby had been pretty damn doe-eyed and round-faced for a girl with that much assholery underneath. It had all been an act, but Sam had fallen for it hook, line, and sinker.

What was the (not evil skank) guy version of that?

Gabriel immediately popped to mind. He was a badass wrapped in a tiny teddy bear. Short, kinda soft looking. Terrifying, evil, definitely a little inner skank with all that mischief and assholery.

Naturally, the thought progressed to picturing the two of them on a date (and more, thank you very fucking much, Andy God Damn Gallagher), which was the exact moment Dean realized what he was doing and violently shoved that mental image into his brain's garbage disposal. Then took what was left and set it on fire.

God no. Just no. That was a friggin' terrifying, terrible idea. Dean waved his hand as if he could physically chase the thought away, never, ever to return.

"So why isn't it okay if you're gay?"

The man from the future startled at the abrupt return to reality. His brother's question was like a backhand to the face. Sam, worked up in his own right, had seemingly missed Dean's entire mental escapade. The older Winchester was pretty sure he had whiplash. There was a worrying buzz in his ears, only getting louder the more he searched, panicky, for a response. A good one, that wouldn't lead Samantha down the path of a righteous lecture on homophobia.

"Uh… I, uh, I didn't say that."

“Oh,” Sam replied in such a pleasant tone that Dean immediately identified it as fake, fake, fake. His shoulders started to inch towards his ears, head lowering to meet them on their way up, collapsing into himself like a turtle. “So you’d be okay with someone assuming you’re gay?”

Tense – and fighting against the same ice in his veins he’d felt earlier – Dean tried several times to successfully draw air into his lungs. That creeping fear was back, which he didn’t understand because he wasn’t afraid. He wasn’t. He just couldn’t bring himself to answer his brother, to tell Sammy yeah, of course it’d be okay for someone to assume that.

There was nothing wrong with being gay. He knew that.

“I don’t see how it’s okay for me to be gay,” Sam reasoned slowly and Dean felt the tension tightening around him like a noose, “but you’re not allowed.”

He wasn’t sure what actually caused him to snap, but Dean was suddenly angry and on the defensive. His body language reflected it, not that the older Winchester was aware. He tossed his arms out wide, chest puffing up like an alpha male gorilla. “Why do you keep saying that? I’m allowed to do stuff, Sammy. I’m a grown ass man, I don’t need you telling me what I can and can’t do.”

“But you do, Dean,” Sam insisted, anger growing as well, though his wasn’t directed at Dean. “Because Dad told you what you could and couldn’t do your whole life. Take care of Sammy. Do as you're told, be the good soldier. Act like a man. Only, ‘real men do this, they don’t do that.” Sam locked eyes with his brother, who couldn’t look away. He was a deer in the headlights of Sam’s angry, sympathetic gaze. “It’s so ingrained in you, but it’s not who you are, Dean.”

As the rising tension abruptly ended in a moment, Dean scoffed out of habit alone. His skin crawled with emotions he didn’t want to examine, and those good ole defense mechanisms were kicking in. But Sam was having none of it. He raised a finger, pointing it first at the older Winchester and then ticking off the others one by one.

“You hum songs to yourself when you’re nervous. You would love musicals if you’d let yourself watch them. I know because the few that you’ve seen get stuck in your head for weeks, and you pretend not to like it, but you don’t try at all to stop singing them. You flirt with everyone, not just women, and you like to. You think cowboys are hot as hell. Case in point, you have a crush on a TV doctor because he wears cowboy boots."

Sam drew back, the amusement that accompanied his list slowly disappearing, replaced by a furled, unhappy brow. "But Dad told you 'real' men don't do any of those things. So even though they're a part of who you are – the parts I think you like most – you don't let yourself believe any of it's real."

Once again, Dean tried to scoff but it came out weak and unconvincing. More of a 'bah humbug' in the face of truths he couldn't deny. Panic was setting in, but there was a numbness to it this time. Like it was old hat. And his chest. His sternum was heating up like a friggin' seat warmer. Dean wondered if he was having a heart attack or something.

Sam turned puppy eyes back onto him, the pity in his face both infuriating and somehow incredibly comforting.

If he wasn't having a heart attack, he was just plain losing it.

"You made yourself coffee this morning the way you actually like it. With ridiculous amounts of sugar and milk. But Dad drank it black, so you drink it black," Sam sagged on top of his stool, losing steam in a way that Dean felt responsible for. "Do you even like black coffee, Dean?"

The older Winchester could only shrug, unable to form words with a brain that was currently melting and didn't seem capable of lying or brushing things off anymore. Not no. But not yes, either? Dean thought back to that morning. He'd wanted it, wanted that hit of cream and sweetness, so he'd let himself have it during one of his rare highs, realizing he'd confessed to Cas, so he could have whatever the fuck he wanted.

Well, shit. That was Sam's whole point, wasn't it?

"When I say you're allowed to do something, I'm not giving you permission, Dean." Sam spread his arms wide, a gesture that begged his brother to hear him. "I'm reminding you that you don't need anyone's permission to just be you."

Dean struggled under the weight of the moment – and it was most definitely a moment. Not one between him and Sam, as per the usual (though yes, he was pretty sure that was also happening), but the panic-inducing, organ-crushing, soul-gripping kind of moment that came with self realization.

Ugh, he'd never been very good with those.

"So…" Dean started slowly, licking his lips nervously as his brain screamed run and the rest of him – but mostly his chest, which was on frigign' fire – told him to man up. People up (and oh, boy, if only Charlie was hearing this conversation. She'd have words for him. Supportive words, of course, but also the verbal equivalent to a smack on the head). "What I'm hearing is… it's okay if I'm gay."

Across the table, Sam's head fell back and he closed his eyes. All that effort, all that pent up anger at their father and how he'd raised them… it all drained away. He was left with the same old obnoxious brother, busy poking the bear that was Sam Winchester trying to care (and, maybe, trying to raise the emotional maturity of his family – even just the tiniest bit – while he was at it). With a sigh that was way too amused given his own childhood trauma, Sam opened his eyes and shook his head.

"Yup, same old Dean."

The man from the future stuttered for a minute, realizing there was more to that statement than just the usual. His cheeks heated up and Dean ducked his head, more than just a little uncertain about that assessment but also feeling… supported? So incredibly supported it was giving him hives, and he wasn't sure if he even minded.

(For real, he was losing it. Heart attack, brain aneurysm, alternate universe. Something.)

"Yes," Sam continued, answering Dean's original poking, "that's the takeaway."

"But I'm probably not," the older Winchester corrected immediately. Sam faltered, for a second thinking they'd just lost all the progress he thought they'd been making. But there was a wobbly little grin on Dean's face (like he was trying it on for size and hadn't quite found it yet). "Because I'm… bi?"

Sam wasn't sure whether to glare – he knew when his brother was trolling him, and Dean wasn't not doing that – or open his arms and offer a hug, because he was pretty sure his emotionally constipated big brother had just come out to him. He'd probably just come out for the first time to anyone. So Sam settled for an amused smile, the type that said, 'I know what you're doing, but I still won.'

“You’re whatever you want to be, Dean.”

With a slow nod – since Sam wasn’t giving him an inch in this conversation, no matter how Dean tried to dial it down with a little harmless baiting – the older hunter leaned back in his chair. He kicked his feet up, face still hemming and hawing through it all, and folded his hands over his stomach. As he looked Sam’s way, a real smile started to overtake his face.

“I think… I’m okay with bi.” At Sam’s returning grin – way too happy way too quickly – Dean immediately leveled a warning finger his way. He was so not ready for his snot-nosed little brother to start designing wedding invitations or doodling hearts around his and Cas’ names. “Maybe.”

The younger Winchester chuckled, raising his hands in a placating gesture of ‘take all the time you need.’ Dean’s glare rolled right off him like oil on water.

As they settled into a much more comfortable silence – Dean belatedly realizing he’d just come out to his brother and not entirely sure how to feel about that (but knowing it didn’t feel… terrible) – the older Winchester finally dug into his meal. It was on the wrong side of lukewarm, but he ate it anyway because he was a damn good cook and it still tasted delicious. Sam eyed him, warm and amused, for a few moments before he dug back into his own meal.

He waited until Dean ate a piece of steak off his fork before he asked, casually, “So what did Chest Cas say when you told him you loved him?”

The man from the future sucked that piece of meat right into the back of his gullet and proceeded to choke, hacking it back up. The amusement in his brother’s eyes when he finally stopped dying indicated that the timing was very much intentional.

“Fuck you,” Dean growled, though it came out thick and wet and definitely took him two tries to fully manage. “I didn’t tell him- He wasn’t- Nothing. It was fine. It wasn’t even-”

A big deal.

Cas had made sure of it. He’d known what to do. Dean, on the other hand…

His breathing was picking up again. Jesus, how many panic attacks were necessary for one little discovery about himself, huh?

Across from him, either seeing his genuine distress or taking pity after trolling him right back (far more successfully, Sam would say) the younger Winchester stood from the table. He grabbed two beers out of the fridge, plunking one down in front of Dean on his way back to his seat. The older hunter grabbed onto it like a lifeline.

After he'd chugged a good half of it, relishing the cold taste of liquid courage (like relief on a hot summer day), Dean set the bottle back down and stared at his brother, panic returning like liquid lead in his stomach.

"Why is this so fucking hard?" he blurted out, genuinely frustrated by his own distress.

Without so much as pausing to think about it, Sam replied, "Because you're being vulnerable."

Dean immediately scoffed as Samantha took them right back into chick flick territory. He was not vulnerable, or any other weepy, soft bullshit.

Sam, on the other hand, rolled his eyes, annoyed to have instantly lost what felt like progress. "Stop thinking of vulnerability like it's a blushing virgin bride, dude. You're vulnerable right now because what you are sharing is important to you. So important that you don't know what you'll do if I reject it. Or reject you for it."

Let alone if Dean rejected it (or himself) on Sam's behalf, which was always a real possibility when it came to his martyring brother. Sam leaned back, hands spread on the table in an effort not to lean across it and physically shake the lesson into the man.

"This means a lot to you, Dean," Sam told him – said it for him when he knew the older hunter wouldn't be able to say it for himself. "But so do I. If I didn't approve, you would have to choose between me and Cas. And you don't know how to do that. Or, maybe you do, but you know it would make you miserable."

Because Dean would choose the younger Winchester over Cas. Sam was sure of it. He didn't support it, didn't think it was the right choice, but it was the one Dean would absolutely make if the ultimatum ever came. Because John Winchester had trained a guard dog instead of raise a son.

Dean didn't speak – didn't so much as breathe – as he stared across the table at Sam. He was locked so intensely on the younger Winchester that he was back to nearly vibrating on the spot.

He hadn't thought about it like that. Hadn't put it into words, that if his family didn't approve, Dean would be stuck with a choice he couldn't possibly make. And now? Now he was locked on the thought – on the possibility – like it was reality. He'd just tumbled right past the cliff named 'difficult conversation' and was free falling, ass over teakettle, into an abyss named "panic" with no end in sight.

Realizing what was happening, Sam offered an encouraging, half-cocked smile. "It's okay to be terrified by that."

The words were barely out of his mouth before Dean was collapsing in a rush of air, "Oh god, I am so fucking terrified by that."

Sam huffed something of a laugh, nodding once in comradery. "And that's why this is hard. But I don't. Disapprove, that is. You don't have to worry about that with me. Or Bobby, if I had to guess."

Having just started to relax as his brother's words settled in his stomach, hauling him back onto that cliff's ledge, Dean tensed right back up, so quickly he cramped. Sam, realizing it, immediately held up his hands.

"Not that you have to tell Bobby," Sam spoke in a rush of reassurance that Dean tried to take to heart. "Or anyone else. I just don't think he'd be a problem."

Right. Dean was still figuring this all out; he didn't have to tell anyone else if he didn't want to.

But… he had been okay telling Sam. He'd dreaded it. God, had he dreaded it, but the earth hadn't opened up and swallowed him whole. Dean didn't think he would be strutting about in public holding a guy's hand or hoisting the rainbow flag anytime soon, but maybe he could acknowledge it with Sam, at least. It was a good first step. Even if the thought of future steps left Dean breaking out in a cold sweat.

Because he would have to take them, if he really wanted this.

Shit, Sam was right. This was important to him. His hands trembled where he'd hidden them under the table, pressed flat and hard against his thighs. The realization of just how important – how fucking world-ending Sam's rejection would have been – had left him shaken.

Now that he wanted it, Dean wasn't sure he could stop wanting it. But he would have had to, if Sam hadn't approved.

Like dad wouldn't have approved.

It suddenly became clear – in a way that Sam had tried to make him see earlier – just how much of what he was struggling with stemmed from John Winchester. He could never have had this conversation with his father. He could never have admitted to his dad that he was in love with an angel, regardless of gender. John would never have been okay with Cas being anything but human.

Dean couldn't imagine approaching John about anyone, actually, human or not. He'd never told dad about Cassie; the only relationship he'd been in that was serious enough to warrant telling his father. But Dean had never planned to. At the time, he'd told himself they were only a couple months in; it was too early to think about stuff like that. But he had thought, long and hard, about telling Cassie the Family Secret. He had told her, and never once had he thought, 'Once she knows, I can introduce her to Dad.'

Not once.

John would have called her a distraction. A liability. He would have said Dean was putting someone else's life at risk. He would have been disappointed. The thought stung and it stung deep. His dad, who had loved their mom enough to go through hell avenging her (and drag both his sons with him), would have thought the same for his son was selfish.

Jesus, John really had done a number on him.

Dean finished his beer with a single, long chug. He slammed it down – harder than he meant, but in no way unjustified – just in time for Sam to set a shot glass in front of him and a bottle of tequila between them (one of the decent ones they kept hidden from Bobby, who didn't have taste enough to care or appreciate it). The man from the future raised a questioning eyebrow at his brother, who'd been particularly uptight with him drinking ever since Dad's death.

Sam smiled – a little affectionate, a little sad, and altogether way too understanding – and raised his own shotglass. "Dude, you just came out. That calls for some libation."

The time traveler laughed, then laughed again when he realized the inevitable panic he was expecting from a comment like that was nowhere to be seen.

Holy shit, he'd just come out and he was okay with it. Mostly.

Dean shook his head, not quite believing it but more than happy to ride the waves of adrenaline and dopamine flooding his brain. There was still a long way to go – the pit in his stomach wasn't done reminding him of that anytime soon – but right now he was going to enjoy the high.

Sammy really didn't care, was even happy for him, and the man from the future felt lighter than he had in years. Dean picked up the bottle of tequila and poured them both a shot, grin wide on his face.

End Chapter

Chapter End Notes

Author's Notes: Whaaaaat? Wholesome and healthy growth!?! I can't even.

Guys. Guys guys guys. We did it. Dean has one foot out of that closet and it only took one million twenty thousand words to get him there

Up Next: Dean thanks Sam without ever thanking Sam (as is his style), Sam nerds out about produce (as is his style), Bobby meets up with an old frenemy (as is his style), and nothing much happens because we've filled up our entire 'happy progress' quota and now life's gotta go back to being tough. Because this is Supernatural. And, for some reason, we all like it that way

Cheers,
Silence

Chapter 153: Season 3: Chapter 12

Chapter Notes

Author's Notes: Oof, this one was a last minute labor of love from my editor, Lyeundu. I did not have time for a thorough edit, and only gave this chapter a one-time read through before throwing it at my poor editors. But y'all have waited long enough and deserve a new chapter!

Can you all believe we're already 12 chapters into Season 3? That whole 'let's be less verbose this season, kay?' thing is going reeeeal well, I see Chapter Warnings: Dean's waking his brother up for the second day in a row cuz they got shit to do, Sam's no less confused but slightly more into today's adventure, and the bunker crew gets an unexpected (and yet actually, totally expected) visitor that's not doing Dean's Djinn PTSD any favors.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 3: Chapter 12

Sunday morning came and Sam was once more asleep at a completely reasonable time for such an activity, when Dean came barging into his room with no warning. True, it was right around the time Sam usually woke up, but generally he did that on his own, without assistance in the form of a trumpeting older brother he kind of wanted to punch.

"What the hell, Dean."

The man in question cackled and announced, "It's Sunday, Sammy! You know what we do on Sundays?"

Confusion filled Sam's entire face, framed by the tangled mop of hair that was longer than it had any right to be. His eyes were still squinty with sleep. "Uh… we go to church?"

“What?” Dean scrunched his nose, head pulled back. “No. Seriously?”

The younger Winchester shrugged, swinging his legs off the mattress with a yawn. “You’re full of surprises lately.”

Dean rolled his eyes. “No, bitch. Sundays are for Farmers’ Markets.”

Sam’s eyebrows climbed higher than they had for yard sales and there was finally a semblance of sentience in those eyes. Confused sentience, but sentience nonetheless.

Again, green eyes went for a roll as Dean crossed his arms over his chest, leaning into the doorframe. “You love them, trust me. Now, get dressed. Chop, chop, we’re already late.”

Sam relented, raising his hands in surrender rather than question an abundance of things currently off with his brother (how could one be late for a Farmers’ Market? Why were they going to one in the first place? And what was Dean doing awake so early for a second morning in a row?) The older Winchester hadn’t been wrong about the yard sales, maybe he was right about another area of domesticity.

So, for the second morning in a row, the Sam climbed out of bed in pajamas and bemusement to follow after his time traveling brother. By then Dean was off, heading down the hall while Sam actually had to get dressed for a farmer’s market of all things. It did sound more his speed than the yard sale, at least.

Chapter Break

Sam walked into the war room, on his way to meet Dean in the garage when the man in question jogged down the steps from the library. Sam gave his older brother a questioning look in the form of a furled brow. He was going the wrong way, so Sam voiced as much.

“Nuh-uh,” Dean shook his head, grabbing the taller man’s arm as he passed, tugging him towards the curved staircase. “We’re walking.”

Sam had made it to the first step, hand on the railing, when he paused, eyes wide and staring up at his brother. “We’re walking? Okay, seriously, who are you and what have you done with my brother?"

Dean scoffed, grumbling that he exercised, damnit, as he stomped up the steps.

"When?"

He could hear the grin in his brat brother's voice. So Dean stomped harder until he could no longer hear that grin as it got bigger.

They left the bunker, heading down the gravel road but before they arrived at the main road that led to the abandoned power plant. Dean cut to the left, down towards the river. They were following a clear walking path that wandered away from the road and through the trees before coming back out alongside the river. It was wide and unpaved, but decently maintained. It would probably serve as a good bike path as well. After what Sam guessed was about a half mile, they rounded a bend in the river and a pedestrian bridge came into view.

As they crossed, a couple with fresh flowers and a paper bag full of produce passed them coming the other way. Sam was surprised by the idyllic little scene they were trekking, like something out of the opening shot of a sitcom. If Dean did this every Sunday morning, Sam had seriously mischaracterized this future brother of his.

It was another five minutes from the bridge, the dirt road becoming paved and depositing them onto a suburban street. Two blocks more and they were in a parking lot filled with pop up tents and stalls. Wandering up to the first stand – local honey – Sam was admittedly more curious than he thought he'd be.

At the first produce stall, Sam picked up a peach, planning to eat it on the walk back. Then he spotted a carton of cherries and thought, it had been a minute since he'd had fresh cherries. By the time he got to the vegetables, he'd had to tuck the cherries under his arm just to carry it all. Dean was off to the side, sniggering. They were still on just the first stand.

After paying the owner of that stand and moving onto the next, Sam had a brown bag tucked in his arm stuffed full with fresh produce, looking like a damn kid close to Christmas. Dean was shaking his head, remembering that same smile on another brother years from now.

"You're usually here two hours earlier than this," he commented with mock-huffiness. "Future you would be complaining about how all the good shit's gone."

Dean watched in real time as Sam went through the realization that there would be better things when the market first opened and that he could go earlier next time. Outwardly, the man from the future judged his brother with deadpan eyes and a slow, predictable shake of his head. But inwardly, Dean's chest was warm and fuzzy and he kind of wanted to rub at it.

"See what happens when you go gallivanting off with Psychic Masters?" the older Winchester teased, moseying on down the row of tents. "You miss the good stuff."

Sam glared, though it was half-hearted at best, as they passed a stall full of handmade soaps. "They do this every Sunday?"

"Every Sunday. Like clockwork." They paused at a table selling more fruit. Sam dug his wallet out once more. "The suburban Utopia, Stepford Wives vibe they've got going on freaked me out at first. Kept waiting for robot heads to start spinning."

Dean gestured at his head exploding and Sam chuckled.

Incredulous (and incredibly doubtful), Sam asked, "So you usually come with me?"

"God no," Dean scoffed immediately, setting the world right again. "You do this every Sunday, I sleep till a reasonable hour of the morning. Like a normal person."

Sam chuckled. Dean side-eyed him, but was grinning himself. He nodded at the line of stalls on either side of them.

"You found it on a morning run," Dean said with a scrunched nose, like his brother was a total alien.

Ignoring his brother's opinion on exercise, Sam thought back to the path they'd walked and realized it would make for a great morning run. Glancing at his brother, who was very purposefully surveying the market around them rather than making eye contact – Sam was pretty sure the man from the future had done that on purpose. A thank you that he could never actually vocalize.

Sam started towards the next booth with a smile.

"After that, you ran your Samsquatch butt over here at ass-crack o'clock every weekend. You'd bring back a bunch of stuff and I'd figure out how to make something edible from it." Dean sniffed, posture rigidly overcompensating for something he was feeling insecure about. "That's how this works."

Sam lit up at the idea and looked down at his purchases so far. It hadn't occurred to him that Dean might make something from the fresh produce, but now that he knew his brother was willing (and since he suspected that insecurity was about Dean's love of a less-than-manly, certainly-not-useful-like-hunting hobby), Sam was eager to get him good ingredients.

Sam tried to judge what Dean might cook from the bag of fruits and a handful of vegetables he'd purchased so far. He wasn't much of a chef, though. "What would you make with this?"

Dean shrugged casually, but Sam could see he'd already been thinking about it. "We could roast the carrots with a honey glaze, for starters. Especially if we went back for some of that local honey. The wildflower one's the best. Maybe make the mushrooms into some kind of sauce or marinade for whatever the main dish is."

"And what's the main dish?"

Dean returned his curious look with an expectant one. "That's your job, not mine."

Momentarily taken aback – before realizing Dean meant he would bring home the ingredients for a whole meal – Sam started looking around at the various stalls until he landed on a butcher's tent, set up in front of a refrigerated truck. He started towards it.

"I make a mean peach cobbler," Dean added as he followed leisurely behind, silently pleased with himself. "We'll need a whole lot more peaches, though."

Sam nodded, now on a mission. Entrê first – something that worked well with mushrooms – then peaches and honey. And maybe whatever else looked good along the way.

Chapter Break

They retraced their route along the river, this time with Sam looking at it from the perspective of a runner. It really would make a great running path, and the psychic was excited about getting some regular exercise into their usually nomadic, chaotic routine.

As they entered the bunker, two large bags of produce and food tucked under Sam's arms, the younger Winchester was genuinely excited. The last two days had been fun. Even though Sam was planning on leaving for another psychic soon, he was looking forward to coming back. He was starting to get why Dean had spoken of the bunker with such longing. How this place could easily turn into their home, not just their homebase.

"I'm definitely going earlier next time. I bet the meat selection is way better first thing. And that one farmer said he sometimes has foraged mushrooms!" he proclaimed loudly as they entered the kitchen, an extra pep in his step.

Dean, following behind, muttered, "Nerd."

"He finally show you the Farmer's Market?" Bobby was at the table, munching on a bowl of cereal, and looked up at their entrance. Sarge was laying at his feet, working away at a bone. He didn't look up at all. "Bout damn time. He's only been talking about it for a month."

"It was one time!" the man from the future squawked in defense as Sam set the bags down on the kitchen counter and Dean started unloading them. "I mentioned it one time."

Sam met Bobby's gaze, which very clearly said it had been more than just one time.

"Traitor," Dean muttered with a glare, which Bobby returned with a sassy look only he could pull off. His phone pinged on the table and the older hunter picked it up.

"That'll be Pamela," he said as he opened the text message. At the counter, Sam perked up while Dean tried not to visibly deflate. It was fine. Sam needed this and it would be fine. "She says come anytime."

Sam beamed and turned towards his brother, who did his very best not to tense up at the sudden attention.

"So… we do anything on Mondays?"

Chapter Break

They spent the rest of the morning discussing what Sam was going to tell Pamela concerning the history of his power. With Missouri, she'd known their father, knew what had happened to their mother. It had seemed like a logical next step to tell her about the demon blood. Sam trusted her with that secret.

He didn't know Pamela. They'd already had one hunter try to take them out because of his abilities. Sam didn't want word of their true source getting around, or they'd find themselves with a lot more than just one hunter after them.

"She won't appreciate us bringing her into our shit," Dean answered honestly when his younger brother had looked his way imploringly. "But she's good people. You can trust her, Sammy."

Bobby had seconded that, vouching for the psychic. "But it's your decision, son. I'm sure Pamela would say so too."

Sam had gone to bed that night – after a day of good meals, a movie with his brother to 'christen the Dean Cave', and an evening spent doing so, so many dishes – still thinking it over. The next morning he went for a run on the path Dean had shown him, sticking with the river well past the point of the pedestrian bridge they'd used, before eventually turning around.

It really was a good running route. Great for clearing his head. By the time he got back to the bunker, he'd settled on keeping the demon blood quiet for now. He wanted to see how Pamela worked with his powers before she knew their origin.

Sam trotted down the main staircase of the bunker, sweaty from his run and looking forward to a shower. He was just pulling his earbuds out when Dean came into the war room from the kitchen, mug in hand, dead guy robe on, clearly having only woken up so many minutes ago and having his first coffee of the morning. He was already shaking his head at Sam's state.

"You freak," Dean said with a large grin on his face. Then he whistled and Sarge came running into the room, tongue out. He circled the older Winchester once before spotting the younger. Or, more accurately, Sam's sweat-slicked legs, covered in tasty salt. "Next time, take the mutt."

“I will,” Sam responded with genuine enthusiasm, bending over to give Sarge’s fur a good ruffling even as the dog obsessively licked his shins clean. When he looked up, Dean was watching the pair of them over the rim of his mug. Sam couldn’t help himself. “You cook up any new buffets while I was out?”

Dean snorted, managing not to take his coffee up the nose as he did, and glared at the kid. “No. Baby can serve himself a bowl of cereal if he’s hungry.”

“Shame,” Sam answered, but his grin was ear to ear. Sarge, contented with his human salt-lick, wandered back into the library, most likely headed to the kitchen. Sam straightened. “I was thinking I’d, uh, hop in the shower and then pack up.”

He could see some of the humor leave his brother’s eyes, but Dean stowed whatever disappointment he was feeling and nodded. “Yeah, sure. Which car you planning on taking?”

Sam’s brow furled at the question. He hadn’t realized there were options. Sure, he’d seen the garage that came with the bunker and its impressive car collection. It just hadn’t occurred to him that he could take one.

“Hadn’t actually thought about it,” he said with a shrug. With the Salvage Yard gone, Sam had figured cars wouldn’t be as easy to come by without added risk. He’d already accepted the limitation when Dean dropped him off at Missouri’s and he’d had to steal a car to get to to the djinn in time.

Transportation was a good idea, though, especially if he was going to join Dean on hunts more regularly. And if Dean was suggesting the bunker resources… it was probably safe to take him up on it.

“I’ll have a look,” Sam finally answered with a smile, excited at the prospect. He wasn’t much of a car guy – nothing like Dean was – but the idea of having his own vehicle was exciting.

“If you want my input,” the man from the future started, but never finished. Sarge suddenly barked from the other room and then came running into the war room moments before a loud banging, reminiscent of an annoyed knock, sounded from the main bunker door.

“What the-” Dean blinked up at the top railing and the door beyond. He looked back at Sam, brow furled. “We expecting anyone?”

Sam shook his head, equally surprised.

“The proximity alarms should have gone off,” Dean muttered as he put his mug down and headed for the main control panel.

“You got them working?” Sam asked, joining him at the console. Dean had bitched to him during his first tour about how hard it was going to be to get them up again.

“What?” Dean’s head snapped towards Sam, his hands pausing on the controls, which were lit but unresponsive. “Yeah, Frank got the place set up weeks ago.”

It was Sam’s turn to frown, but a repeat knock interrupted them, louder this time. So Sam shrugged at his brother and headed for the staircase.

“Wait,” Dean ordered, holding up a single finger. Sam paused on the first step, but Dean had already spun and was heading for the library. He jogged up the steps and disappeared, only to return a moment later with a gun. Sam looked surprised.

“Did you… did you stash a gun in the library?” he asked incredulously. Though, really, he shouldn’t be surprised. It was a smart move. It didn’t inspire much confidence in that whole ‘impenetrable bunker’ thing, however.

“Didn’t have to,” Dean answered as the two started up the staircase. With a gesture from Sam, Sarge stayed below, watching intently. “Men of Letters did it for us.”

There had been a gun holster installed under the table nearest the war room. Dean had discovered it accidentally, after knocking a pile of research papers onto the ground and, grumbling, ending up on all fours to pick the mess up. It had been an antiquated revolver tucked in there, so they switched it for a handgun, both in his time and this one, but the idea had been all MOL. Dean just agreed whole-heartedly with the precaution.

As they approached the door in tandem, the knock sounded for the third time. If a follow-up knock could be bitchy, this one most definitely was. Sam positioned himself in front of the door, ready to turn the wheel, while Dean stood to the side, gun raised. With a nod from his brother, Sam opened the door.

“About damn time,” a man complained from the other side, sounding entirely put upon. Sam, who couldn't see the individual, watched Dean's face go from stone-cold-hunter to surprised– no, confused– back to surprised– and then he lowered the gun.

"Frank?" Dean asked as Sammy opened the door the rest of the way. "What the hell are you doing here?"

Frank Devereaux stood in the doorway of the bunker, several duffle bags slung over his shoulders and hips. His eyebrows were up near his receding hairline and there was annoyance behind his thick glasses. Sam glanced over at Dean, unfamiliar with the person in front of them but familiar with the name. He'd been mentioned in that same conversation as the proximity alert on their first day in the bunker.

"Uh, you called me, chuckleheads? Unless there's another Bobby Singer living in a different abandoned power plant in Lebanon, Kansas." He didn't sound too pleased about any of that – grumpy as all get out – and pushed past the two brothers without another word. Sam gave a startled look to his brother, who just rolled his eyes and sarcastically gestured for the man to come on in.

By the time they followed him down the stairs, he was dropping his bags on the war room table and having a conversation with the dog, which made about as much logical sense as talking to a dog did in the first place. Sam sent his brother a strained look, glancing between the crazy man standing in the equivalent of their foyer, talking to Sarge, and his brother who'd apparently invited him. But Dean wasn't looking his way. He was staring at Frank with a glazed over look.

"Interesting place you boys have got here," Frank said as he walked the room in a circuit, fiddling with the occasional control board or readout. He turned back to the two Winchesters. "Now, who the hell are you and why am I here?"

"Uh," Sam once again glanced between his brother and the newcomer, but Dean looked wholly out of it, no longer paying attention. "I'm Sam. This is my brother, Dean."

As the younger Winchester awkwardly made introductions, Dean's head spun. Frank had already been here. He'd fixed the bunker up, got them back to almost fully functioning. Sure, he was no Charlie Bradbury, but he'd done enough to get the bunker functioning.

Only no, he hadn't. Because that had been in a dream.

Dean felt unstable, like the ground beneath him wasn't solid and gravity wasn't behaving. He couldn't remember what was real, what had happened and hadn't. By force of will alone, Dean kept it together; he locked his knees and fisted his hands. Frank Devereaux was a paranoid old bastard; if he picked up on anything he didn't like, he wouldn't help them.

Except he already had helped them. The work was done; it had been done. Why couldn't it just stay done?

The man from the future closed his eyes and breathed through it. Breathed through the spinning, the panic rising in his chest as he questioned his own reality. Three sets of memories so overlapped it was getting difficult to remember which was this time, which had happened before, and which had been nothing but a fantasy.

Some of those memories were so real, so believable, that Dean ached for them. But they weren't.

Why couldn't some of it just stay real?

"Dean?"

He opened his eyes and gave Sam a reassuring nod. Yeah, his head was a mess and his heart was beating way faster than it had any right to, but he'd figure it out. He was fine. Just as soon as the floor returned beneath his feet, reality quit being so wibbly wobbly about the edges, and his inner child stopped throwing a temper tantrum about how none of this was fucking fair.

One break. Was one break too much to ask?

"We, uh," Dean cleared his throat as he addressed Frank, crossing his arms over his chest, "we need you to patch the place up. This bunker, it's, uh, well, old."

"No shit, Sherlock." Frank looked over his shoulder at the half-century old control panel. He pushed his glasses back up his face. "Why? What's this place do?"

"Monitors supernatural activity," Sam cut in. "But it shut down back in the fifties and hasn't been touched since."

Frank eyed the younger Winchester with narrowed eyes. "How'd you two bozos find it?"

“Watch it,” Dean growled, and Frank raised his hands. “Call it family inheritance.”

An unexpected call out – “Frank, you old bastard!” – interrupted them and all three men turned as Bobby came down the steps from the library. Their guest looked like he couldn’t decide whether to return the greeting or pull a gun. Bobby stuck out his hand and, after a moment of grumbling hesitation, Frank shook it.

“What have you got me into this time, you old hat?”

Bobby took over from there, sweeping Frank off for a tour and working the old Bobby charm. Which was pretty much just gruffly telling someone how it was and what they were going to do. Sam and Dean followed several paces behind.

“You alright?” Sam questioned softly as they trailed behind the two. The brothers were more of a second thought at that point and happy to remain that way while Bobby talked the paranoid security expert into helping them.

“No.” Dean didn’t bother sugarcoating it. He’d spent two days in a world where the bunker had been fully set up, almost back to her 2016 glory, for weeks. In reality, they’d only found her a couple weeks ago. Sam had been gone for half that and Dean, before he’d gone off to hunt a djinn, had only just started setting the place up. He knew shit about computers, so he’d focused on upping the warding. Now he had to do it all again. “Fucking djinn.”

His brother offered a sympathetic smile but didn’t ask for more and Dean didn’t volunteer. Instead the older Winchester increased their pace, catching up to Bobby as he led Frank to the bunker’s control room. The ache in Dean’s chest was quickly turning to anger.

“Let’s just get this done.”

Chapter Break

“No can do.”

“What do you mean, ‘no can do’?”

“I mean no, I can’t do it.” Frank enunciated each word sharply, looking at the three of them through those thick black glasses, like they were the idiots.

He’d been there less than an hour. Time in which Sam chose to remain in the bunker, hyper aware of Dean’s current instability (in turn, Dean was hyper aware of Sam’s awareness and it was annoying). Now the three of them stood in the bunker's mainframe, staring at Frank who sat in a pile of wires, unscrewed metal panels, and his own tools.

“I mean, look how old this is.” He lifted up a cylindrical glass tube reminiscent of a lightbulb, but not any lightbulb they’d ever seen. “What even is this?”

Dean, who’d gotten tired of Frank’s grumbling half an hour ago, shrugged casually and hazarded a guess, “It’s a… you know… doodad.”

The paranoid security expert looked real unimpressed with him. “I can’t do it. I won’t.”

Bobby shifted, adjusting his ballcap. “You owe me, Frank.”

The man in question stood up with an energy that could only be described as fidgety. He looked taken aback, then frustrated, and settled for indignant. “Guy saves your life one time and, what, you owe him the rest of yours?”

“That’s usually how it works,” Dean piped up, leaning against the wall with arms crossed. He raised them in surrender when Frank spun on him with a look.

“Frank,” Bobby tried again, eyebrows up and imploring. “This is important.”

Devereaux sighed, actually looking contrite. “Look, even if I wanted to – which I don’t – this is the friggin’ stone age of computers here. It would take… weeks, minimum, and I don’t have that kind of availability in my schedule. Hell, I’m not even sure what you’re asking for is even possible.”

“It is,” Dean interrupted cooly.

Frank turned back to him, eyes huge behind his glasses. “Oh, yeah? And you know that how? Mr. I-don’t-even-know-what-a-vacuum-tube-is?"

Dean pulled his head back, glaring. "You didn't know what it was either."

"Did too," Frank retorted, looking like a petulant toddler as he pointed at the older Winchester, vacuum tube still clutched in hand. "I was testing you."

Sam cleared his throat, catching Dean's eye and giving him the gentlest version of Bitchface #9 ('You're really bad at this'). The man from the future took a deep breath, which he knew was all that would keep him from punching Frank in the face if this kept up. When he opened his eyes again, his expression had smoothed out into something more serious. And possibly more dangerous, too. "I've seen it done before."

"Well then get whoever that was to do it," Frank said, head swaying side to side, hands on his hips. "Cuz this ain't happening. Not with me, at least."

Chapter Break

That was that. Frank was gone within the hour. Dean couldn't believe he'd just… turned them down. This was the supernatural technological quest of the century. Who the hell wouldn't want in on that?

As Bobby escorted the paranoid security expert out of the bunker, Dean stewed in the library, nearly boiling over with frustration.

It had never occurred to him that Frank might say no. Of course, him having said yes and been successful in a dream version of all this was just salt in the wound at this point. He'd underestimated the work Charlie had done for them; it had taken days – weeks for some of it – but his favorite little redhead and just turned that into time she got to spend with the Winchesters, talking cases and hanging out. Dean lacked the proper perspective to realize just how much work fixing up the bunker's systems had actually been. She'd done it because it had been a Quest: a challenge that combined her expertise and talents with her yearning for adventure and something more. That had been her jam, and she'd talked about how cool it was for weeks.

Frank was no Charlie. He was a guy used to getting paid for his services. Even with all the treasures of the newly-acquired bunker – several of which they'd tried to ply him with – they still couldn't afford the bill for a project this big. Dean had been really banking on that nerd quest factor. He just didn't realize it until now.

"Who did it in your timeline?"

Dean looked up at Sam's question. His kid brother was leaning against one of the library tables, ankles and arms crossed. He raised an innocent eyebrow at Dean's stare, and the older Winchester sighed.

"Charlie Bradbury."

Sam waited a beat for more information to follow before raising the other eyebrow. "And Charlie Bradbury would be…"

"Someone we get killed, Sam," Dean snapped, knowing even as he did that it was uncalled for. But he didn't care because, "We're not bringing her in."

It hurt, saying it out loud. Charlie had been one of his best friends. A kid sister. Somebody good who honestly cared about him. He was loath to lose that this time around, to never have Charlie Bradbury in his life. Their lives. But his mind was made up.

He could already hear her yelling at him through time, how all she'd wanted was adventure and he damn well better not be taking that away from her in some misguided act of chivalry ('Men!') But he couldn't do it. They couldn't be the reason she died again. His heart couldn't take that twice in one lifetime.

"Okay." Sam already had his hands up in surrender, recognizing Dean's anger as the fear it was. Whoever this Charlie was, she'd been important to him. He looked around the bunker; their problem remained unsolved. "What do we do instead?"

Dean sighed, hanging his head and scrubbing a hand through his hair. He didn't know. Sam had taken a look when they'd first moved in, but there hadn't been much he could do. He got internet access up and going, but that was about his limit in this situation. The old computers had baffled him and the internet hadn't been much of a guide once they realized the ancient machines had been modified supernaturally, in ways neither the Winchesters or Bobby (or anyone on the internet, apparently) had ever seen.

Which left them back at square one. But that wasn't Sammy's problem.

"Nothing," Dean ended up saying, shaking his head as he leaned against the bookshelf across from Sam. "We aren't doing anything. You are going off for your psychic training."

Sam immediately protested, but Dean had made his mind up on this too. It was something Sammy said he needed, so Dean was gonna make sure he got it.

"Come on, your next Jedi Master is waiting," he said, cutting through Sam's arguments. The fact that it was enough to silence his protests spoke to the younger Winchester's desire to go. It stung, but Dean told himself to grow up. Sam was allowed to have other people in his life, damnit, and he would learn to deal with that. "Bobby and I will figure this out."

"Gee," the old hunter said, trudging up the steps to the library to join the two boys. "Thanks for volunteering me."

"Think the world you're looking for is 'voluntold,'" Dean supplied helpfully. "Future lingo."

"Boy, they've been using that since the 70's," Bobby harrumphed, looking entirely unimpressed. Dean pulled his head back.

"Seriously? Huh." Dean made a face but shrugged. "Learn something new everyday. But I mean it, Sam. Get outta here."

The younger Winchester gave another token protest, but his heart wasn't in it. He was excited to visit another psychic, to explore more of his powers and himself. But leaving wasn't easy, either. Especially with Dean off-kilter, djinn-dream so easily re-triggered. Reluctantly, Sam nodded, trying to convey his confliction in his eyes as he looked at his brother.

"Call me," he insisted sternly, holding Dean's gaze even as green eyes turned guilty. "I mean it."

It was Dean's turn to hesitantly nod, but he held his brother's gaze. "I will."

Chapter Break

And that, too, was that. Sam grabbed his duffle of meager belongings, exchanged a hug with Dean and Bobby in the garage, gave Sarge a thorough ear scritching, and left.

"Can't believe he picked the Indie," Dean scoffed as Sam drove out of the bunker garage. "Sam. On a motorcycle. Who does he think he is, Arnie?"

Beside him, Bobby snorted, watching the younger Winchester disappear beyond the bunker entrance. He turned to eye Dean, gauging how he was handling his brother leaving. Outwardly, he looked fine. Bobby knew otherwise. But the kid was holding it together admirably, and the old hunter trusted him to work through it.

Maybe not healthily, but Dean would see himself through.

"Well, come on," he groused, nudging the older Winchester, who looked at him questioningly. Bobby turned back into the bunker, heading for the room that held the ancient mainframe. "We got work to do."

End Chapter

Chapter End Notes

Author's Notes: And that wraps our first Season 3 Arc! Now for the good stuff: Season 3 Plot!

Bunker location: My editors flagged that the bunker was further out of town than a walk/run would allow. However, I can't find anything to support either argument. The bunker is next to a river (which does not exist in Lebanon - the closest thing being a creek, which is too far out of town for a walk/run in, but also not nearly big enough to offer the flow a power plant would pull from). It's said in one episode that the Oak Park Retirement Home is 15 min from the bunker, but they don't specify if it's located in Lebanon (there is no retirement home in the real Lebanon, it's a town of 170 people and takes about two minutes to drive from one side of town to the other 😂 The nearest actual retirement home is 30 min away from Lebanon - I suppose the bunker could be 15 min out of town, and the nearest retirement home is 15 min from that…) There is a power plant in Red Cloud, the next town north of Lebanon. It's a slightly bigger town, and that power plant is right on the edge of it. Given the episode where Jack is in town making friends on what seems to be a main drag downtown, the writers are visualizing Lebanon as a bigger town than the real one. Since there's no clear answer and some liberties appear to be taken, I'll hop on that bandwagon 😁 I really like the idea of Sam being able to run along the river and to a farmers market (which I also picture set up on the edge of town, but I've only ever lived in cities where it's setup in a parking lot, alley, or closed down street so) so I'm going to stick with what I have here. But please know that it is at least somewhat suspect and a completely unsupported head canon. Thank you to Lyeundu for flagging and Forestpelt for seconding as a possible issue! I have good editors 😁

Up Next: Sam's off to meet the fabulous Pamela Barnes and he likes what he sees, Dean's got some bunker visitors who bring good news (and not so good news, too), and Evil Baddies are up to their Evil Baddie ways!

Next Posting: Well, crap, guys. The next chapter isn't actually finished 😅 I have fallen so far behind because RL has been crazy for the last two months. I'm on a two week road trip now (which, by the time I get back home, will be the 5th weekend in a row away. My dogs aren't even gonna know me by the time I'm back 😅) However, that two week road trip is largely down time at my parents house, dogsitting for them while they're away. I have all my fingers and my toes crossed (it's kinda painful, actually…) that I'll get some good writing time in!

So, next chapter may be up in two weeks, or we may have a small posting delay. I'm sorry Season 3 has been off to such a rocky start! I believe it'll shape up soon, though. We've slogged through the completely unplanned romantic identity crisis and resulting emotional chatter. That was always going to trip me up; I'm just an action girl at heart. The good news is, Season 3 Plot is up-n-coming! And we've got so much to cover and some really fun things planned. Once the Muse realizes we're through the slow stuff (which SHE caused, thank you very much), she should circle back around and kick it into gear.

For progress updates, check in on Discord, Tumblr, or my profile on AO3. Thanks for hanging in there, everyone!

Cheers,
Silence

UPDATE - 11/23/2025:
I was really hoping to get a chapter up this weekend, but then I realized that we're entering a new arc, and it's a fast-pased one. So I don't want to post a chapter if I can't post the following one a week later.

I'm back at writing and excited about this arc, so hopefully I'll bang a couple chapters out and then I can post weekly for a while. But I don't want to start posting until I know I can do that. Sorry everyone, but thank you for your patience!

Cheers,
Silence

Chapter 154: Season 3: Chapter 13

Chapter Notes

A/N's: okay, so we are officially getting complicated now. Welcome to the start of arcs within arcs

Last Time on the The Road So Far (tta): Sam left the bunker on Dorthy's Indy, on his way to Pamela Barnes for some more psychic training.

Chapter References: There's no direct references in this chapter, but Persephone and the Bind, Lilith and Azazel and the Hellgate in Arizona, and Sam reaching his brother in the djinn dream are all brought up. If any of that causes "??" to flash in your head, then Andy is trying to remind you about A Shortcut to the Road So Far (tta), newly updated and available if you need a quick refresher. It's linked to this story and should be the next one in the collection.

Chapter Warnings: Now we get into the season 3 plot stuff! Muuuwahahahaha!! Bad Guys are bad-guying, Sam's padawaning, and Pamela is being her best self.

Actual Chapter Warnings: Lilith is topside and needs a vessel. We're going to dive, without much detail, into how that happens. TRIGGER WARNING: a child is kidnapped and harmed (off screen) in this chapter

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 3: Chapter 13

"Right this way, little Miss," Azazel said as he guided the young girl through the high-end hotel where Lilith was waiting. The little thing was a good fit. Eight years old, well groomed, dressed to impress, and gullible enough to believe he was some sort of talent scout. According to her non-stop chatter, she was a child beauty pageant contestant. She'd won Little Miss Arizona last year and was very confident about this year's chances.

"Mama is gonna be so impressed," she said as they exited the elevator on the top floor. Her young voice was a parody of her mother's words, full of pride and dangerous levels of confidence. Lilith was going to love her; she was perfect. "She's always telling me to keep an eye out for talent scouts. That's how you get the big gigs."

"Well, she was quite wise not to teach you about stranger danger," Azazel said blatantly, grinning at this child's poor luck and even poorer self-preservation skills. "How else would you become famous?"

"I know," the child said lightly, tossing her blonde curls over her shoulder. "Winners take chances. Losers play it safe."

"That they do," the yellow-eyed demon said as he opened the penthouse door and held it for the little miss, who strutted right through. Azazel's eyes slipped yellow as he followed behind, closing and locking the hotel door.

Chapter Break

When Sam climbed off the motorcycle two hours later, he had to not-so-subtly adjust himself several times and stretch his poor abductor muscles before he could stand normally. The bike had been fun for the first thirty or so minutes. By the hour mark he'd been sore. By the time he arrived at Pamela Barnes' address, he was filled with regret. He probably could have used a couple of smaller trips first before roadtripping on the bike.

It had been worth it for the expression on Dean's face as he drove out of the garage, though.

There was still a bow-legged wobble in Sam's step as he walked up the front stairs of the psychic's home. Once again, the door opened before he could knock and he was greeted with a head of dark hair, gorgeous eyes twinkling with mischief, and a wide, full smile that lit up her whole face.

"You must be Sam Winchester," Pamela said, smile quickly becoming an ear-to-ear grin. She gave him a once over, taking her time to soak up the tall drink of water standing on her front porch. "Well, aren't you gorgeous? Bobby told me you would be, but I see he left out some of the finer details."

Sam fought the sudden blush that threatened to turn him into a tomato. He cleared his throat, offering a hand in greeting. "Bobby said, uh, what about me, now?"

"I'm paraphrasing," Pamela laughed, ignoring his hand as she went in for a hug. She had to raise onto tiptoe to reach one arm around his shoulders, even with him bending over to accommodate. Her other arm wrapped around his waist, and she took the opportunity to grab a handful of that fine tush on the way. "Though he wasn't kidding about that ass. Just as firm as it looks."

With a wink and a cackle, The psychic turned on her heel and walked back into the house, gesturing for him to follow. Sam - stuttering through surprise, amusement, and embarrassment - was still trying to figure out the proper response. (Was there a proper response in this scenario? Dean would have one. Sheesh, no wonder he'd had his patented, this-is-a-joke-from-the-future-the-other-you-would-get grin on his face when Sam first brought up Pamela Barnes.) Wondering just what he was getting himself into, Sam followed.

"So, Bobby said you've recently discovered some latent psychic ability?" Pamela asked as she led him through the house, glancing over her shoulder as she spoke. They ended up in the kitchen, a small but homey space filled with a lot of personality. "Want something to drink? Beer?"

"Oh, uh, sure."

Sam awkwardly looked around the kitchen, hands in his pockets for lack of anything better to do with them. Pamela opened the fridge and bent over to rifle through it. The younger Winchester's eyes went with her, landing completely unintentionally on her butt. And lingered. There was a calligraphic tattoo just above the waistline of her jeans, in the soft dip of her lower back. A tramp stamp, Sam's mind supplied, unhelpfully.

Jessie Forever.

"Sit," Pamela said, startling Sam out of his… observations. Lucky for him, she was still in the fridge, flapping a hand behind her as she grabbed two beers, the bottlenecks clinking. Slightly mortified and fighting back yet another blush, Sam quickly slid into one of the two chairs at the small kitchenette table. A moment and two bottlecaps later, an open beer was placed in front of him. At the other end was a wicked grin and knowing eyes.

She'd done it on purpose, Sam realized, cheeks aflame all over again.

Pamela slid into her own seat, eyes twinkling with mischief and amusement. After a pull from her beer, she licked her lips and launched into the real reason they were sitting at her table. "So, tell me about these abilities."

Sam cleared his his throat (and hopefully his head as well). "They, uh, they started two years ago. Dreams only, at first. Death premonitions, usually of people I didn't know, though, uh… they were usually connected to me somehow in the end. Eventually I got them when I was awake, too."

They'd talked about it earlier that day – Sam and Dean and Bobby – how much of the story he should tell her. Sam had been hesitant to share the full truth, but he would if they thought he should. In the end, Dean had been the one to suggest telling her everything but the demon part. No blood and no Yellow Eyes. No need to scare Pamela beyond what she was comfortable getting herself into, and no reason to drag her into that part of it, either. So, Sam had spent the drive spinning a careful story of truth, lying only by omission.

"They were more like attacks, though," he continued. Across from him, Pamela listened raptly. Although her charm and warmth never lessened (Sam had a feeling that was just who she was), it was obvious from the steel in her eyes that he had her full and sober attention. "I could never control when they came or what I saw. Sometimes we were early enough to save them. My brother, Dean, and me. But most of the time…"

He shook his head and Pamela reached over to lay her hand on top of his. She offered a comforting squeezeand, with a smile – that was only a little self-deprecating – Sam pushed those thoughts away and continued, "All that changed a month ago, though. Something happened – something, uh, traumatic – and now it's like…"

"You unlocked something?" Pamela offered with a smile, small but knowing. "Opened a door, and now you can't keep it closed."

"I don't want to," Sam said immediately. "This – what these powers are – they're a part of me. I need to learn how to control-" he paused, remembering Missouri's words and shook his head, rewording it. "I want to be able to use them… without them using me. If that makes sense."

"Oh, absolutely." Pamela leaned forwards conspiratorially, folding her arms on the table. "Every psychic is different but, in my experience, we all have the same thing in common. We can't ignore that part of us, no matter how hard we try. It's like having a third arm; you'll find yourself using it without conscious thought, like it's natural. Because it is."

Sam wasn't so sure how natural his powers were, but he knew what the psychic meant. What he could do, those abilities weren't a weapon meant to be wielded, that could be put away when the battle was over. They were a part of him – they were him – now, and he had to learn how to coexist with them and the rest of the world.

(Or maybe just Dean, to start with. His brother was a big enough challange alone.)

"Now," Pamela continued, smile growing, "we gotta bulk that new arm up. Get it used to doing some heavy lifting. You're right that control isn't the way to go about it, but I'm confident we can get you comfortable with your abilities."

"Yeah?" Sam asked, hesitant but hopeful. The psychic nodded with utter confidence.

"Mindset is more than half the battle," she said, leaning back in her chair. "And it sounds like you're on the right track. Now we just gotta loosen you up. Prove to yourself that those powers aren't something to fear."

Sam started as he realized she'd pinned it in one. He was afraid of developing these powers. It no longer scared him that they existed, not even how strong they'd gotten, but their potential still did. Sam couldn't let go of the path they might lead him down if he let them.

Or if Azazel forced him.

That fear was very likely holding him back; the moment he thought it, he knew it was true. Sam didn't have a clue how to overcome it, but he wanted this – he wanted the freedom to use his powers without that fear – which meant he had to face it.

Swallowing roughly, the young psychic nodded. It was not going to be an easy road, he figured, but there was a wave of relief already loosening his muscles. “That sounds good.”

“Great!” Pamela tapped the tabletop with manicured fingernails before standing. “Let’s get started.”

Surprised, Sam straightened up almost immediately. “Right now?”

“No time like the present,” Pamela quoted as she put a kettle on the stove, turning the burner on high. She leaned against the counter, legs crossed at the ankles, smile just a little bit wicked. “Let’s see what you’ve got, Sam Winchester.”

Chapter Break

Hell’s Princess twirled in her new body, pretty pink dress flaring out with each spin. She clicked her shiny black shoes and admired her youthful skin and full curls in the hotel’s penthouse mirror.

“Oh, Azazel, she’s perfect,” Lilith said with a wide, toothy grin. This new model was positively delightful. The last girl – the one she’d been sent to Hell wearing – was soooo last millenia. “Wherever did you find her?”

“The mall,” Azazel answered lazily. Finding a child had not been difficult. Lilith would be quite pleased to know that human children these days wandered off with strangers all the time. The stories of old, warning children against the dangers of the world, had been long abandoned in favor of shiny baubles and popularity contests. “We need to discuss the plan, Lilith.”

She hummed in agreement, but continued admiring her new body. The yellow-eyed demon reigned in his impatience.

“I need to check in on things,” he began, loudly and with extra emphasis, not that either fazed Hell’s Princess. “Sam will have to be put back on the blood, he’s gone too long without it. All but the long-term effects will have worn off by now.”

Lilith hummed again, leaning into the mirror and baring her pretty white teeth. She turned side to side, then pulled at her hair and adjusted the bow sitting perfectly atop her head.

“Tom hasn’t reported in, so he’s probably dead,” Azazel continued, now grinding his teeth and trying to keep it out of his tone. “We still need to deal with the Winchester’s angel-” that would have to be Lilith’s priority while he checked in on young Sam- “and you need to meet with Crowley. He confirmed the contract is signed and in his possession. You should insist he hand it over, for safe keeping.”

Lucifer’s first born finally stopped preening in her new form and switched to preening about her foresight. She turned from the mirror with a haughty pout. “And aren’t we lucky for that, Azazel? Your plan backfired spectacularly! If I hadn’t been ready with a backup plan, Persephone would have royally screwed us!”

Hell’s top general tried very, very hard not to react in any way. Reports of the Battle Royale had been sketchy at best, but their most recent spies had returned with unconfirmed rumors of an intact Righteous soul and a successful Golmagen Bind. What they did know for certain was that Sam had walked away unscathed, Persephone was on the lam and, as far as they could uncover, Dean Winchester’s soul remained untouched.

It was… not ideal.

“Persephone binding with the boy before his death is unfortunate.” Azazel managed to keep his voice level and borrowed body relaxed. While he didn’t agree – he’d had his own backup plans in place should everything go to crap – it would do no good to let Hell’s Princess get to him. He would have to spend the next several hours – possibly days – listening to her gloat. “However, the golmagen’s purpose is not wasted. She’ll protect him. Not even Heaven will be able to touch Lucifer’s true vessel. Not without going through her.”

“Or chucking her back in the ground,” Lilith responded sweetly, but her tone promised awful things for whoever next interfered with their plans.

“Even better.” Azazel’s eyes slipped into their cloudy, yellow form, giving his expression a sick and twisted air. “Sam’s soul will remain tied to his body, with no recourse but to say yes to Lucifer. And if Heaven doesn’t throw her into a hole, she’ll convince Sam to serve as a vessel when the time comes. She’ll have to, if it means saving his life.”

Lilith’s wicked grin matched her general’s.

She did a little hop-skip towards him, brushed floppy curls over one shoulder, and clasped her hands in front of her sparkly dress. "I want to meet her."

"Fine," the yellow-eyed demon said with a defeated sigh. "Then, we kill the angel."

Hell's Princess let out a very unladylike snort. "How? No one knows how to kill an angel."

"Then we capture her and find a way," Azazel rephrased through clenched teeth. "We can't risk sending her back to Heaven. For whatever reason, she's helping the Winchesters but hasn't reported her actions to Heaven, or we would know about it. She's gone rogue."

"A lone angel will be easier to handle than one with friends," Lilith responded, sing-songy.

Azazel knew that, despite her airy tone, Lucifer's First knew better than to take the angel's interference lightly. Lilith would play ball and deal with the angel, once Azazel came up with a plan to capture the winged nuisance.

"Well, now that I'm properly dressed," Lilith changed topics with a twirl, face lit by a childish grin, "I should check in on the troops. And you-" she waggled a finger Azazel's way- "find our wayward vessel and his homewrecking golmagen."

Chapter Break

They sat on the rug-covered floor of Pamela's living room, a well-lit room filled floor to ceiling with plants, crystals and occult craft, dreamcatchers and macramé. As Sam looked around – there was a lot to look at – Pamela handed him one of the two mugs of tea she'd brought from the kitchen. Sam took it obligingly, watching steam curl off the top.

Pamela had already started sipping hers, watching him over the rim with those big hazel eyes, as the hunter took a small whiff. "It's not, uh….?"

The psychic cracked a wide smile and laughed. "Hippie tea? Not so much. Just some herbs good at calming nerves, relaxing the mind and body alike. It's all natural, psychedelic-free. Scout's honor."

Relieved, Sam nodded and took a sip. It was earthy, a touch bitter, but the young hunter didn't mind. There was a flowery aftertaste he didn't care for, but it wasn't too terrible.

"Now, if you want something stronger…" Pamela trailed off with an impish grin. "There are a couple of less legal options I may have on hand, if you're interested in experimenting-"

"No," Sam declined quickly, already shaking his head. "I'd rather not, um… use anything that affects inhibitions."

Pamela's smile turned softer, her eyes too knowing. "How long have you been sober?"

Sam raised an eyebrow, but he figured the answer must be obvious. He was just glad she hadn't asked his poison of choice. "Not long enough."

The psychic across from him merely nodded and went back to sipping her tea. "We'll avoid any of the experimental stuff. Stick to the tea. Now, drink and tell me about the last vision you had on purpose."

So they drank while Sam talked about seeing his older brother, cruising along in the Impala with a friend. He told her it ended up being a dream, which Sam hadn't realized at the time, but he was sure Dean had heard him, at least a little. Sam was determined to make contact while in a dream, he just didn't know how.

"Yet," Pamela tagged on with a grin, finishing the last of her mug. She rolled her shoulders, cracked her neck, and stretched her arms out in front of her, hands clasped together. "Alright, let's do this. You said meditation helps you enter the dream state. Let's pick someone for you to focus on and get meditating!"

Sam couldn't help but grin along with her enthusiasm. He did feel looser, surely a byproduct of the drink, which he finished and set aside. He crossed his legs, scooting a little closer to Pamela and she did the same. They formed a small, two-person circle on Pamela's woven rug, knees almost touching, a soft current of air running through the room, a peaceful silence broken only by the soft windchime tinkling somewhere outside. It felt right.

Sam felt calm. Confident.

“Dean,” he called his brother’s name softly, already closing his eyes. Why mess with what had already worked once, right? Plus, Dean was easily the person Sam was closest to on the planet, so he was a safe bet and a good place to start.

He probably wouldn’t freak out too badly when he found Sam poking around inside his head. Probably.

“Take your time,” Pamela instructed just as softly, like the calm voice of a guided meditation. “Pay close attention to everything you feel, and not just once a connection is made. Scan your body continuously. Can you spot the moment you slip into an altered state? Look for the smallest of differences.”

Sam nodded, though his eyes remained closed. He was already deepening his breathing, expanding his awareness. He was getting better – more confident and quicker – at this step, opening his mind and body to a world beyond the material.

‘Dean,’ he thought, not quite a mantra but a call. He let go of the last hold he had on brute awareness. It was no longer Dean but brother. Protector. The one who raised me. Friend, confidant, savior, love and safety. He stopped searching for a person and started looking for what his brother was to him.

For a moment, Sam thought he’d done it. There was a sensation of traveling away from his body, leaving Pamela’s house, street, city, even the state behind. He was somewhere else, following a call as familiar as breathing. The journey came with no visuals, just the sensation – a knowing in the dark – that led him ever closer to what Sam knew was his brother.

But then there was nothing. Like leaving a sensory world – colors, emotions, life all around him – and entering a black void. An empty bubble in the middle of a country full of people, and his brother’s trail led right into it. Cautious, Sam got as close as he could to the void, raising his hand against the emptiness and finding it solid. It wasn’t a black hole, it was a wall. An invisible barrier. Like a force field, Sam realized, only a supernatural version.

“Warding,” he whispered. The feel of his lips pursing, of sound carried away on a breath, was enough to ground him once more and Sam snapped back to the physical plane, reeling from the abrupt retreat.

“Easy,” Pamela was there, a hand on either one of his knees, soft voice guiding him back to safety. "You're alright."

"I'm good," Sam confirmed as soon as he was able. The snap back was always disorienting. He needed to learn how to ease out of a vision rather than get his ass kicked out of one plane and back to the other.

Pamela patted his knee twice before pulling back. "You said something about warding?"

Sam opened his eyes and blinked at the darkening room around them. The sun was setting outside and he frowned. "How long was I-"

"Twenty, maybe thirty minutes," Pamela answered easily, standing to grab the two mugs. "I'm going to make more tea. You gather your thoughts. Think about the last moment before the vision ended."

"It never started," Sam said, climbing to his feet as well and following her. He needed to stretch his long legs anyway. Sam braced himself against her kitchen counter, crossing his arms over his chest as she filled the kettle at the sink. "You were right – I can feel when I make a connection, and this wasn't… that."

"Okay," she answered easily enough, setting the water on the stove to boil. "So what was it?"

"I…" Sam blew out a breath, jostling the hair around his face. "I'm not sure. It was like… I found Dean's trail."

"Trail?"

"Yeah, his… I don't know…" He sighed again, frustrated by the lack of words. Well, at least the lack of words that didn't sound stupid.

"There are no wrong statements here, Sam." Pamela leaned against the other side of the stove, observing him with sharp, but caring eyes. "Don't worry about sounding ridiculous. We're talking astral projection and dream walking, here."

The young hunter laughed, body losing some of the tension Sam hadn't realized was there. He dropped his arms back to his side. "Okay. It was… like a trail of Dean. Everything he is, everything he means to me. I focused on that and just… followed it."

Pamela hummed, pulling the kettle off as it started to whistle. Steam poured out alongside hot water as she refilled both mugs to the brim.

She handed one to Sam, curling her hands around her own and bringing it to her chest, soaking in the warmth. "And what did you find when you got to the end?"

"That's the thing," Sam grumbled, sipping at his drink and wincing. It was too hot to drink but, more than that, he'd forgotten that it was not an appealing taste. "I never found the end. I found… a wall."

"A wall?" A small frown overtook Pamela's face, perhaps the first expression Sam had seen that wasn't filled with life and joy and impishness.

"Yeah, a black void of… nothingness. I couldn't pass through it."

"But Dean's trail led to it?"

"More like… into it." Sam shook his head, trying to recall exactly how he'd felt. Had he done something wrong, something different from last time?

"You mentioned a ward while you were under."

The young hunter perked up. "I did?"

Pamela smiled and pushed off the counter, sweeping out of the kitchen and back towards the living room. Sam followed, tea in hand, sipping slowly as it started to cool down. The flavor didn't improve, but he could already feel the relaxing effects of the herbs.

"Does Dean use personal warding?" The psychic settled back onto the rug and Sam followed suit.

"I mean, yeah, but that didn't stop me last time," Sam thought aloud. He didn't think it was the warding on his brother's ribs, put there by Cas, that he'd encountered. It was… bigger than that. His eyes widened with realization. "The bunker. Where we're staying. It's warded."

Better than any other place in the country, Dean had said. That… that felt right. The size of the void he'd encountered, the solidity of it. Of course he wasn't able to follow, Dean was in the bunker right now!

"That's got to be it," Sam reasoned, confidence growing and excitement alongside it. "There was never a connection, but I was on the right track. I was close; I could feel it."

Pamela smiled, wide and proud. “That’s a great place to start. But, if you’re up for trying again-”

“I am,” Sam replied quickly.

“-then we’ll need to find you a new target,” Pamela finished, already grinning at the man’s eagerness. Sam smiled sheepishly and the psychic genuinely enjoyed his boyish embarrassment. He was quite the cutie pie.

(And not at all hard on the eyes, if she did say so, herself.)

That shy grin shifted into thought as Sam realized she was right; he couldn’t search for Dean or Bobby. Maybe that was why he’d failed to establish a connection to them at Missouri’s. Not until Dean had left the bunker.

Who else could he go looking for?

“Persephone.” The name came to his lips entirely unbidden and, as much as he wanted to be surprised, Sam really wasn’t. She’d crossed his mind more than once (a lot more, if he was honest) since bringing him back from the brink of death.

Pamela raised one manicured eyebrow questioningly, and Sam swallowed. How to explain Persephone? He hadn’t come up with a cover story for her on his ride over.

“She’s, uh, someone I’ve had a vision of before,” he managed at the last second, mouth taking over where his brain drew up short. He knew it sounded stilted – not entirely true – but he didn’t know how else to explain having a connection to the goddess of the dead. “Maybe that will make finding her again easier? And she won’t be in the bunker.”

That was for sure.

“A woman, hmm?” Pamela replied, grin downright pouty. “Well, there go my chances of a fun evening.”

If Sam had been drinking the tea by his side, he would have spit it all over himself at the implication. His cheeks were on fire.

“Not like that,” the hunter said quickly. Too quickly, if Pamela’s slowly widening grin said anything. Sam winced, trying to put the shovel down before he dug himself any deeper. “I don’t really know her."

She'd only reconnected his soul to his body, was all.

"But I've had a vision of her while awake, before." The ziggurat, in Gomorrah, when Azazel first found her. Of course, he was pretty sure Persephone wasn't the one he'd been 'spying' on with that vision. Sam was fairly certain the yellow-eyed demon had been the target his mind sought out, his blood-connection with the bastard enhancing his visions.

But Sam wasn't going looking for Azazel, now or ever. That was one bear he had no interest in poking, no matter how it might expand, explain, or further his powers.

"Well, maybe it's my lucky night after all," Pamela announced in delight, waggling her eyebrows. `` Sam, whose cheeks had since recovered from their cherry red state, immediately relapsed. Pamela giggled. Straight up giggled, and it was the most auspicious, terrifying promise of possibilities Sam had ever heard.

"Alright." She waved away the sexual tension between them with nothing more complicated than a change in her posture, straightening out of a seductive lean. With one last wink, Pamela adopted a more businesslike demeanor. Sam wasn't sure if he should be disappointed or relieved. "Let's try reaching out to this female acquaintance, shall we?"

Sam, still blushing, licked his lips, cleared his throat, and tried to focus. He let his eyes close and slipped into a meditative state, focusing on Persephone.

She was harder to find than Dean. Sam didn't know anything about her. Finding his brother had almost come naturally; Dean felt like brotherhood, childhood nostalgia and a scattering of happy days. A parent, a friend, and a confidant walked into a bar. He was gleaming black metal, snark-covered caring, and rock music (Sam could hear his brother humming AC/DC in the back of his mind every time he went looking for him.)

Whenever he thought of Dean, those things popped up around him like a trail of breadcrumbs to follow. Although he'd not successfully found anyone else with his mind, Sam was pretty sure the process would be the same, no matter the target.

So what would Persephone feel like?

The youngest Winchester floundered for a long time and knew it. He tried looking for pomegranates, feeling for death or the dead, chasing after the smell of flowers, all while picturing the wild-haired, green-eyed woman he'd seen in a previous vision. Nothing caught, and Sam remained grounded in Pamela's living room.

He wasn't one to give up easily, though. He kept his eyes closed, continued the rhythmic, meditative breathing, and turned his focus further inward. He'd found her once without even trying – without even knowing he was doing it – and he knew he could find her again.

Sam's head twitched to the side, brain tripping over the thought. How did he know that? That he could find her? Because he did, with complete confidence. Which was odd. It wasn't so much a thought as a feeling; Sam knew he could – and would – find Persephone again. But why? And how?

Something shifted in the air around him. No, not the air. The plane. He'd shifted planes, he could feel it. Like a change of temperature or maybe air pressure. Sam opened his eyes. The world around him was an out of focus blur of colors, but not so much that he couldn't identify objects. Shelves, a table, a pile of books. And next to them, feet up on the table, book in her lap, was Persephone.

Sam breathed out, body thrumming with accomplishment. He'd done it.

Focus, he redirected himself quickly, calming his heart and letting his mind settle into the space he found himself in. A library, he realized, as it came into focus. His vision remained fuzzy at the edges, soft like a dream, but he could see the area around the goddess more clearly. The library was dark save for a lantern glowing on the study table. The pile of books were all on history – History of the World (Pt. II), Modern American History, A History of Technology in the Modern Era – and Sam could see, as he neared, that the one that she was reading covered the Industrial Revolution. The goddess herself – in a pair of black leggings and a band t-shirt advertising The Aquabats, whatever that was – had leaned back in the library chair until it only had two legs on the ground, rocking slightly against the table as she scanned the pages in her lap.

She looked… comfortable. Unguarded. Almost at home in the space, Sam would say.

"Are you…" The young Winchester looked around, from the camping lantern to the goddess, to the library he found himself standing in during the middle of the night. "Are you squatting in a library?"

The question, incredulous yet amused, brought him back to Persephone, only to find her eyes – now glowing that fierce green – locked directly on him.

Sam reared back in surprise, straight into Pamela's living room. He opened his eyes to find the ceiling directly above him, the floor beneath his back. He'd been kicked out of the dream and knocked – quite literally – on his ass.

But his grin was ear to ear.

"I did it," he said breathlessly, sitting up with a hand from Pamela. "I saw her."

"What did it feel like?" the psychic asked from his side, still steadying him. "Were you able to tell when you connected?"

"Yeah," Sam affirmed on an exhale, high on his success and breathing heavily. "It was… I don't know, I could tell when I wasn't here anymore."

Pamela nodded like she could relate, and she probably could.

"I wasn't there for long," Sam continued, grin still on his face. He wasn't sure what had kicked him out – maybe his surprise at Persephone knowing he was there – but he felt exhilarated. "I think I can find it again."

"Whoa, there, stud." Pamela patted his chest from where she sat at his side. "Love the enthusiasm, but I think that's a good start for tonight."

Sam blinked, thinking 'Night?', even as he realized the living room was now completely dark, save for a handful of pillar candles lit about the room. There was more light from the adjoining kitchen, but outside the windows the world was pitch black.

"How long-"

"Significantly longer," Pamela replied with a huff of laughter. "I'm calling it."

Sam immediately apologized, quickly forfeiting any argument.

Regardless of whether or not he wanted to go again, he knew he shouldn't. His psychic host deserved to get some sleep in her own home at a semi-normal hour. Besides, he could already feel it coming on: the adrenaline crash, the developing headache. If he went again, he'd be pushing up against lines he swore he wouldn't cross.

Best to save that for an emergency.

"No need to apologize, gorgeous. You made great progress." Pamela stood with him, ensuring he was stable before backing off. She'd thought twice about it, though, given the adorable blush dusting his cheeks once more. Pamela didn't usually go for the bashful types, but Sam Winchester was rapidly changing her mind. So, instead, she gave that fine ass a playful tap. "We can jump right back into it tomorrow, bright and early."

The young hunter jumped again, bright red and Pamela cackled. She gathered their empty mugs and headed for the kitchen while Sam followed like a lost, embarrassed puppy who didn't know what to do with his hands. The psychic dropped the cups off in the sink and swept right back out of the kitchen, snagging Sam by the arm as she did.

"Let's get you the tour: abridged version." She led him through the rest of the first floor, back through the front hallway that served as something of a foyer, and up the stairs. Pamela pointed out the bathroom, a linen closet where he could grab towels, before stopping at the first open door. "You can sleep in here."

Sam ducked his head in, taking in the modest guest room that was better than most of the places he'd stayed throughout his life. His duffel bag of clothes was already on the bed, waiting for him.

Pamela's hand settled on his lower back, just low enough to light a fire low in his gut and warm his face again. Sam swallowed thickly.

"I took the liberty while you were practicing," she explained of the bag. When he looked back at her, that hand quite purposefully slid along the waistline of his pants to his hip. She offered a playful wink. "Hope you don't mind."

"N-not at all."

Sam had to clear his throat, voice almost squeaking in a way that was so utterly humiliating. God, it had been a minute, hadn't it? He hadn't flirted – or been flirted with – since Jess. The thought was sombering and he looked away. Pamela must have sensed the shift; her hand fell to her side. She rallied a softer smile, still somehow impish. It promised a world of trouble that Sam found himself desperately wanting.

"Well, that one's my room." Pamela gestured to the next door down, just a few feet away. "If you need anything – and I do mean anything – come on in."

Sam choked as she swayed closer, words whispered like they were sharing a secret (that secret being how much Sam wasn't against this idea, at all, if the growing tightness in his jeans had anything to say about it. And she'd know, wouldn't she, considering she'd just casually brushed up against said region.)

The woman gleefully turned and sauntered away, already pulling her shirt up and over her head. Sam watched, jaw metaphorically on the floor (he hadn't actually moved in the last thirty seconds; he was frozen in place and had been since he realized what was on the table, here) as Pamela disappeared into her room and left the door wide open behind her.

He really shouldn't. Sam knew he shouldn't. He was here to learn. To master his powers and prepare to fight an apocalypse. Anything else was a distraction.

But that firebrand of a woman – that open, willing, gorgeous woman – and her open door were calling.

Sam licked his lips, fisted and un-fisted his hands, glanced once more into that empty, cold guest room, then back down the hall. Pamela had turned on a light, filling the doorway with a soft, warm, beckoning light. It had been so long. What could one night hurt? He'd focus on the apocalypse tomorrow.

Telling himself that, Sam followed after Pamela, quietly closing the bedroom door after him.

Chapter Break

Azazel was inordinately pleased to find Sam's mind open and available when he went looking. Whatever he had been using to shield himself previously – and Yellow Eyes' bet was on a charmed object – the young Winchester had either lost it or foolishly discarded it.

Sam's mind was a calm and pleasant environment as Azazel stepped into it. The darkness was warm with satisfaction, soft around the edges with complacency. Wherever Sam was (and whatever he'd been doing before dozing off) had left him quite pleased with himself. A slow grin overtook Azazel's face as the world around him started to take shape.

"That's my boy," he whispered into the retreating darkness, leaving behind a dimly lit bedroom. Sam was asleep, curled around a depression in the bed that no doubt held a lover in the waking world. Azazel walked right up to his sleeping child, running a possessive hand through bed-ridden hair. "Time to wake up, Sammy."

Hazel eyes opened slowly, cloudy with sleep and a deep sense of comfort. Both quickly dissipated as his gaze focused and realization replaced lazy searching. Sam gasped, scrambling away from the demon's touch and right off the other side of the bed.

"You," he hissed scathingly, breathing hard and staring at Yellow Eyes with wide-eyed shock.

But not panic, the demon noticed. How interesting. Either Sam was getting better at hiding it, or he was genuinely less afraid. As if the human could hear his thoughts, Sam straightened, chin up and shoulders back, physically readying himself to resist.

'Well,' Azazel thought, clicking his tongue disapprovingly, 'That just won't do.'

The demon ran a hand along the depression in the mattress where Sam had lain. It was still warm with body heat. Slowly, Azazel let the grin stretch across his face, locking eyes with his favorite kiddo, before launching himself unexpectedly forward. Sam staggered back in a mix of shock and fear, raising his fists instincticely. But the yellow-eyed demon had only jumped onto the bed, settling in the depression Sam had left behind like a lazy, well-fed cat. He settled against the headboard, hands in his lap, legs crossed at the ankle. He relocked eyes with the young human, that slow and twisted smile spreading once more across his face.

Sam lowered his arms, fisted hands curling tighter. "What do you want?"

Azazel breathed in deeply as though to answer, only to let his gaze wander down the length of Sam and up the length of the mattress. There was another depression beside him, and he reached out a hand to run the length of it with a pleased hum.

"Hmmm, still warm," he stage whispered, maintaining an unsettling amount of eye contact. "Who's the lucky lady, Sammy? Is it that cute blonde thing? What was her name?" He took a moment to think, dramatically so, before perking back up like he'd found the answer. "Oh, right, Jessica."

A vein in Sam's jaw jumped. "You made me a deal, Azazel."

The demon leaned over, pressing close to the sheets and inhaling deeply. "No, this is someone new." He straightened up, delighted. "Is it love? Oh, it would be so convenient if it was love. I could use a new worm on my hook, Sammy."

"It's Sam!"

Rage flashed in the boy's eyes before Azazel found himself flying violently off the bed and tomahawking to the floor. Spitting carpet fibers out of his mouth, the demon picked his head up off the ground, grinning ear to ear.

Now that was something! He bounced to his feet with a boisterous laugh and loud clap.

"You've been using your powers!"

Sam startled back another several feet. The hunter was slowly but surely backing himself into a corner and Azazel took advantage of it, rounding the bed and closing the distance between them.

"Good! But you'll need more than that to get rid of me, kiddo. You're bone dry, aren't you?"

Sam stopped. He straightened, resolve settling over him like a cloak. He raised his hand, fingers spread wide, telegraphing his next move. "I don't need it."

This time when Sam pushed, Azazel pushed back. The kid was strong – stronger than ever – but he was practically nothing to a Prince of Hell. Not yet, anyway. It was time to remind the hunter of that. To remind him of his place.

He sent Sam flying back, crashing into the dresser just behind him. Azazel lunged forward, across the bed in the blink of an eye, and grabbed the boy by the throat. He pushed, grip tightening, until Sam was bent backwards over the top of the dresser, gasping for breath, head pressed to the wall. Azazel leaned in, smelling along Sam's neck. The man reeked of fear.

"That's better," he purred into the boy's ear, delighting in the goosebumps that crawled across his flesh. The demon pulled back to look his kid in the eye. There was murder there, a real thirst for blood that left Azazel so proud. "You wanna kill me, Tiger? Good. I'll let you. I told you before, let me bulk you up. Let me teach you how to use those powers, and I'll stand there and let you kill me with 'em."

His grip was too tight for Sam to speak, but there was still defiance in his eyes. So Azazel dug his fingers in until he could smell blood, could feel it beneath his nails and watch it drip down Sam's neck.

"But not." Azazel gave a little squeeze "Before." And another. "You're ready."

With a final, punishing reminder of his strength compared to the human's, he shoved off the boy and stepped back. Sam tried to straighten up, tried to speak, but only managed a wrecked cough. The hunter grabbed at his throat, hacking against his abused windpipe.

"Sam!"

A cry echoed through the air, faint and faraway to Azazel, but Sam's head turned, chasing after it. A shift in light, a source that hadn't been there before, drew both demon and human gazes to the space between them. There was a soft purple glow wrapped around Sam's forearm like a handprint. It started to brighten and pulsate.

Sam's eyes widened just as Azazel realized what was happening. He raised his mental shields as the kid raised his arm, but it was too late. The wave of psychic power hit him like a wrecking ball to the chest.

The Prince of Hell was thrown back into his body and he toppled over with a jolt of shock. Azazel picked himself up off the hotel floor in a hurricane of furious motion. How dare one of his kids throw him out! The gall, the disrespect, the-

The power.

His rage shifted erratically to pride. Damn if he hadn't bet on the right racehorse with that one. Sam Winchester was an absolute pain in his ass, but it truly would be a thing of beauty when the demon finally broke him.

Assessing himself with a far calmer demeanor, Azazel dusted off his black shirt and adjusted his band collar, which had become askew.

“Well,” he announced to the empty room around him, smiling with a mouth full of shark’s teeth. “Looks like an in-person visit just got added to the agenda.”

Chapter End

Chapter End Notes

Author’s Notes: Aaaaand we’re back! Hopefully for a decent stretch. My 2026 resolution is to get a structured routine back in place. I haven’t actually had one since covid, and it shows in these long breaks in the story.

Sam and Pamela: I always liked what an open flirt Pamela was. I imagined her to be very sex-positive, not one to be tied down (at least, not after Jesse ;) While this will not be a main paring in the story, it was one I couldn’t see not happening once Sam showed up alone. Plus, that boy deserves some happiness and stress relief!

Next Up: I wouldn’t want to spoil anything, but we’re about to have ourselves a very fun, action-packed little arc.

When, Silence? The goal of the most recent break was to ensure that answer would be “Soon!” and “Consistently!” And it will be, with one exception. I am going to try and get the next chapter up next week, but I’m actually going to be at the Supernatural Convention in Las Vegas that weekend. I have no clue if I’ll have time or energy left to post, but I will be aiming to!

If anyone else will be there and wants to do a little get together or something, reach out to me on Tumblr or the Discord server!

Cheers,
Silence

Chapter 155: Season 3: Chapter 14

Chapter Notes

Author's Notes: Oof, getting this one up this weekend was a labor of love. I came down with a cold (alongside being in Vegas, what fun), compounded by truly horrific allergies (I'm apparently allergic to sin). I'm talking wrecked, so a big thank you to my editors, who hopped on today to get this chapter proofed.

Chapter Reference - Malachi: This time around, Uriel and Malachi, the Anarchist, teamed up and began recruiting other angels who wanted Lucifer to rise. When Castiel returned to heaven injured, Malachi assisted with a healing trance. See Chapter 55: Season 2 - Chapter 22 for a refresher.

OG Timeline Reference - Ishim: In episode 12x10 Lily Sunders Has Some Regrets, we learn that Castiel used to be part of an Earth-bound unit led by an angel named Ishim. If you haven't seen the episode, Ishim is a class A dick, but the short version is that he "fell in love" (cough became obsessed with cough) with a human named Lily. He later killed an angel in his unit, accusing him of sleeping with Lily and producing a Nephalim. Despite knowing it wasn't true, Ishim used it as a reason to kill Lily's daughter in front of her. I repeat: class A dick. Also, because Ishim will bring it up later, Castiel occupied a female vessel during that time.

Chapter Warnings: We are back on Cliffhanger row for a hot moment.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The Road So Far (This Time Around)

Season 3: Chapter 14

"Sam!" Pamela yelled for the umpteenth time since her bedmate's very visceral fear had waken her up in the early hours of morning. He was trapped in a nightmare and it had its claws dug in deep. She gave one of his broad, bare shoulders a hardy shake, but 'third time's the charm' was not the case here. Whatever dream had him ensnared, Pamela was starting to suspect it wasn't natural.

She tightened her grip on his forearm and closed her eyes with deep, measured breaths. If she couldn't wake him, perhaps she could help anchor him to the physical plane, guide him back to the waking world.

Focusing on only that, Pamela concentrated inward, feeling for her power and letting it flare around her. She'd never seen her own aura – one usually couldn't – but a friend once described it as hazy purple, dainty like a sweet pea but intense, just like the flower's powerful fragrance. It was fitting: her grandmother had always called her sweet pea. A psychic herself, she'd taken in an angry, lost teenager and taught her everything she knew.

Pamela harnessed that power now – focused on happy memories of warmth, comfort, food in her belly, a roof over her head, and a house full of love – and pushed it into the man beneath her hands. Pamela called for him, aloud and in her head. She could feel him, locked in a fight she couldn't see, but the moment she connected with him, Pamela could feel it. It was faint and far away, but it was evil. An evil seeking residence in Sam's heart.

It was… God, whatever it was, it was strong. A chill ran down Pamela's spine. It was the strongest evil she'd ever encountered, and all she was getting was castoff from Sam. What the hell was after the man?

Pamela knew the moment Sam sensed her presence. Beyond the confusion – shock, surprise, comfort, heartfelt gratitude – she felt the wave of warning coming off him before he latched onto her power and pulled. It was draining, more so than anything Pamela had ever done on her own before. Whatever Sam was fighting, it was strong and it would take the both of them to fend it off.

More than that, though… the way Sam could pull her power from her, so naturally as though it was his own…

Fine tremors were running through her as he siphoned her energy and Pamela realized just how powerful the man sleeping in her bed was. He looked so gentle, having settled onto his back, pinched brow the only sign of an ongoing battle.

Sam came to with little warning, surging upward with a battle cry. Luckily, Pamela knew better than to hover over someone waking from a nightmare and left him plenty of space. She released his arm once she was sure he was back. Sweating profusely and gulping for air like he'd run a marathon, sure, but back.

"Easy," the psychic whispered softly, rubbing calming circles across his back as the hunter got his breathing under control. When he reached out blindly, she grabbed onto his hand and held on. "It's okay, you're back."

His nose was bleeding, but he didn't seem to notice. At least, not at first. Once he did, Sam swore and tried to stem the blood without getting it on her sheets. Pamela wasn't worried, but she could see embarrassment and insecurity settling over him like a heavy shroud.

"Why don't you take a shower, shake off anything that might be lingering, and I'll put on some coffee." Before climbing off the mattress, she trailed her fingers from his back to his shoulder, offering comfort and a hint of normalcy. Then she slipped out of bed and crossed the room to grab a robe off the bathroom door. She waited until Sam had climbed to his feet, nodding wearily and heading her way, before leaning in for a quick peck on the cheek.. "We can talk about it if you want, or we can drink coffee in silence and brood. Whatever you need, gorgeous."

She snuck another firm squeeze of his posterior and Sam blushed, which helped bring color back to more than just his cheeks, and even laughed as the last of the nightmare sloughed off of him. He looked visibly relieved at what she was doing. With a grateful smile, Sam bent down and gave her something a lot better than a peck.

Pamela giggled after he pulled away. She tried not to grin too much, though. While it wasn't the wrong time – she was offering comfort to someone scared and unsettled – Sam was still openly bleeding and had clearly just gone through his own bout of hell. Pamela supposed some decorum was expected. She wasn't exactly known for restraint but for Sam Winchester, she'd do her best.

With one last wink and a smile that Sam soaked up like sunshine, she spun on her heel and headed downstairs to make that coffee.

Chapter Break

The bathroom was cold and grey, the pale blue light of dawn had chased away any warmth in the room. Sam shivered, trying to ignore the cool tile beneath his feet or the porcelain under his hands. His fingers curled over the edge of the sink as he stared into the mirror hanging above it. He looked terrible. His face was drawn and haggard, the circles under his eyes looked more like bruises, and his neck was smeared with his own blood.

Sam hissed as he tilted his head to the side, turning into the mirror to see four sharp crescent cuts dribbling blood down his skin. There was a fifth on the other side and the fact that they were all still bleeding indicated just how hard Azazel had been crushing his throat.

His hands trembled beneath him and his fingers tightened on the porcelain. The fear was palpable: a foul taste on his tongue that left a hollow, swirling pit in his stomach. And with it, a desperate need to be stronger, to feel safer.

'I need it.'

Sam shuddered. Rage quickly replaced fear, and the young psychic slammed his fist down on the sink's edge. "No!"

He didn't need it. He didn't.

Sam hung his head between his shoulders and tried to breathe through the want. It ebbed, ever so slightly, and he opened his eyes. There was a fissure running over the curve of the sink, and Sam followed it along the porcelain and back to its source: his fist, still planted in the porcelain. With a quick breath in, Sam lifted his hand to reveal a spiderweb of cracks, several fractured pieces of porcelain now loose.

He cracked the sink. Sam blinked, startled, and looked his hand over. No damage. His hand didn't even hurt.

"I don't need it," Sam whispered, this time assuredly, and curled his hand back into a fist. He pressed that fist to his chest, holding it close. A lifeline for when he felt alone in the dark.

'Demon blood don't add to you.' Azazel's words, not his. 'You're bone dry, kiddo.'

Those razor thin fissures were all the proof he needed. He'd done that all on his own. No demon blood powering him up, no life-or-death survival situation. He was bone dry, and he'd still done that.

“I don’t need it,” he repeated, firmer this time, making it a declaration rather than a realization. Sam met his own eyes in the mirror and told himself, “I don’t need it.”

Chapter Break

Pamela had a fresh pot of coffee brewed and a couple day-old pastries crisping up in the toaster oven when Sam made it downstairs. He’d taken her up on that shower – hair wet and clothes fresh – and she was glad to see that he seemed lighter. The hunter slid into the other seat at her small table and she pushed a mug of coffee his way. True to her word, they sat in silence, sipping from their cups in the early morning stillness.

Eventually, Sam set his mug down and took a measured breath. “So, um… thanks.”

“For waking you up? Or the fantastic sex before all that?”

Sam choked on nothing then broke into a coughing fit that he tried to stifle as quickly as possible. He could feel the heat in his cheeks, could see it reflected in the mischievous sparkle in her eye. Sam tried to school his expression, cool off his cheeks and dispel the sense of adolescent embarrassment.

“Uh… so, um. Yeah, last night- last night was great.” His smile was genuine – it had been really good – even if he found himself a bundle of nerves totally unprepared to be having the morning-after conversation. “I, um, I’m not usually the, uh…”

“Wow,” Pamela cut in, shaking her head sympathetically, but she couldn’t stop grinning. “Not much of a one-night-stand guy, are you?”

Sam was once again blushing, but he was getting more comfortable with her provocative candor. Smiling sheepishly, he shook his head. “No, not at all. That would be my brother. I’m more of the, uh…”

“Emotional connection type?” Pamela guessed, leaning her chin onto her fist with a brilliant smile. Sam’s cheeks were the most adorable shade of red and she couldn’t get enough.

“Yeah, that,” he agreed, proud of it but clearly struggling with a prejudice he'd clearly learned growing up. Still, his shoulders were more relaxed than when he'd first sat down and he was starting to look more like the man that had shown up on her doorstep yesterday. "I am crashing and burning spectacularly, here, but, uh, I guess… I'm asking what your expectations are for this?"

He gestured between them and, taking pity on him, Pamela reached out to wrap her hand over his, stopping him. "I'm not going to run out and get your name tramp-stamped on my body anytime soon, if that's what you're worried about."

She winked just to keep those cheeks dusted and he laughed unexpectedly. Pamela loved that smile on him, loved how he tried to fight it off. As if she wasn't flirting spectacularly with him (successfully, she might add).

Patting his hand twice, she added, "Don't worry, gorgeous, I'm not the ring and joint-filing type."

Sam laughed again, fully relaxing into his seat. Pleased, Pamela pulled back.

"I get it – you're a proper gentleman. Tell you what. My door will always be open the next time you want to spend an evening with a lady who is anything but proper."

"Oh, I remember," Sam replied a conspiratorial grin, lessened only slightly by just how tomato-red his cheeks still were.

"Seriously, the blushing. I can't get over it," Pamela said with a giggle, chin back in her hand. Eyes sparkling with mischief, she said, "Maybe I will keep you."

Sam picked up his mug to take a sip, covering his own quirked lips. "At least till tax season."

Pamela broke into peals of laughter and Sam realized with a start that he had finally stopped thinking about Azazel. The fear had settled to a dull, white noise in the back of his head that he knew he could deal with. He felt good – good about himself – which had seemed impossible twenty minutes ago.

Sam smiled into his cup. He found himself genuinely liking this woman. She was charming, both captivating and oh-so devious. A rare mix of confidence and caring that left Sam warm in a way hadn't been for a long time. It was nice, feeling it again.

That smile faded as reality settled back in like a thick blanket. She deserved to know what was really going on. He needed to tell her.

(He should probably mention the cracked sink, too.)

"So, what should we get up to today?" Pamela set her tea down, back to business without so much as a transition, and yet it wasn't awkward at all. "I was thinking about your Soul Sight-"

"My what?" Sam interrupted, pulled back into the conversation by the phrase he didn't recognize.

"Your other vision, the one where you can see souls? Seemed like as good a name as any." She shrugged the rename off with a flowy hand gesture. "I want to know more about it. You said it was the ability you could tap into the easiest. Let's explore that, see if we can learn something from it that could help navigate your other powers."

"That's, uh…" Sam trailed off into a weak chuckle. "That's a good name for it. And yeah, totally, we should do that. But first, I, um… I want to talk about what happened. In the- in my dream."

She deserved the truth. She'd offered up her own psychic power, letting Sam siphon it off to escape. However unknowingly, she'd exposed herself to a Prince of Hell. That deserved a proper explanation.

"Oh," Pamela leaned back with a surprised blink and a slow smile. Sam knew she wanted to know and he appreciated that she hadn't asked. "Alright, I'm all ears. Talk to me."

"His name's Azazel," Sam started, voice rough. "He's a demon and… he has a plan for me. Me and my brother."

Chapter Break

"This is a clusterfuck!" Zachariah shouted, bringing his meaty fist down on the desk in front of him. He locked his eyes – across all four faces – on the angel standing in his office. "You hear me, Naomi? A fucking clusterfuck."

"Calm down," Naomi said firmly, a hint of disdain shimmering through her grace like a dark shadow swimming through clear waters. She clasped her hands in front of her, eyeing the report laid out on the other angel's desk. It was not good news.

"Calm down?" Zachariah screeched, his faces blotchy red with anger. "Why in Hell's name should I? Did you read the report?" He gestured wildly at the papers on his desk. "Dean Winchester's soul may still be intact! Hell was supposed to make their move weeks ago. What the hell!"

"Yes, their delay is… unfortunate." Naomi pursed her lips, staring unhappily at the Enochian typed neatly across the pages. "My network reports a rise in chatter concerning the End of Times."

Zachariah's lion head roared as his primary face spun towards her. No one was supposed to be chatting about the End Times because no one was supposed to know they were coming up! He threw his arms out impatiently. "And?"

The other angel offered him an impatient look herself, darkening her grace with more swimming splotches. She let out a disappointed hum. "The majority of the Host anticipates a battle."

"When?" Zachariah foamed, his grace red and pudgy with barely contained bluster.

"I told you to calm down. The whispers have only just begun. No one is brave enough to speak about it publicly yet. We have time."

The Dominion swore, a flurry of motion and frustration. "No, it's too soon. What are they going to do, stand around in full armor with their thumbs up their butts? What's going to happen when they don't receive any orders?"

"I suspect the host will begin to question, but we can't know when because no one is talking. Yet," she answered almost flippantly, ignoring the other angel's dramatics. Naomi picked the report up off the desk and flipped through it, scanning words she'd already heard from Zachariah. The disdain across her grace might only be smudges, but there was nothing unclear about it in her voice when she said, "Your very public condemnation of Castiel has not helped."

Zachariah seethed beneath her scolding. They were equals; they both reported to Michael, as per their official titles. Not that either agreed with that statement beyond their shared duties.

“I told you. He generates loyalty in those around him, despite his… flaws.” She spat the word like it was a stain she wished to scrub off. “Uriel, on the other hand, did not. You accused the angel everyone likes without any proof. The Host will continue to follow orders for now, but there are whispers that question your version of events.”

The shorter angel’s grace churned with reds – bright and fiery embarrassment muddling with chunky, deep-rooted anger – as he spun on her. “They’ll follow orders and believe what I tell them to believe, or they’ll face me.”

Naomi looked at her companion, barely containing her contempt. How cute, thinking he was the power that kept the Host in order. If any angel actually stepped out of line, she would be the one to put them back into their proper place.

Chapter Break

Swift footsteps echoed off stone and faded into the inky void of stars, galaxies, and nebulae that orbited Heaven in a timeless cycle. Beneath that sky, an angel made his way quickly down a rarely used garden path. Heaven had many gardens – too many to count – which is what made them particularly good places to meet in secret.

Malachi leveled unimpressed eyes on the last angel to enter the quiet grotto, long forgotten beneath curtains of ivy unlike any found on the earth below. The angel dipped his head in contrition and tucked himself among the others that stood about the round space. Malachi made his way to the center of the room, stepping atop a small platform of stone. He drew their attention as one, silencing all conversation.

“Brothers,” Malachi began, arms folded in front of him, voice and grace as monotone and blank as ever. “The death of Uriel was a tragedy to us all.”

A murmur of agreement – the expected expressions of grief or outrage – moved through the angels.

“However,” the anarchist continued, raising his voice. The whispers fell silent. He turned slowly, taking in each of his brothers in turn with a piercing gaze. “It has also presented an opportunity. One that should not be squandered."

There were nods, sounds of approval, a general shifting of grace among the crowd.

"The angel, Castiel, our brother's murderer," Malachi called out, his very tone denouncing the missing angel. There was a flare of anger throughout the room, calls for vengeance and grace swirling with outrage. Malachi sneered in agreement. "Reports say he has taken shelter with humans. Uriel believed these humans to be the True Vessels."

A hush swept through the enraged crowd, washing over the cavernous space like a physical presence. The gathered angels exchanged looks, whispered words of the prophesized End.

"My contact on Earth has looked into the matter and believes the Michael Sword has failed to make a Righteous Deal," he continued once the crowd had settled. He looked at the angels surrounding him, some recruited by Uriel, others by himself. They had both had the same desire – no matter Malachi's personal opinion of the brute, may his grace rest in peace – the return and rise of Lucifer. If Dean Winchester did not make a deal, would not spill blood in Hell and break the First Seal, then that desire would never come to fruition. The anarchist angel let his eagerness – his malevolent glee – shine through his grace in the form of a wicked grin. "Perhaps, he could use some… encouragement."

A wave of approval swept through the other angels and Malachi's grin only grew.

"It is time," he announced, "for Heaven – for us – to join this battle. It is time for each of us," here he paused, catching and holding the gaze of each of his brothers, "to choose a side."

"For the Morning Star!" someone yelled, the others immediately taking up the call.

"For Lucifer," Malachi agreed, though any such devotion was non-existent. He didn't care whether Lucifer won the battle for Heaven or fell to Michael's blade, just so long as it meant chaos. However, his brethren were simply easier to cajole when given a rallying cry. So Malachi obliged, raising his fist in a salute. "For our brother."

Stepping off the raised stone to cheers, Malachi turned to the angel closest to him, one who he actually trusted. "Get the word to Ishim.

Kill Sam Winchester and make sure his brother is there to witness it."

Chapter Break

"Wow." Pamela took a moment, blinking slowly as she processed, before she shook her head. "Yeah, that's- wow, Sam. That's a real shitshow you waltzed right through my front door, mister."

The younger Winchester couldn't help but deflate, even though he knew it was the normal response, the sane response. Still. It bothered him more than he was expecting, being called Sam once more and not gorgeous.

Worse, he was a mister, now.

Sam offered an apologetic grimace. "I know, and I'm so sorry. We didn't think anything would follow me here, or I never would have come."

"We?"

Sam paused at the unexpected interruption. Pamela was staring at him, eyebrows up, less angry than he'd been anticipating. "Uh… yeah, Dean and me. We talked about it before I headed out. He didn't think you'd be in danger or I never would have come."

"He the expert?" Pamela was downright calm, voice back to that teasing tone she fell into so easily.

Sam huffed, shoulders twitching with a restrained chuckle. "Something like that. Look, Pamela, I'm sorry-"

"Yeah, I got it, you didn't mean to bring the shitstorm down on my house." Her words were harsh, but her tone was that of a realist tackling a new problem. She didn't have time for the things they couldn't change. "What's the likelihood this demon follows through?"

The young psychic took a moment to think it through – weighing this woman's life against the chances – before he shook his head. "Low. Unless something's changed, Azazel doesn't know how to find me. Even if he does come after us, we have time before he shows up."

"Right," Pamela interrupted, "because an angel carved sigils onto your ribs."

"But I can be packed and out of here in twenty minutes," Sam continued without acknowledging the interruption, finally getting to the point he'd been trying to make ever since he'd finished telling her about Hell's plan to end the world. "The risk isn't worth your life."

"A repeat performance of last night might be, though," Pamela said off-the-cuff, expression clearly weighing the risk on her life against the possibility of an encore. Sam choked mid-swallow, coughing to clear the unexpected blockage of embarrassment and his immediate response of, 'well, not no.' Pamela watched him closely, her expression once again serious as she searched his eyes for something. "And after you leave? Will he come after me, here?"

The younger Winchester didn't answer right away; this was Pamela's life they were discussing, it wasn't something Sam would be reckless with. Ultimately, though, he shook his head again. "No. He was just trying to scare me, get in my head."

Azazel wasn't going to waste his time on a one-time dalliance; he'd go after Sam himself, first. So long as Sam was long gone from Pamela's by the time Yellow Eyes found him, Pamela should stay off his radar.

"And did he?"

Deep in his thoughts, Sam startled at the question. Pamela was regarding him sharply once more and, again, the hunter took the time to ensure his response wasn't just a gut feeling. He was confident it wasn't; he knew Azazel too well at this point. Shaking his head firmly, Sam confidently replied, "No. That dream was… unsettling, but I'm not going to let him get under my skin."

Pamela's expression was slow to change, but as it did, a wide smile overtook her face. She sat back in her chair with an approving nod. "Well, alright then. Sounds like an encore might be on the menu after all."

Sam choked, having to beat back a second coughing fit caused by the audacious woman.

"But…" Pamela continued, grinning wickedly. She spread her hands out on the table, ready to get down to business. "Work before play, gorgeous. Let's talk Soul Sight."

Chapter Break

That night, Sam lay in bed, contentedly staring at the ceiling with a feeling of peace that he hadn't had in a long time. Pamela was curled up beside him, the curve of her back pressed to the length of his side, head pillowed on his arm. The rhythmic rise and fall of her body was a metronome of calmness, soothing frayed nerves.

It had been too long, Sam thought, since he'd felt this. He'd missed it. The hunter was under no illusion of longevity; tonight would be his last with Pamela (at least for now, he thought with an undercurrent of distant, pleased anticipation). She'd made it clear that she wasn't looking for commitment and Sam wasn't ready for a new relationship. But it was nice, holding someone again, feeling the warmth of another, the rise and fall of life within them. It was a certain sort of companionship he'd lacked these last two years.

He'd been okay without it; really, he had. Sam didn't see sex as the therapeutic outlet his brother did. It wasn't a necessity for him, either, unlike Dean. At least not with strangers. One-nighters had never done much for him, lacking the emotional component that came with a relationship.

God, he missed Jess. He missed that connection – sharing his life with someone – in more than just body.

Sam sighed, afterglow wilting under the new train of thought. He tried to push aside that particular negativity and focus on the soft body in his arms, the happiness that was this moment. Sam rolled onto his side, curling around Pamela and pulling tighter against his chest. She hummed her approval before sinking further into sleep.

He'd leave in the morning, Sam decided then and there. He didn't think Pamela was in danger, not yet, at least. Not if he left before Azazel came looking. That would take time, Sam knew, but holding her now, he didn't want to risk it. Risk her. d

Sam slid his arm from Pamela's waist to the five crescent-shaped scabs spread across his neck. Cas had told him, once, that if the demon wanted to hurt him in his dream, he could. Azazel couldn't get him hooked on demon blood, but he could still hurt him. Or others. Sam wrapped his arm back around Pamela, thumb rubbing circles on her soft skin.

He'd leave in the morning.

His thoughts, lingering on the cuts, drifted in a different direction. Sam had half expected them to be gone by now. The last time he'd been injured, it had healed overnight. During that fight with the djinn, he had definitely fractured his wrist, no matter what he'd told himself the next morning. It had been broken, to whatever extent, and he'd woken up to a fully healed arm, zero pain, zero break.

At the time, Sam had thought it could be his new powers, previously dormant. He hadn't met a special kid with the ability to heal, but it didn't seem farfetched, given the other extreme abilities he'd witnessed. Now, though, he wasn't so sure. A broken bone was a lot bigger than a couple of nail marks on skin. If he was capable of advanced healing, they would have been gone by now. Instead, they were progressing like any normal cut.

Which meant it hadn't been him doing the healing. Ergo, something else had healed him.

'I find you, and I heal you.'

"Persephone," he mumbled in the darkness. That's what the goddess had said when Sam agreed to the Bind between them.

Maybe…

Sam closed his eyes and deepened his breathing, heading towards a meditative state. He focused on the Greek deity. He'd found her once, already. Surely he could do it again.

Chapter Break

Persephone was waiting. She had positioned herself at the table beside hers (or, at least, the one she'd claimed as hers every night), ready to wait there for as long as it took. The golmagen had spent six thousand years trapped in a grave; she'd mastered infinite patience long ago.

She knew the moment he found her. Persephone couldn't see her charge, but she could sense his presence in the library when a moment ago she had been completely alone. Although he lacked a visible manifestation, there was a displacement in the space where she was sure he stood. Like a heat wave shimmering in the indistinct shape of a man.

"You're back," she said aloud, regarding the area that should vaguely be his face.

The shimmer shifted, flickering stronger for a moment before fading back to its indistinguishable blob of a human form. There was a burst of something on the air, warbled and faint and very far away. Persephone turned her head slightly, trying to catch whatever it was.

"Your connection is once again weak." She shook her head with a loud huff. "Stop half-assing this, Sam. You are keeping one foot in each location. If you are going to be here, then be here."

It took several moments, the shimmer of Sam's presence flickering into something more solid, only to dissolve once more. Eventually, he managed it. Sam stepped out of the veil of invisibility and into the library as a manifested, physical presence.

Persephone locked eyes with him, pride on her lips. "There you are."

"You can see me?"

She gave a single nod, pushing off the table to join him next to her things. "Now I can. Before you were like a hiding mouse. Timid. And squeaky." She made a face over it and her charge laughed. He looked around the library with new eyes. Persephone immediately spotted the cuts on his neck, focusing in on it like a shark on blood. "You're hurt."

Sam turned back to her, hand coming up to his throat. He rubbed at the crescent-shaped wounds before lowering his arm. With an expression that could only be described as challenging, he asked, "Are you going to heal me?"

Persephone gave him a look that vocalized her thoughts far better than words could. "I cannot do that through a dream, Sam."

"But you have before, haven't you?" He took a step forward, like he was searching for the answer physically as well as verbally. "In person, I mean?"

Her eyes dropped to his wrist unintentionally and he had his answer.

“We ward the motels we sleep in.” Sam spoke softly, like a secret he wasn’t sure he should be sharing but couldn’t stop himself. “Against pretty much everything. Demons, angels… and pagans.”

Ah. So that was what he was getting at. Persephone shrugged.

“There is very little warding that can keep me from fulfilling the Bind,” she replied easily enough, wondering if he would push the matter. Persephone would rather he didn’t, at least for now. “Besides, most warding is designed to keep out evil or those that would do harm. I am neither.”

“What are you?” he asked, tentative and cautious, even as he took another step closer.

Sam was very tall for a human – they had grown so much as a species – but the height difference was not intimidating. Persephone regarded him for a long time, weighing her answer. She could not lie to him, but she was not required to tell him the truth.

She had already admitted her identity to Dean, but he clearly had not told Sam. Which was entirely unexpected. It was hardly her business – Dean was not her charge and Persephone had little interest in what he did or didn’t do – but she was admittedly curious about this particular choice. Probably because it didn’t make much sense to her. Not that she was one to close an open door.

“A guardian,” she finally answered, wondering if he would accept such a broad answer.

Sam’s hazel eyes shifted a little more green. He didn’t know what to do with that answer, but it hadn’t been the one he wanted. He was so very easy to read. The golmagen knew he would be safer if he learned to hide his emotions, but seeing as it was currently making her job much easier, it was low on her list of priorities.

Persephone prepared herself for the next question, the one she didn’t want to answer but would ultimately have to. Sam would need to know, eventually, that Hell’s plan might have been sabotaged but she was still very much a part of it. Persephone had just been hoping to find out what exactly that plan was before having to tell Sam her role in it.

The question never came. Instead, Sam straightened unexpectedly, body going rigid as his gaze roved elsewhere. His appearance flickered; one foot reaching back to the physical plane. For a moment, Persephone wondered as to the change. What had made her charge feel the need to flee?

But then she felt it. A wave of dread washed over her seconds after it had obviously hit the hunter. Unlike him, though, Persephone immediately recognized it for what it was: a warning. Sam was still looking around, searching for the threat his psychic abilities were trying to show him, but Persephone knew it wasn't in the library. The threat to Sam wasn't in her head.

"Your physical form is in danger."

Sam turned back around, knowing she was right – knowing his body was the thing under threat – but struggling to conceptualize it. He flickered in and out again. The connection was weakening as his mind fought to return to its body.

Not fast enough, Persephone decided. She stepped into his space, planted her hands on his chest, and shoved. "Time to wake up."

Chapter Break

Sam woke violently. He'd been asleep on his side when Persephone shoved him, pushed backwards out of the dream and right off the mattress. He scrambled back up, legs tangled in a sheet, and locked eyes with Pamela. She was sitting bolt-upright, eyes wide, a look of fear on her face.

"Company," she whispered and Sam nodded.

"Yep," he agreed hurriedly, gripping the mattress and pulling himself to his feet, shoving the rest of the linen off with his one free foot. Sam grabbed his pants from the floor, hopping into them frantically.

"Stay here," he said in a rush, making it to the door about the same time he got his jeans buttoned. "Do you know any wards?"

Pamela nodded a little frantically herself, but she was already searching through the nightstand for something to write with.

"Put them up," Sam instructed before opening the bedroom door and darting into the hallway, speed over stealth. Whatever was on its way was bad – bad like a weight draped over his whole being – but it wasn't here yet.

The younger Winchester darted into his bedroom, digging through his duffle bag, withdrawing a knife and gun and tucking them into his waistline. He didn't know how Azazel had found them so fast – it shouldn't be possible – but he had to keep Pamela safe. Sam went back to the bag, rooting through clothes and beginning to get desperate when he finally found the small, cloth pouch.

"There you are," he said, fisting his hand protectively around the bag, sprinting back to Pamela's room. She was drawing wards on all four walls with a tube of lipstick. Sam hurried over to her, dumping the contents of the pouch into his hand.

"Anti-possession charms," he said quickly, keeping his voice as even as he could. Panic wasn't going to help in this situation. He watched as her eyes dilated, realizing who – or more accurately, what – was about to pay them a visit. But she kept a brave face, filled with the determination to survive. Sam pressed the charm into her hand, squeezing as she closed her fist around it. "It's going to be okay. Just hide."

"Sam-"

But the hunter was already shaking his head. "He's not here for you, Pamela, I'm the one he wants. I'll keep his attention on me. Stay hidden."

She looked like she wanted to argue, but he could also see how desperately she wanted to take the easy out and stay safe. Sam leaned in, kissing her cheek chastely and whispering in her ear, "Proper gentleman, remember? Now go."

He grabbed the bedroom door on his way out, starting to close it behind him. He caught sight of Pamela shaking herself out of her indecision and searching for a hiding spot. Sam closed the door, sending a silent prayer to a God his brother swore wasn't listening, and hit the stairs at a run.

If he could reach the kitchen, maybe he could salt himself in at the base of the stairs. Sam knew he wouldn't make it, but he had to try. The weight dragged over him now, clouding his senses with the strength of the warning. Whoever it was, it was bad and it was coming now. There was no way he would make it.

Sam was rounding the kitchen door when he heard wingbeats.

Chapter End

Chapter End Notes

Author's Notes: Remember that part where I mentioned things were getting complicated? Bad guy plans are now OVERLAPPING. I'm going to take a serious stab at being just a little less verbose before 20-page chapters become the new norm. 😶

Another heartfelt thank you to my editors for helping me get this one edited!

Soul Sight: Credit for the name of Sam's new vision ability goes to Lyeundu!

See you all next week (assuming I survive the Head Cold from Hell 😵)

Please drop by the Archive and comment to let the creator know if you enjoyed their work!